AT this time there were great factions at court, owing chiefly to the debauched and light behaviour of the Soltân: the depredations also of the Kosaks gave no small uneasiness, of whom complaint was made to the king of Poland for redress. In short, every thing looked with so gloomy an aspect, that nothing but the expectation of the good success of their army against the Persians could keep up their spirits. The grand Wazîr had now passed the Tigris with part of his forces, in order to besiege Bâghdâd; but the Pâshâ of Hâlep being sent with six thousand men to view the places, was defeated, with the loss of most of his troops, by two thousand Persians, going to reinforce the garrison of that city. However, the Wazîr having spent all September in making his approaches, and mounting eighteen pieces of cannon, in October, for twenty-five days continually, battered the curtain between two bastions. The breaches being made, and seemingly left undefended, on the 20th of November, the Spahis, supported by thirty thousand Janizaries, were ordered to give the assault: but as the ditch, which was wide and deep, had been covered with planks and green turf laid over them, to deceive the besiegers, on their crouding forward, the gallery fell under them, and swallowed up five or six thousand in an instant. At the same time there appeared fifteen thousand men at the breach, and on the bastions, where likewise there were four cannon, unknown to the Turks; who were so galled with the continual firing of the artillery and muskets, that the main body of the Spahis was quickly broken, their commanders killed, and at length the whole army routed. Two days after the Wazîr raised the siege, and marched towards Musol, pursued by eight thousand Persian horse, who cut off three thousand more of his men. However, he represented matters so much to his advantage at the Porte, that the Poles renewed the peace, and the Hungarians continued quiet.

Morâd thunderstruck.
A. D. 1631.

NEXT year the Wazîr made great preparations to renew the siege: but while the Soltân slept secure from enemies, he was in great danger of perishing by a natural evil: for in September, one night he was awakened by a terrible lightning, which entering his chamber, surrounded his bed, leaving several marks on the sheets and quilt. Morâd in a great fright got out of bed; but while he sought to hide himself, the flame passed under his arm, and burnt part of his shirt: this threw him into a swoon, which ever after much impaired the strength of his brain. However, he was so affected with the accident, that he dismissed many of his buffoons, and for some time abstained from wine¹.

Rebellion in Natolia.Hej. 1041.
A. D. 1631.

THE Turkish historians tells us, that the good success of the late Persian expedition was hindered chiefly by a fresh rebellion, which broke out in the borders of Persia: for Ilias Pâshâ, whom Morâd had made Beglerbeg of Arzerûm, in Abâza's room, following the example of his predecessor, throws off his obedience to the Soltân: but being taken in the year 1041, by Kyuchuk Mehemmed Pâshâ (S), and sent to the Porte, his head was stricken off in the public market place².

Sues for a peace.

ACCORDING to the Christian writers, there were two rebels up at the same time, one who seized on Prusa or Bursa, and Elias Pâshâ, who made himself master of Magnesia. There being besieged by the Beglerbeg of Anatolia, he was at length prevailed on to accept of terms; to which trusting, he went to Constantinople to receive his reward, and met with a halter.

The Spahis
mutiny.

A. D. 1632.

MEAN time the Wazîr wanting the necessary supplies, occasioned by his enemies at court, the Persians recovered all the fortresses they had lost the preceding year, with Illy (T), a considerable city, two days journey from Bâghdâd; where eight thousand Turks, left in garrison under three Beglerbegs, were cut in pieces, and vast quantities of stores taken. This made the Soltân think of peace, and send the Persian lord from his prison in the seven towers, as his ambassador to solicit it: at the same time he caused hostilities to cease, by calling home his army: and the Wazîr at his return was removed.

Morâd's
resentment.

BUT the new Wazîr, one of Morâd's brothers-in-law, did not long enjoy either his dignity or life: for having joined with the Janizari Aga and Testerdar, or treasurer, in procuring the death of the Aga, or general of the Spahis; these latter rose tumultuously, and demanding all their heads, knocked the Wazîr off his horse, within the walls of the court. On Morâd's refusing to deliver them, they threatened to depose him, and set up his brother Ibrâhim. At length being obliged to give them up to save himself, they were all strangled and hung upon trees. The Soltân greatly incensed at this insult, and suspecting the new Wazîr, Rejep Pâshâ, to have encouraged the mutineers, he took occasion some time after, at a fire-work played off in the palace, to carry the Wazîr aside into a little room, where he was strangled by persons placed there for the purpose: but as he had for some time before expected this treatment, a he took care to dispose of his wealth, for the benefit of his family. After this, the Soltân A. D. 1632.

¹ RICAUT, ubi supra.² CANT. p. 245, & seqq.(S) A name generally given by the Turks to persons of low stature. Cant. Kiuchuk or Kuchuk, and Kichuk, signifies little.(T) It should be Hilla or Hella; it stands on the*Euphrates*, on the north side, near the place where Babylon formerly stood; as appears by the ruins found there by Ravolf, Della Valle, and other travellers.

by degrees cut off the ringleaders, and diminished the soldiery. He also appeared more in public, to strike them with awe, which had its effect. At the same time, to win them over to his interest, he daily went to see them perform their exercises in shooting and riding; in which he always bore a part himself ¹.

THE Othmân army being weakened by these civil wars; Rustem Khân, the Persian general, Wân besieged.
invades the Othmân dominions, and lays close siege to Wân. Morâd, on the news of this danger, sends to its relief the Beglerbeg of Rûm-ili, with his European forces; who rout the Persians, and deliver the city, now on the point of surrendering ^m.

ABOUT this time a Turkish woman slave being found in a French ship, ready to sail from b Constantinople, the Turks impisoned the French ambassador's son, who was then on board; and would have confiscated the vessel, but for the warm remonstrances of the other Christian ministers at the Porte. Yet Morâd being informed by the Kâpudân Pâshâ, that they were set on by Baldazar, an Armenian, interpreter to the French ambassador, he ordered him to be impaled before his face.

IN the interim, an ambassador came from Persia with proposals of peace, which was sud- A short peace.
denly concluded; but as suddenly broken again the same year, by the persuasions of the Great A. D. 1633.
Mogul, who promised to assist Morâd with forces. Some of his ministers would have had him turn his arms against Hungary: but to no purpose, since an agreement was signed not long after with the imperial ambassador for continuing the truce; and this was the more readily c effected, in regard the Soltân had entertained some thoughts of making war on Poland, and dispossessing the Amir Fakro'ddîn of his territories in Syria.

THIS Amir was a prince of the Durzi, commonly called Druses, who inhabit part of mount Amir Fak- Libanus: but his ancestors had gotten possession of the cities of Barût and Sayda, or Sidon, ro'ddîn reduon the sea-coast, with great part of the adjacent territories; so that they were become ced to streights, very potent under Ebn Mân, or Mân Oglî, of whom an account has been already given ⁿ.
Morâd, resolved to destroy the power of these Durzi, sent great forces (U) against Fakro'ddîn, under the Pâshâ of Tripoli, with orders to those of Damaskus, Gâza, Hâlep, and Kayro, to join him. Mean time, Fakro'ddîn being summoned to surrender Sayda, and other places, sent word, he was but a subject himself, having resigned his power to his son Ali, and that there-d fore they should apply to him. The old Amir at that time had twenty-five thousand men, divided into two bodies, and commanded by his sons. Ali the elder, marched with one of them to Safet, to prevent the junction of the Amirs, Faruk and Herabit, as well as the Pâshâs of Gâza and Damaskus. Being a brisk prince, he engaged them so warmly, that he defeated them, and killed eight thousand of their men: but as he lost seven thousand of his own, the next day they returned to the charge, and overthrew him by numbers. All his men were killed, excepting one hundred and forty-six: his horse was mortally wounded; and being himself weary and faint, he yielded to a soldier, who promised him quarter, but afterwards strangled him.

THIS news so discouraged Fakro'ddîn, that giving up Sayda to the Kâpudân Pâshâ, he Goes to Cone returned to Barût; and thence retired, with his Durzi and Marionites, into the mountains. stantinople.
But now good fortune had forsaken him, his subjects forsook him too, revolting to the Pâshâ of Damaskus. After this, his houses and country were destroyed: he also lost his two remaining sons; one being slain in battle, and the other carried for an hostage to Constantinople. He had now scarce any thing left, excepting a few strong holds in the mountains, where living at good terms with Reba king of the Arabs, he never ceased ravaging the lands belonging to the Pâshâ of Damaskus: but being pursued from one place to another, he was at last forced to submit, on condition to be sent free with all his treasure and equipage to the Porte. When he Is strangled.
was about two stages from thence, he sent eight chests of gold before him, to open his way to the Soltân; who, pleased with the present, went in disguise to the Amir's tent, and got him f to relate the history of his life. Fakro'ddîn, pretending not to know him, did this with all the advantage he could, in order to gain his favour; which he afterwards obtained to such a degree, as raised the envy of the great officers, who traduced him as an apostate from their faith. This wrought so much on Morâd, that one day ascending his throne, he commanded

¹ RICAUT, ubi supra.^m CANT. p. 246.ⁿ See before, p. 383.

(U) The Kâpudân Pâshâ, in transporting the army, met with two English ships freighted with corn; which being prohibited goods, rather than fall into his hands, they fought his whole fleet for several hours, slew him with abundance of his men, and then blew themselves up, to the astonishment of the Turks, who admired their bravery.

A. D. 1633. the Amîr to be brought before him, and placed on a low chair; where he passed a formal sentence of death on him (X), which was accordingly executed in his presence^a.

War with Poland.

As to the war with Poland, the Turkish historians tell us, that the Persian expedition being over, Morâd assembled his forces at Adrianople, and ordered Murtâza Pâshâ, in conjunction with Jambolad Zadeh (Y), general of the Rumilian horse, to infest Poland. These generals passed the Danube near Gbirghiow (Z), a town of Walakbia; but while they waited there for the Soltân's orders, Polish ambassadors arrive, and sue for peace to Murtâza, who sends them to the Porte, where Morâd grants it them, but on his own terms^p.

THE Christian writers relate this short war more to the advantage of the Poles, and with some variation. According to them, the Othmân general, whom they name Abâza, having ordered fifteen thousand Tatars to enter Poland, they quickly over-ran the country about Khochim and Rinczug; but being overtaken on the 14th of July (A), by the Polish general, with only two thousand five hundred horse, who surprised them unmounted, they easily recovered their booty.

The Turks
defeated.

MEAN time, Abâza Pâshâ, with sixty thousand men, resolving to attack the small army of Poles, consisting chiefly of Kosaks, in their camp, the latter lined the hedges and ditches, planted their cannon advantageously, and then drew their troops into battalia. The Turks pushing forward, fell into the ambuscade: but having lost five hundred men, Abâza stopped, and ordered the Tatars to charge the right wing; the Moldavians and Walakians the left; while he with the Turks fought the main body. But the Poles stood so bravely to it, and their Christian adversaries made so faint an attack, that Abâza was obliged to retreat, although he made the Soltân believe he had gained a great victory. This was the more readily credited, because Ladislaus, being then at war with the Russians, sent an ambassador to the Porte to treat of peace. Morâd, to bring him to his own terms, declared war, talked insultingly, and went to Adrianople, affecting to make great military preparations: but finding at length, that the Russians were obliged to sue for peace to the Poles, he thought fit to dispatch an ambassador, to renew the antient league with them. This only gave the Poles a better opportunity to mortify his pride: for the king and dyet so resented his treatment of their ambassador, as well as the violation of the late articles, that the Chausb was dismissed with some reproaches on those occasions.

Sue for peace.

MORAD, who waited to turn his whole force against the Persians, was very uneasy to find so much resolution in the Poles; especially as they had now an army of eighty thousand effective men ready in Podolia; and therefore Mortâza, one of the Wazîrs of the divân, was ordered to lay the blame of all on Abâza, and even offer to have him punished, in case the Poles would comply to make a peace. This the Pâshâ did so effectually, in his letters to the Polish general, that Abâza (B) being strangled, articles were at last agreed to; whereby the Vayvods of Moldavia and Walakbia should be confirmed by the Soltân, with the consent and recommendation of Poland: Cantemir, and his Tatars, should be obliged to quit Buják, and the Kosaks to forbear hostilities in the Euxine Sea. The Turks were likewise to renounce all demands of tribute from Poland, and to build no new forts on the frontiers.

Terrible fire.

BEFORE the Soltân went to Adrianople, a most terrible fire happened about the middle of September at Constantinople, which reduced one third of it to ashes. There were burned no fewer than twenty-five thousand houses; two hundred mosks; the Mustî's library, and the habitation of the Janizaries, consisting of three hundred chambers. Morâd was so affected with the sufferings of the poor people, on this occasion, that he distributed considerable sums in order to support them, and rebuild the city^q.

Wine licensed.

A. D. 1633. In the year 1643, the Soltân publishes a new, and till then an unheard-of edict, by which, not only the sellers of wine are permitted to exercise their trade, but also every body is allowed

^a RICAUT, ubi supra. ROGER la terre sainte.

^p CANT. p. 246,

^q RICAUT, ubi supra.

(X) Eugene Roger, the missionary, who has given the life of this Amîr, in his La Terre Sainte, says, he was received and treated with respect by Morâd for fifteen days, at the end of which they consulted about putting him to death. That the Soltân pronounced sentence against him as a rebel, in the manner related: that he made a speech proper to move clemency; to which Morâd only answered, that cats should not pretend to fight with lions; that he was then strangled by mutes, the 14th of March, 1635, at the age of 70.

(Y) He seems to have been of Tatar extraction; for this name is peculiar to the Tatars, as Polad Mirzah, &c.

Cant. Polâd or Pulâd seems to be no other than the Persian orthography of Fûlâd, which in Arabic signifies a pillar.

(Z) An ancient city, between Silistria and Nikopolis. Cant.

(A) They place this action in the year 1634; whereas, by the Turkish account, it seems to have been in 1633.

(B) This could not be Abâza, the famous captain and quondam rebel; for he was killed afterwards at Wân, by the account of the Turks. Perhaps Abâza here is mistaken for Morteza, or Murtâza.

a to drink it (C), contrary to the Mohammedan law. On the other hand, the coffee-houses are forbidden to be opened under severe penalties. A. D. 1633.

MEAN time the care of the Persian war gave him continual uneasiness; because he perceived it impracticable, either to establish, or, as he intended, to enlarge the empire, whilst Bâghdâd, the noblest city of Asia, and bulwark of the Ottomân dominions, was in the hands of the Persians. Wherefore, as he found he had gained no advantage to the state by his generals, he resolves to take upon himself the office of commander in chief, and surmount, by his presence, the obstacles which had stopped the progress of so many Wazîrs. To this purpose, in the year 1044, he passes into Asia with a numerous army, which, full of hopes, he leads towards Bâghdâd. In his march he lays siege to Revân, lately recovered by the Persians; and so fiercely assaults it, that the garrison on the eighth day surrenders at his mercy. Hereupon, the governor alone, Amir Ghiun Oglî (D), is detained, and sent to Constantinople: to which city he the next year, about Kassim Ghiuni (E), leads back his army, after he had staid for some time about Tibris (or Tauris), to repair and garrison the neighbouring castles.
Morâd's expedition.
A. D. 1634.
Recovers Revân.

ACCORDING to the Christian historians, Morâd set out on his Persian expedition about the end of April, 1635. Before he went, in order to prevent seditions, he not only ruined taverns and tobacco shops, but forbade coffee-houses, and other idle places of resort: nay, in barbers shops, no more than one person was suffered to enter at a time. And further, to restrain meetings, all houses were obliged to put out both fires and candles, an hour and half after night-fall. The same authors tell us, that Morâd was induced to undertake this expedition by the prime Wazîr, who wrote him word, that he had not forces sufficient to oppose the king of Persia, then encamped towards Wân; and that his presence was absolutely necessary to encourage his soldiers. Wine forbidden.

WHILE the Soltân was on his march to Persia, there were great contests in Transilvania, between Stephen Bethlem and George Ragotski, for that principality. Morâd espousing the interest of the first, while the other sought the assistance of the emperor Ferdinand II. though not with the desired success. The Turks entering the province with twenty-five thousand men, under the Pâshâ of Buda, Ragotski detached his general Cornis, with seven thousand, to seize an advantageous post; but ordered him not to fight, till he came up to support him. However, the Pâshâ having sent twelve thousand horse and two thousand Janizaries, with some cannon, to attack him, he set himself at the head of his troops, and fell on with such bravery, that he drove the enemy's first rank upon the second; and at length put them all to flight, leaving their cannon and baggage behind, beside three thousand slain. The whole army had been defeated, if a party of Janizaries had not fortified themselves in a wood, and stopped the pursuit. Ragotski having had the better in several other rencounters with the Turks, and burnt two thousand villages in their territories, they were content to agree, that Ragotski should enjoy his government, on condition that the goods and estate which belonged to Ghabor in Transilvania, should be restored to him. Affairs of Transilvania.
Ragotski prevails.

By this time Morâd was arrived at Arzerûm; the head of whose Pâshâ he ordered to be cut off, for oppressing the people. Then entering Armenia, and finding it deserted by the inhabitants, he commanded them to return within twenty days, under pain of death: but most of them being settled elsewhere, bought off the penalty by fines. In this March, though naturally luxurious, he set his army of near three hundred thousand men an example of temperance and hardiness, using a saddle for his pillow, and his horse-cloth for a quilt. Being come in July before Revân, he began the siege: but although the place, which was well provided with necessaries, and a garrison of fifteen thousand men, might have held out a long time; yet the governor Amir Guni betrayed it to Morâd, who afterwards held him in great esteem. As soon as this news reached Constantinople, great rejoicings were made there for four days; during which time Bâyezîd and Orkhân, two of the Soltân's brothers, were strangled; the last of whom was said to have killed four of his executioners before they could overpower him. Revân betrayed to the Soltân;

AFTER this, the Turks entering farther into Persia, miserably wasted the country; yet not without many losses and defeats from the Persian cavalry, and mountain people. At last, being destitute of provisions, they retired to the parts about Tauris; which being harassed who returns.

^c CANT. p. 245, & seq.

(C) According to Ricaut, he in the year 1634 (half of which falls in that of the Hejrah 1033) suppressed taverns, and had the wine spilled.

(D) Son of Amir Ghiun, a Persian Khân. By his skill in music he gained Morâd's favour to such a degree, that he made him one of his privy council; and when he indulged himself in drinking wine, was delighted only with this Persian and Bekri Mostafa. In his palace on the Bosphorus, called Imir Ghiun ogli Tulîf, the Soltân often went to drink with him. CANT.

MOD. HIST. VOL. V.

(E) That is St. Demetrius, whose day falls on the 26th of October; by this day and that of Hiderlek (or Khiderlek) being the 23d of April, the Turks regulate their expeditions. After the 23d of April they take the field, and return on the 26th of October. CANT: Hiderlek is supposed to be St. George.

A. D. 1634. like the rest, the Soltân, in revenge, gave that city up to be plundered by his soldiers. After this he put his army into winter-quarters, and returned to Constantinople in December^a.

THE Persians, who had hitherto skulked for fear of the Othmân sword, when they hear of Morâd's departure, rush forth with numerous forces, and besiege Wân; of which city Abâza Pâshâ had been made governor. Yet the Othmâns behaved in so gallant a manner for four months, that the enemy could gain no advantage, although they frequently repeated their assaults; and perhaps the city would have escaped falling into their hands, if the brave governor, on whom the strength and safety of the place seemed to depend, had not been snatched out of the world. For, dispirited by this loss, the garrison more faintly defend themselves; whilst the Persians, grown more courageous, furiously renew their assaults, and taking the city by force, sacrifice all the Othmâns to the ghosts of their countrymen slain by Morâd^b.

ACCORDING to the Christian writers, after Morâd's return from the east, the army, wanting provisions, was disbanded; and Mortâza Pâshâ, governor of Revân, being killed, the soldiers mutined; who opening the gates, yielded to the Persians (F). At the same time, two thousand Janizaries, for fear of the Soltân's resentment, lifted with the enemy, who thereupon instituted chambers of Janizaries; and would have drawn over the Spahis also, by an offer of twelve aspers a day constant pay. These tidings Morâd received with great indignation: however, to retrieve his loss of Revân, he ordered the Wazîr to besiege Bâghdâd: but the soldiery, not liking the enterprize, would march no farther than Arzerûm. They likewise demanded the head of Jambolâd Ogli, who commanded the army before his arrival; because he had put a Pâshâ, with several Spahis and Janizaries, to death: and although Jambolâd pleaded the Soltân's orders, yet the Wazîr, to appease them, was forced to strangle him. Mean time the Persians besieged Wân; but although they could not take it (G), yet they so ruined the country, that it could afford no subsistence to the Turks; who led by a Kyurd, to surprize one of the enemy's quarters, the guide, when he brought them thither, changed sides; so that fifteen thousand were slain and taken prisoners.

IN the interim, great contests arose in little Tartary, between Kantemir (H), a very leading man, and the Khân, who had overthrown the other in battle: but as he had thrown off much of his respect to the Soltân, this latter began to take Kantemir's part, and sent for him to Constantinople. There he was kindly entertained, till his son, having killed a Tatar, was strangled for it; and soon after the father himself was strangled. Yet his nephew having pretended to revolt to the Khân, and slain him, with one of his brothers, he was highly applauded at the Porte; and Bekbir Ghieray, another brother, set up in his room. But the joy of this good news was allayed by bad tidings from Asîk or Asof, which was taken by the Russians and Kosaks, who fortified that important place with new works^d.

BUT to return to the war with Persia. The Soltân, not expecting any such misfortunes as happened after his last year's prosperous expedition, let fall the first effects of his anger on the Wazîr, Mehemed Pâshâ. This minister, for neglecting to fortify the borders, is instantly turned out, and his office given to Bayrâm Pâshâ, whom, the same year, he sends before with some light-armed troops (I), and following in person with a greater army into Asia, marches directly to Bâghdâd. When he comes there, spurred on by revenge, he attacks the city so vigorously, for thirty days together, that it seemed to be rather a continual slaughter than a fight. Fire, sword, and cannon, cease not one moment the whole time, to destroy the soldiers on both sides. The assaults are daily renewed, and the Soltân, with his scymitar, compels the retiring forces to re-charge; and with his own hand kills the Wazîr himself, for appearing too negligent. At length, by the bravery of the army, and steadiness of the Soltân, the city is taken, and above thirty thousand Persians (K), who had delivered themselves up to his power, are slaughtered in his presence. Thus fell the famous city; to defend which the Shâh of Persia had assembled the flower of his army, with almost his whole nobility;

^a RICAUT, in Amurath.^b CANT. p. 248.^c RICAUT, ubi sup.

(F) Here Revân seems to be mistaken for Wân; and if so, it helps to confirm what we suggested in a former note, that Abâza was mistaken for Mortâza Pâshâ.

(G) As the Turkish historians affirm, that Wân was taken, Wân here may be mistaken for Revân; as Revân seems to be mistaken for Wân, in the place above.

(H) Prince Cantemir takes occasion to inform us, in a note, that this Tatar family is a different one from his. It seems to be compounded of Kant, Kente, or some such word, and Amîr.

(I) While the Wazîr was on the road to Persia, an ambassador arrived in August at the Porte; but although the Soltân seemed disposed for peace, yet he resolved to make another expedition. Ricaud.

(K) The Persians still mourn this cruelty of Morâd, who spared no captive excepting one. This person, when the officers were going to kill him, desired that he might speak a word to the Soltân before his death. Being brought before him, and asked what he had to say, suffer not, cried he, most gracious emperor, that with me, Shâh Kuli, that is, the king's slave (by which name he was afterwards called), the whole art of musick should perish. Being ordered to give a specimen of his skill, he takes up a shehdâr (called in Arabic zabur, and in Greek a lity; and to take which Morâd had applied the strength of the empire. This was the last A. D. 1637^o overthrow of the Persians; since which they have not dared to seek revenge, or to lift up their heads against the Othmân power¹.

According to the account given of this siege by a Turkish officer (L), who was present; “as soon as the Soltân’s tent was erected (M) on the side of the Dogayl, or Tigris, near the sepulchre of the great Imâm, on the 8th of Rajeb, they began to make their approaches with vigour. They opened their trenches under cover of ten pieces of cannon, and as many royal falcons, opposite to the white gate, which faces the angle of the tower of Jighalzade, over-against the great fort. When the siege was formed, and they had entered the trenches beyond the white gate, Mostafa, Pâshâ of Damaskus, Ibrâhîm, the Haznadâr Pâshâ, the Sanjâk Bey of Kustandil, and others, were posted at the tower of Persia, with seven pieces of cannon and five royal falcons. Somewhat lower, where the grand Wazîr Mohammed had his quarters, there were only five pieces of cannon. A little beyond that, towards the gate of darkness, where stood the great tower between two forts, Derwîsh Mohammed, Pâshâ of Diyârbekr, was posted with seven great guns; and Mostafa Pâshâ, the Selikhtar, or sword-bearer, with five pieces of cannon and thirty falcons, took his quarters over against the bank of the Tigris, where is the bastion of birds.”

“THINGS being thus disposed, they began to batter the city with inexpressible fury; having beaten down five or six great towers: the trenches in thirty days were carried to the ditch; to fill up which, the officers among them furnished thirty millions of sacks filled with hair, wool, and hemp. They likewise cut down fifteen hundred palm-trees; and for ten days and nights the soldiers carried earth to fill the ditch of the fortrefs, which was about eighteen feet deep, six whereof were filled with water. On the 19th of Shaabân, they marched at break of day to attack the fort which was at the angle of the grand Wazîr’s quarters; where the fight continued three days and nights with unparalleled fury. In this action the Turks engaged the enemy so closely, that some took them by the collar, whilst others struck them with their fists, or engaged with their poniards. Here the grand Wazîr, after slaying several with arrows, was slain himself by a musket ball, which hit him in the throat (N).”

“MORAD at this news dropped a tear, and appointed the Kapudân Mostafa Pâshâ in his room; who renewed the attack with such vigour, that at length the Turks set up their standard on the top of the fortrefs; and made so great a slaughter, that on the 29th of the same month, the Persians from the top of the walls demanded quarter. Morâd having given them till the evening to evacuate the city, Bektâsh Khân, the governor (O), with all his train, came to the camp, where he was received with honour, and quarter granted to him and his troops. Mean time Fetab Khân, Khâlef Khân, and Ali Khân, who remained in the fortrefs, having twenty thousand men at their command, resolved not to quit the place. Hereupon Ali Pâshâ, son of Arslân, entered the city with all the Janizaries; and made himself master of it with such a slaughter, that the streets ran with blood, without the loss of one man.”

“HUSSEYN, Pâshâ of Anatolia, seeing Morâd incensed at this breach of articles, desired leave that he might go and put the revoltors to the sword. His request being granted on the second application, he set himself at the head of his troops; who fell on so furiously, that the enemy presently fled towards the gate of darkness: but they were pursued so closely, that out of twenty-five thousand, not one escaped. The three Khâns, with a hundred captains, and many other officers, were taken prisoners. Morâd, having reproached them for their misbehaviour after quarter given, put two or three of them into the hands of the Selikhtar Mostafa Pâshâ, and left the rest to the discretion of the soldiers; who slew some, and gave the remainder to the Janizaries. Of those who were in the place not one in a thousand were saved; whereas the Turks lost not above five thousand men in all.”

THIS is the substance of what the Turkish officer relates concerning the siege. But the author, who has communicated the relation, observes that those at Constantinople, who were best acquainted with affairs, seemed convinced that the city was taken by the perfidy of the

¹ CANT. p. 248. & seq.

² DU LOIRE Voy. de Levant, lett. 8.

Greek psalterio), and with so much art, as well as sweetness, both play’d and sung the tragedy of the taking of Bâghdâd, intermixed with Morâd’s praises, that the Soltân could not refrain from tears all the while he was performing. For this musician’s sake, Morâd set at liberty all who had not yet been massacred, and his musical works became famous in Turky. This instrument is much like a harp, with six strings each way, as the word sheshdâr denotes. ’Tis reckoned the chief of musical instruments, and is said to have been invented by David, though few at present know how to play well on it. CANT.

(L) This account is inserted both in the Turkish (printed in Italick characters) and the French, by the Sieur du Loir, in his voyage to the Levant.

(M) The place was invested by the Wazîr, on the 19th of October, with 30,000 men, although the Soltân did not arrive till November 5th. Ricaut.

(N) By this it appears that he was not slain by the Soltân, as the Turkish historians relate.

(O) The Christian writers call him Amir Fatta, who must be the same with Fetab Khân, mentioned a line or two below.

A. D. 1638. governor, rather than by force. They alledged farther, that the Khân's wife, being ashamed of her husband's treachery, poisoned herself, the same day on which the Turks entered Bâghdâd; and that neither the other Khâns nor the inhabitants consented to the surrender made by the governor. Hence they inferred, that the inhabitants were falsely accused of mutiny by Husseyn Pâshâ; who having formerly betrayed Revân to the Soltân (P), forged this story of a mutiny to incense Morâd, when intoxicated with wine, that he might have the pleasure of washing his hands in the blood of his countrymen^a.

Some farther particulars of the siege.

WE shall add something farther concerning the siege of this famous city, from the Christian historians. They tell us, that at this time the king of Persia, Shâh Sefi, with his army consisting of one hundred and twenty thousand horse, was gone to oppose the great Mogol, who had promised Morâd to make a diversion in his favour: that the besieged made no opposition to the Turks while they were carrying on their trenches to the ditch, except by their cannon: that they were twenty days filling the ditch; and after they had gained the first inclosure, had two more grand walls to encounter, and another ditch to fill up, which at length they did with trees and other matter: that things being ready for the assault, it was given on Christmas day, and the fortieth of the siege; when the brave Wazîr being killed, Mostafa, seeing almost all his men dead about him, furiously took a royal standard, and climbing up the wall, planted it there: that being followed by the soldiers, they soon entered and mastered the city, killing all before them without distinction; excepting the governor and a few others: that Morâd ordered the slaughter to cease; but that, on the remonstrance of Mostafa, who was made Wazîr, he gave up fourteen thousand more to the sword: that in the assault the Turks lost thirty thousand men, besides ten thousand wounded: that Morâd entering the city, ordered that sixty thousand of the slain should remain unburied, for a terror to a Persian ambassador whom he expected^a.

Morâd returns.

Hej. 1048.

A. D. 1638.

MORAD, having stayed a few days to repair the breaches and settle the affairs of Irâk; leaving the new Wazîr Mostafa to finish what he had begun, winters in Diyârbekr; and the next spring returns to Constantinople (Q), with his guards^b.

HE entered the city with all the triumph imaginable, although in a very bad state of health; and not long after an ambassador arrived from Persia with propositions of peace, which were not accepted of. However, another concluded a treaty with the Wazîr on the frontiers, whereby Bâghdâd was confirmed to Morâd; who being now at leisure, resolved to call the Venetians to an account for destroying the Algerine pirates in his port of Valona. The affair was this:

Capello de-
troys

THESE pirates, in conjunction with those of Tunis and other Barbary rovers, having infested the coasts of Italy, the Venetian gallies, under the command of Capello, blocked them up in the aforesaid port. The Corsairs, not daring to venture out, resolved to remain there till the coast should be clear: but Capello, after a month's stay, finding an opportunity, boldly went in; and, to the astonishment of the Turks, took the whole sixteen vessels. The graver part of the Venetian senate, altogether disapproving of this action, wrote to Contareni, their Bailo, or resident at the Porte, to mollify, if possible, the resentment of the Turks. The Kaymakâm, as soon as he was informed of the affair, sent for the Bailo, and exclaimed against it, as an infraction of the peace, which the Soltân on his return from Persia would resent.

the Barbary
pirates.

THE Bailo answered, that those same pirates having landed the year before in Kandia, and pierced far into Italy, with design to plunder the island of Liffâ, belonging to his republic, he had done nothing contrary to the capitulations; which enjoined, That all ports should be forbidden to those pirates, unless they first gave security not to injure the subjects of the Venetians. The Kaymakâm however required that the gallies should be restored; and that ten thousand soldiers and slaves belonging to those gallies, who were at Valona, should have free passage through the territories of the republic. But all those vessels, excepting the admiral galley, had been sunk in the port of Korsu, by order of the senate, to prevent the restitution demanded.

Satisfaction
demanded;

AN account of this transaction being sent to Morâd, he was so enraged, that he ordered the Bailo, with all those of his nation found in the Othmân dominions, to be cut in pieces. But the Wazîr and his Persian favourite stopping the mandate for thirteen days, till the Soltân grew cooler, persuaded him to change the sentence into an imprisonment of the Bailo; which, by application of the other Christian ambassadors at the Porte to the Kaymakâm, was ordered to be in his own house. When the senate heard this news, they, to prevent a war, which

^a RICAUT, ibid.

^a Ibid. ubi supr.

^b CANT. p. 249.

(P) According to the Turkish and Christian historians, the person who betrayed Revân, or Riwân, was Amîr Ghiun; a different person, as it should seem, from Husseyn Pâshâ, whom the Christian writers name Delli Husseyn.

(Q) The Christian writers say, on the 10th of June 1639.

a they were apprehensive of, began to make alliances with other powers, and, at the same time, used all their address to soften Morâd. They also wrote him a handsome letter, to excuse themselves; and although he answered it with disdain, and seemed to breathe nothing but revenge, yet it was carried by a Chaussh, and couched in such terms as shewed there was room for an accommodation. A. D. 1638.

MORAD, at his return from Bâghdâd, let Contarini know, that he looked on him no longer as a public minister, but an hostage for the ships which had been taken: however, he at the same time ordered the Kaymakâm not to shut his ears against a treaty. Accordingly that minister having admitted the Bailo to an audience, and finding the senate resolved not to deliver up their own galleys in exchange, at last accommodated the matter with him, on his promising to pay two hundred and fifty thousand chekîns, and restore the vessels which were in being.^c

BUT now to come to the period of Morâd's reign: we are told by the Turkish historians, that while he was meditating an expedition against the Christians, he was suddenly seized with a distemper, which in fifteen days carried him out of the world, on the 15th of Shawal 1049, after he had lived thirty-one, and reigned seventeen years.^d Morâd dies.

THE Christian writers are more particular; they tell us, that Morâd began to grow feeble by frequent debauches, his stomach so cold and weak, as not to digest the lightest meats. He was also at times grievously afflicted with the gout, and all over paralytic; so that his mother and the physicians persuaded him to forbear wine. Yet he could not withstand the temptations of a banquet to which his companions invited him. In the time of Bâyram, he, at the instance of his Persian favourite and the Seliktâr Aga (R), appointed a solemn drinking day, to which they being invited, the former took care to excite his inclination to liquor by high seasoned dishes; by whose aid they all drank so hard of wine and strong waters, that they were carried off drunk one after the other. The excess of this debauch threw the Soltân into a violent and continued fever; and the timorous physicians agreeing at length to let him blood, it hastened his death, which happened on the eighth of February 1640.^e Cause of his death.

A CERTAIN traveller, who was then at Constantinople, says, he was not ill above eleven days, and that on the eighth he threatened his physicians with death unless they cured him. At the same time being sensible he should die, he gave orders about paying his debts, and other affairs. After this the fever increasing, he resolved to put to death his brother Ibrâhîm, and all the great men who were enemies to Mostafa, to the intent that after his death his favourite might seize the throne without opposition (S). The great officers, believing that Ibrâhîm had been strangled, with his two other brothers, in the road to Persia, crowded the sick monarch's chamber, not so much to render him their last respects, as to be present when he appointed a successor, each of them having the vanity to expect that the nomination would fall on him. But their ambition was strangely mortified, when the Soltân, in order to find a pretence to cut some of them off, began to examine them very strictly, as to the execution of their respective offices. When he saw by their answers, that he could not with shew of justice put them to death, he commanded the Mufti to sign a fetva for the execution of his brother Ibrâhîm, who escaped the blow twice by means of his mother. Attempts to d'stroy, his brother Ibrâhîm.

MORAD expired in the arms of his favourite, with these words, Mostafa, I am dying. Mostafa, quite distracted at his master's death, ran to a window, and would have thrown himself out headlong, if he had not been prevented by those who were present: but his chief support being now gone, his enemies obliged him immediately to disburse fifteen hundred thousand crowns, as well as resign his post of Kâpudân Pâshâ, in lieu of the Pâshâship of Temeschwaer; and probably they would have aimed at his life, if it had not been for fear of enraging the princess, sister of the late Soltân, who was in love with him, and breeding of a sedition among the soldiers.^f

THE Turks have related the manners and domestic affairs of this Soltân in so many volumes, that it is to be suspected they sometimes insert fables. His most accurate historians observe, that he did some things which were contrary both to the majesty of an emperor, and the dictates of nature. They say he used to resort with particular favourites to certain pleasant places and gardens without the city, where he would light fires, dress victuals, and buying wine from a tavern, drink and converse familiarly with them. Moreover, he married old women of fourscore to young men of fifteen or five and twenty, and old men to girls; committing a thousand such like frolicks.

^c RICAUT ibid.
voy. de Levant, lett. 4.

^d CANT. p. 247.

^e RICAUT ibid.

^f DU LOIRE

(R) This was Mostafa, who was also Kâpudân Pâshâ, or high admiral; Du Loire, who was then at Constantinople, says he was a handsome man, of about five or six and twenty; so well beloved by the Soltân, that instead of slave, he called him his friend. Du Loire voy. de Levant, le. iv. p. 110.

(S) Others say, that he did it in favour of the Tartar Hân or Khân; often wishing that he might be the last of the Othmân line. Ricaud.

A. D. 1639.

A great drinker.

IN drunkenness he exceeded all his predecessors who were given to that vice. He not only drank wine in private, and allowed it to be publicly sold, as before is mentioned; but compelled even the Mustis and Kûdbî'laskers (or lord chief justices) to drink with him. He was drawn into the love of strong liquors by the following accident: As he was going one time about the market in disguise, he happened to see a man wallowing in the dirt, almost dead drunk. Morâd wondering at the novelty of the thing, asks his attendants, what was the matter with him? for he took him to be lunatic. Being told he was intoxicated with wine, he wants to know what sort of liquor that was, of whose effects he was yet ignorant. Mean while, Mostafa gets up, and with opprobrious words bids the Soltân stand off.

The adventure of Bekri Mo-
stafa.

THE prince, astonished at the man's impudence, Rascal, says he, dost thou bid me, who am Soltân Morâd, to be gone? And I (answers the drunkard) am Bekri Mostafa (T): but if thou wilt sell me this city, I will buy it; and then I shall be Soltân Morâd, and thou Bekri Mostafa. Morâd demanding where he would get the money to purchase such a city, Mostafa replies, Don't trouble thyself about that; for, what is more, I will buy also the son of a bond-woman (U). Morâd agrees to it, and orders Mostafa to be taken out of the kennel, and carried to the palace. After a few hours Mostafa comes to his senses; and seeing himself laid in a gilded room, asked those who attended him, what was the meaning of all that, and whether he was in a dream, or in paradise? Having informed him of what had passed, and his bargain with the Soltân, the man falls into a terrible fright, as knowing Morâd's fierce disposition. But necessity whetting his invention, he feigns himself ill, and pretends he should die, unless he could have some wine to restore his spirits.

THE waiters, to preserve his life, give him a pot full of wine, which he conceals under his gown. Presently after being sent for by the emperor, and ordered to pay so many millions as the price of the city, Mostafa, taking the pot out of his bosom, says, This, O emperor! is what would yesterday have purchased Constantinople; and were you likewise possessed of these riches, you would think them preferable to the monarchy of the universe. Morâd asking how that could be? By drinking, said he, this divine liquor. The Soltân being persuaded, takes a large draught; which, as he was unused to wine, presently made him so drunk, that he fancied the whole world not able to hold him; conceives mighty projects, and was filled with such pleasing joy, that he thought it equal to the charms of a crown. After this he fell asleep; and in a few hours, awaking with the head-ach, in a great passion sends for Mostafa. The man forthwith appears; and perceiving the case, Here, says he, is your remedy; and offers the Soltân a cup of wine, by which his head-ach was presently removed, and his former gaiety restored (X). When he had done this two or three times, he became by degrees so addicted to wine, that he was drunk almost every day.

Envy to tobacco:

As Morâd was an immoderate lover of that liquor, so he was a mortal enemy to opium and tobacco (Y). He forbade the selling of both on pain of death; and with his own hand killed several, whom he found either eating the one, or smoking the other (Z). However, one Tiriaki, a smoker, escaped punishment by his wit: for as he could not abstain from tobacco, he caused a deep pit to be dug under his tent, and covered with green turf, to prevent discovery: but one day the emperor coming and enquiring for him, he is betrayed by his people, who expose him in the pit with a pipe in his mouth. The Soltân instantly drawing his sword in order to kill him, Tiriaki, seeing the danger he was in, humourously cries out, Go-to, thou son of a bond-woman! thy edict extends above, not under the earth. By this ready turn, he obtained new honours, with the sole licence of smoking tobacco.

extremely
cruel:

FROM this vice sprung another cruelty. He thirsted after blood, and seemed to be nourished with it. Very often at midnight he stole out of the womens apartments, through the private gates of the palace, with his drawn sword; and running through the streets barefooted, with only a loose gown about him, like a madman, killed whomsoever came in his way. Frequently from the windows of the higher rooms, where he used to drink and divert himself, he shot with arrows such as passed along. In the day time, he strolled up and down in disguise, and never returned till he had slain some unfortunate wretches, for little or no cause. He struck so great a terror through the whole city, that no man dared even to mena tion his name within his own doors. Many weak persons, especially such as used to eat opium, ^{A. D. 1639.} fell into a swoon, if they heard but the word Morâd repeated: for he never spared that sort of people, but either killed them, or made them drink wine instead of it. By these methods he is said, within the seventeen years of his reign, to have put to death above fourteen thousand men, several of whom were generals of the highest rank.

(T) That is drunken Mostafa.(U) Meaning the Soltân himself: for the princes are all born of captives.(X) Bekri Mostafa, his tutor in drinking, was afterwards admitted among the Mufahib or privy councillors, and always near the Soltân; who at his death ordered the court to go into mourning; but caused his body to be buried with great pomp, among the hog-heads. After this loss Morâd declared that he never enjoyed one merry day; and whenever Mostafa's name happened to be mentioned, was seen to burst into tears, and sigh from the bottom of his heart. Cant.(Y) He is reported to have said to his people, by way of advice, if you will be merry, drink wine and eat not t—rd. Cant.(Z) Thevenot relates an adventure of his with a Spahi, whom he smoked with on the liosphorus; but going to seize him, when he landed, the Spahi, thereby suspecting that it was the Soltân, with a blow on the back with his mace, beat him down, and ran away. Travels to the Levant, part i. chap. 45.

But at the same time that Morad excelled in those worst of vices, he was adorned with great endowments both of body and mind. All sorts of exercises requisite to a soldier were found in him. In the art of shooting with the bow, he had not his equal in the whole Turkish nation, excepting the famous champion Toskoparan. There are now two marble pillars standing, fifteen hundred cubits asunder, over which he is said to have shot an arrow. He was, of all the Othmâns, the most expert horseman; and threw the jerid (or dart) with such dexterity, that no Tatarian arrow could fly so far, or with such exactness. He is reported to have been so swift of foot, that the fleetest Arabian horse could hardly out-run him.

NOR did this Soltân want singular endowments of mind: in the first place he was steady in the conduct of affairs; and desisted not from an undertaking, till he either had accomplished it, or found it was not in his power to succeed. He was unshaken in all circumstances; so that if his years had been equal to his greatness of mind, he would without much difficulty have acquired the monarchy of the universe: but the wounds, with which the sword threatened others, were given him by drunkenness, and removed him early out of the world, of which he was the terror.

c THE Christian writers say, that Morâd was the most absolute prince who ever swayed the Othmân scepter; but very irreligious (A), often laughing at the Darwîshes and other religious orders. That he was very active, but a great dissembler, and covetous to excess; having left fifteen millions of gold in his treasury, which was empty when he ascended the throne.

^b CANT. p. 249 & seq.

^a RICAUT, ubi supr.

(A) Is not this to abuse the word religion; as if superstition required respect? or any thing which is either useless, or ridiculous, can deserve the name?

C H A P. XIX.

The Reign of Soltan Ibrâhîm.

d MORAD being dead, and no other heir of the Othmân race remaining but his brother Ibrâhîm, he was with unanimous consent proclaimed emperor, being then in the three and twentieth year of his age.

According to the Christian historians, his interest was managed with the great officers by the Soltâna mother Kiosem, in opposition to the Khân of Tatary. But when they came to the hole of a prison, where, almost void of light, he had been mewed-up for four years, in constant expectation of death, he barred the door, and denied them entrance, supposing they came to strangle him. Nay, when the Wazîr proclaimed him emperor, fearing it to be only an artifice of his brother, he said, he did not desire that honour; and still persisted to deny them entrance, till the Soltâna mother caused Morâd's corpse to be brought. With this being at last satisfied, he plucked up his spirits, and taking boat, passed to Job's mosk (Z), where in eight days all the ceremonies of his inauguration being completed, he rode through the city to his palace: but whether for want of practice, or through an awkwardness natural to fools, he sat his horse so odiously (A), that it moved the laughter rather than the acclamations of people.

THE Soltân, for want of capacity, left the whole management of his affairs to his ministers; who knowing his luxurious and wanton appetite, humoured him therein, as well as his other recreations of horse-races, shooting with the bow, and the like. So that he was a mere stranger to the business transacted; only the Wazîr would sometimes, in matters of least importance, apply for his assent; either out of formality, or because it was not safe to act altogether without his authority. As his fondness for women was his reigning passion, so they ⁱ CANT. p. 252.

(Z) Du Loir calls it Yupuan Saray; that is, the Saray or palace of Yup, Yub, Ayub, or Job, as we corruptly spell the word after the Germans. To this Saray belongs a mosk, where the Soltâns are girt with a sword by the Musli, and then mount on horseback.

(A) Du Loir only says, that he was so feeble, that in saluting the people by bowing his head, he would have fallen with his face to the ground, if he had not been supported. Voy. de Levant, let. 4.

A. D. 1639. were the first objects of his diversion. But as the law of the country forbad the Soltâns to see a any other ladies than virgins, and he found he exhausted his strength to no purpose on girls, he had a mind to caress the favourite Soltâna of his deceased brother, who had charmed him with her beauty and wit. Nor was the lady averse to the design: but finding the queen mother and Wazîr do all they could to oppose it, she chose to sacrifice her ambition to her safety, and retire to the old Saray, where the other women of Morâd were locked up^k.

The Kosâks
repressed.

IBRAHIM's first care, as to matters of government, was to clear the Black-sea of the Kosâk pirates, and render the passage safe for ships sailing for Constantinople. As Asâk (or Asof) situated at the mouth of the Don or Tanais, was very convenient for people of that profession, and, in case of an overthrow, would afford them a retreat, he perceived that there was no putting a stop to their depredations without great difficulty, so long as that city remained in b their hands; and therefore sends a numerous army to besiege it, which after many assaults takes it, and puts all the garrison to the sword^l.

Asof besieged:
A. D. 1641.

THE Christian writers give quite a different account of this affair. According to them, this city was besieged twice by the Turks; who the first time being molested by frequent sallies, made some furious assaults on the place; but were so repulsed with arms, wild-fire, and scalding liquors, that they lay still for fourteen days. During this time the captain Pâshâ tried the force of bribes: but finding it to little purpose, and having received some supplies by sea, another assault was given for seven days together, without gaining an inch of ground. So that they were forced to raise the siege, after they had endured the severest hardships, and lost three thousand Spahis, seven thousand Janizaries, and eight thousand other soldiers, besides Molda- c vians, Walakhians and Tatars.

and abandoned.

A. D. 1642.

HOWEVER, the Soltân having settled all differences with the emperor, and concluded an advantageous peace for twenty years, the Wazîr resolved to attack Asof a second time both by land and sea. The Kosâks on this news sought the protection of the Czar of Russia: but that prince excusing himself, as having lately concluded a peace with the Porte, they abandoned the city, ruined the places, and carried all their moveables along with him.

Raab in danger.

ABOUT the same time the Turks renewed their league with the king of Persia, on condition that he should demolish the fortrefs of Fortrina, which, contrary to articles, he had built on the Caspian Sea. But notwithstanding their league lately made with the emperor, they contrive to surprize the fortrefs of Raab, in Hungary, by the following stratagem. A select number of d soldiers, dressed like peasants, were put into carts covered with hay; which being admitted into the city, they were to surprize the centinels and gates, in which they were to be supported by four thousand others, lying in a valley near at hand. But this party being discovered by an officer of the garrison, in his return from hunting, he quickened his pace to the town; and overtaking the above-mentioned carts, which seemed to be laden after an unusual manner, it increased his suspicion. On his arrival at the town, he acquainted the officers, who immediately put the garrison in arms; and having permitted the carts to enter, the bridge was drawn up, the carts searched, and the whole fraud detected. However, the emperor, being at that time at war with the Swedes, could not resent the injury in the manner he was inclined to have done.

Changes at court.

A. D. 1644.

NEXT year nothing remarkable occurs; but in 1644 some broils arose between the emperor and prince Ragotski, wherein the Turks somewhat concerned themselves; but matters were composed the year following. All this while Ibrâhîm minded nothing but his pleasures; yet the prime Wazîr, Mostafa, being an active minister, put to death all those persons whom he suspected in the least inclinable to sedition; particularly the Pâshâs of Halep and Kâffa. Yet his care of the state could not secure him from the resentment of the Valide Soltâna, who cut him off, for some marks of disrespect shewn to her; as for a like offence against the Soltân, the Kâpudân Pâshâ underwent the same fate. The Tatar Hân (or Khân) was likewise deposed by Ibrâhîm, not so much for his incursions into Poland, as for his ill success; having in one of them lost ten thousand men.

Actions at sea.

BEKR, Pâshâ of Rhodes, the new Kâpudân Pâshâ, to hance his office, made a descent on the f coast of Calabria, from whence he carried off three hundred men: but attempting the like near Corton, paid for the former booty with the loss of five hundred of his own. However, six of the Maitefe gallies made more considerable reprisals, although the consequence proved fatal to the Venetians: for they took several rich Turkish vessels bound to Alexandria, with a vast booty; and amongst the rest, the wealth of the Kislar Aga, who was slain in the action^m. But here it will be proper first to see what the Turkish historians say upon this occasion, which became of such importance to their nation.

Offence given by the Venetians.

THE Soltân having cleared the Euxine Sea of Corfairs, he resolves likewise to purge the White Sea, or Mediterranean. All the islands therein were already subdued by the Othmân valour, excepting Kandia, or Krete; which, in defiance of the imperial power, afforded a g retreat to pirates, who plundered the Turkish ships. To the provocations before given by the

^k RICAUT, in Ibrâhîm. DU LOIR Voy. lett. 4.

^l CANT. p. 252.

^m RICAUT, ubi sup. subjects

a subjects of the Venetians, a new one was added about this time, which presented him with a fair occasion for subduing this island, long before desired, and more than once attempted in vain : for a Turkish ship, with the Kislar Aga (B), the Kâdî of Mekka, and Mollah of Prusa on board, being on its way to Egypt, was attacked by six Maltese gallies, and taken ; after the Kislar Aga, the Kâdî, and commander of the ship, had been killed in the action. The Corfairs immediately put into a port of Kandia, and giving the governor some share of their prize, were suffered to depart with the rest ^m.

ACCORDING to the Venetian historians, the Kislar Aga retreated, to avoid the fury of the Soltâna, mother of Soltân Mohammed, on the following occasion. The Aga, enamoured with a beautiful Persian slave, whom he took for a virgin, gave for her four hundred and fifty dollars : but soon after, she appearing to be with-child, he confined her to his steward's house ; yet was so taken with the infant when born, that he adopted him for his own. About the same time, Mohammed happening to come into the world, the pretty slave was preferred to be his nurse ; and during the two years that she continued in the Saray, Ibrâhîm took such an affection for her boy, that he seemed to love him better than his own son. This so displeased the mother, that she could endure neither the nurse, her child, nor the Kislar Aga, who had recommended her (C) ; and the fear of her resentment was the occasion of that eunuch's retiring from court. The boy, who caused all this uneasiness, was taken among the prisoners on board, and considered at Malta as a son of Soltân Ibrâhîm. But time having discovered the falsity of that opinion, he became a frier, and was the same person who went under the name of Padre Ottomano.

IBRAHIM, enraged for the loss of his ships, not only vowed utter ruin to Malta, but vented his passion against the Christians in general, and in particular the Venetians, for not guarding the seas from his enemies, and for relieving them in their ports. The Bailo answered, that the port which the Maltese put into, had neither castle nor fortrefs ; and if his majesty was not able to hinder those ships from careening, as they had often done, before Rhodes, how was it possible for the Venetians to drive them out of the sea ? With this answer Ibrâhîm seemed so well satisfied, that the Bailo, who was a person of penetration, had no apprehensions of a war. However, as great preparations that way were seen to go forward soon after at the Porte, they began to provide against the danger at Malta, which seemed to be the place on which all the storm was to discharge its fury.

MEAN time the Venetians, suspecting the worst, prepared also for their defence ; yet gave their Bailo orders, to try if money would purchase their tranquillity. Hereupon he demanded an audience of the Wazîr ; but after waiting several hours, was told there was no opportunity of giving it him, although he saw the ambassadors of other princes admitted during the time. This was a convincing mark of their resentment : yet as soon as Ibrâhîm understood that the republic, growing jealous of his vast preparations, began to arm likewise, he did all that was possible to persuade the Bailo that hostilities were not designed against the Venetians, and complained that by their suspicions they injured his friendship.

ALL this while the Soltân was pursuing his pleasures, with no less vigour than preparations for war went on : so gay was his Harâm, or ladies apartment, and so eager were they to get silks, cloth of gold, and the like to adorn it ; that many times, when ships arrived at the castles of the Hellepont, gallies were sent to fetch the goods, which often were forced away, without any account taken, or price agreed with the merchant. Of this when Sir Thomas Bendish, the English ambassador, complained to the Wazîr, without redress, he put fire on the yard-arms of thirteen English ships, then at Galata ; and drawing in the guns, brought them to an anchor just before the Saray : for it is the custom in Turkey, when any one has received a very great injury from the chief ministers, for him to put fire on his head, and running to the palace, no person dare refuse him access to the Soltân. This unusual sight therefore, of fire on the ships yard-arms, being espied by the officer of the customs, he presently apprehended the reason, and went to acquaint the Wazîr. This minister immediately dispatched him on board, with a considerable sum of money, and desired the fires might be put out ; promising faithfully to pay the remainder.

^m CANT. p. 253, & seq.

(B) That is the chief eunuch, or keeper of the women. They are all, when displaced, sent into Egypt, where they receive a pension of 8,000 para a day, each of which is three aspers Cent. He is a Black.

(C) 'Tis said, that on a time when Ibrâhîm was diverting himself in the garden with his women and children, the Soltâna vented her anger against the nurse and her boy in such provoking terms, that the Soltân threw her son Mohammed, then in his arms, into a cisttern ; where, though saved from being drowned, he received the scar which he had in his forehead. Ricant. Thevenot says, the scar was on his left cheek ; and given by his father, who, being half drunk, fell a dancing, and calling to Mohammed to dance with him, the little boy made answer, I am not a fool to dance. I am a fool then, replied Ibrâhîm, in a rage ; and gave him a wound with his dagger ; or, as others say, with a bottle thrown at him. Trav. Levant. c. 45.

A. D. 1644.

Kandia issued.

AT length the preparations both by land and sea being ready, the fleet on the last day of April set sail, consisting of seventy-three gallees, besides eight from Barbary, two galleasses, one great galleon, twenty-two other ships, ten of them English and Dutch, pressed into the service; with about three hundred Saiks and Karamousals, which carried soldiers, provision, and stores. The army was composed of seven thousand Janizaries, fourteen thousand Spahis, fifty thousand Timariots, and other soldiers, besides three thousand pioneers. They arrived at Scio the 7th of May, and from thence steered different courses, to disguise their design, till war was declared at Constantinople, by imprisoning the Bailo, and giving orders throughout the Archipelago, to destroy or enslave all the subjects of the republic^a.

The island reduced.

Hej. 1051.

A. D. 1644.

THE Turkish historians, omitting the circumstances above-mentioned, only take notice, that upon the taking of the ships bound for Egypt, with the Kislar Aga, Ibrâhîm, by advice of his counsellors, breaks the peace with the Venetians; and having declared war against them, as robbers and protectors of pirates, sends out both an army and a fleet; the first commanded by Musab Pâshâ, and Morâd Aga, Kulkieth Udasi, or lieutenant-general of the Janizaries; the other under the conduct of Kâpadân Yusef Pâshâ. On the 21st of Rabio'lakbir 1055, they landed in Kandia, and next day invest Kanea, which, after a resistance of fifty-four days, surrenders; then having repaired the walls, and left a garrison, they returned to Constantinople. Shortly after, Husseyn Pâshâ is sent with fresh forces; which, after several battles, fought in this and the following year, subdue the whole island, excepting the capital city^b.

Hej. 1056

Kanea taken.

THIS is all the account we have from the Turks, relating to the expedition. From the Venetians we learn, that the republic was not unprovided with a fleet, nor wanting in care for their defence. They immediately sent necessary provisions to Kandia, with orders to Cornaro, then general and inquisitor there, to fit out twenty gallees from the arsenal of Kanea. About the middle of June, the whole Turkish fleet arrived at Gogna, a place about eighteen miles from Kanea, where landing their forces without opposition, they defeated the Venetians in several skirmishes; and although powerful succours were sent by the pope, as well as other Italian princes, yet having been too long delayed, and the commanders disagreeing among themselves, nothing was done of any service to prevent the loss of Kanea, which the Turks forced, with great slaughter of the besieged.

Retino ma-stered.

A. D. 1646.

HAVING thus had the fortune to take the second city the first year, they were encouraged to proceed in the conquest of the island the next year; when they had the success to make themselves masters of Retino, where general Cornaro lost his life with a musket ball. Nor were the Venetians more successful at sea this year, than the former; for the quarrels among the commanders still subsisting, they grow negligent in the affair, and suffer the Turkish vessels to pass freely, as if they had not been at war. Nay, when the Othmân fleet lay half disarmed, and ill provided, at the isle of St. Theodore, opposite to Kanea, where it is thought they might easily have burnt them, they made no use of the opportunity: so that towards the end of the year, Molino returning home, was dismissed from his employment, and Capello appointed in his room.

Venetian indolence.

THE general, with a very good fleet under his command, in the spring, arrived at the city of Kandia; whence Morofini the admiral, with twenty-two ships, sailed to the Dardanelis, in order to draw the enemy to an engagement: but finding they would not accept the challenge, he returned, and importuned the general, with the proveditor Grimani, to engage the Turkish fleet, promising them the victory: but while they were debating the matter, the fleet, consisting of three hundred sail, arrived at Kanea, and landed forty thousand men, which quite turned the scale. The Venetians in the mean time, being joined by the gallees of the pope and Malta, left port Suda, to attack the enemy at St. Theodore: but failing in that design, Capello sailed with some gallees and galleasses, to intercept thirty Turkish gallees, with men and provisions, in their way to Kanea.

Morifini slain.

IN the interim Mostafa Pâshâ left that port with fifty-seven light gallees, four large ships, and many saiks, in order to return to Constantinople: but in his passage, meeting with a storm, he lost seven gallees, and several other vessels; being forced into Zia, followed by some other ships, under the command of Mohammed Cbelebi. Here the soldiers landing and roving about, Micrisini and Grimani came up and took two of their ships; but Morifini's vessel being by a storm separated from the rest, forty of the enemy's gallees attacked, and at length boarded her; in which dispute, the valiant admiral was slain. For all this, the men made so brave a defence, that the Turks were forced to leave her, especially when they saw two gallees come up to her relief.

Successes in Dalmatia.

HOWEVER, the republic had good success this year by land: for in Dalmatia, Foscolo took Ali Bey prisoner, besides the towns of Salcovar, Polisano, Issan, and other places: he also recovered Novigrade, and reduced Obraozzo, Curino, Ottissona, Vellino, Madino, Uzana, Tino, Salona, with several other forts and castles, all which he plundered, and to them afterwards added Scardano. 'Tis true, the Venetians lost a great part of their fleet in a storm, at the

^a RICAUT, ubi sup.^b CANT. p. 254.

a isle of Pfara: but this misfortune was recompensed by the ill success of the Turks, who at this time had laid siege to the city of Kandia, which was defended with such bravery, that they were constrained to raise it. Foscolo likewise going on victoriously, took Gliffa, and overthrew Tekbeli Pâshâ in battle: but seven thousand Albanians, who had a design to surprize Kroja, being set upon by a body of Turks, were routed, and many of them slain, while the rest fled to the mountains for refuge ^P.

WHILE these things were doing in the fields of Mars, Soltân Ibrâhîm was making fierce war in those of Venus. A woman, whom he called Sukbir Para, that is, a little lump of sugar, was the principal instrument of his amours: for as she visited the public baths, she gave him an account of all the beauties in the town; and he, falling in love with the Soltâna, his brother Morâd's widow, made use of her to pander for him with that princess, who rejected his suit. Mean time Sukbir Para, having informed him that the Mufti had a beautiful daughter, he thought it better to propose taking her for a wife, than attempt debauching her: but as that prelate knew his inconstant humour, and that he had several sons already, he artfully replied, that he dared not to force the inclinations of his daughter, because it was contrary to the Korân; but that in case she complied, he was very ready to give his consent to so great an honour. Ibrâhîm hereupon makes his addresses to the fair lady; but she, by the instructions of her father, rejects the motion.

THE Soltân, enraged at this slight, banishes the Mufti; and finding afterwards that all the persuasions of Sukbir Para were in vain, he orders the Wazîr to cause her to be seized coming from the bath, and brought to his palace; where having enjoyed her by compulsion for a few days, he sent her back with scorn to her father. The Mufti, filled with grief at this injury, dissembled it for a while; but at length telling his tale to Mehemed Pâshâ, a principal member of the Divân, and to the Janizari Aga, they resolve to depose Ibrâhîm. Into this conspiracy they prevail on the Valade Soltâna, or queen mother herself, to enter, so far as to consent that her son should be confined for a while, in order to his reformation; and that the seal should be taken from Abmed, and given to Mehemed Pâshâ.

AFTER this, several other great men being drawn into the plot, on the seventh of August 1648, the Janizaries, having in a manner forced the Soltân to confer the seal on Mehemed, and strangled the other Wazîr, next day demanded of the Mufti, whether Soltân Ibrâhîm himself, as a fool and tyrant, ought not to be deposed. That prelate answering in the affirmative, they thereupon required him to appear the next day at the Divân, to administer justice to his soldiers and subjects. Ibrâhîm laughed at this citation; and the same being seconded by a Fetva from the Mufti, importing, that as the Soltân was called to account, he was obliged to appear before justice, he tore the paper, and threatened the author of that sentence with the loss of his head. The Mufti, far from being terrified by the menace, backed that Fetva by another of a higher nature, which declared, that whosoever obeyed not the law of God was not a true believer, although the person should be the Soltân himself: but that being become a kafr, or infidel, by his actions, he was ipso facto fallen from the throne, and no longer capable of authority or government.

c IBRAHIM, on hearing this new Fetva pronounced, immediately ordered the prime Wazîr to take off that prelate's head; but this command was not obeyed, for by the last Fetva he had lost all authority. In short, the Janizaries, about five the same evening, hastening in a tumultuous manner to the Saray, the Soltân lost all courage; and flying to the arms of his mother, begged her protection. She being a resolute and subtle woman, employed all her eloquence to persuade the soldiery to offer no violence to their sovereign; promising that he should abdicate the government, and retire with a guard to his old lodgings; which was accordingly performed. Ibrâhîm for a few days bore his imprisonment with great patience: but at length growing desperate and furious, he often beat his head against the wall of his apartment; wherefore, on the 17th of the same month, he was strangled by four mutes ¹.

f THE Turkish historians, come to our hands, say nothing either of this Soltân's deposition, or the manner of his death: they only tell us, with equal brevity and obscurity, that while he was making great preparations for the reduction of the city of Kandia, he was, on the 18th of Rajeb 1058, removed out of the world, and crowned with martyrdom. But, whatever motives induced them to suppress the circumstances which attended the end both of his reign and life, we are told by prince Cantemir, that the manners of this Soltân, as well as those of his predecessor Morâd, are fully described by the Turks, though at the peril of their heads. As Morâd was wholly addicted to wine, so Ibrâhîm was abandoned to his lust. They say he spent all his time in sensual pleasures; and used potions and art to restore nature, when exhausted. Every Friday, the Turkish sabbath, he dedicated to Venus, and had a beautiful virgin, richly dressed, brought him by his mother, the prime Wazîr, or some other great man. He covered the walls of his chamber with looking-glass, that his love-battles might seem to be acted in several places at once. He ordered his pillows to be stuffed with rich furs, that the bed designed for the imperial pleasures might be the more precious : nay, he put fable skins under him, in a notion that his amorous desires would be inflamed, in case his love-toil was rendered more difficult by the glowing of his knees.

P RICAUT, in Ibrahim.

9 RICAUT. ubi supra.

A. D. 1648.

*His amorous
frolics.*

IN the palace garden called Kbâs, he frequently assembled all the young maiden ladies, and having made them strip themselves, and him, ran naked, neighing like a horse, among them ; and, as it were, ravished one or other, kicking and struggling by his order. Happening on a time to see the privy parts of a wild female heifer, he sent a model of them in gold all over the empire, with orders to make enquiry whether a woman, made just in that manner, could be found for him ; which at last, they say, was done, and she received into the Harâm. He made a collection of great and voluminous books ; expressing by pictures the various ways of coition, and by their help was sure to invent some new posture never thought on before. Thus the public treasury, diminished by Morâd's drunkenness (D), was quite exhausted by Ibrâhim's luxury and lust^r.

For a while impotent.

THE Christian historians tell us, that the continual apprehensions which he entertained of death, during his brother Morâd's reign, had so frozen his constitution with a strange frigidity towards women, that all the dalliances of the most beautiful ladies in the Harâm could not for a whole year thaw it effectually. This was what at first occasioned the report of his impotency : and during that time, he attended to the affairs of government with much assiduity ; which gained him a great deal of reputation. But after his natural warmth had returned, as if it had acquired force from its long suppression, he quickly plunged himself wholly into sensual pleasures, and gave up the reins of government to his ministers.

His person.

As to his person, he had a large forehead ; a quick and lively eye ; his complexion was ruddy, and his features well proportioned : yet he had something in the air of his face, which promised no great abilities of mind. However, he was by nature of a gentle and easy temper^s.

His children.

HE left nine sons, Selîm and Othmân, born in 1054 ; Mohammed, Abmed, Soleymân, Morâd, Jebân Ghîr, born in 1056 ; Bâ-yezîd and Orkhân, in 1058. Of these, Mohammed, Soleymân, and Abmed, came to the throne : the rest were excluded by an untimely death^t.

^r CANT. p. 254.

^s RICAUT, ubi supra.

^t CANT. p. 254.

(D) This is contrary to what the Christian writers say. See before, p. 363.

CHAP. XX.

The Reign of Mohammed IV.

SECT. I.

Transactions during this Soltân's minority ; with the conquest of Kandia and Kaminiek.

19 Soltân
Mohammed
IV.
A. D. 1649.

IBRÂHIM being thus removed, the Janizaries, in the year 1058, and on the 8th of ^d Râjeb, proclaim his son Mohammed (E), then but seven years old, and place him on the throne. In this tender age, he gave very sensible proofs of his future greatness, and of the hopes the Othmâns ought to conceive of him. The treasury, exhausted by his father's luxury, being replenished by the management of the Wazîr, Kioprili Mehmed Pâshâ (F), and all intef-

(E) His mother was the daughter of a Greek priest, brought from the Morea, before the law, by which the children of Christians were collected by way of tribute, was abolished. Cant.

(F) The founder of the present most noble family among the Turks, of Kioprili Oglî. In the beginning of Mohammed's reign, he, by reason of his poverty, lived very private, and seldom appeared abroad. Shortly after the Spahis having in a sedition murdered the prime Wazîr and all the Pâshâs, excepting this Mehmed, who escaped by his obscurity ; the Kissar Aga and other officers confer on him the Wazîrship ; but the first thing the old fox did, was to lay a snare to cut off his benefactors. He likewise destroyed in two years all the mutineers. He enjoyed the post seven years, and at his death recommended his son Abmed as the fittest person to succeed him. Cant.

tine

a fine commotions appeased, he strangles his grandmother, who had been privy to the rebellion of the Janizaries, and puts many of their accomplices to death. He recovers Tenedos and Lemnos from the Venetians; takes and beheads the rebellious Pâshâ of Halep, with his associates; and sends the Wazîr against Yanova, which after a siege of a few days is reduced.

WITH the same success he wages war in Hungary, where, in the year 1070, Ali Pâshâ assaults and takes Waradin. In 1074, the Wazîr, Fazil Ahmed Kioprili Oglî (G), subdues Vivar. He likewise declares war against and vanquisheth Rakofi (or Ragotski), who died of wounds received in the battle; and over-running Transilvania, appoints Mikhael Apafi, prince of that country, under a certain tribute. The emperor of Germany, terrified at the progress made by the Othmâns, sends ambassadors to the Wazîr, suing for peace; and promising to quit claim to whatever the Turks were possessed of, it is at length granted for twenty years, on the Soltân's own terms.^c

IN this cursory manner the Turkish historians relate the transactions of the first fourteen years of Mohammed's reign; suppressing those in which they met with bad success, and barely mentioning such as turned out to their advantage apparently, that they might hasten to the siege of Kandia; the conquest of which is reckoned of so much honour and importance to their nation. But, to acquit ourselves as impartial historians, it will be necessary, before we proceed with them, to lay before our readers what the Christian authors take notice to have happened within that interval.

SOLTAN Mohammed was during his minority (which was to continue ten years longer) under the government of his mother, assisted with the council of twelve Pâshâs: these resolved to continue the war against the Venetians, who yet conceived some hopes of an accommodation, from the jars, attended with frequent skirmishes, which at this time happened between the Janizaries and the Shapis, so much to the disadvantage of the latter, that none for a while dared to own that name within the walls of Constantinople. But their hopes soon terminating with those disturbances, they diligently applied themselves to preparations for war, which was to be carried on not only in Kandia, but also in Dalmatia, Bosnia, Albania, and the Morea: for though Foscùlo was beaten off again to his shipping, near Castle Nuevo, yet he had better fortune in Bosnia, where he repulsed the enemy to the very gates of Saray, capital of the province, and took Bisano upon articles: but the Turkish army being at length reinforced, the Venetians were obliged to quit their new conquests, and retire home.

MEAN time the Turks in Hungary, making incursions into the emperor's territories, were overthrown by Forgatz, near Buda; the Pâshâ of which was taken prisoner, and his son slain. Nor had they better fortune in their attack on Kliffa, which they left with dishonour, after the loss of five thousand men. The Kosâks also, during this interval, did much mischief in the Black Sea. Thus was the Othmân empire afflicted with misfortunes abroad, as well as intestine troubles at home; and the blame of all being thrown on the prime Wazîr, he was first displaced, and then, at the demand of the Asiatic Spahis, put to death.

BUT, for all these disturbances, the Turks were very active to carry on their war in Kandia, whither they sent considerable supplies to Husseyn Pâshâ, the commander in chief there. The city of Kandia was at this time in a very bad state; when 600 men, with sixty knights, arriving from Malta, mounted the guard at fort Martinengo, which was the place of most danger; and although the Turks, in the fourth desperate attack, carried it by dint of sword, yet the knights returning, bravely recovered it, with the destruction of all the intruders. However, the Turks prevailing again in their turn, the Venetians sprung their mines, and blew up the fort, with two thousand Turks, into the air.

THE Janizaries and Spahis were still at ill terms together at Constantinople: and the Kâpudân Pâshâ was so beaten and cooped up by the Venetians, within the Dardânels, that he could not get out with his fleet; which so enraged the ministry, that they sent all the subjects of the republic, and even the Bailo himself out of their dominions. At length winter obliged the Venetians to withdraw, and leave the Turkish fleet at liberty to relieve their army in Kandia, which stood in great need of provisions. They were so intent on the war there, that next year they sent 1100 sail of all sorts with necessaries. This fleet was followed by the Venetians, who forced several of their galleys into Scio, with the loss of Mohammed, Pâshâ of Anatolia, sent to succeed Husseyn, who was made prime Wazîr.^d

ON the tenth of July, the Turks gave a signal of defiance to the Venetians, who presently came to an engagement; in which the Kâpudân Pâshâ being slain by a cannon ball, it threw

^c CANT. p. 255.

^d RICAUT, in Mohammed IV.

(G) He was prime Wazîr seventeen years; famous among the Turks for learning, prudence, and fortitude. He is said to have excelled all those of his time for eloquence. They say also, that if he had not been general in the expedition, Kandia could never have been taken. He is dignified by the Turks with grand titles. He was the only Wazîr who received that dignity from his father, and transmitted it to his son and grandson.

Cant.

A. D. 1651. the Turkish fleet into such disorder, that they fled. Mean time the gallies, which were towing off a the heavier ships, being chased to Mocenigo, the captain-general quickly left them to shift for themselves: but the Turks, rather than fall into his hands, blew up five; the rest were taken. In short, not a ship remained in sight, but what was either seized, sunk, or burnt. A few days after they had no less success against another fleet, of which they took thirty-nine gallies, twenty-three ships, three galleasses, with three thousand soldiers on board.

Another defeat. A. D. 1652. MEAN time the dissention increased among the soldiery, which was hardly quieted when news arrived of two rebellions at the same time, one at Damaskus, the other at Grand Kairo. How to suppress these dangerous commotions, employed the thoughts of the Divân this year and the next; which gave the Venetians some time to breathe, and reinforce themselves in Kandia.

A. D. 1654. But in 1654, the Pâshâ of Buda, being made captain Pâshâ, fitted out a good fleet; and although in an encounter with the Venetians, at the mouth of the *Dardanel*s, he lost six thousand men, with seven of his vessels; yet he broke through their fleet, and landed twelve thousand soldiers in Kandia. On this occasion, the admiral so extolled his own merit, and vilified the Wazîr to the council; that they sent an officer to take off his head, and put the accuser in his place. Yet the latter falling sick and infirm soon after, the Pâshâ Hâlep was pitched on to succeed him in the command in Kandia; but in his way thither his fleet, fitted out with great expence, was overthrown by the Venetians.

Sedition of the Janizaries. A. D. 1656. HEREUPON a treaty was set on foot with the Bailo; but the ministry insisting on the intire surrender of Kandia, it broke off. However, on the tumults raised by the merchants and tradesmen, in which the Wazîr fell a sacrifice, the negotiation was renewed; yet came to nothing a second time, by the Turks demanding the payment of ten millions for the charges of the war. Mean time the Spahis and Janizaries at Constantinople joined together, pretending to reform the abuses of the state. Entering armed into the Divân, they deposed the prime Wazîr, turned out several other officers, made the Mufti flee to Jerusalem, and went so far as to propose dethroning the Soltân himself. Then entering the palace, they broke open the treasury, and carried two millions away with them. At length the sedition beginning to subside, Soltân Mohammed advanced to the Wazîrship the Pâshâ of Damaskus: this was the famous Kuperli (or Kyuprili); the Pâshâ of Silistria was made captain Pâshâ; and Husséyn confirmed in his government of Kandia.

Fleet destroyed. AND now, to prosecute the war in that island, the Turks fitted out a great fleet; but as soon d as it sailed out of the *Dardanel*s, the Venetians, who waited for them, began the attack, whence ensued a terrible fight. And although the captain-general Marcello was slain, yet the provedor so vigorously prosecuted the victory, that of sixty light gallies, twenty-eight ships, and nine galleasses, none escaped being either taken, sunk, or burnt, excepting eighteen gallies.

Lemnos taken and recovered. The Venetians, animated by this success, in four days time took Tenedos, and afterwards Lemnos. The ministry, considering the loss of these islands, especially the first, would be attended with great inconveniencies, sent a numerous fleet to besiege the fortress: but putting into Scio, to wait for ten gallies from Barbary, with a great number of Saiks under their convoy, the Venetian general intercepted and burnt the ships, with many of the Saiks; and killed one thousand Turks. Hereupon another fleet was fitted out; but although the Venetians defeated e that also (with the loss, however, of their own valiant captain-general Mocenigo) yet they repaired it again; and coming before Tenedos, in the end of July, it was deserted by the besieged, who thought it not tenable. But Lemnos held out two months, and then was surrendered on articles. Hereupon, Soltân Mohammed proposed to make peace with the republic, on surrendering Kandia, with the fortress of Kliffa in Dalmatia, and paying three millions for the expences of the war: but those conditions were rejected.

Rebellion in Asia. A. D. 1658. THE brother-in law of the Pâshâ of Halep arriving with his troops at Adrianople, which was the rendezvous of the army destined for Dalmatia, the prime Wazîr put him to death: hereupon the Pâshâ, in great fury, sets forward, at the head of forty thousand men, to demand the head of Kuperli, and four others; at the same time carrying with him a young man, f whom he affirmed to be the son of Soltân Morâd, and whose right to the throne he undertook to establish. The rebels at length drawing near to Skutari, and by this time fourscore thousand strong, the Wazîr passed over into Asia with a numerous army: but being met by the Pâshâ was totally routed, and all his cannon as well as baggage taken. This alarm made it necessary for the Soltân himself to go over, and join the Wazîr, whose united forces making seventy thousand men, the Pâshâ proposed an accommodation: but imprudently consenting to meet in a private place, at some distance from his camp, Mortâza, who was sent to treat with him, overpowered and strangled him, with seventeen of his accomplices, which was no sooner known in his army than they dispersed.

THE Venetians all this while were not idle in Kandia; for having received a reinforcement g of four thousand French foot, after the peace of the Pyrenees, they quickly took Kalamo, Kalegro, and Epikarno. After this, they proceeded to besiege Kanea; but the place being reinforced a forced with three thousand men, they gave over the enterprize, in expectation to beat the Turks out of New Kandia, lately built by them, near the old city of that name, in order to strengthen it; where we shall leave them for a while, to see how the affairs of the Othmâns went on in other countries ^y. A. D. 1659.

State of Kandia.

THE rendezvous for the army designed against the emperor of Germany was at Belgrade; where the prime Wazîr falling sick, he sent orders to Halil Pâshâ, general of the forces in Hungary, to hasten the siege of Waradin, which was begun the 4th of July; but although the Turks soon approached to the counterscarp, and made breaches in the walls; yet they found the ditch so wide, and full of water, that they could not get to storm them, till a woman captive shewed them how the citizens used to drain it. However, they bravely repulsed their attacks till the 20th of August; when, being reduced very low, they surrendered on articles, and marched out with ensigns of honour. The Transylvanians, resenting this loss, depose Barklay their prince, a favourite of the Turks, constituting Kemenius in his room, and crave the assistance of the emperor, to whom they give up Zekelid, Khowar, Giula, and other places. A. D. 1660.
Affairs of Hungary.

HEREUPON Montecuculi joining Kemenius with a considerable army, would have drawn Ali Pâshâ to a battle. This the Pâshâ for the present declined: but having set up Mikbael ^{son of} Apafi for prince of Transylvania, to whom the people revolted in great numbers, he took the opportunity to attack the Imperialists, discouraged by that event, with such success, that he slew and took fifty thousand persons, and drove Kemenius out of the country; who, gathering more forces, was defeated a second time. This animated the victors to besiege Clausenburg; but on the approach of the general Schemidau, out of Hungary, they raised it as hastily. A. D. 1661.
Germans defeated.

THIS year a great plague happened at Constantinople: and towards winter the prime Wazîr, Kioprili ^{dies.} Kuperli, being in a declining state, obtained a grant of the Soltân, not only that his son Abmed should assist him, but also (what was unusual) succeed him in his office, as he in fact did, on the 15th of October, on which day his father died. While the new Wazîr was taken up with removing some officers, who were his enemies, and banishing the Musti to Gallipoli, the war went slowly on against the Venetians, who on their side destroyed five galleys at Milo, and took the fortress there. A. D. 1662.

NEXT year the Algerines complained to the Porte against the proceedings of the English fleet, under the earl of Sandwich, before Algiers; but were baffled in their suit by the earl of Winchelsea, then ambassador at Constantinople; where the Soltân proved very burthensome to his subjects, by his extravagant way of hunting, in which thirty or forty thousand men were appointed to beat the woods for him, for three or four days together. Mean time the Wazîr Abmed was employed in removing his enemies, among whom none disturbed him more than Mortâza, Pâshâ of Bahadâd. Mortâza being at length displaced, retired to the king, or prince, of the Kurdi, whose daughter he had married: but while the Wazîr prepared to force that king to surrender him up, unexpected troubles broke out in Georgia. When Soltân Soleymân had taken Arzerûm, it was agreed, that of the seven princes of Georgia, three should be tributary to the Turks, and three to the Persians, all governed by Achik Pash, as supreme prince, to whom the seventh should also be subjected, without being dependant on either of the two powers. But at this time the governor dying, his widow married again, and, to oblige her new husband, was content to have her own son set aside, and his eyes put out. Hereupon the three provinces under the Persians chose a new governor, which the Turks being offended at, they elected another, descended from the former. But this storm blowing over by the establishment of a person to the liking of both parties, the Turkish forces were turned against Mortâza, who was then in the castle of Zizri, belonging to those Kurdi called Yezîdi (A). The army arriving at the pass commanded by that castle, five hundred Turks entered it: but were quickly put to flight by the Kurdi; who, pursuing them, left the pass open; hereupon the Turks seized it, and laying siege to the castle, required Mortâza to be delivered up. The belieged, to free themselves from the danger, soon complied, and the Pâshâ's head was immediately struck off. His son succeeds.
A. D. 1662.

THE Christians having rebuilt the churches burnt down at Constantinople, in the great fire in 1660, contrary to the prime Wazîr's command, and the Turkish laws, under pretence of dwellings and warehouses, that minister in a rage ordered them to be demolished, and the restorers imprisoned. About this time also he reformed the coin, which had been greatly clipped by the Jews, Armenians, merchants, and others. This year the Turkish fleet, bound to Alexandria, consisting of seventeen ships, and thirty-seven saiks, richly laden, under the convoy of six galleys, in its passage near Rhodes was encountered by the Venetians, who sunk and took twenty-eight saiks, and four of the ships, with many prisoners of note. Mortâza Pâ-shâ slain.

^y CANT. ubi sup.

(A) They have a religion of their own, and are reckoned atheists by the Mohammedans.

ALL

A. D. 1663.
 War in Hungary.
 A. D. 1663.

ALL this while the preparations for war against the Germans went on: but the emperor ^a not inclined to embroil himself, sent to treat with the Pâshâ of Buda about continuing the peace. Yet when all points seemed to be agreed on, in February following the horsetail was erected before the prime Wazîr's gate, and next month the Soltân and he set forward with the army towards Sofia; where a messenger who arrived from the emperor was refused an audience, and detained in the camp. The Tatars were ordered to send one hundred thousand men to Hungary; but had great difficulty to obey that command, on account of the Kosîks, who infested them, and threatened Asak, or Asof, their capital city. They had likewise one hundred and fifty sail in the Euxine Sea, where they carried all before them; but most of them having been cast away on the coast of Mingrelia, the rest were forced to retreat into the Boristhenes, by twelve Turkish gallies. ^b

Germans defeated.

THE Wazîr, Abmed, being come to the Danube, began to pass his army: but the bridge of boats breaking, when about four thousand had gotten over, Forgatz, governor of New Heusfel, marched in the night with eight thousand men to attack them; which he did with great slaughter: but the noise reaching the grots of the army, which, unknown to him, had now gotten over, they drew up, and surrounding this small body, cut them all off, only the commander and a few more escaping. Montecuculi, governor of Raab, being informed by Forgatz of this defeat, sent him a thousand men; who would have been intercepted by the Turks, had not that officer deluded them, by erecting a white flag, as if he designed a treaty: but when the succours were safely gotten into the place, the white flag was changed to colours of defiance, to the great surprize and anger of the enemy. ^c

New Heusfel
 taken.

HEREUPON the Wazîr invested the city, and having from two batteries, mounted with one hundred pieces of cannon, terribly annoyed the place, they made a furious assault on the 14th of August, but were repulsed with great loss. On the 28th, a breach being made in the walls, they attempted a second storm, but were forced to retire, after a very great slaughter of them: and although, ten days after, they planted an ensign on the rampier, yet they were beaten back, and five thousand slain. But in the middle of September, the chief magazine of powder happening to blow up, the officers agreed to surrender, on condition of being conducted to Komorra, after they had held out about forty-three days, and destroyed fifteen thousand of the enemy; among whom were the Beglerbegs of Romania and Anatolia, with two other Pâshâs, the Aga of the Spahis, and twenty-five captains. ^d

Serini's
 bravery.

AFTER this the Othmâns took Leventz, which so terrified Presburg, that it seemed inclined to submit. It was expected that the Wazîr would have done still greater things this year: instead of that he failed in his attempt on Schinta, the imperial magazine of arms and artillery. However he presently reduced Novigrade, and then returned to winter at Belgrade; sending thirty thousand Turks and Tatars to ravage Stiria and Kroatia. Count Serini, on their sudden approach, with four hundred and eighty men, who were all he could raise, posted himself at the river Muer, if possible to stop their passage. On perceiving two thousand who had gotten over, he fell on so vigourously, that they were soon routed; and missing the ford, most of them who escaped the sword perished in the water; which so amazed those on the other side, that they made no farther attempt that way. ^e bridge,

Burns Essek
 A. D. 1664.

THE count, having after this gotten together an army of twenty-five thousand men, in the beginning of the year 1664, took Berzenkhe and Bakokza. He then marched to Essek, and having defeated six thousand Turks, took the Palanka, at the foot of that famous bridge, and burnt the bridge itself; which however, to their surprize, the Turks rebuilt in forty days time.

Takes Five Churches.

After this, on the 5th of February, he took Five Churches by storm, and put all the inhabitants to the sword: then laid siege to the fortress of Sigeth, or Ziget, famous for the attempt made on it by Soleymân the magnificent, with six hundred thousand men: but when he had reduced it also to the last extremity, the approach of a considerable body of Turks and Tatars to relieve it made him draw off his forces. On advice of these successes, the Wazîr detached part of his army to besiege Serinswar: but the count, with all the force he could raise, lying in ambush, surprized and defeated them, killing about two thousand, and taking many prisoners.² ^f

His castle
 razed.

SERINI, on the first of May, laid siege to Kanissia, which he pushed with great vigour: but Montecuculi, the German general, delaying to support him, on the approach of the Wazîr by the bridge of Essek, he retreated towards Serinswar, leaving some ammunition to the enemy; who presently, with thirty thousand men, invested that place. Mean time the count joined Montecuculi, and urged him to fight the Turks; but that general, instead of complying, entering into Serini's fort, dispossessed the governor, and cleared the garrison of the count's forces; which so offended him, that he left the camp, and retired home. The Turks,

² RICAUT, ibid.

a taking advantage of these delays, on the 9th of June blew up a half-moon; which so terrified the besieged, that in their fright they left a sally-port open; whereat the enemy entering, the garrison, consisting of nineteen hundred men, fled over the bridge; which breaking, many were drowned, and the rest slain. As for Serinſwar, it was razed to the ground. A. D. 1664.

To counter-balance this loss, count Soise recovered Nitra, lately taken from the Imperialists: and having twice defeated above fourteen thousand Turks with great slaughter, Levintz surrendered also. This last place the Walakhian and Moldavian forces, joining with some Turks and Tatars, determined to recover: but after losing two thousand men, on the approach of count Soise, the 16th of July, they marched off to fight him. The Imperialists having in the first volley poured a shower of shot on their main body, they fled, leaving the two wings to an unequal battle, who quickly after fled also, and left their cannon as well as baggage. They lost many more by the pursuit; and those who escaped being denied a passage at Gran, over the Danube, the Moldavians and Walakhians forced their princes to return home; while Husseyn Pâshâ fled to New Heusel, after he had lost six thousand men, out of eight and twenty thousand, to one hundred and fifty of the Imperialists. There were taken four thousand carts, with ammunition and provision; one hundred colours, and twelve pieces of cannon; besides tents, arms, horses, camels, and other booty. They gave no quarter to any, except seven hundred Moldavians and Walakhians, in order to hang them with their muskets about their necks. After this, count Soise took and burnt Barkam, a palanka opposite to Gran. Count Soise's success.

MEAN time the two main armies under the Wazîr and Montecuculi, did nothing but observe each other's motions. At length, on the first of August, one half of the Turkish army crossed the Raab, the Wazîr designing to pass over with the rest the next day: but although the great rains which ensued prevented his passage, by swelling the river, he was not uneasy, as the troops which had crossed were equal at least to the Imperialists: however they proved not to be their match; for Montecuculi not giving them time to intrench, fell on them the third in the morning with great fury, and continued the fight till four in the afternoon with various fortune. During that time, the waters being abated, the Spahis forded them in several places, and charged the imperial left wing, while the Janizaries threw up earth, to secure the passage of the rest. Overthrown again, by Montecuculi.

THIS being observed by the general, he thought at first to sound a retreat; but perceiving that the trench was only just begun, he drew up the body of his army in form of a half moon, and furiously attacked the Janizaries, while the horse encountered the Spahis, with such bravery, that the Turks began to give ground. At this instant an outcry being heard that count Serini had assaulted the Wazîr's camp on the other side, they were so terrified, that they betook themselves to a shameful flight, after they had lost eight thousand men on the field of battle, and above as many more were drowned in the river. Nay, the Turks themselves acknowledged, in our author's hearing, that since the Othmân empire came to its greatness, the Turks had never suffered any slaughter or disgrace equal to this. They lost sixteen pieces of cannon, one hundred and twenty-six colours, with the grand Wazîr's standard, five thousand scymitars, with many horses. The Imperialists on their part had near three thousand men slain; among whom were the count of Nassau, and some others of note.

THIS victory inclining the Wazîr as much to a peace, as the Germans were before inclined to it, a negotiation was set on foot, and soon concluded, with the imperial resident in the camp. The chief articles were; "That prince Apafi should hold Transilvania, paying the Soltân six hundred thousand dollars for the expences of the war: that the emperor might fortify Gutta and Nitra; and the provinces of Zatmar and Zaboli to revert to him; Zekhelid to be demolished; and Waradin and New Heusel to remain to the Soltân." Mohammed all this while resided at Adrianople, the disgust he had taken to the imperial city increasing every day; and having now a son of his own, would have put his brother Soleyman to death, had not the Mufti refused to grant a Fetva for the purpose. Peace concluded.

WE must not omit to inform our readers, that while count Serini besieged Kanissia, a kind of rebellion broke out at Kayro, in Egypt, among the Beys: who having very great power in that country, seized Ibrâhîm Pâshâ, when his three years government were nearly expired; and having imprisoned him, demanded no less than three thousand purses for his release. Hereupon the Soltân sent over the master of his horse, who soon brought matters to an amicable agreement, and obtained Ibrâhîm's liberty. Rebellion at Kayro.

NEXT year count Lesley, the imperial ambassador, arriving at Buda, in May he set out with the Wazîr Ahmed for the Porte; and on the last of June came within six hours of Adrianople, when Soltân Mohammed, who seemed to doat on the Wazîr, sent his favourite to meet him, with a present of five horses richly adorned, and feasted him on the way. He was so impatient

A. D. 1664. The Wazîr honoured. for his company, that he ordered him to come privately before the day of his public entry, a kissed him on the shoulder, and honoured him with a Topûz, or mace of gold, studded with precious stones, besides a sword, dagger, and other things of value. In the ambassador's retinue there came a nobleman of Genoa, to negotiate a treaty of friendship and commerce with the Porte, which was granted, much to the displeasure of M. de la Haye, the French ambassador ^a.

Great preparations against Kandia. LET US now, after a long respite, return to the Turkish historians. According to them, the peace with the emperor being concluded, Mohammed resolves to renew, with more vigour, the Kandian war, which, on account of other affairs, had hitherto proceeded but slowly. His father Ibrâhîm had reduced the whole island, as well as expelled almost all the old inhabitants, excepting the city of Kandia; which being exceeding strong both by nature and art, had often baffled the attempts of the Musulmân forces. But as the possession of the country could not be reckoned sure, so long as a port was open to receive the enemy, whenever they pleased to invade it, Mohammed resolved to employ the whole forces of his empire to make himself master of that place.

Hej. 1076. A. D. 1663. THE care of this expedition was intrusted to the Wazîr Ahmed Kioprili Oglî Pâshâ, who having prepared every thing for a long siege during the winter, in the spring of the year 1076 assembles all the forces, with which he marches to Termis (I), where he embarks for Kanea, and landing his army, places them in winter quarters ^b.

A. D. 1666. Sabatay Sevi, a counterfeit messiah. HERE let us leave them a while, to speak of certain transactions not mentioned by the Turkish authors before us. The year 1666 affords a remarkable instance of imposture and superstition, in the case of Sabatay Sevi, the pretended messiah of the Jews. This man, the son of a broker of Smyrna (K), being banished for a tumult in the synagogue there, wandered over Greece for a time, and then went to Jerusalem. There he met with one Nathan, a subtle fellow, who taking upon him to be Sabatay's prophet, had the impudence to declare, That, within a twelvemonth, the messiah should appear before the Soltân, and take the crown from his head. At the same time Sabatay preaching repentance to the Jews at Gaza, his fame spread far and near among that people, who flocked to him in multitudes on the way to Smyrna, where he openly assumed the title of messiah, and published his declaration thereof to all the nations of the Jews. The mortifications and other extravagancies committed by that infatuated people were astonishing. They believed the most improbable stories of him. Some invented miracles in his favour, and others swore to be witnesses to them; while almost all believed them, and were ready to tear in pieces those who did not: for there are, even among the Jews, some men of understanding and discernment.

AT length the impostor declared that he was called by God to visit Constantinople: but, at his arrival, the Wazîr had him seized and clapped up in prison. Yet this did not cure the frenzy of the Jews; whose numbers and madness daily increased to such a degree, that the Soltân at last ordered him to be brought into his presence. No pen can describe their confidence on this occasion, in asserting the power of their pretended messiah, and the wonders which he would perform. But here the farce at one ended; for Mohammed, demanding a miracle in proof of his mission, put it to this issue, that he should be stripped naked for his archers to shoot at, and promised, in case the arrows did not pierce his body, that he himself would acknowledge him to be the messiah. This was a very fair proposal; but Sabatay chose rather to confess himself a cheat, and turn Mohammedan, than stand the trial. Yet even this could not convince his incorrigible followers: for most of them, through stupidity or perverseness, affirmed that it was only his shadow which appeared in a Turkish dress, but that his body was taken up into heaven, there to reside till the time appointed for the accomplishment of those wonders was come.

Peace with Poland. THE Tatars having, about the beginning of the next year, made incursions into Poland, the republic sent an ambassador to make complaint to the Porte, where it was quickly agreed, that no compensation should be demanded on account of those incursions: that the Poles should not make war on the Kosâks, lately revolted from them to the Soltân: that they should forthwith declare war against the Russians: and that the Turks should have free trade to Poland. This affair being over, and the rebellion raised by the Pâshâ of Basrah (L) suppressed, the

^a RICAUT, ibid.

^b CANT. p. 258.

(I) A poor town in Thessaly, on the coasts of the Archipelago, called by the modern Greeks Thermas, and by the ancient Therma, giving name to the Sinus Thermaicus. CANT. According to Ricaud he embarked his army at Malvasia, in the year 1666.

(K) The history of this impostor, written by Sir Paul Ricaud, was first published in 1669, in a book, intituled,

The history of the three late famous impostors; Padre Ottomane and Mohammed Bey being the other two. It was reprinted, with some useful matters prefixed, in the Two journies to Jerusalem, 12°.

(L) Corruptly in the text called Balsora, by others Bassora.

- a Wazîr began with vigour to prosecute the conquest of Kandia ^c. But before we proceed with A. D. 1666. the Christian historians, let us hear what the Turkish say concerning this important expedition.

WHEN all things were ready the next year, on the 18th of Zilkaadeh 1077, the Wazîr sails from Kanea, and landing his men without opposition at the village Kawlokbhor, near Kandia, marks out the ground to encamp in. Next day he views the places about the city: then in a council of officers it was determined to undermine the Red Tower, and after battering the walls, make the first attempt on that side.

- HEREUPON, in the end of the next month, the last in the year, the city is invested, and the siege begun, the like whereof never had been seen, nor perhaps ever will. Many years ^{City of Kandia surrenders to the Wazîr. Hej. 1077.} preparations are employed: fresh troops supply the place of the slain: while the soldiers, declining the danger, are compelled by threats and blows to renew the charge. For the besieged, joining all their courage to the strength of the place, fought like determined men for nineteen months incessantly, being frequently relieved with fresh supplies by the French and Venetians, to which latter it belonged. Every inch of ground is gained by the blood of many heroes slain on both sides. When the walls are battered down and mounted by the besiegers, new walls are instantly raised by the enemy. And thus the Othmâns, who imagined that in entering the breaches their dangers were at an end, are almost reduced to despair, by the sight of new obstacles, no less difficult to surmount than those which they had just then, with so much loss, subdued.

- c AT length, the Othmâns being now quite tired out and spiritless, what could hardly be effected by force of arms, is brought about by Panaiot (M), the Tarjimân, or interpreter, of the court, who, by an artful speech, persuaded the governor (N) of the city to surrender, on certain conditions, the last but strongest fortrefs to which the garrison had retired. The Wazîr, in the beginning of the month Jomazio'lawel in the year 1080, takes possession of Kandia, A. D. 1669; deserted by the Venetians, and annexes to the Othmân empire a city renowned for many ages, the eighth wonder of the world, and which nature seemed to have fortified against all assaults, after a war of twenty-four years; wherein, according to the best Turkish historians, above two hundred thousand (O) Othmâns were slain ^d.

- THIS is the Turkish account, which does great honour to the Christians, and ascribes the Its strength. Wazîr's success at last not to force but artifice. But we must have recourse to the Christian authors for the particulars of this remarkable siege. The city was then fortified with seven great bastions, Sabionera, Vetturi, Jesus, Martinengo, Bethlem, Panigra, and St. Andrea. These were all encompassed with a broad and deep ditch, defended by ravelins, of which the first was that of St. Spirito: the ravelin of Panigra, flanked to the right with the half-moon of Mocenigo: next followed the ravelin of Bethlem, bordering on the work of St. Mary's, which to the left had the ravelin of St. Nicholas, and this joined to the fortification of de Palma. Next to de Palma was the ravelin of Priuli, with the redoubt of Crepa-cuore: and over all was the royal fort of St. Demetrio, which commanded the work of Molino and Sabionera to the very sea.

- c THE 14th of May the Turkish army, consisting of about seventy thousand men, encamped ^{The siege begins.} over against St. Mary's along the valley of Gioffiro, on which side began the first traverses, which were carried on to the sea-side. The grand Wazîr took his quarters over against Panigra; the Janizar Aga opposite to Martinengo; and the other Pâshâs at other places. After this they raised three batteries, facing the bastions of Martinengo, Panigra, and Bethlem, shooting bullets of sixty, ninety, and one hundred and twenty pounds. The besieged within posted themselves accordingly: the marquis Villa, governor and general of the infantry, had his quarters at the bulwark of Jesus; the proveditor-general of the kingdom at Martinengo;

^c RICAUT, in Mahomet IV.

^d CANT. p. 258.

(M) His true name was Panagiotes. No Christian before ever did, or after him it is thought ever will, enjoy so much credit as he did in the Turkish court. He was to the Wazîr what Ulysses was to the Greeks. He was never known to have been mistaken in his advice or judgment of things. His bringing the brave and wise Morofini to surrender Kandia, after holding out 24 years, was a proof of his great dexterity in managing affairs. By these means he acquired such favour with the Turks, that he ventured to dispute before the Wazîr Ahmed, about the law, with Vanli Effendi, the most learned among the Turks, and no less skilled in the Christian than the Turkish religion, formerly tutor to the Soltân Mohammed. The dispute is inserted in de la

Croix's commentaries on the eastern churches. He is also famous for his skill in astrology, and knowledge of future events, of which our author Cantemir gives two or three instances.

(N) This was Francisco Morofini, mentioned in the preceding note; afterwards famous for subduing the Morea. On his return he was created doge of Venice. Cant.

(O) That is, soldiers on the list, exclusive of others, who might have amounted to as many more. The Venetians own this war cost them above an hundred millions of gold crowns. Cant. The Christian writers compute 900,000 Turks slain during that time. Ricaud.

A. D. 1667.

Carried on with various success.

A. D. 1668.

and Giacomo Contarini, duke of Kandia, in the fort of Sabionera; and the other officers at a proper posts.

THE city being thus invested on all sides, but that towards the sea, the besieged began to disturb the enemy with their sallies and mines, six of which were sprung with good success, at the angle of the half-moon of Mocenigo. Notwithstanding this, the Turks advanced so well to the borders of Panigra, that they sprung some mines likewise, tho' to little effect, except one, and then made a most furious assault at the breach, but were repulsed, as they were afterwards at another breach made in the half-moon, by a dreadful mine, which opened a gap for eight men to enter abreast. Both parties went on mining and attacking with various success; and the besieged having received three reinforcements, of about five hundred men each, made some successful sallies. At length, towards the end of October, the Wazîr, urged by a letter and presents from Soltân Mohammed, caused a furious assault to be given, chiefly on the side of Panigra; so that the Turks, having planted six of their colours on the ruins of that work, ventured to descend into the ditch. But many of them being blown up by three mines, which contained seventy barrels of powder, their progress for that time was stopped.

Now winter coming on, hostilities began to flag, and some proposals of peace to go forwards: but as these came to nothing, the Turks, in the spring following, made great preparations in all their ports to furnish their camp with provisions, and recruited their army with seventy thousand men. The besieged likewise being reinforced with some men, the garrison were reckoned to be four thousand strong. Mean time the besiegers raised a battery on the side of Lazaretto, which so offended the port, that ships could neither enter nor abide there. They likewise erected another by fort St. Andrea, which much annoyed Tramata, another harbour for small craft. After this, in a dark night, passing along the sea-side, they fixed a cable to the pallisade of St. Andrea, and having tore it down with an engine, continued to advance their lines that way. But the besieged making a sally, forced them to retreat to their trenches, and overthrew certain redoubts and traverses; for which piece of service the general rewarded every soldier with fifty Chekîns.

St. Andrea bastion closely pressed.

THIS success gave the besieged an opportunity to finish their platform on the side of the ditch adjoining to the bulwark of St. Andrea. However the Turks, with invincible patience, battered the little tower of Priuli, with the curtain and ravelin of St. Andrea, as well as employed all their power to fill the ditch: and altho' a very successful sally was made on the 29th of February, yet they still went on with their works against that bastion. This was the state of the siege, when the brave marquis of Villa being recalled by the duke of Savoy, the command was conferred on the marquis of St. Andrea Montbrun, a French nobleman. By this time the earth was grown so porous with the number of works, mines, and traverses, that the light of the mines on one side, glimmering into the traverses of the other party, discovered where they were; so that it became a trade to steal powder from each other. However the besieged sprung a mine on the 1st of December, which overthrew the enemy's battery against St. Andrea, and buried all their cannon.

AMONG the many volunteers which the length and fame of the siege brought to Kandia, one was M. la Fueillade, duke of Roanez, with a body of men divided into four brigades, under so many noblemen. These made so brisk a sally, headed by the duke, who behaved very gallantly, that they broke through the main body of the enemy's force; but penetrating too far, were obliged to retreat with considerable loss. About this time also the besieged received a reinforcement of three thousand three hundred Lunenburg troops; yet they were so hard put to it for want of men, that the captain-general Morosini disarmed several galleys to supply them. Mean while they sprung a great many mines with good success; and towards the end of the year made a sally at Sabionera, wherein they slew near three thousand Turks; and taking a battery, dismounted and nailed their cannon.

General assault.

THE besiegers having gained considerably on the fort of St. Andrea, to the east, pressed hard, with ten thousand men, on the bastion of Sabionera to the west; and one night gave a general assault, with all their forces on those two bastions, that of Panigra, and the great fort of St. Demetrio; but received three repulses with great confusion and slaughter. Not long after, the marquis of Cornaro, with baron Spar, arriving with a recruit of three thousand men, they made a resolute sally, in which they killed above two thousand of the enemy.

MEAN time the Soltân having removed to Larissa, to be nearer the seat of war, Signor Molino arrived from Venice with proposals of peace: but he was told nothing would do unless he had brought the keys of Kandia with him; for Mohammed was resolved to have that city at all events, and his Wazîr pressed the siege exceeding hard. He caused it now to be twice stormed at four several bastions, which cost the lives of thirty thousand Turks, and such a number of mines was sprung, that the ground lay open like a vast abyss.

a BUT St. Andrea and Sabionera being reckoned the most weak, because not fortified by any considerable outworks, or encompassed with deep ditches, the Turks pressed upon them more earnestly than any other parts. Having raised some batteries on the heaps of earth, they advanced foot by foot upon the ravelin of St. Andrea, which at length they blew up; and penetrating into the ditch with four traverses, came to the very foot of the wall of the bulwark. This was defended by eighteen pieces of cannon, six of which being fifty pounders, shot into the ditch; for all this, they stormed the walls in nine different places, and in short penetrated almost to the gate of St. Andrea, laying open a breach ninety paces wide, as far as the sea. So that at last the besieged were forced to quit the outworks, and confine themselves within the walls of the city; which was still more distressed by an unlucky shot that set a magazine of ammunition on fire. Thus ended the year.

A. D. 1668.
The out-works taken.

b NEXT spring the Turks renewed the assaults upon fort St. Andrea, and penetrated forty paces within the city walls; but the besieged knowing the weakness of the place on that side, made it part of their winter's work to draw another wall from fort Panigra, across almost to the Tramata. Mean time the enemy fortified themselves as strongly without; and advanced so far on the bulwark of St. Andrea, that there remained nothing of it but the ruins. In effect, this post was become so weak, that Montburn, and all the chief officers, took their quarters here.

St. Andrea battered down
A. D. 1669.

c THINGS were in this posture in Kandia, when the dukes of Beaufort and Noailles landed there with seven thousand French: and it being determined in a council of war, that the place was no longer to be maintained but by some extraordinary enterprize, it was resolved to make a grand sally on the 27th of June, while the fleet, by the duke of Beaufort's order, drew near the shore to annoy the enemy with their artillery. The troops marched out silently in order, and at day-break the forlorn hope assaulted two redoubts, which they took, putting all the Turks therein to the sword. Hereupon the other regiments entered the lines; and having mastered the trenches after much slaughter, by storm carried a fort, wherein was a battery which played upon St. Demetrio, and nailed the cannon. Mean time the Turks began to draw into order, and then a most terrible fight ensued. But while the success of the day seemed to smile on the Christians, a magazine lately won, containing one hundred and thirty-four quintals of powder, accidentally blew up, and destroyed many men. This blow so amazed the rest, that they began to fly in disorder; having in the attack lost a good number of men, and some considerable officers, among whom was the brave duke of Beaufort, supposed to have been blown up. At the same time the fleet, consisting of eighty ships, fifty galleys, and six galleasses, were driven by the winds at some distance from shore; and a French man of war of 70 guns, blown up.

A grand sally.

d HEREUPON, disputes arising between the French and Italians, who threw the blame upon each other, the duke de Noailles ungenerously sailed off with his forces, and left Kandia in the utmost distress. The Turks, encouraged by the departure of the French, assaulted the quarters of Sabionera and St. Andrea afresh, and advanced to the pallisades of the new retrenchment; but although some stop was put to their fury here, yet the gross of the army was so weak and broken, that they refused to advance against the enemy. Mean time the captain-general sprung a mine of one hundred barrels of powder, under the thickest croud of the Turks, which made such destruction among them, that the rest retired hastily to their redoubts. Neither was the storm less furious at Sabionera, nor the advantage less considerable on the side of the besieged.

The French depart.

e BUT notwithstanding this success, and that a small reinforcement arrived under the duke of Mirandola, yet the town was so weakened by the departure of the French, with the battalion of Málta, and the rest of the volunteers, that the captain-general at length called a council of officers, to deliberate what was fittest to be done in this extremity. Grimani and some others were for blowing up the place: but the captain-general urging the difficulty of embarking the soldiers, they came to a resolution of treating with the Wazír about a surrender. For this purpose they sent colonel Thomas Anand, and Stephano Cordili, an understanding young man of twenty, secretly to the Wazír's camp. A treaty being here agreed on, the plenipotentiaries met under Paleo Castro. Those on behalf of the Turks were Ibrâbîm Pâshâ of Halep, Abmed Aga the Kabîyabeg of the Janizaries, the Spabiler Agasi, and Panaiotti the Wazír's interpreter. The plenipoes for the besieged required some place in exchange for Kandia: but that being rejected, they were at last contented that the Venetians should embark (P) with all their arms, provision, and baggage, together with such cannon as had been brought thither during the war^f.

The city yielded.

^f RICAUT, ibid.

(P) There embarked not above 2,500 soldiers, sickly, ill accoutered, and half naked. All the inhabitants departed likewise, excepting two Crack priests, one woman, and three Jesus, besides about thirty decrepid Jesus and Greeks.

A. D. 1669.
A Turkish fiction.

THERE is nothing in this account of the surrender inconsistent with that given before from ^a the Turkish historians: for Panaïotti might at this time have first proposed it, and Morofini, through policy, seem to have been persuaded by his arguments, although no mention is made of any such matters here. But the account which prince Cantemir gives in a note, of the manner in which Panaïotti duped Morofini, as related to him by Masbûd, the messenger of Panaïotti on that occasion, must needs be a fable; since it is all grounded on the false suggestion, that the French fleet, which the besieged long expected, arrived; but being by Panaïotti's address introduced into port as friends to the Turks, Morofini gave up the city to prevent their landing; concluding from thence that they came to act as the interpreter had informed him (Q): for we find that all the French succours which were expected did come, and that all which came did actually land. ^b

THUS ended the famous siege, which had continued 25 years, yet went on but languidly, excepting for the last two years and four months, in which great numbers of men were destroyed, and vast quantities of warlike stores consumed (R). But it is now time to return to other affairs.

Affairs of Hungary.

THE Hungarians were all this time very uneasy, as thinking themselves not well used by the emperor; more particularly count Péter Séreni (whose brother had been killed by a wild boar), Nadisti and Frangipani, who after some consultations resolved, if possible, to gain the Turks on their side: but not being able to agree with Kâra Mostafa, the Kaymakân, because he insisted that they should become tributary like the Transilvanians, they sent their agents to the Wazîr, Ahmed Kyoprili, at Kandia, in hopes of better terms: but he, not being yet willing ^c to entertain thoughts of another war, civilly dismissed them. However, he ordered their proposals to be taken in writing, and promised to refer them to the ministers then at the Porte. But the machinations of these three lords being at length discovered, they were all seized, tried, and executed the next year.

Peace with Venice.
A. D. 1670.

THE prime Wazîr being arrived at Adrianople from Kandia with great applause, signor Molino was sent ambassador from Venice, to confirm the peace; which at length was effected; and the dispute about the limits in Dalmatia adjusted. This year wine was prohibited on account of the Janizaries, with such strictness, that the English ambassador could scarce obtain leave, with much trouble and charge, for his family and merchants to make use of it. But the French ambassador dè Nointel, was more sensibly mortified by the prime Wazîr, who, under ^d various excuses, put off renewing the capitulations this year and the next: towards the end of which, Orkbâh, the Soltân's brother, was poisoned by his order. Let us now return to the Turkish historians, from whom we have been long absent ^e.

Kosâks
submit.

WHILST Soltân Mobammed, under pretence of hunting, removed to Yenishahr (S), that he might be near at hand to send supplies to Kandîa; the Sâri Kamîsh Kosâks (T), then subject to Poland, submit themselves to him by their ambassadors; among whom was the Hetman himself, Doroshenko (U): him the Soltân presents with a robe, and dismisses, adorned with a Tâg, or horse-tail (X), and an alem sanjâk, in token of dominion. The Kosâks had hitherto been of service both to Poland and Russia, as well by their daily ravaging the Othmân borders, as because their country, abounding with straits and marshes, was accounted the bulwark of ^e

^e RICAUT, ibid.

(Q) The narrative relates, that the Wazîr getting intelligence that the French fleet drew near, Panaïotti, at a secret meeting, told Morofini that the admiral had sent to inform the Wazîr, that he was sent by his king to carry away the Venetians prisoners, and deliver Kandia up to him: that next night twelve Turkish ships sailed out of port, with orders to return next day with French colours; and that as soon as they appeared in sight, twelve more were sent out under Turkish colours, who, instead of fighting the counterfeit French, saluted and accompanied them into the port: that Morofini, convinced by this, that what Panaïotti told him was true, explained the mystery to the besieged, who stood astonished at what they saw: and having persuaded the soldiers that it was safer to trust enemies than faithless friends, surrendered the city to the Wazîr.

(R) During the last two years and four months of this siege (which from the beginning held 25 years), we are told by Ricaut, that of the Venetians there were killed and wounded 30,985; of the Turks 118,754. The assaults given by the latter were 56; the combats underground 45; the sallies made by the Venetians 96; the mines and fornelli sprung by the besieged 1,173; by the Turks 472; the Venetians spent 50,317 barrels of powder; bombs; from 50 to 500 weight, 48,119; grenades, of brass and iron, 100 960; of grâls. 84,877; cannon-bullets 276,743; pounds of lead 18,044,957; pounds of match 13,012,500. They left behind about 300 small cannon.

(S) So Larissa, a noted city of Thessaly, and at present the metropolis, is called. Cant.

(T) That is, Kosâks of the Yellow Reed; so are called those who inhabit between the Boristhenes (or Nieper) and the Tyras (or Nießer) formerly subject to Poland; now vassals partly to the Poles, partly to the Russians. They have several times changed their names among the Turks. Doroshenko called them Kazagbi: and when he revolted to the Russians, they took the name of Serke Kazagbi, from Sirke, also their leader. Cant.

(U) Ricaüt says, the reason of this revolt was, the court refusing to annex Ukrania to the crown, which would have intitled that country to the privileges of other free provinces, and given that general an opportunity of becoming absolute over the Kosâks.

(X) This was taken away, when the country was given to Duka; the Wazîr thinking it too great an honour for an infidel. Cant.

both

- a both kingdoms ; which being now removed, they had cause to fear from them no less damages, than what the Turkish provinces had formerly suffered. Hereupon the king of Poland, to destroy their new allegiance, before too deeply rooted, sends a great army, which, joining with those who still favoured his interest, make great devastations in their country. A. D. 1670.

THE Soltân, on this advice, sends a Chausb with a threatening letter to the king ; and on his continuing hostilities, declares war against the Poles. Pursuant thereto, in Safer 1083, he sets forward with a great army (Y) ; and running a bridge over the Danube at Sackebe, (Z), passes his forces. At length, after long marches through Moldavia, he encamps near Khotin (or Khochim). Then he sends over the Tyras, in boats, a strong party, who at the first assault take Zwaniecz ; and being now joined by the Tatars, headed by their Khân, Selîm prince of Moldavia, refusing timber, is discovered to favour the enemy, and to be bribed to delay the building of the bridge : wherefore he is deposed, and stripped of his treasure ; after which, Peter is chosen prince by the nobility of that country. War with Poland. Hejrah, 1083, A. D. 1672.

AT length passing the Tyras on the 3d of Rabio'lakhbîr, he appears with his army before Kameniek, three hours distant from the river. This city being strongly fortified both by nature and art, is very difficult to be assaulted. It is surrounded by the rapid torrent Smotricz, the banks whereof, every-where full of craggy rocks, afford a strong bulwark to the place. Besides these, a castle stands in the middle of the town, environed with walls of a great height, and not to be shaken. The Poles depending on these fortifications, and the strength of the garrison, hoped to blunt the edge of the Othmân fury with this siege ; and therefore, appeared not in the field. But the walls were so vigorously battered on all sides, that in ten days time they are beaten down ; and the garrison finding themselves unable to sustain the assault, relinquish the outer walls, and retire into the inner castle : yet not thinking themselves safe even there, they surrender (C), on condition of having life and liberty. taken.

THE Poles were quite astonished to see a fortress, thought capable of holding out many years, taken in so few days ; and to confound them the more, Kaplân Mehemed Pâshâ, governor of Hâlep, and the Khân of Tartary, were sent with the light armed forces to reduce Leopolis ; whilst the Soltân, intending to follow with the main army, encamps near Buchach (D). When the city was at the last extremity, ambassadors arrived in the Tatar camp, offering in the name of the king and kingdom, to deliver up forty-eight towns and villages, in the territory of Kameniek ; to pay a yearly tribute of twenty thousand rix dollars (E), and never more quarrel with the Kosâks under Doroshenko. The Khân having heard the proposals of the ambassadors, sends them to the Soltân, who grants a peace on those terms ; and then disbanding his army in Shaabân, returns to Adrianople ^h.

^h CANT. p. 263, & seq. RICAUT. ubi supra.

(Y) Of one hundred and fifty thousand men, according to Ricaut.

(Z) Formerly called Obluciczia, a town on the south side of the Danube, not far from Galacz, in Moldavia. By the very old buildings there, it seems to be a work of the Roman colonies, or the Daci ; as are Falca, Babadâgli, and other very antient towns of that region. Cant.

(A) The most famous Khân of the Tatars, in the present age ; a prince equally brave and prudent. Cant.

(B) He was thrice prince of Moldavia, and once of Walakhia ; originally a Greek, and servant to a merchant of Jassi : he was illiterate, but very prudent in managing affairs, and reckoned the most excellent of his age. Cant.

(C) Prince Cantemir observes, that this was the last victory by which any advantage accrued to the Othmân state, or any province or city was annexed to the empire ; and that since then, the strength of the *Othmân*s has been weakened, by the destruction of several kingdoms and provinces, by the loss of whole armies, and by intestine wars and dissensions, as he proceeds to relate in the words of the Turkish historians.

(D) According to the Polish orthography, Buczacz.

(E) The Poles do not deny that this was promised, though it was never paid ; and in time was abolished by the peace made at Zuranno. Cant. According to Ricaut, the king of Poland was to quit claim to the Ukrain, Podolia, and Rusland ; Leopolis, and the adjacent country, to pay 70,000 dollars, yearly tribute.

S E C T II.

The war with Poland, Russia, and the Emperor ; with the siege of Vienna.

- e BUT whilst Mohammed expected the arrival of the Polish ambassadors, who were to bring the promised tribute, and ratify the peace, he is informed that Doroshenko, general of the Kosâks, had revolted ; and with a large body of men was laying waste the borders of the empire. This bad news was followed by worse ; that the Poles, animated by the promises of the emperor of Germany and the pope, were preparing again for war. Not long after, the Wazîr, Kyoprili Ahmed Pâshâ, receives letters from the high chancellor of Poland, importing, that the states of the kingdom considered as null the conditions to which the king had submitted, The peace broken.

A. D. 1672.

The Polish
army defeats
the Turks
under John Sobieski.
Hej. 1084.
A. D. 1673.

mitted, without their consent ; and that they would rather suffer death, than the infamy of a paying one farthing by way of tribute.

THE Soltân, finding himself deceived by the Poles, determines to take a severe and memorable revenge. The Wazîr answers the letters of the states, reproaching them with their perfidy, and threatening the total destruction of the kingdom, unless they submitted without hesitation to what was agreed upon. As these remonstrances had no effect upon the Poles, the Soltân, in Rabio'lakhir, 1084, sets out at the head of an army, not inferior to the former ; flattering himself with the hopes of subduing them at once, weakened as they were by the last year's ill success, and to annex Poland to his empire. But the Poles, grown wise by their misfortune, having composed those domestic broils, which had opened the way to the Turkish victories the former year, assemble all their forces (F), and before the Soltân could reach them with his army, pass the Tyras at Khotin, under the command of John Sobieski.

A FEW days after Mohammed arrives, and finding the place where he designed to cross the river, seized by the enemy, is surprised at the boldness of a people lately vanquished ; and imagining that, led by their evil genius to destruction, they had shut themselves up between the Tyras and the Danube, commands his forces to attack them. Hereupon the two armies engage, and a fierce and bloody battle ensues, which lasted with doubtful success till the evening : at which time, Petreczeicus, prince of Moldavia (G), and Gregory (H), the son of Chika, prince of Walakbia, deserting to the Poles, the left wing of the Turks, commanded by Ibrâhîm Pâshâ, cried out they were betrayed ; and quitting their ranks, refuse to obey the orders of their leader. The right wing likewise is soon broken by the valour of the Poles ; and at first, indeed, retreat gradually ; but being vigorously pressed by the enemies troops, they quickly take to flight, and abandon their cannon, with all their warlike provisions. When the Soltân, who had remained four hours march behind, saw his soldiers flying in disorder, he endeavoured all in his power to make them return to the charge : but finding neither his commands nor sword had any effect, he is forced at last to have recourse also to flight, to avoid falling into the hands of the enemyⁱ.

THE Christian historians say, that Sobieski broke into the Turkish camp, and wounded the general Husseyn with his own hand : that the fight continued fifteen hours ; and that of the Turks, Soleymân, Beglerbeg of Bosnia, fought best ; who having had six horses shot under him, was afterwards slain in the pursuit : that all the Janizaries, to the number of eight thousand, were cut to pieces ; besides twelve thousand other soldiers : that they lost all their baggage ; twenty-five thousand waggon-loads of provision and ammunition ; with two thousand purses of money for payment of the troops^k.

He is chosen
king :

THE Othmân army being thus defeated, there appeared nothing to hinder the Poles from recovering what they had lost, and even extending the limits of their kingdom. Kameniek, which they found to be a check to their progress, was pressed with a severe famine ; which would probably soon force the garrison to abandon that fortress : but all these hopes were suddenly destroyed, by the death of Mikhael, king of Poland, which happened soon after, and drew off the nobles from the care of the war, to the election of a new king. After long deliberation, the crown is conferred on John Sobieski, great marshal of the kingdom ; who, besides the nobleness of his family, and his own personal merits, by his late victory against the Turks, had procured the votes of the states of Poland.

not well assisted.

THIS choice was by no means agreeable to the Othmân court ; and as it seemed to threaten the vanquished with some greater calamity from the same hand, the Soltân therefore prepares a very powerful army to oppose him, and commands Selîm Gyeray Khân to join him, with numerous troops of Bujâk, and Krîm Tatars. The king of Poland, suspecting what was really the case, admonishes the states of the realm to assemble all their forces : but they were deaf to his advice, under pretence that the Othmân power, broken by the loss it had lately sustained, could scarce recover itself in many years ; and that therefore the forces already raised were sufficient : but the true reason was, that the nobles were afraid, lest the heroic king, when he found all Poland united under his command, should make the crown hereditary in his family.

ⁱ CANT. p. 275, & seq. RICAUT, ubi supra.

^k RICAUT, ibid.

(F) Consisting, according to Ricaut, of 50,000 men.

(G) He was disgusted at Husseyn, the Turkish general, who struck him on the head with his pole-ax, because he had not brought troops according to his expectation ; yet the same night intrusted the care of the guards to him ; who thereupon corresponded with Sobieski. Ricaut.

(H) A very great man, and adorned with many virtues. This was the second time he revolted from the Turks. Cant. Ricaut says, he was forced away to the Poles, by his own troops, and soon after escaped back to the Turks.

^a HOWEVER, Sobieſki, to overcome the enemy by art, ſince he could not by force, ſent what forces he had ready to block up Kameniek; which reduced that city to ſuch ſtreights, that the gariſon had ſcarce proviſion enough for a few weeks: but the Soltân being informed of their diſtreſs, aſſembles his forces, and marches them with ſuch ſpeed, that about the tenth of Rabio'lakbir, 1085, the foremoſt of his troops appeared about Khotin. The Poles, who did not expect the Turks ſo ſoon by a month or two, on the news of their approach, in haſte abandoned the ſiege. Hereupon the Soltân quickly recovers the city of Khotin; and then ſupplying Kameniek with neceſſaries, goes and reduces Human, a town of Podolia (I). Mean time Doroſhenko comes unſent for, with four thouſand Koſáks, to the aſſiſtance of Mohammed, and offers him his whole army: but the Soltân, ſuſpecting perhaps the Hetman's integrity, commands him to return; alleging, that he had no occaſion for the aſſiſtance of the Koſáks againſt the Poles. This highly exaſperated Doroſhenko, and proved afterwards very detrimental to the Othmân affairs, by their revolt to the Czar of Ruſſia.

A. D. 1673.
Kameniek relieved.
A. D. 1674.
Khotin taken.

^b MOHAMMED, conſidering that he could not be ſure of Kameniek, whiſt inhabited by Chriſtians (ſince they might both inform the enemy of every thing which paſſed, and put them in a way to take the city) commands all the inhabitants of that territory to be removed beyond the Danube, and mount Hæmus, into the province of Kirk Ekkleſiá (K), and lands to be aſſigned them; dividing their country among two thouſand Spahis, who were before ſeated in the diſtricts of Bender, Akkierman, and Kili. The ſeaſon being ſpent in theſe affairs, he returns to Adrianople, where, deſpiſing now the enemy, of whom he had before been a little afraid, he devotes all the next year to his pleaſures; and ſolemnizes the circumciſion of his two ſons, Moſtafa and Abmed, with the nuptials of his daughter (L): on which occaſion he amasses a greater treaſure (M), than half the revenue of the whole empire would amount to.

Inhabitants removed.

^c THE Poles, imagining the long ſilence of the Turks to be only a ſtratagem, were cautious of making any attempt: but in 1087, the king diſcovering the true reaſon of their inactivity, raiſes freſh troops, and paſſing by Kameniek, enters Moldavia, in order to attack them within their own territories. Soltân Mohammed, who had reſigned himſelf wholly to luxury and hunting, upon the death of Shiſhman Ibrâhîm Pâſhâ (N), ſends Shaytân Ibrâhîm Pâſhâ (O), with the dignity of Seraskier (P), at the head of an army againſt the Poles; who immediately offer him battle. But he, as a man of great policy and military ſkill, at firſt amuſing ^d the king with pretences of peace, renders the enemy more negligent: then breaking off the treaty, on ſome ſlight occaſion, circumvents the Polish army by a thouſand artifices, and renders all their efforts ineffectual. At laſt on a ſudden he beſieges the king ſo cloſely in his camp, (Q) that he could neither ſend a meſſenger into his kingdom, nor receive any from thence.

The Poles circumvented.
A. D. 1676.

^e AFFAIRS being reduced to the moſt deſperate ſituation, the king ſends ſome perſons into the Turkiſh camp, to try whether the former treaty of peace might be renewed. Ibrâhîm Pâſhâ would ſcarce have conſented to their deſires, if he had not diſcovered that a mutiny was ready to break out among his troops. The Janizaries, uneaſy at the quick marches they had been obliged to make, to reduce the king to thoſe ſtraits, declared it great injuſtice to be compelled to contend with the enemy and ſeaſons; whiſt the Soltân diverted himſelf with hunting and other pleaſures. On the other hand, the Khân of Krim Tartary, perceiving he loſt more than he gained by the war, did not ceaſe to perſuade the Seraskier, that it was better to accept of the conditions which the Poles would offer, to ſave themſelves from imminent deſtruction, than to hazard the defeat of the Othmân army, by driving them to deſpair. Ibrâhîm at length approving of this advice, hoſtages were given on both ſides: but the report of peace making the Othmâns grow remiſs in guarding the paſſes, the king of Poland privately retires out of his camp, and unexpectedly attacks a body of Tatars, who were incamped near Mobilow (R), and eaſily puts them to flight.

Peace proposed.

(I) Ricaut ſays, the Turks alſo forced the Ruſſians to retreat; and by help of the captain Pâſhâ, rebuilt Aſak, or Aſof, which the Ruſſians had deſtroyed. After this, falling on that part of the Koſáks which had not ſubmitted, they ſwept all away into ſlavery.—Perhaps this has reference to the removal of the Chriſtians from about Kameniek, mentioned lower down.

(K) A province and town, formerly called Teffaracenta Ekkleſiai, or the forty churches, but now it has none, and very few Chriſtians; being inhabited by Polish Jews, tranſplanted thither by Soltân Mohammed. It is 38 hours from Conſtantinople, and 12 from Adrianople. Cant.

(L) To his favourite Kûl Ogli, Pâſhâ of Magneſia. Ricaut, Cant.

(M) All officers whatſoever belonging to the government, are obliged to make preſents on this and the like occaſions. Cant.

(N) Shiſhmân ſignifies the fat. He was a very brave general. The Turks ſay, he kept a French ſurgeon, who opened his belly every year, and took out the fat: but at laſt increaſing ſo, that it could not be taken out, he burſt. Cant.

(O) Called Shaytan, or Devil, from his ſkill and cunning. Cant.

(P) Vulgarly Bâſhbog, that is, the head, or general of the whole army. Cant.

(Q) The Poles, whoſe army amounted to ſcarce 15,000 men, were ſurrounded near Zorawno, by well nigh 100,000 Turks, who yet gave them peace, when they leaſt expected it. Manley.

(R) A town of Polish Ukrania, on the eaſt ſide of the Tyras, twelve hours from Soroka, and twelve from Kameniek. Cant.

A. D. 1676.

and concluded.

AN account of this defeat being brought to the Seraskier, when at dinner with the ambaf-sadors, he severely reproaches them for this breach of the law of nations, and immediately sends his cavalry to assist the Tatars; who, on the 19th of Râjeb, finding the enemy under Zerauna, rush upon them full of resentment: but, after a fierce and bloody conflict, both parties at night retire to their camps, where they skirmish for seventeen days continually, with doubtful fortune. At last peace is concluded in the midst of arms, and signed on the 6th of Shaabân. The Poles on their return assembling the states, notwithstanding the endeavours of the emperor of Germany to the contrary, ratify the conditions, and send the palatine of Kulm as ambassador extraordinary to the *Porte*¹.

Vanity of a Polish ambassador.

H. J. 1088.

A. D. 1677.

THE ambassador being arrived near Constantinople, with 700 attendants, demanded by a letter, what had never been done before, that the Wazîr should meet him at the city gate. b
This being refused, he would not enter the city (S), but retired to Daud Pâshâ (T); by which unseasonable pride the negotiation is protracted, from the month of Rajeb 1088, to that of Safer next year. However, the peace is at last ratified in the aforesaid village, and afterwards drawn up in such a manner as the Wazîr thought proper (U). By these articles, the Poles not only renounced claim to Kameniek, but likewise engaged to give up all authority over the Kosâks of Podolia, as subjects, and resign it to the Othmân court: and allowed the Lipkâ-Tatars (X) leave to depart. In short, the whole treaty was worded not as if a king was treating with a king, but a lord with his vassal. However, this did not cure the vanity of the Polish ambassador: for, that he might not seem to have brought so magnificent a retinue with him to no purpose, he, after the peace was confirmed, desires leave of the Wazîr to c make his public entry.

ON this occasion, besides other marks of magnificence, he orders his horses to be shod with silver, and the shoes to be fastened with only two nails, that they might the more easily fall off in the streets, which were paved, and strike the Turks with admiration at the riches of Poland.
But what he had designed for his honour turned to his disgrace: for the Wazîr (Y), when one of those shoes was brought him, is reported to have said, that the infidel had indeed shoes of silver, but a head of brass; since it was incredible that any person in his senses could be guilty of such a ridiculous extravagance^m.

Affairs of Hungary.

HUNGARY was all this while full of discontents and troubles. However, the Turks being at war with the Poles, did not interfere; but count Strazoldo having taken from the mal-con- d tents Debrezin, which paid tribute to the Porte, the Othmân governor interpreted it as an open breach of the peace. For this reason it was thought fit to give it up to the Soltân. Thus matters stood, when Kara Mostafa succeeded the famous Kuperli: this new Wazîr being wholly bent on a war in Hungary, gave the frontier Pâshâs liberty to assist the mal-contents as they saw occasion; and the Turks accordingly made some incursions, which gave the Imperialists great alarms. About this time also, Apafi, prince of Transilvania, having discovered a conspiracy against his life, began to declare himself, more than ever, in favour of the malcontents, who were now grown pretty formidable.

Mal-contents strengthened.

THEIR army consisting of sixteen thousand men, was commanded by count Wezelini, their palatine, who designed to besiege Zatmar; but Smith, the German major-general, marching e to oppose him, was defeated there. After this, they sent to excite the Soltân to turn his arms against the emperor: but being then at war with the Russians, he declined it, yet assisted them with troops under-hand. While Leopold, by his ambassador, complained of this at the Porte, the states of Hungary assembled at Altenburgh, in order to induce the mal-contents to return to their duty, resolved that the churches which had been taken from the protestants, should be restored to them: but this article being eluded by the clergy, the parties concerned were the more exasperated; neither could they endure to see the crown of Hungary, as it were, hereditary in the house of Austria.

Hostilities continue.

HOSTILITIES between the Imperialists and the Turks still continued, notwithstanding the negotiations. Five hundred German horse marching to Erlaw, were cut to pieces by a party f

¹ CANT. p. 279, & seq.^m CANT. p. 284, & seq.

(S) The obstinacy and pride of the ambassador would have put an end to all hopes of peace, had not the Wazîr been at this time meditating the Vienna expedition.

(T) A place about an Italian mile on the west side of Constantinople; where are palaces of the Soltân, and houses for the courtiers. There is a Daud Pâshâ Mekimessî in the midst of the city. Cant.

(U) The articles of this peace are inserted in a note, by prince Cantemir, from de la Croix's history of the war between the Poles and the Turks.

(X) Lipka is the Turkish name for Lithuania; whence the Tatars living there are so called. They are Mohammedans, and though derived from the Krim Tatars, yet they are naturally weaker and more infirm. Cant.

(Y) Abmed Kioprili Oglî made this peace a little before his death. He died of a dropsy and jaundice at Churlâ (or Chyurli), on the way to Adrianople, the 23d of October, 1676, in the 47th year of his age, and 16th of his government, and left not his fellow behind him; having been an excellent minister both in peace and war. Ricaut.

a of the enemy; and two hundred more, by the garrison of New Heusel. Hereupon the Imperialists, by way of reprisal, fell on the new Pâshâ of that city, sent thither by the Porte, and defeated his convoy of two hundred Spahis. The Beglerbeg of Buda so resented this injury (the new Pâshâ having had no hand in those violences before-mentioned), that he sent a party towards Butrak, who returned with two hundred prisoners. About the same time, count Paul Wefelini dying, he is succeeded in the command of the mal-contents by Tekeli, who, though young, was very vigilant and braveⁿ.

But let us leave the affairs of Hungary for a while, to look into those of the Russians, as related by the Turkish historians. As soon as the peace was concluded with Poland, a fresh war broke out with Russia. Doroshenko, Hetman of the Sari Kamish Kazaghi, to revenge the affront lately offered him by the Seraskier, as well as for other reasons (Z) of disgust against the Turks, with the consent of all the chief officers, offers to submit themselves to the Czar of Russia; to whose father, his predecessor Bogdân Kiemielniski (A) had many years before promised fidelity; but afterwards was obliged by force of arms to abandon their engagement. Nothing could happen more agreeable than this offer to the Czar; since, by this means, not only Ukrania, which was always liable to incursions from the Kosâks, was secured, but his territories were extended also beyond the Boristhenes, and his army increased with above sixty thousand men of approved valour.

THE Othmân court was strangely disturbed at the news of this revolt; when the Soltân, to avoid the war if possible (not on account of the Czar's power, but of the difficulties attending such an expedition) and by policy recover the Kosâks to his obedience, releases George Kiemielniski (B), son of Bogdân, from the Seven Towers, and appoints him Hetman, in the room of Doroshenko; hoping those people, out of affection to his family, would submit to him: but the Kosâks, who had found the Turkish yoke too heavy, resolutely reject all offers in their favour. Hereupon the Soltân, finding it necessary to use force, sends Shaytan Ibrâkîm Pâshâ, Seraskier of Silistria (C), with his whole army, to reinstate George in the country of the Kosâks; with orders to subdue Chebrîn (D), the capital of the province, and seat of the Hetman.

IBRAHIM passing the Danube on the 6th of June, 1678, marches through Moldavia and Podolia. When he came to Chebrîn, he is surprised to find sixty thousand Russians and Kosâks strongly entrenched; so that not having force enough to attack them (for he had scarce forty thousand men) he was resolved to wait for the Tatars, who were three days march behind. But the Russians getting intelligence of their approach, plant themselves in an advantageous post, between both armies, and fall on the Tatars as they drew near, with such vigour, that in a few hours there were slain the Khân's son, eight Mirzas, and ten thousand men; the rest were either taken prisoners or dispersed. The Turks beholding such a slaughter, and fearing that it would be their own case if they stayed, threw away their arms, and fled with such precipitation, that they stopped not till they had passed the river Bog (E).

THIS ill success made the Soltân still more desirous of peace: however, to prevent any blemish on his honour, he sends an ambassador to Russia, in the Khân of Tartary's name, to persuade the Czar to make peace with the Soltân. This ambassador required, that Chebrîn should be restored to the Turks, as they had an undoubted right to it; and that the Czar

ⁿ MANLEY contin. of Ricaut in Mah. IV.

(Z) Among the rest, for their resigning to the Poles Bialocerkiew, and Parwoloczs, the chief bulwark of their country; also for passing over in silence the prohibition of commerce, and other Polish arts, by which they were daily exhausted, with a view the more easily to impose their tyranny on them, when they should think proper.

(A) Hetman of the Kosâks, who was a terror not only to the Poles, but also to the Turks and Tatars, who call him Kbmil. He was slain in battle with the Poles. Cant.

(B) He was the eldest son of Bogdân; who having been slain by the Poles, George succeeded, and carried on the war with reputation for three years: then finding the Kosâks diminish, and fearing his father's fate, he changed his name and dress, resolving to retire to a monastery in Ukrania. In his way, he fell among a party of Poles, who stript and beat him; but was rescued by Tatars, who carried him into Krîm. Being at last discovered by a Kosâk, the Khân sent him to the Porte, where he was imprisoned in the Seven Towers. From thence he strangely escaped, but was taken and cruelly beaten. He lay there from 1670 till 1677; and then, against his will, was made Hetman of the Kosâks; but could never engage them on his side, most of them saying he was a counterfeit. Three years after he was slain at the mouth of the Nieper, as is related lower down. Cant.

(C) So the Pâshâs intrusted with the defence of the northern provinces are called; but they reside at Bâbadâgbi. Silistria stands on the south side of the Danube, opposite to Walakhia, and is still called in Greek, Drissa. It is inhabited mostly by Christians, and has a Greek metropolitan: but Bâbadâgbi lies nearer the Euxine Sea, about twenty hours from the Danube, directly below Sakzen, called formerly Oblucziza. Cant.

(D) The Russian merchants who were going into Turkey, were on this occasion detained at Nisna, a mart in Ukrania, subject to the Hetman of the Kosâks. 'Tis situated in a very large plain near the Wustrow, and defended by a good castle. Cant.

(E) Or Buh, formerly Hypanus, between the Tyras and Borysthenes; though so deep as not to be fordable, yet it is not navigable, being full of cataracts. It falls into the Euxine, near the town of Ozi, (Ozia, or Uffia) commonly Oczakow (or Ochakow) and by the Greeks, Olbiopolis. There is another Bog which rises near Lemburg, and falls into the Vistula. Cant.

should

A. D. 1678.

should abandon the Kosáks to their own evil genius : for he pretended to know for certain, that the Soltán would rather continue the war for twenty years, at all hazards, than lose one foot of land to which he had a right. But the Czar, who was not ignorant by whom the ambassador was really commissioned, sends an officer of his court with letters to Mohammed and the Wazír, in which he advised them, not to flatter themselves that he could be imposed on by the same artifices as the Poles had been ; since their example had made him more cautious, and taught him how to deal with them : adding, that they ought to desist from an unjust war, and leave Ukrania undisturbed, to which he had an undoubted right, by Bogdán Kiemielniski's resignation, confirmed lately by Dorosbenko : but that, in case they resolved to prosecute hostilities, they might be assured he would not agree to a peace, till he had recovered the rest of Ukrania, unjustly taken from his ancestors, as far as the Tyras and Asof.

The war revived.

HAVING read this letter, the Wazír, Kara Mostafa Páshá (F), sends for the Mufti, the Kaymakán, the Kadhi'laskers, and Aga of the Janizaries ; and enquires what the law and reason advised to be done. The majority declare for peace, since there were little hopes of doing any thing for the Othmân interest, in those difficult and remote quarters. The Wazír alone opposed these pacific sentiments ; declaring, that so great a slaughter as the Russians had made of the Tatars, ought not to pass unrevenge. To this opinion, the rest assenting out of complaisance, it is determined to renew the war with the utmost vigour ; in consequence of which, the Russian ambassador receives an answer, breathing nothing but fire and sword^a.

Chebrin besieged.
Hej. 1090.
A. D. 1679.

THE Othmân army being arrived at Tatar Pazarjik (G), about the end of Rabio'lawel, in 1089, Mohammed invests the Wazír with the full command ; who, passing through Moldavia in the following month, reaches the Bog. From thence he marches with eighty thousand Turks, thirty thousand Tatars, and four thousand Kosáks, whom George Kiemielniski had drawn to his party ; and on the eighth of Jomazio'lawel, comes in sight of Chebrin. The garrison of Russians and Kosáks, who were at that time employed in building a new fort without the city, on the unexpected approach of the Othmáns, retire in confusion into the town. The Wazír observing their disorder, ordered his Kyebaya (H) forthwith to attack the place, in hopes to terrify them into a surrender : but after fighting bravely for four hours, they are forced to retire with dishonour, and the loss of their commander, besides two thousand Janizaries. Hereupon Kara Mostafa, before the soldiers had pitched their tents, orders the city to be surrounded, and trenches to be dug, ramparts thrown up, and batteries to be planted. When he found these endeavours did not succeed, by reason of the sandy soil, he, by advice of a Pole, causes bridges to be made on the other side, where the town was defended by a morass : but this work also failed of the desired effect.

The Turks defeated.

ABOUT the same time the Russian army, under the command of Romadanowski, having passed the Boristhenes before the Wazír had any intelligence of it ; that minister, to obviate their designs, sent Kara Mehemed Páshá, governor of Hálep, with great part of his army to fight them, in case he found a good opportunity : but as he could not draw the Russians, tho' superior in number, to a battle, the Wazír, suspecting that the enemy's intention was either to destroy the Othmân forces by delay, or reinforce the garrison of Chebrin, commands Koplán Páshá (I) to encamp with the rest of the army, between that city and the Russians. When Romadanowski perceived that all communication with the town was cut off, he, on the 22d of Jomazio'lakbir, attacks Koplán Páshá's troops with such vigour, that the foremost ranks being broken at the first onset, the rest fly for safety through the midst of the morass : while the Páshá, finding it impossible to rally his terrified soldiers, sets fire to the bridges, to prevent the enemy from pursuing and destroying the whole Othmân army.

The city taken with great loss.

AT last winter approaching, the Wazír, in order either to conquer or retire, causes three mines to be sunk under the walls of the castle ; and springing them on the 21st of that month (K), commands the men to surround the city, and enter the breaches. Hereupon the garrison, finding it impracticable to defend the place since the walls were demolished, fly out of the gate towards the Boristhenes, after they had laid a train under the magazine of powder ; by which means, several thousands of the common soldiers, who had flocked in to plunder,

^a CANT. p. 288, & seqq.

(F) A man of great capacity and valour, but the most covetous of all the Wazírs. He was first Páshá of Silistria, and Damaskus ; then admiral ; afterwards Kaymakán. CANT.

(G) A pretty large town of Thrace, towards the northern foot of the mountains Chenghe, or Hæmus. CANT.

(H) Or more elegantly Ketchudabeg, that is, the Wazír's deputy. His office is the most considerable in the Othmân empire, and his authority very great ; for nothing can be done or ordered, but it must pass thro' his hands, and be confirmed by his letters. CANT.

(I) Called Koplán, that is, Tyger, from his courage. He is celebrated for his bravery in the Polish wars ; and of so great authority among the Turks, that the Wazír, though his mortal enemy, could never destroy him. CANT.

(K) Perhaps it should be the next month, for the 22d is mentioned before.

were

- a were blown up (L). Next day the Wazîr, accompanied by the chief officers, views the city, which had cost so much labour and blood : but, as it appeared very difficult to repair, as well as to defend it, he commands the walls and houses to be levelled with the ground ; then giving his soldiers some days refreshment, he endeavours to provoke the Russians to a battle ; but they being unwilling to quit their trenches, and at the same time preparing for their retreat, he orders Koplân Pâshâ, with some light troops, to follow and attack them in their march. But as the Russians retired with close ranks, and were defended by a chain of waggons, they vigorously repelled the assaults of their pursuers. At length the Wazîr himself is obliged for want of provisions to return ; and in his march loses, besides almost all his baggage and larger cannon, a greater number of men than had been destroyed by the enemy ; so that at his entrance into Adrianople, in the beginning of Ramazân, the army appeared rather to have been defeated than victorious.

A. D. 1679.

- b FAR from being inspired, by the conquest they had made, to renew the war in Ukrania, they rather considered those who mentioned it to be their enemies. Their having taken the ruins of Chebrîn, and seen some hundreds of their enemies heads placed round the Wazîr's tent, could afford them but little joy, after the loss of thirty thousand of their companions, and the fatigues they had sustained in their march. The Wazîr himself, finding how difficult it was to carry on war, in places unknown, barren, and full of marshes, as well as rivers, repented too late that he had opposed the motions for peace, and would have desisted from the war, had not the perpetual incursions of Kosâks, who laid waste all the countries along the Euxine Sea, prevented his pacific designs.

- c HE resolves, therefore, to build a town and castle at the mouth of the Boristhenes, not far from Ochakow (M), in hopes, that by this means, the Kosâk ships might be hindered from entering the Euxine Sea, and the Zaporovi Kosâks be obliged, for want of salt, to submit to the Othmân empire. The execution of this affair he commits to the Mimar Aga (N), for whose defence, till the work should be finished, he sends Koplân Pâshâ, with six regiments of Janizaries. But this politic design of the Wazîr is ruined by a sudden and unexpected accident : for the foundations were scarce laid, when Cirko, general of the Zaporovi Kosâks, returning from an expedition into Tartary, with fifteen thousand men, by chance passed thro' the neighbouring parts, and hearing that a new fort was building, approaches to view it, and see who were the projectors. When he finds them to be Turks, he immediately surrounds and kills all the workmen and their guards, with Kielmielniski (O), who had been made Hetman of the Kosâks by the Turks : then pitching his camp on the spot, sends a messenger to inform the Czar of what had been done. Hereupon, that prince dispatches orders to Dolhoruki, who succeeded Romadanowski in command of the army, to join all his forces as soon as possible with Cirko's, in order to oppose the attempts of the Turks.

Another misfortune.

- d THE Wazîr, judging it madness to exhaust in those countries the strength of the Othmân empire, which might be employed to advantage in other parts, agrees to a peace, which was extremely desired on both sides : not that the Soltân wanted either inclination or force to carry on the war ; but he had not an army inured to cold, hunger, and other hardships, too severe for mortals : besides, fortune seemed now inclinable to abandon the Othmân arms. However, all this could not have diverted the Porte from prosecuting their first design, if new commotions in Hungary had not induced them to turn their arms that way °.

Peace concluded.

e EMERIK TEKELI (P) had about this time revolted from the emperor of Germany, and in a few months drawn into his rebellion almost all the people in that part of Hungary which belonged to the imperial crown. But finding himself unable to withstand that monarch, who having

Count Tekeli revolts to the Turks;

° CANT. p. 292. & seq. MANLEY, ubi supra.

(L) Manley says, the Turks took the city by springing eight or nine mines, and then put the garrison to the sword. But the Turks, we think, ought to be believed in this case.

(M) In the year 1679, the captain Pâshâ, Kara Kiaja (who, next to the Wazîr, made the greatest figure at the Porte) was sent with sixty galleys, to build two castles upon the Borysthenes (or Nieper) ; the Czar complained of this by letter, but was not answered. Manley.

(N) The Mimar Aga is the chief architect ; his chief business is to oversee all the new buildings in Constantinople, and take care that they do not exceed the height allowed, or come out the least further than they ought into the street. In this case he can punish the common builders, who are called Kalfa, or Khalife. It often happens that this officer knows nothing of his art ; the place being given by the Wazîr to whom he pleases. Cant.

(O) This is George Kielmielniski, before-mentioned, sent to cover the workmen.

(P) After he had lost his estate in Hungary, he received a daily pension of 80 Leonines from the Turks. And being released from his imprisonment, by Ancji Soleyman Pâshâ, he was held in great honour by the Turks, all the while they were engaged in war. Whenever Soltân Mostafa was in the camp, he took him along for his companion, and generally made use of his counsel. After the peace of Carolowitz, (in which it was stipulated, that such persons as were inclined to raise commotions, should be hearkened to by neither party) he was sent away by the same Soltân to Nikomedia, where he was presented with a country house ; and being very much afflicted with the gout, he died there soon after. Cant.

A. D. 1680. made peace with the French (Q), had assembled all his forces to extinguish the flame, he applied to Soltân Mohammed for his aid; promising to pay forty thousand rix dollars yearly tribute (R), and assist him with thirty thousand Hungarians, whenever he should demand them. It was long deliberated at the Othmân court, whether Tekeli should be assisted openly, or only under hand, till the twenty years truce, made in 1075 should be expired. The latter opinion was approved by all the Vlema, with the Valide Soltâna, or queen mother (S); declaring it was unjust to wage war with a prince who had given no cause of complaint, but till then strictly observed the conditions of the truce.

THE Soltân and Wazîr were inclined to the former opinion, alleging, that so fair an opportunity of propagating the Mohammedan faith could never happen again, since Hungary submitted, and Germany was exhausted with the French and Swedish wars; so that nothing could hinder the reduction of all the countries formerly subject to the Roman empire. Farther, that the war might not seem too great a burden upon his subjects, the Soltân declares, that he has ready for this design, seventy thousand purses in his treasury, a complete army, and all other necessaries for several expeditions. The Janizaries, instructed by the Wazîr (T), demand a war, and the Soltâna mother, now gained by that minister, with the hopes that out of the conquests her Pashmalîk (U) would be increased to three hundred purses, votes likewise for it. Hereupon the Mufti, who had long concealed his sentiments, approves of the Soltân's designs by a Fetva: for all this, the opposite party disperse libels against the divân, advising the people not to consent to an unjust war.

who seek pretences to break the peace.

THIS made it necessary at least to find out some pretence to remove their scruples, and make them more readily engage in the expedition. The emperor having disturbed the peace with Poland, afforded indeed a plausible ground for breaking the truce: but because this had not been done openly, it was not deemed sufficient. At last they contrived that the emperor, and not the Soltân, should appear to be the aggressor. To this end, letters are sent in the Soltân's name to Leopold, declaring, that as Tekeli, and the other Hungarian lords, had been forced by his oppression to subject their country to the Othmân empire, therefore the emperor was required to recall his troops sent against them, and restore what he had taken from them, otherwise he would be considered as guilty of an infraction of the peace, and draw on himself the punishment due to his rashness.

Hejrah 1093.
A. D. 1682.

LEOPOLD, rightly suspecting that the Turks were only seeking an occasion of commencing a war, which he was not capable of supporting, sends count Albert Caprara as ambassador extraordinary to Constantinople; with orders to spare neither persuasions nor bribes, that the peace might be continued, and hostilities diverted. But the Wazîr Kâra Mostafa, without waiting that minister's arrival, in the same year 1093, sends Ibrâhîm Pâshâ (X), Beglerbeg of Buda, with six thousand men, to Tekeli's assistance; and orders Apafi, prince of Transylvania, with his forces, to join the Hungarians. Tekeli, strengthened by these supplies, during the summer, takes (Y) Kassovia, Epeies, Leutsch, Levent, Lipschet and Tillek; whose garrisons retired, with design to reserve themselves for a more favourable opportunity.

They declare war.

THE Othmâns imagining from these beginnings that the expedition would prove fortunate, keep no farther measures, but by the Pâshâ of Buda, declare Tekeli king of Hungary (Z), and attack the isle of Schut, though not with the desired effect. Mean time the Wazîr amuses the imperial ambassador with false hopes of peace, in order to retard the enemy's preparations.

(Q) The Christian historians say, that in the year 1679, the emperor Leopold (notwithstanding an armistice and treaty the year before) retracts his former offers, thinking now he had secured a peace with France. However, Tekeli, out of love to the daughter of the princess dowager Ragotski, revolted to the emperor; but being slighted, returned again to his old friends, and returned to the command of his deserted troops; with three hundred of whom he surprised Kremnitz.

(R) Manley says, eighty thousand crowns.

(S) The title is appropriated to the mother of the reigning Soltân, who can lie with no women in the Saray, without her consent. Every day during the feast of Bâyram, she presents him a beautiful virgin for his use. Her revenue is 1000 purses.

If the Soltân lies but once with any woman, she is separated from the rest, has attendants given her, and called Khafeki; but has no access to him, unless sent for, not to her on whose head, out of love, he has set the crown. She has also guards, a revenue of at least 500 purses, and is called Khafeki Soltâna. Cant.

(T) They who are best acquainted with the counsels of the Othmân court, at that time affirm, that none but the Soltân and the Wazîr Kâra Mostafa, were for a war with the emperor of Germany, till the rest were drawn in, by the motives of interest. Cant.

(U) This is the usual revenue assigned to the Valide Soltâna, and other Khafeki; the name is derived from Pashmak, a Sandal, because said to be granted to buy sandals (or as pin-money with us). In all towns taken by the Turks, some street is assigned for the Pashmaklik, as Pera in Constantinople. Hence the Valide Soltâna's revenue is very large. Cant.

(X) A man so very eminent both in war and peace, that he is reckoned by the Turks, one of the greatest men of his age. Cant.

(Y) He likewise took Zatmar first of all. Afterwards the Turks acting for themselves, Tekeli surrendered to them on their appearance, and the Pâshâ of Waradin took Tilek, Leventz, and Neutra. Manley.

(Z) Tekeli going to Buda, to take his measures from the Pâshâ, was received with great honour, and presented by him, as from the Soltân, with a sword, pole-ax, and standard. Some say he declared him king of Hungary, and invested him with the royal robes and crown. Manley a At length, when he was informed of the new king's success, he sends for Caprara, and acquaints him, that the Soltân would grant the emperor peace on no other conditions, than the restoration of Hungary to the state it was in 1067; a yearly tribute of five hundred thousand florins; the demolition of Leopoldopolis and Gutta; the resignation of Neutraschnita and Ekolt, with the island of Schut, and the fortrefs of Muran to Tekeli; a general amnesty to the Hungarians, with the restitution of their estates and privileges. Kara Mostafa, on finding these terms rejected by the emperor, immediately proclaims war against him, and orders the horse-tails to be set up before the palace in the month of Shawal^p. A. D. 1682.

At

A FEW days after he departs for Adrianople, there to prepare for the German expedition. The army But at Chirpiji Chayri (B), a meadow one mile from Constantinople where he encamped, there sets out.
 b happened such a violent storm and whirlwind, mixed with rain and hail, that the tents of the Soltân, prime Wazîr, Mufti, and the Pâshâs, were overthrown. Five days after at Silbebria, on the sea shore, another tempest arose, while so great a torrent of water rushed from the mountains, that the tents, baggage, horses, cattle, and the very soldiers themselves were overwhelmed, or carried with the stream into the sea. These two accidents struck no small terror into the superstitious Turks; who, accustomed to judge of the success of actions from the beginnings, interpreted these accidents to be marks of divine vengeance, and God's displeasure against the Othmân arms: but the Soltân despising such vulgar reflections, as unworthy a great mind, pursues his intended march, and reaches Adrianople about the end of the year. At length having in the winter finished his preparations, he in Rabio'lakbir, 1094, sets out with his whole
 c army towards Belgrade; but altering his resolution, stops at Hesarijik, a town about eight hours from Adrianople. Here, after a second review of his forces, he delivers the command of his army to the prime Wazîr, with Mohammed's standard (C), and then returns to Constantinople, hunting all the way. Hej. 1094. A. D. 1683.

THE Wazîr pursuing his march, passes the Save at Belgrade, and at Essek is met by Tekeli, Tekeli's with about three hundred Hungarian nobles, who is received with great marks of respect. arguments. A few days after, although he had a full power of acting from the Soltân, yet he called a council of the chief officers, with a view not only to gain their affections by this condescension, but also to lay the blame on their advice in case any thing went wrong. As Tekeli was supposed to have the most perfect knowledge of the state of Germany, he was ordered to deliver d his opinion first (D), and declare what part of it ought principally to be attacked; and whether the siege of Vienna should be undertaken this year, or deferred till the next.

ON this occasion the new Hungarian king made a pathetic speech, wherein he shewed, against be- from cogent arguments, "That it would be greatly detrimental to the Othmân interest to sieging Vienna: "besiege Vienna; that being too remote from the borders of the Othman empire, the army
 "would be wasted by the garrisons of the country they were to pass through, before they "could reach the city: that if the siege should be prolonged by the bravery of the defend"ants, the besiegers must be starved for want of provisions, which would be intercepted by "the enemy, who at the same time would weaken the army by their incursions: that in "case they should take Vienna, all the Christian princes, even the king of France himself, e "would unite to recover the city, which they consider as the bulwark of their religion: that "if the German princes found there were no other hopes of safety, rather than submit to the "Soltân, they would call in the king of France, and declare him emperor; who joining even
 "the remains of the Germans to his own army, would, he feared, become more powerful "than was imagined."

ON the other hand he urged, "That the war might be carried on in Hungary with less for subduing hazard and more advantage: that the part under his banner, now voluntarily offered to Hungary,
 "submit to the Soltân, and that the other part, subject to the emperor, was weary of the "German tyranny: that Hungary being once brought under, it would be easy to subdue
 "not only Vienna, but all Germany; and that the country would prove a magazine of prof "visions and stores for future expeditions into any other parts: that the Wazîr should encamp

^p CANT. p. 295, & seq.

(B) Near Daud Pâshâ.

(C) 'Tis a standard of green silk, long and large, made like all other Sanjâks. The Christians thought they had taken it at Vienna, but were mistaken, for the Wazîr himself carried it off. It is never brought out of the camp, or exposed in battle. 'Tis very old and tatter'd, rolled round a spear, on the top of which is the word Alem. 'Tis carried in a chest on a camel before the Soltân, or the Wazîr, when going to war. Whether Mohammed's, or another, I cannot say.

Cant.

(D) Though most of the Christian writers ascribe the siege of Vienna to Tekeli's counsels, yet prince Cantemir affirms it was not so; that Aneji Soleymân Pâshâ, when Wazîr, publicly demonstrated his innocence, and that Haznader Ibrâhîm Pâshâ, governor of Belgrade, who was present at all the consultations, assured him, that Tekeli was against the siege, and gave advice, such as is set forth in the text. He adds, that Tekeli told him Mau-rocordatus invented that calumny, and also provoked the Wazîr Kara Ibrâhîm Pâshâ to imprison him.

" about

A. D. 1683. " about Buda or Belgrade with the greater part of the army, in order to march against the enemy, if they appeared in the field; and in case they retired into the cities and castles, to send the Tatars, and other light armed troops, to lay waste Austria, Moravia, Bohemia, and Silesia; that by this means, the imperial army being without difficulty dispersed, and unable to subsist for want of corn, the whole German empire would be reduced in a single campaign."

The Wazîr
dissembles.

THE Wazîr, too confident of his own power, and meditating greater designs, did not like this wholesome advice; but concealing his sentiments, lest he should disoblige the Hungarians, commands the other Pâshâs to declare their opinions. Ibrâhîm, Pâshâ of Buda, and Abmed Pâshâ, high treasurer, (both eminent for their warlike conduct, and of great authority in the camp) partly guessing at the general's opinion; and knowing he would prove an enemy to those who should be against the intended siege of Vienna, which they looked upon to be dangerous, as Tekeli had represented it, delivered their minds directly, neither on one side nor the other; saying, it ought to be left to the well-known wisdom of Kara Mostafa, to determine whether the war was to be carried into Hungary or Germany. The Wazîr, perceiving that even these two Pâshâs were not entirely of his opinion, the better to conceal his designs, pretends to approve of Tekeli's advice; and ordering the army to march for Yavarin, (or Raab), sends the imperial ambassador, whom he had hitherto amused with the hopes of peace, to Buda, that he might not be an observer of his proceedings^a.

Besieges
Yavarin.

AT the same time all his forces being assembled by the arrival of Selîm Gyeray, Khân of the Tatars, the Wazîr passes the Raab, after the Hungarians, left to guard the ford, had shamefully abandoned their post (E), and encamps under the walls of Yavarin. But he had scarce began to batter the place, when he was informed by his scouts, that the emperor was fled from Vienna to Lintz, that every thing there was in confusion, the walls ruinous, the magazines empty, the garrison weak and seized with fear, as well as the citizens. This encouraged him to prosecute his design; and having by large promises gained over the Janizaries, with their Aga, he sends again for the chief Pâshâs to deliver their opinion: but they now perceiving the Wazîr to be wavering, unanimously advise against the siege of Vienna, till the cities in the way were all subdued. Tekeli above all opposed that scheme, foreseeing that if the Wazîr persisted in it, all his hopes of the kingdom of Hungary would be destroyed.

Marches to Vienna.

KARA MOSTAFA finding he could not prevail by his speeches, at last produces the Soltân's Khâtî Sharîf (or order), by which he was empowered to act as he should think fit. On sight of this the Pâshâs having no more to say, promise to execute his commands with cheerfulness. The Wazîr, having thus gained his point, leaves a few troops under Kior Housseyn Pâshâ (F), to block up Yavarin; and taking the rest of forces, moves with the utmost expedition towards Vienna. In their march they seize the baggage of several imperial officers (G), kill the troops which convoyed them, and take a great many prisoners, with whom they appear before Vienna on the 18th of Jomazio'lakbir. The trenches being opened, and every thing necessary for the siege prepared, the Wazîr soon makes himself master of the out-works, beats down the walls with his cannon and mines; and then assaults the city with such vigour, that although the garrison, assisted by the citizens, bravely disputed every inch of ground, yet in all probability the place must have been quickly taken, had the general continued the siege as vigorously as he began it.

His ambitious
views.

BUT Kara Mostafa, though otherwise a man of great prudence and experience, being infatuated with ambition and the power he saw himself invested with, imagines it for his interest to prolong the siege. He fancied he was able to throw off the Othmân dominion, and having seized the metropolis of all Germany, found a Mussulman empire in the west (H), which should rival that in the east. He thought he had nothing to fear from the Soltân, since all the disciplined troops of the empire were under his command, and it would be difficult for Mohammed to bring such an army against him. The emperor of Germany seemed less formidable to him, as he hoped to be master of his capital city before the troops expected from Poland, whose proceedings were known to be dilatory, could possibly arrive. He had brought with him a great treasure, and resolved to increase them with the riches of the German princes, which he supposed to be repositied in the city besieged by him.

Corrupts the Pâshâs.

HE knew that the Pâshâs and other governors in Hungary, appointed by him during his seven years Wazîrship, were attached to his interest, and imagined would prove no obstacle

^a CANT. p. 299, & seq.

(E) Some say count Budden treacherously gave the Turks a free passage; but his crime was never clearly proved. Cant.

(F) Kior signifies one who is blind, or has but one eye, in the Persian and Turkish languages.

(G) These were the duke of Saxenburg, prince Lewis of Baden, counts Caprara and Montecuculi. Manley.

(H) The Christian historians relate his aspiring to found an empire in the west, as one cause of his fall. See Manley in Mab. IV. ad ann. 1683.

a to his advancement. It remained only to gain Ibrâhîm Pâshâ, Beglerbeg of Buda, a man of great authority with the principal officers of the Janizaries and Spahis. These latter he prevailed on by large presents. He promised Ibrâhîm Pâshâ the kingdom of Hungary for ever; to divide all the provinces of it among the Spahis, by way of Timâr (I); and to settle the whole army in the cities and lands of that country, as new colonies, after driving out or enslaving the old possessors. But he reserved for himself, under the title of Soltân, all Germany, as far as the borders of France, Transilvania, and Poland, which he resolved the next year either to subdue or make tributary.

LET us now leave the Wazîr, big with these great designs, in the camp before Vienna, Leopold ^{pre-} and see what measures were taken by the emperor to repel the enemy. While count Caprara ^{parcs for his} was in vain waiting at Constantinople for a confirmation of the peace, Leopold's ambassador in Poland had much better success in his negotiations. The states of that kingdom, excited either by the common danger, or the pope's exhortations, laying aside their intestine divisions, unanimously resolve to raise an army, and oppose the enemy of the cross. Accordingly, an alliance is quickly concluded between the emperor and John Sobieski (K); of which one of the principal articles was, that in case the capital of either monarch should be attacked by the Turks, both princes should march in person with their whole army to its relief.

LEOPOLD being strengthened on that side, in the following year declares Charles duke of Lorraine general of his army; and as soon as he heard war had been proclaimed at Constantinople, ordered him to march with what forces he had ready into Hungary, and there, before the Turks could arrive, make himself master of some castle, which might serve as a bulwark to Germany. The duke first attempts Gran, the garrison of which he had been assured was very weak: but finding that a large reinforcement of Turks from Wywar had entered the city, he sets fire to the bridge, which joined the two places, and on the 7th of Jamazio'lakbir invests Wywar (L). There for eight days both sides fight with equal bravery, yet not with equal success; for the imperial general being informed that the Wazîr was advancing against him with a powerful army from Belgrade, on the 14th of the same month abandons the siege, though the city could not long have held out. Then supplying the garrison of Vienna with several regiments, he encamps with the rest of his army near the city, on the borders of Hungary and Austria, in such a manner, that he might provide for the exigencies of both countries, and safely wait for the forces of Poland as well as of other states. When Leopold heard that Hungary was abandoned by his troops, and that the Turks were preparing to besiege Vienna; not thinking himself secure within the city, he commits the defence of it to count Staremburg, a man of approved integrity, valour, and prudence, and retires to Lintz on the Danube, as before-mentioned, and from thence sends letters to all the neighbouring princes to desire their assistance.

THIS is in substance much the same with what is related by the Christian writers, from whom it will be proper to add a few particulars. According to them, Tekeli, in February 1683, blocked up all the emperor's towns in Upper Hungary, and the Turks in March posted fifteen thousand men to secure the bridge of Essek. On the 7th of May, Leopold, attended by the dukes of Bavaria and Lorraine, reviewed his army, which did not consist of more than forty-three thousand men: but in these are not reckoned six thousand hired Poles, commanded by prince Luhomirski, a great number of volunteers, and the forces of Alsatia, with those of the Rhine. The cannon consisted of seventy great pieces and fifteen mortars, under the care of count Staremburg, general of the artillery. The Turkish army, according to a moderate computation, amounted to one hundred and eighty thousand effective men, besides miners, gunners, sutlers, and other attendants, which might well make forty thousand more.

UPON the march of the Wazîr towards Vienna, and the emperor's retreat to Lintz, every thing was in the utmost confusion, till the duke of Lorraine arrived; who with count Staremburg, the governor, set all things in order for a vigorous defence. The whole garrison (including 2717 train'd bands, officers and volunteers) consisted of thirteen thousand men. The Turks beginning to approach the city, the duke on the 14th retreated over the bridges, and encamped: but the isle of Tabor in the Danube being judged no proper place for the cavalry, he passed that river, leaving the bridges to be defended by Schultz's dragoons. On the 16th, the Wazîr

* CANT. p. 303, & seq.

* Ibid. p. 305. & seq.

(I) Timâr Spahi are the nobles or old Spahi, who for their stipend have villages assigned them in the provinces, and are obliged, in proportion to their income, to carry slaves to the wars, but three at least.

(K) In the year 1679, both the czar of Russia and king of Poland offered to enter into league with Leopold against the Turks; but the emperor, though he apprehended a war from that quarter, yet not having force enough to reduce the malcontents, he did not think proper to begin first with the Porte. Manley.

(L) The Christian historians say New Hensel, and that he raised the siege the 3d of June, and marched towards Raab to observe the enemy's motions.

A. D. 1683. entered the camp, and began to open his trenches about fifty paces from the counterescarp, in the suburbs of Ulrick; ordering a writing or summons, wrapped in a linen bag, to be thrown on the covered way, wherein he exhorted the governor and people to turn Mohammedans and surrender the city, otherwise to expect no mercy.

AFTER this, the Turks and Tatars obliged the troops which kept the bridges to retire. One of the first misfortunes which befel the besieged was, their governor's being wounded in the head with a brick bat. Mean time the Turks having drawn two parallel lines, and a third on the lobel bastion, with a line of communication between both, here raised their batteries of thirty pieces of cannon. The prime Wazîr took his station on the side of the ravelin, with his Kyehaya, the Janizer Aga and Pâshâ of Rumeli, who was killed with a cannon ball. The attack of the court bastion on the right was given to Husseyn, Pâsha of Damaskus; that of the lobel bastion on the left of the Wazîr, to Abmed, Pâshâ of Temeswar. But although they were disturbed in their lines by a brisk sally of the besieged; yet on the 23d of July, a strong gale of wind blowing towards the city, they threw several bombs into it, and the same day sprung a mine near the lobel bastion with very little effect: however, they made a furious assault upon it, but came off with loss. Next morning a messenger from the duke having swam four times over the water with a letter in a bladder, hung about his neck, with much difficulty got into the city, and gave the besieged hopes of relief, as the army was now daily encreasing¹.

The Wazîr's avarice.

MEAN time the Wazîr Kara Mostafa continues the siege of Vienna, not as prudence, but his vain imagination suggested: for in a persuasion that the city could not avoid falling into his hands, he would not suffer it to be closely blocked up on all sides, or the breaches to be attacked every-where with equal vigour; but orders the soldiers daily to assault in small parties only, that the garrison being exhausted with continual watching and loss of their men, might be obliged at length to surrender the castle. When the Janizaries, ignorant of the general's designs, began openly to complain of these proceedings, and that more were destroyed by the skirmishes than by a general assault of the whole army; he unwarily discovers part of his projects, telling those who acquainted him with what was said, that he could not satisfy the desires of the army, because he knew there were great treasures in the city, which it would be improper, and contrary to the Soltân's command, to give up for plunder.

Provisions fail in the camp.

BESIDES, lest the soldiers should happen to break into the city, and in the first heat to seize on those treasures, he commands proclamation to be made in the camp, that if any Othmân troops should force the walls, they should immediately secure themselves with a trench, and not presume to advance farther, or enter any house, before he should come and give them fresh orders. Lastly, that after taking the city, the want of corn should not oblige him to change or defer his designs; he very sparingly distributes the provisions, which he had brought with him in great plenty, alleging that good part of it was to be reserved for the troops to be left in garrison when the city should be reduced. In the mean while, all the provisions expected from Hungary were intercepted by the garrisons of Presburg, Tavarin and Komorra, as Tekeli had foretold the Wazîr. Hence so great a scarcity arose, that, a thing before unknown in the Turkish camp, ten drachms of bread, and even without salt, were sold for one Rhub (M), with other eatables, and liquors in proportion.

THE general, to remedy this inconvenience before the famine caused a sedition in the army, sends a Pâshâ, with twenty thousand men to the aid of Tekeli (N), with orders to attack Presburg, because that was the city least able to make resistance; and see the provisions, with the military stores collected at Buda, safely conducted to the Othmân camp. But duke Charles being informed of the Wazîr's intentions, sends prince Lewis of Baden, with several regiments, who first meeting with Tekeli, quickly disperse the Hungarian troops; which struck the Turks with such terror, that besides a thousand killed, and many taken, they leave a thousand waggons laden with provisions and warlike engines, as a booty to the victors.

The soldiers desert.

THE Janizaries, on the news of this defeat and loss, exasperated against their general, began to exclaim, that they came to fight, not against famine, but the enemy; and growing negligent in their duty, allow the garrison, now reduced to the utmost extremity, time to resume their courage, and repair their breaches. The officers likewise, discouraged by the obstinacy of the Wazîr, and difficulty of the siege, grow careless of their affairs; and would have been surprised by the imperial army, if one of the enemy's couriers, who was taken, had not shewn them to what danger they were exposed. But this indolence had taken such deep root in the minds of the soldiers, that they were heard frequently to say, "O! infidel; if thou wilt not come thyself, at least shew thy cap, at the sight of which we will fly in a “an hour.” And, on the approach of the Polish auxiliaries, although it was easy for them to have hindered the junction of the two armies, yet not a single man would stir, to divert that imminent danger. Shortly after, the night before the battle, almost a fourth part of the army dispersed themselves; and those who remained seemed to want resolution to fight ^{A. D. 1683.}*

¹ MANLEY, ubi sup. JONES in Mah. IV.

(M) It is the fourth part of a leone, as a tult is the third. Cant.

(N) The Christian writers reckon in the whole 28,000 men.

By this account one would imagine, that the Turks remained quite inactive before Vienna, ^{The Turks advance on the court bastion;} after the defeat at Presburg; but according to the Christian accounts, they pressed the siege with great vigour. On the 26th of July they designed a furious assault, and ordered all their warlike musick to sound: but just as they were beginning the attack, the besieged sprung a mine, which blew up many of the enemy: and though the rest pressed hard to gain the ground, which the mine had laid open, they were valiantly repulsed with considerable loss.

b However, they gave the besieged no rest; and on the 6th of August, springing a mine, which opened the earth very much, as far as the counterscarp, towards the court bastion, they there began a terrible fight, which lasted five hours: and notwithstanding the great valour of count Lesley the younger (slain in this action) they at last, like a violent torrent, became masters of the ditch of the court ravelin; though with the loss of one thousand men, to one hundred and eighty of the besieged.

On the 8th, the Turks sprung a mine at the point of the court bastion, which they seconded with an assault; so that the governor judging it impossible to defend the ravelin, caused the cannon to be withdrawn from thence, and then in a sally, driving the enemy out of their galleries, burnt all their works. The Turks at length, by their assiduous labours, on the 13th c blew up the flanker of the ravelin: but the quantity of powder being very great, the mine reversed on themselves, with such execution, as abated the courage of the assailants. However, the besieged being much distressed with their daily losses, sent the duke of Lorain an account, by one Kotlinski; who disguising himself like a Turk, silently passed the pallisadoes, and went confidently, singing a Turkish air, through their camp. The same messenger returning with letters, promising speedy relief, they signified the receipt of them to the imperial camp, by firing three rockets, while they rung the bells for joy, and fired all the guns in the city on the enemy.

It would be tedious to relate every day's action. But while these things were going forward bravely repulsed before the city, divers rencounters happened abroad; in which considerable bodies of Tatars, ^{repulsed.} d Turks, and malecontents, were defeated with great slaughter, and convoys of provisions from time to time intercepted. Hereupon the Wazir orders Tekeli to repair with his forces to the siege; but he excused himself from that service. Mean time, although the Turkish camp began to be somewhat discouraged for want of forage, yet they still persisted vigorously to push on the siege. On the 23d of the same month, they carried a third part of the ravelin, where they made a lodgement: next day they sprung another mine, without success; at which time, a messenger brought news to the besieged, of speedy relief. Hereupon they made a sally on the 25th, with so much resolution, that they drove the Turks out of the ditch, overthrew their galleries and gabions, nailed six of their cannon, and discharged one of their mines of its powder.

e HOWEVER, the 27th in the evening, sixty rockets were fired from St. Stephen's tower, as a signal of their great distress: while the Turks fired incessantly upon the place, sprung a mine, and were within a little of taking the ravelin; which caused the besieged, for fear of the worst, to make another retrenchment at the foot of the court bastion. On the first of September they made a sally, though not with the desired success: but in another on the same day they burnt the enemy's galleries; and ruined so much of their works, that they could not repair the same in less than three days. However, on the third the governor thought fit to quit the ravelin to the enemy; who having sprung a mine next day under the court bulwark (which made a great breach, and shook the whole city) five thousand Turks, with their drawn scymiters, immediately entered, and crying Allah! Allah! planted four of their standards upon the f breach.

THE besieged here acted even beyond themselves; and after a fight all day long, repulsed the enemy with the slaughter of twelve hundred. They beat them also next day in the ditch: ^{Repulsed again.} and although, on the 6th, they with two mines made a breach in the lobel bastion, and vigorously assaulted it for two hours, yet they were beaten off; and in their retreat, lost two thousand men, slain by the cannon, grenadoes, and other engines. The joy for this success was increased by five rockets fired the same evening from the mountains of Kalemberg, as signals that relief was at hand. The Turks being not insensible hereof, took an account of their army, which from one hundred and sixty-eight thousand, was now reduced to one hundred and nineteen thousand four hundred and fifty-six. Therefore, on the 9th, they

* CANT. p. 306, & seq.

A. D. 1683. resolve to make their last effort against the city, which they judged was now reduced to the utmost extremity, as in reality it was.

Prepare for battle.

ACCORDINGLY they redoubled the firing of their cannon and mortars, though it was but like the last struggle before death: for in the afternoon the Turkish camp began to move, and their cavalry to ride in a confused manner from one side to another, in order to change their situation for fighting: while those who were left to carry on the siege, still went forward with their works, and sprung nine several mines under the lobel bastions, but without much execution. Other mines were discovered on the 10th; and next day they cannonaded the place, with as much violence as ever: but the noise, occasioned by the approach of the Christian army, at last silenced their roaring. This indeed happened very seasonably, for the besieged were now reduced to great extremities, as well as necessities; and the appearance of smoke, in three different places, on the Kalemberg mountains, cheered their spirits, as being the signal that the duke was hastening to their relief.

A council held.

BEING now come to the eve before the battle, it is time to return to the Turkish historians, and see what resolutions were taken in the Othmân army. While the desertion of their soldiers before-mentioned struck the Pâshâs with dread, the Wazîr alone continues fearless. However, he assembles the other officers to hear their opinions. Ibrâhîm Pâshâ, Beglerbeg of Buda, first delivers his thoughts, and advises the raising of the siege; then marching against the enemy, to make a rampart with the trees of the neighbouring woods, and fortify it with cannon, in order to receive the first attack: that afterwards, the horse should fall on the enemy in flank, as they retired, and thus obtain an easy victory. All the Pâshâs, excepting a few, approve this advice: but the Wazîr obstinately opposes their admonitions; alleging, that if he raised the siege, the garrison would destroy the works raised against them, repair their walls, and recover their strength: that the small forces of the enemy, which scarce deserved the name of an army, would refuse to venture a battle; which, as things then stood, they could not avoid, without hazarding the loss of their all: that even after a victory, it would be difficult to get the Janizaries to return to the siege, and again enter the trenches, where they had suffered so much already; and that in case it should not, yet the autumnal rains were approaching, which formerly obliged Soleyman to withdraw with his army from before the same place. For these, and other reasons, he concluded it best to continue the siege, without drawing off to fight the enemy.

The Pâshâ's opinion.

The Wazîr's obstinacy.

WHEN the Wazîr had done speaking, the Pâshâs answered, that the garrison being so much exhausted with sickness and labours, would be more solicitous to defend the fortifications still left than to recover what they had lost: and that as the trenches and other works were stronger than the city, if one or two regiments were left to defend them, it would be more difficult for the garrison to seize them, than for the Janizaries to take the city. But nothing could divert the Wazîr from his purpose, which he resolved to execute, by virtue of the power given him by the Soltân.

The battle fought.

THE Christian army therefore advancing on the 20th day of Ramazân, Kara Mostafa orders first all the prisoners, amounting to near thirty thousand, to be massacred. Then dividing his forces, which were not employed in the siege, into three parts, he gives the command of the left wing to Ibrâhîm, Pâshâ of Buda, and of the right to Kara Mehmed, Pâshâ of Diyarbeker; the body of the army, with the Aga of the Janizaries and Spahis, he reserves for himself. The rest of the Janizaries he leaves under the command of his Kyehaya, in the trenches, to attack the city in the mean time. Although the officers seemed to execute these orders with great vigour, yet the Wazîr soon found what Ibrâhîm Pâshâ had told him was true, and now too late repented that he had not followed his advice: for, upon the first charge of the Germaus, those who were placed in both wings quit their ranks, and refuse to obey the orders of their generals. The Janizaries who were left in the works, observing what was done in the battle, of their own accord abandon the siege, and remove out of their trenches, under pretence of assisting their companions who were in distress, but in reality to withdraw themselves from the danger. The Polish forces soon after coming up, and attacking the body of the army, which was intirely unsupported, the rest of the Janizaries and Spahis betake themselves to flight with the utmost precipitation.

The Turks overthrown:

WHEN Kara Mostafa Pâshâ saw his soldiers scattered on every side, and no possibility of renewing the battle, he returns also himself to the camp; and finding no man in his tent, laments his ill fortune with a flood of tears, takes up alone the standard of Mohammed, and follows the remains of his army with all possible speed. Night coming on, the darkness covers the fugitives from the enemies sword, but does not remove their fears: which had so deeply possessed them, that insensible of hunger, and the fatigues of the way, they never stop till they reach their companions, who had been left at the siege of Tavarin, twenty-five

- a German miles from Vienna: thus travelling in one day and night, without meat or drink, the A. D. 1683.
space of fifty hours.

MEAN time the imperial army, finding that the Othmâns, after a short skirmish, retreated to their camp, and not knowing what passed there, imagined the Wazîr had laid an ambuscade for them; because they could not believe that such a numerous army would take to flight upon so slight an attack. As the darkness increased their apprehensions of danger, they resolved to stop, and to assault the camp next morning: but when they were informed by their scouts, that the Turks were fled (O), the Poles, chiefly induced by the hopes of plunder, enter their camp in the night, and find there, besides one hundred and eighty large cannon, with other warlike stores, a great booty, and provision enough for several months².

- b To this account of the Turkish historians, let us add some particulars from the Christian. Order of battle.
September 12, being the day appointed for the relief of Vienna, which could not have held out twenty-four hours longer; the confederate troops joined the Imperialists at the foot of the Kalemberg, or mountain of Kalem, amounting by computation in the whole to sixty-five thousand men. In their march over this mountain, the prince of Saxe Lawenburg, general of the cavalry, with eight regiments of horse, two of dragoons, and one of Kroats, belonging to the emperor, with all the cavalry and dragoons of Bavaria and Frankonia, marched on the right; and next to them the king of Poland, with his army. In the middle was the infantry of Bavaria and Frankonia, commanded by prince Waldek, near whom the elector of Bavaria kept all that day. The imperial foot, with the Saxons, under prince Herman of c Baden, were drawn up on the left, and marched along the Danube, towards St. Leopold: next to these, on the left, marched count Caprara, with seven regiments of imperial horse, joined by the Poles, under Lubomirski; with all the cavalry and dragoons of Saxony, commanded by the elector himself.

- BOTH armies began with the opening of the morning, to take a view of each other; and the generals supposed by the disposition of the Turkish camp, that they intended to dispute every inch of ground with them. This they might easily have done, had they possessed themselves of the forest of Vienna, which could have hindered the descent of the confederate army from the mountains. Therefore the king of Poland got four battalions of German foot to flank his horse; and count Lesley, general of the artillery, having raised a battery at d the coming out of the wood, the Turks early in the morning detached some forces to demolish it. In the mean time, the duke of Lorraine, observing the motion of the enemy from St. Leopold, sent some battalions under the duke of Croy to attack them; which he did with such gallantry, that he made them retire to their main body, although himself was wounded in the action.

- THE whole Turkish army beginning now to move, the duke of Lorraine ordered his left wing to advance; and the princes of Waldek and Saxe Lawenburg, to fall out of the woods upon their front, at the head of their intrenchment, while the king of Poland rode in among the ranks of his army, encouraging them to conquer, or die martyrs to their religion. By this time the Kalemberg, and neighbouring forests, resounded with the peals of cannon, and e volleys of shot; which invited the inhabitants of Vienna to the tops of their houses and rampiers, to behold the long wished-for fight of their deliverance. However, they did not so neglect their own defence, but that the Turks, who attacked them now more closely than ever, were bravely repulsed.

- MEAN time the confederate army advanced boldly upon the enemy, who began to shelter themselves behind trees, rocks, and rugged places; and the Imperialists left wing, without much resistance, possessed themselves of the post at Holstadt, while prince Waldek compelled them on the other side to give way. The king of Poland also detached several Hussars, to skirmish with the front of the enemy: but being overpowered, they were forced to retreat to a place where Waldek had seasonably ordered some troops to advance, who put a stop to the f pursuit of the Turks. The king seeing the disorder of the Hussars, caused the first line of his army to march, who forced the gross of the enemy's to retire to the top of the hill. And now the whole Polish army moved, opposing the Othmâns in several places; while the duke of Lorraine advancing with the left wing, the Turks, to avoid the attack upon their right, drew into battalia before their line of circumvallation, and there fortified themselves

² CANT. p. 308, & seq.

(O) Happy is the Christian general who sustains three onsets of the Turks; for at the third, or at most the fourth repulse, they will certainly turn their backs: and if he advances upon them with a slow pace, they will not only abandon their camp and cannon, but also put the whole army in disorder, by the confused cry of Gyâwr Ghildî, the infidel is coming. The Janizaries are not obliged to make above three charges: once indeed in a battle with the Russians, in 1711, they renewed the attack seven times; but it was because the Russian general dared not pursue them, when they gave way.

Cant.

A. D. 1683. with some cannon : but after all, making no resistance, the duke commanded the whole left a wing to wheel about to the right, without breaking their ranks, or falling to plunder.

The camp entered.

THE king and Waldek entered the Turkish camp about seven in the evening ; and the duke soon after mastered the counterscarp, and suburbs of the city. Night put an end to the battle ; which favoured the retreat of the Janizaries, and gave the confederates a complete victory : for the enemy abandoned all their tents, baggage, ammunition, and provisions, with all their artillery, and they so hastened their retreat, that the van of their army had passed Raab before next day in the evening. The Wazîr's rich tent fell to the king of Poland, who made the emperor a tender of one half of the booty (P), which he generously refused : but at the bishop of Vienna's instance, took down the crescent from the spire of the cathedral, and set up the cross. This crescent was erected in 1529, when Soleyman besieged the city, and was there by compact to remain, on condition that the Turks should not batter the steeple with their cannon ; which compact they had now broken.

Booty found there.

To give our readers a general estimate of the booty taken on occasion of this signal defeat ; there were 6500 tents ; 4500 barrels of powder ; 6000 weight of lead ; 20,000 granado shells ; 8000 hand granadoes ; 11,000 shovels and pickaxes ; 1600 weight of match ; 2500 fire balls ; 5200 weight of pitch ; 11,000 weight of oil of petroleum and tar ; 500,000 of linseed oil ; 9500 of salt-petre ; 5100 pieces of coarse linen ; 200,000 hair sacks, for carrying earth and sand ; 810 weight of iron bars and horse-shoes ; 100 ladles for melting pitch ; 200 weight of packthread, with thongs made of camels hides, and buffler leather, for binding ; 4000 sheep skins ; 52 sacks of cotton ; 1500 empty wool-sacks ; 2000 halberts ; 400 scythes and sickles ; 5600 barrels of guns, for the Janizaries ; 2000 plates of iron, for covering targets ; 123 hundred weight of grease and tallow ; 230 powder horns ; 2600 bags for powder ; four pair of smiths bellows ; 8000 carts ; 1000 great bombs ; 18,000 cannon balls ; 180 cannon and mortars^a.

^a RICAUT & MANLEY, ubi supra.

(P) We are told also that he sent one of the three standard to the pope : but it has been observed, in a former note, that it was not Mohammed's standard.

S E C T. III.

Transactions from the Siege of Vienna to that of Buda.

The Wazîr destroys the chief officers.

NOW let us break off, to return to the Turkish historians. While the Christian camp d resounds with joy at this so unexpected a victory, and all Europe congratulates the confederates upon the relief of Vienna, there appears a very different face of things among the Turks who had escaped from the defeat. The Wazîr, when he comes to Tavarin, earnestly studies not to repair his loss, but to turn upon others the danger, to which, according to the Turkish custom, himself lay exposed. He perceived it was not possible to do this, so long as Ibrâhîm, Pâshâ of Buda, and the rest, who were privy to his councils, were alive ; since they might, by their testimony, add great weight to the charge which would be preferred against him, and discover his designs against the Othmân empire. He therefore sends, on some pretence, for all those who had opposed him in the last consultation, and commands the Pâshâs to be strangled (Q), and the other officers of the army to be put to death ; giving out, that they, in conjunction with Tekeli, had first devised the siege of Vienna, and in a manner constrained him to undertake it, contrary to his inclination : that, notwithstanding, they were afterwards very dilatory in obeying his orders, and the first who in the battle betook themselves to flight. After this, he encamps under the walls of Buda, of which he makes Kâra Mehemed Bâshâ the governor ; a man who had always implicitly followed his opinion.

The Poles defeated.

In the mean time, the confederate army resolving to reap in Hungary some farther fruits of their victory, move towards the east. The Poles, who assumed the greatest share of that success, claimed the right of marching in the van, being farther puffed up with the pride of having routed some of the flying troops, wander about the country without any order, as if they had now subdued all the Othmân forces. In this manner ranging, they happen in the month of Shawal, to meet near Gran with six thousand horse, and two thousand Janizaries, f

(Q) They were the Pâshâs of Buda, Esseck, and Posséga, with the Aga of the Janizaries. The soldiers were mightily enraged hereat ; the Pâshâ of Buda being very well beloved by them, as well as the Aga. Manley. drawn a drawn together by two Pâshâs. These they attack boldly, thinking to rout them at the first onset: but the Turks, who were at first inclined to fly, perceiving them to be separated from the rest of the army, make a stand, and after repulsing, hem them in: so that, had not the Germans seasonably come into their assistance, they must all have been destroyed by the Othmâns, who killed a thousand of them, with the son of general Yablownowski ^b. A. D. 1683.

 Seasonably relieved.

THE Christian writers inform us, that the design of the confederate army being to besiege Barkan, a palanka, or fort, opposite to Gran, the king of Poland, in haste to get thither, marched forward, leaving the infantry behind, contrary to the advice of the duke; who thereupon marched away, with most of the horse to attend him. The Poles being come within sight of some squadrons of the enemy, forced them to retreat: but being supported b by fresh troops, the king with all his cavalry came to be engaged; when six thousand Turks, concealed behind a hill, suddenly appearing, the Poles were charged both in front and rear with such bravery, that they were put to flight. The duke of Lorraine, on advice of this, hastened his march to the opening of a plain, where the Turks were in hot pursuit of the Poles; but on his appearance they retreated. The Poles were so discouraged with the repulse and loss they had sustained, amounting to 2000 men, that the duke had some difficulty to bring them to resolve upon another engagement ^c.

NEXT day, the Polish and German armies being united, attack the Turks near Barkan; and after a fierce battle, defeat them. In their flight, passing the Danube hastily, they with their weight break down the bridge, before one-fourth part could get over, and are carried away by the stream; the rest flying to Barkan, on the approach of the confederates, deliver up the town, and their arms, with both the generals. There fell in the battle about three thousand Turks: the remainder were either drowned in the river, or taken prisoners ^d. In this battle, prince Lewis of Baden commanded the right wing, Dunewaldt the left, and Staremburg the main body. The king of Poland posted himself on the right wing, between the imperial cavalry and dragoons; Jablonski in the left; and the rest of the Polish army made a third line. In this order, being come near the enemy, the Turks right wing charged the left of the confederates with such fierceness, as if they had a particular resentment against the Poles. At the same time, those on the rising of the hill advanced, as if they intended to attack the main body of the confederates; but they suddenly wheeled, and fell upon the left. This being d observed by the duke of Lorraine, he crossed the line of the cavalry on the left wing, and with all the first line which had not yet been engaged, charged the enemy in flank with such bravery, as to put them to a general rout, so that they could not rally again. Dunewaldt was ordered to pursue them; and with the first line, and Poles of the left wing, advanced to the very gates of Barkan; where many were killed, and perished in the marshes of Gran. Hereupon prince Lewis attacked and took the fort of Barkan; and of the vast multitude of people who were in that place, none escaped the sword or drowning, excepting about seven or eight hundred who were in a redoubt, and obtained quarter. The Turks in this battle lost above ten thousand of their best soldiers, and had about one thousand prisoners taken, among whom were the Pâshâs of Hâlep and Silistria, with several Agas. The Poles and Germans were ready to come e to blows about the plunder: but count Staremburg interposing, the place, with all the spoil, was yielded to the Poles.

THE Turks, on this defeat, grew very mutinous, so that the prime Wazîr himself dared hardly shew his head: while Tekeli and his associates sent deputies with proposals of accommodation to the duke of Lorraine, who would agree upon no terms, but an absolute submission. Soon after this, Wesbrin and Leventz received German garrisons: the countries also of Trinschin, Tirnaw, and Nitria, declared against the mal-contents. Mean time, the duke induced the king of Poland, after some hesitation, to undertake the siege of Gran ^e. The Turkish historians tell us, that the christian generals were at first diverted from this design, by a report, that the Wazîr was advancing with an army of fourscore thousand men, to wipe off his late f disgrace; but that the report proving false, they, in the beginning of Zilkaadab, attack this fortress with so much fury, that the Turks were seized with terror, and the governor Bekr Pâshâ, though he had above four thousand men, on the fourth day of the siege surrenders, upon capitulation, a city, which had resisted a much larger army for as many months ^f.

THE taking of this strong place was owing much to the bravery of the Bavarian troops. Three batteries raised against it, began to play on the 25th of October early, and much battered the castle on the side towards Buda; they threw in likewise many bombs, whilst the Imperialists advanced to the very ditch, and there made a lodgment, in spite of the great efforts of the besieged, to hinder them. They likewise stormed, and soon took the lower town on Barkan side, from whence the inhabitants retired to the castle. However, that night

^b CANT. p. 311, & seq. & MANLEY, ubi supra.

^c RICAUT & MANLEY, ubi supra.

^f CANT. p. 312.

^d CANT. p. 311.

^e RICAUT

A. D. 1683. they undermine the hill on which it stood, and there being also a wide breach made in the wall, the garrison was summoned to surrender, on condition of safety for their lives and goods, which next day, being the fifth of the siege, they, for fear of the utmost extremity, accepted of. The governor Bekr Pâshâ, and some others, having a great desire to wait on the duke of Lorraine, were treated by him with great civility.

Other advantages.

AFTER this success, the troops began to retire into winter quarters. In their way thither, Leventz yielded to them; the Kroats also took the castle of Rabonitz; the town of Probenz on the Drave; the castle of Esseghet, with the city and castle of Brevenitz near Kanisia. The citizens of Setzin, which was attacked by the Poles, opening the gates before the articles were agreed on, a miserable slaughter was made of them; among whom were slain twelve hundred Janizaries and two thousand other Turks. After this, the king returned home with his army. For all this separation of the confederate forces, the Imperial arms gained such reputation, that several castles belonging to the mal-contents surrendered at discretion; and count Zabbar, commander in chief next to Tekeli, submitted to the emperor^s.

Moldavian cruelty,

WHILE these things are doing in Hungary, Petreczeicus (O) prince of Moldavia, after the departure of the king of Poland for the relief of Vienna, joining those of his party with Konikki (P), general of the Kosâks, passed the Tyras, and marched into Bessarabia. When he found the country without any defence (for the Bujâk and Krim Tatars were almost all employed in the siege of Vienna) leaving the Kosâks to guard his camp, he, with his Moldavian troops, destroys the country on all all sides, with such cruelty, that he spared neither age nor sex. He empaled alive, or dashed out the brains of the Tatarian children; caused the virgins to be ravished and then murdered, the women with child to be ripped up, and the old men to be put to the most dreadful tortures, to make them discover their riches; in a word, he omitted no kind of barbarity which had ever been before invented.

severely re-
wenged.

WHILE the Moldavians (Q) are thus performing the part of executioners, rather than of soldiers, the Tatars, who had escaped from the battle of Vienna, return; and finding themselves inferior to the enemy, lie concealed in the borders, where being reinforced, they suddenly attack them, dispersed over the country, and take a severe revenge for the slaughter of their companions. Then they inclose the Kosâks, who not daring, on account of their fewness, to venture an engagement, defend themselves with a chain of waggons, and proceed slowly to the river Hierasus. But their number daily decreasing, and provisions failing, they are dispersed by famine and the snows, rather than by their pursuers. In their flight many are slain, and more taken prisoners: so that of the whole army, only a few troops of Kosâks, with Petreczeicus and Konikki, escape with great difficulty into Poland; nor could they have escaped, if the horses of the Tatars had not been quite spent.

Prince

Dukay's fate.

DUKAY, prince of Moldavia, underwent a much harder fate: for at his return from the Vienna expedition, when he sees the country in confusion (almost all the nobles having either revolted to Petreczeicus, or fled into the neighbouring provinces) and finds Jassi, his capital, desolate, he retires with a few followers to Domnestim, a village in the district of Putna, in expectation of better times: but here, while he is intent on settling the affairs of the nation, he is suddenly attacked by Bainski (R), a Moldavian, related to Petreczeicus, who takes and carries him into Poland; where soon after he dies in close confinement at Warsaw. In his room the Turks appoint Demetrius Cantacuzenus (S), a man of noble extraction, but weak, and fitter for times of peace than war; for which reason he did not long enjoy his dignity^h.

The Wazîr's
artifice to destroy others.

LET us now see what was doing in the mean time at the Othmân court. The Soltân, who knew nothing of what passed either in the army or state, but as he was informed by the Wazîr, having been assured by that minister that Vienna could not hold out many days longer, as hath been before related, removed his hunting nearer to Constantinople, with design, as soon as news was brought him of its surrender, to celebrate his triumph with great magnificence: but when he heard of his army's defeat, he returned to his capital, to prevent any sedition which might be raised on that occasion. Not long after he received letters from the Wazîr, wherein he imputed his ill success to the artifices and treachery of his officers, especially Ibrâhîm Pâshâ, who first advised the siege, and then refused to obey his orders, prejudicing the rest by his ill example. With the letters he had sent rich presents to the Valide Soltâna, and all the officers

^s RICAUT & MANLEY, ubi supra.

^h CANT. p. 312, & seq.

(O) Who in the battle of Chebrin had revolted from the Turks to the Poles.

(P) He was, after the defection of Doroshenko and Circo to the Turks and Russians, made by the Poles, Hetman of the Kosâks dwelling between the Tyras and Borysthenes, who had not yet shaken off the Polish yoke.

CANT.

(Q) This was not the fault of all the Moldavians; for all the old and principal barons had retired to the mountains, and into Walakhia; but it was done by some of the younger, who had been allured by the fallacious promises of Petreczeicus and the Poles. CANT.

(R) After Petreczeicus's death, he returned to Moldavia, and was appointed Sirdar, or general of the army, which was beyond the Pruth, by prince Cantemir's father, who was then Vayvod of Moldavia.

(S) The son of Mikhael, of the Constantinopolitan family.

a of the court in favour with the Soltân; who, by their representation of matters, was so fully persuaded of Kâra Mostafa's innocence, that he not only approved of his putting Ibrâhîm Pâshâ and the rest to death, but also confirmed him in the Wâzîrship, and the command of his new army. A. D. 1583.

THE Wâzîr had not ventured to put all the officers to death who were privy to his designs, for fear the great number of executions should raise a suspicion in the Soltân, without whose knowledge they had been done: but now, encouraged by the success of his presence, privately intimates to Mohammed by letters, that the Aga of the Janizaries, and other Pâshâs, whom he named, had again shewed themselves disobedient to his orders; yet, that he was unwilling to use the power which his majesty had given him, lest his enemies should malign him, and therefore desired to know his pleasure concerning them.

b BUT this step, instead of obtaining his ends, proved his ruin: for the court was by this time much changed; and the other officers, who had been present at the siege of Vienna, had transmitted a more faithful account of the transactions, whereby the artifices and designs of the Wâzîr were discovered. This, with the news which arrived of the taking of Gran, and defeat of the forces at Barkan, gave the patrons of the persons accused an opportunity to set forth the treachery of the Wâzîr in such strong colours to the Soltân, that he orders the Kyehaya of the Kâpiji to go and put him to death. That officer finds him at Belgrade, in the hords of Mohama, intent on recruiting his army, and seizes him in his own house; where being shewn the mandate, and making no resistance, but affirming himself crowned with martyrdom, he is strangled by four executioners, and his head carried to Constantinople. The Soltân appoints in his room Kâra Ibrâhîm Pâshâ, the Kaymakan, and charges him to take a severe revenge on the enemy, for the disgrace which the empire had suffered by his predecessor's ill conduct: but Kâra Mostafa had, by injuries offered to the Christian princes, raised too many enemies for the Ottomân empire to contend with.^a Hej. 1095. A. D. 1684.

c WE are told by the Christian historians, that this Wâzîr having in 1680 married the Soltân's daughter, a child of but eight years old, rapine and violence were necessary to support the charge. One way to raise money was by false demands or allegations against the ambassadors or residents of Christian princes. They began with the French minister, to whom they denied the privilege of sitting on the sofa when admitted to audience. But the ambassador, by his master's order, resolutely standing on his privilege, the Wâzîr called him to account for what some French men of war had acted against the Tripolines in the Soltân's port of Scio (T); and without so much as seeing, committed him prisoner to the custody of the Chausb Bâshî, demanding, besides satisfaction for the affront, two hundred thousand crowns reparation for the damage.

d WITH this the ambassador was forced to comply; although, to save his master's honour, the submission was made (U) by his secretary and agent of the French nation. Nor did the English ambassador, Sir John Finch, fare much better: for the Wâzîr demanded seventeen thousand dollars, under pretence that a great sum of money, which was imported to Turkey, was not good; and then having borrowed the capitulations from Sir John, under pretence of perusing them, would not part with them till the merchants paid him fifty purses, twenty of which were afterwards returned. The Venetian Bailo, thinking to run some goods, was detected, and fined thirty thousand dollars: but it cost the republick two hundred thousand to make amends for some damage done to Dalmatia. Lastly, the Dutch president having had a dispute with the customer, was obliged to pay seventy purses, in order to have his capitulations rendered more explicit.¹ The Christian ambassadors.

e THE affair of the Venetian Bailo is set in a more advantageous light by the Turkish historians. According to them, Pietro Ciurani, arriving at Constantinople with two men of war and three merchant ships, upon his landing, ordered the goods to be carried to his house. The receiver of the customs suspecting, from the quantity, that the effects did not all belong to the ambassador, visits the ships; and finding that great part of the freight was consigned to merchants, who refused to pay the customs, confiscates and sends them to the Soltân's warehouses. The Bailo, to recover what was taken from him, shews from publick records, that it was the privilege of all foreign ambassadors to bring to Constantinople, custom free, whatever goods they pleased, as well on the merchants account, as their own (X): but finding reasons were of no

^a CANT. p. 314, & seq.

¹ RICAUT, ubi supra.

(T) This affair is placed by Manly in the year 1682.

(U) These prostrated themselves with their presents before the Soltân, while the usher of the imperial presence proclaimed with an audible voice: Behold the agents sent from the king of France, to humble themselves before our magnificent emperor, and in the name of their king to offer their presents, in satisfaction for that affront and insult which the French ships offered at the port of Scio. Then the presents were produced one by one, and rated at ten times the value each. Thus writes Jones; but Manley does not make such a farce of the matter.

(X) The Christian writers accuse the Bailo of running goods; the Turkish (perhaps to criminate the Wâzîr) acquit him.

A. D. 1684. effect, he redeems the ships which had been seized, by promising the receiver a large sum of money.

A FEW days after a Venetian nobleman, who had formerly been taken prisoner at sea, escapes to the ships sent to convoy home Morofini, the former Bailo. His patron, being informed of this, petitions the Wazîr, by an Arzubal (Y), that the fugitive might be restored to him. Hereupon the Bostânji Pâshâ is sent to search the ship; but the captain, denying he had any fugitive on board, opposes him by force. However, numbers prevailing over courage, the ship is searched, the captive found, and the sailors, who had taken arms, are partly killed, and partly left on board, under strict guard. The Soltân also, hearing that a Venetian ship had presumed to make use of arms in the very port of Constantinople, arrests both the ambassadors, Ciurani and Morofini; refusing to discharge them, till they had paid several purses to redeem the sailors, and atone for their crime.

Venetians declare war.

As Vienna was at that time besieged by the Turks, and the event doubtful, the republic of Venice take no notice of the affront: but when they hear of the defeat of the Turks before that city, they boldly demand satisfaction. This being refused, they make an alliance with the emperor of Germany (Z) and king of Poland, and then proclaim war against the Othmân Porte. The declaration is delivered to the Kaymakân by the Venetian ambassador, who afterwards changing his habit, flies from Constantinople. So unexpected a blow struck the Turks with more than ordinary terror: for since it was necessary to employ their whole strength against the Germans and Poles, they were at a loss how to supply all the maritime places with garrisons, which would require a number of men, equal to a powerful army: nor was there any fleet on foot, excepting six Soltânas, old and leaky; nor any hopes of procuring one soon; because the Hungarian expedition would employ all the money in the treasury.

Turkish preparations.

FOR these reasons, Kâra Ibrâhîm Pâshâ uses all his endeavours to pacify the Venetians (A); declares, that the injuries complained of were not done by the Soltân's orders, but through the avarice of his predecessor; and promises to restore what had been seized, in case they would desist from the war. But the Venetians, deaf to those flattering speeches, answered, that they had suffered injuries long enough already, and now the time of revenging them was come. The Wazîr, finding that the storm which threatened the Othmân empire cannot be diverted, applies his whole care to resist the shock. He appoints Shaytân Ibrâhîm Pâshâ, a man of approved valour, Seraskier against the Germans, and Ayneji Soleyman Pâshâ (B), against Poland. He orders the high admiral to observe the motions of the Venetians; and continues himself at Constantinople, under pretence of indisposition, directing the general to inform him faithfully of the progress of affairs: but to acquaint the Soltân only with their good success, and conceal the bad as carefully as they could.

Vicegrade taken.

WHILE these things are transacting at Constantinople, the imperial army, under the command of the duke of Lorraine (C), in Jomazi'olakkir, marched into Hungary; and about the end of that month besieged Vicegrade, which in a few days surrendered on conditions (D). In their march from thence, they meet, and overthrow with great slaughter, the Beglerbeg of Buda, sent to retard their progress; and then besiege Vacia; which Badân Pâshâ coming to relieve, he twice attacks the imperial camp, and is twice repulsed, with the loss of fifteen thousand men. Hereupon, the governor surrenders the city, upon the same conditions which had been granted to Vicegrade.*

The Turks defeated.

INSTEAD of Vacia, the Christian historians mention Witzen. They tell us, that after the reduction of Vicegrade, the imperialists having performed a difficult march, on the 27th of June, encamped near Witzen, in sight of fifteen thousand Turks, and eight thousand Tatars, drawn up on the side of a hill, of difficult access; for on the right they had the Danube, and on their left a morass. The Imperialists had their right rowards the Danube also, and left towards the mountain, extending largely in front. The way to the enemy was very rugged, and defended by four pieces of cannon; yet the prince of Baden and count Staremburg

* CANT. p. 316, & seq.

(Y) As much as to say, the opening of the cause; so those petitions are called, which are presented to the Wazîr in the diwân, about judiciary matters. They must be penned so concisely, though the cause be ever so great, or intricate, as not to fill up above half an octavo page: for the Wazîr's resolution, with the opinion and sentence of the judges, must be written on the other half of the page. Cant.

(Z) The emperor, by way of opening a door to a treaty, published a general act of pardon to the malecontents: but, as no mention was made of liberty of conscience, very few accepted of it; and Tekeli ordered count Humanai, who did, to be beheaded.

(A) He also restored to the English and French the privilege of sitting with him on the sofa. Manley-Jones.

(B) Ayneji signifies, the deceitful; a name given him on account of the many artifices he used, to deceive both friends and enemies. He was the son of Bosnian Christians. Cant.

(C) It did not exceed 40,000 men, although the emperor had in all, for garrisons and the like, 104,880 forces. Manley.

(D) In the middle of June.

forced

a forced their passage through. Hereupon the Turks attacked Taaff's regiment in the middle of A. D. 1694. the line, and the duke of Lorraine had his horse killed under him, by a pistol shot: yet not being able in three charges to break the Imperialists, who moved regularly, and kept close together, they began to give way: but, rallying again, made a fourth charge without success, so that the Christians pressing on them, they took to flight with considerable loss, although most of their cavalry escaped to Pest.

THE consequence of this victory was the surrender of Witzen at discretion; when, July Witzen sur- the 10th, the army passed the Danube, without opposition from twenty thousand Turks, who renders. were within three miles of the river, and might easily have hindered them. After this indeed, the Seraskier advanced against them, with all his horse, and some Janizaries; making so sudden an attack, that the Imperialists had scarce time to draw into order of battle: but the duke of Lorraine, at the head of his cavalry, leading the van, sustained the first shock with carbine shot; so that no breach being made in their ranks, and at the same time, the rest of the army having drawn up, the Turks, upon their motion, were terrified into a disorderly flight, to the place where the Janizaries and cannon were left, and pursued by the Polish horse, with no small slaughter¹.

THE Turkish historians before us do not speak of this battle previous to the siege of Buda: Buda besieged. they only say, that Vacia, and the neighbouring towns, having been reduced, the duke of Lorraine marched with his army to Buda, on the first of Shaban, and encamps under the very walls. The first attack was upon Pest, a town opposite to it on the Danube, which was taken in a few hours (E). But whilst they were intent on the siege of Buda, the Seraskier, Shaytân Ibrâhîm Pâshâ, advances with the whole Othmân power (F), and endeavours to break thro' the lines, with which the Imperialists had fortified their camp; at the same time ordering a body of Janizaries to attack the enemy another way, and try to throw supplies into the gar- rison, by penetrating through their camp: but being repulsed in every attempt, he pitches his tent opposite to theirs, and annoys them with continual skirmishes^m.

FOR more particulars of the siege, we must have recourse to the Christian writers. Ac- The Pâshâ cording to them, the confederate army sitting down before Buda, on the 14th of July, the Turks burnt the lower town next day, situated on a hill, and defended by a strong castle, with regular works, and eight thousand men, furnished with all kinds of necessaries. On the 12th of August, the besiegers sprung a mine near the great tower, without much effect; and d Kâra Mohammed, Beglerbeg of Buda, dying on the 14th of a wound in the face, he was suc- ceeded by Ibrâhîm Pâshâ; who soon after was slain also. On the 16th the besieged made a fall, and were beaten off with some loss; but had better fortune in several others, which suc- ceeded. Mean time, endeavouring to open a wider breach in the wall, they were not a little disturbed by the approach of the Seraskier. But while the duke of Lorraine drew off part of his army to oppose him, some of his foremost troops fell violently into the trenches on the right, and were seconded by a fall of the Janizaries from the city on the left. Their charge was so furious, that they gained the two first posts, and proceeded to the third, even under one of the batteries: but they were at length driven back, and had a fort on the Danube Turks de- taken from them. At the same time the cavalry of their left wing was so warmly charged by feated. the Imperialists, that they fled in disorder, without staying for the foot to advance upon them. This done, the duke stormed the upper town, and carried it. Many of the Turks fled to the castle, which being shut against them, fell by the sword, whilst others, who retired to their houses, were burnt along with them. It is said that twelve hundred Janizaries fell on this occasion, to about fourscore Imperialists, killed and wounded.

THE same night batteries were raised against St. Gerard's mount: however, the besiegers The Seraskier began now to labour under many inconveniencies: and at the beginning of September the rains attempts to re- fell in such abundance, that in some trenches the soldiers remained a whole day up to lieve the city. the middle in water. This increased the diseases of the camp, and helped to give the Turks successful sallies. At this time, the Bavarian infantry coming to reinforce the Imperialists, the duke summoned the governor to surrender, threatening otherwise to give no quarter. The governor answered, that he expected none; and to shew that he resolved to give none, ordered forty prisoners to be slain on the walls. But, for all this boasted resolution, he depended not so much on the strength of his garrison, as the assistance of the Seraskier; who at length marched with about twenty thousand men to Alba Regalis, with an inten- tion to disturb the siege: but on the advance of the duke of Bavaria, he moved towards the bridge of Esseck, in order to hinder count Lesley, the general of Kroatia, to burn that bridge, or take the forts which defended it.

¹ RICAUT & MANLEY, ubi supra.

^m CANT. p. 318.

(E) Our historians say the Turks burnt it.

(F) Consisting of 80,000 men, besides 15,000 left to guard the bridge of Esseck. Manley

A. D. 1684.

To furnish this design, the duke of Lorrain went himself in person to oppose him. But the Seraskier declined fighting, and returned under the cannon of Alba Regalis: while certain regiments were posted on hills, to observe their motions; and several redoubts built, to impede his march to Buda. However, that general being resolved once more to attempt the relief of it, set forward on the 20th of September. Next day two thousand Turks attacked the lines in two places, in order to force their way into the city: but although they were beaten off with considerable loss, fifteen hundred horse and foot, making a sally at the same time out of the town, cleared all the trenches before them, killed two hundred men, and advanced to the very batteries: yet at length were driven back, with the loss of four hundred of their companions. To make amends for this, about the same number, on the 23d, waded over a marshy ground, up to the arm-pits, and got into the place, while the Seraskier appeared as if he would have attempted the lines himself. On the 25th, making the same feint, the besiegers drew out of their lines to oppose him. Mean time, a detachment of Turkish horse advancing under covert of the hills, before they were perceived, attacked a quarter of the Imperialists, were they cut off one thousand men, while a thousand Turks, under favour of the same hills, got into Buda: whereupon the Seraskier retired to Alba Regalis.

The siege raised.

THE siege now began to go on very heavily; and the Imperialists, having on the second of October battered down a little tower belonging to the castle, next day, with four thousand men, attempted to make a descent into the ditch; but were beaten off, with the loss of fifteen hundred. This encouraged the besieged to make several successful sallies; while the Seraskier kept the confederate camp in a continual alarm. Hereupon the generals, considering that the besieged were still ten thousand strong, well provided with necessaries; that without a greater force, it was not possible to cut off their communication with the Danube; and that their own mines, besides being ill managed, had been discovered, they raised the siege on the first of November, after they had lost twenty five thousand men, and retired to winter quartersⁿ.

To what owing.

THE Turkish historians impute the raising of the siege wholly to the last cause; and confess that all the efforts made by the Seraskier would not have relieved the city, if the garrison had not by accident, or treachery, discovered the mines, just as the Imperialists had determined to surround the place. For the generals, finding they must now begin their work again, and at the same time contend with a superior army, thought it more adviseable to raise the siege; which they did on the 23d of Zulkaadeh, after four months leaguer, without any opposition from the Turks, who were glad to see themselves freed from the fears of that formidable expedition.

IN the mean time count Lesley, sent by the duke to besiege Wirrowit, a considerable fortress in Sclavonia, defeated the Turkish auxiliaries in two battles, and assaulted the walls with such fury, that the garrison was obliged to surrender, on the 23d of Sbaabân (G). About the same time, Tekeli being routed by the Imperialists at Eperies, in Upper Hungary, his cabinet and baggage are taken by the conquerors.

Affairs of Moldavia.

WHILE the Seraskier of Hungary is thus engaged, to his loss, with the Germans, Ayneji Soleyman Pâshâ, with better success, fights the Poles at Bâbadâghi (H); where having assembled his army, he passes the Danube near Sakza (or Sakcha), and hearing that the Polish troops did not yet appear, thinks it more proper to settle the affairs of Moldavia and Walakhia, than march any farther. These provinces were at that time governed by the two Cantakuzeni, Moldavia by Demetrius, and Walakhia by Serbân (I), whom he resolves to depose; the first, because a weak man, and unskilled in military affairs; the latter, because he kept a correspondence with the emperor of Germany and czar of Russia. Demetrius he divested of his authority, and appoints Constantine Cantemir (K), Serdar of the province, in his room:

ⁿ RICAUT & MANLEY, ubi supra.

(G) By this means a way was opened for him to Esseck, whither he was bound, with 15,000 men, to burn the bridge.

(H) The seat of the Pâshâ of Silistria, as hath been observed before. There are found in the neighbourhood plenty of eagles, from their strength and largeness, called by the Turks, Ghiujighien. Their feathers are the best for arrows; but if an arrow, fledge with a quill of this eagle, be put into a quiver with arrows made with other feathers, that feather will eat all the other feathers to the wood. Cantemir.

(I) A magnanimous prince, who formed the design to drive the Turks out of Europe: for which purpose he had made leagues with the emperor, and czars of Russia, who promised to make him emperor, after Constantino- ple was taken. He also cast 38 cannon, and raised 24,000 men. This the Turks knew; but, being harassed by the Germans, dissembled their resentment. However, they were delivered from him by death, being poisoned, as it was thought, at a feast, by his brother Constantine Stolnick, and Brankovan, his sister's son, that they might live at ease. He left one son, prince George, who lives in Transylvania, under the emperor's protection, and four daughters. Cant.

(K) Surnamed the old; he was prince of Moldavia eight years, and the father of our author prince Demetrius Cantemir. He died in 1693. Serdâr is general of the forces, appointed to defend the borders, that lie between the Hicrafsi and Tyras, against the Kosâks and Tatars.

but,

a but, being bribed by Serbân, with a large sum of money, conceals his treachery, and confirms him in his government. A. D. 1684.

DURING the Seraskier's stay in these parts, John III. king of Poland, on the 12th of Ramazan, assembles his forces at Buchach, and before any such design was suspected, at the first assault, takes Quancze (L), situated on the Tyras, opposite to Khotin, and about two hours distant from Kameniek. There he commands a bridge to be built over the Tyras, in order to transport his troops into Moldavia: but when it was just finished, the Seraskier, passing the Tyras, surprises the king, and shuts him up in his camp; where he harasses the Poles, and gives them no time to rest, or draw up in order, while the Tatars destroyed all the provisions in the neighbourhood. The king finding things desperate, escapes first out of the camp, with a few attendants, and is soon after followed by the officers; who, having burnt their baggage, and thrown their warlike engines into a lake, leads home the remains of the army (M), not without great loss. Polish invasion.

THE Venetians had much better success in the Adriatic sea: they begin the war at Morlakki, in Dalmatia, subdue Urana, Obrowazzo, and Skardona; burn Dernis, and take the castle of Duare by stratagem. Their fleet commanded by Miorosini, who surrendered Kandia, arriving at Leukos (N), lays close siege to the city, which Behr Aga, governor of the castle, after seventeen days defence, delivers up, on the 6th of Ramazân, and passes over to the continent. The island being subdued, the Venetians send part of their forces, under the command of Strasoldo, into Akarnania, a province of Epirus, and compel Venizza and Saromero to submit. In their progress forward, they defeat four thousand Turks, under Seffer Aga, who endeavoured to stop their passage; whereupon the inhabitants of the country voluntarily submit to pay them tribute. Venetian success.

IN the mean time the rest of the army had passed into the Morea, and so fiercely assaulted Prevefa (or Prevefa) that on the eighth of the same month of Ramazân, Mehemed Effendi, who commanded the garrison, was obliged to deliver up the castle (O). Besides these successes, there came an account from Tina, an island in the Archipelago, that several Turkish galleys, sent to seize it, had been repulsed with great loss. Prevefa surrendered.

KARA IBRAHIM Pâshâ, judging that it would be easy to recover those places from the republic, when once the German and Polish armies were repulsed; he appoints the generals, who had before been so successful, to be Seraskiers against those powers, and sends only a small army, with a fleet, against the Venetians.

MEAN time the Germans had so closely besieged (Owar, or Newhausel) during the whole winter, that the famine destroyed more than the sword. At length on the first of Shaabân, in the year 1096, the city is assaulted in form, and the siege pushed with such vigour, that the garrison, a few days after, was obliged to abandon the out-works. Viwar besieged, Hej. 1096. A. D. 1685.

ACCORDING to the Christian historians, besides famine, snows, and great rains, the Germans were afflicted with a pestilence, which spared neither man nor beast: the blockade was commanded by general Schultz, with four thousand horse and dragoons, besides Hussârs, who defeated six thousand men, coming to relieve the place, under Tekeli. However, this prince, adventuring a second time with three thousand horse, made way for as many more, and three hundred waggons, with provisions, to enter. After this two thousand sacks of corn got in: but while Schultz defeated another convoy, Tekeli defeated him, and took all his baggage. Being also forced to raise the siege of Esperies, he was, in his retreat, totally routed by Tekeli; whose troops, not long after, were routed in their turn, with the loss of the provisions sent to supply the garrison of Newhausel (Viwar or Owar). General Heuster was likewise successful in divers rencounters, and took two large convoys, going with provisions to that city.

MEAN time the duke of Lorraine having joined the imperial army at Gran, it was resolved to besiege Novigrade, rather than Buda, which had been strongly fortified by the Turks: but encouraged by a letter, sent from the Christian slaves at Newhausel, falsely setting forth, that the place might be easily taken, and that there were no more than twelve hundred men in garrison, they determined to invest it; and on the 7th of July, encamped on the Nitra, about cannon shot from the town. On the 11th, they opened their trenches. The 14th, the bat-

° CANT. p. 318, & seq.

(L) Or Quanche, the Christian writers say Jaslowitz.

(M) The Christian writers say, the king's actions this year tell very flat: and that the Turks laughed at them, and said, he had been bribed by the king of France, their only friend among the Christians; and so made no preparations against him, for the ensuing year. Jones.

(N) Or Leucade, called also Santa Maura, an island in the Ionian sea, north of Cephalonia, formerly joined to the coast. It has no towns, but only the forts of Demata, and Santa Maura. The fleet arrived there on the 20th of July, which was surrendered on articles the 6th of August, when ready to be stormed. Jones.

(O) The Venetians attacked Prevefa, because Sancte Maura could not otherwise be secured. They began the siege the 21st of September, and had the place surrendered on articles, on the 28th.

A. D. 1685.  teries began to play against the bastion, near the gate of Gran, and by the 21st made a considerable breach; while the duke sent parties to observe the motions of the Seraskier, Shaytân Ibrâhîm, late governor of Buda. On the 22d, the town was set on fire; which yet was extinguished by the great rain that fell, and much incommoded the besiegers in their trenches. On the 25th, they endeavoured to fill the ditch with rubbish; but the Turks in a sally stopped the channel by which the water ran into the river. Yet being beaten back by the Bavarians, and the bank again open, the water fell so low, that they discovered a secret passage, by which the ditch was supplied from the marshes; the stopping whereof became a continual cause of contest.

THE waters still increasing in the ditch, the besiegers fell to make galleries, which being fired by the Turks, caught hold of the next batteries, and blew up their powder. Mean time advice arrived daily of the Seraskier's motions; who on the 26th, with 60,000 men, pitched his camp in sight of Gran^p.

The Seraskier marches to relieve it, but is overthrown.

Now let us return to the Othmân historians. On advice that the garrison of Viwar (or New-hausel) had abandoned the outworks of the town, the Seraskier, Shaytân Ibrâhîm Pîshâ, hastens to the relief of the city; and finding it dangerous to attack an army so strongly intrenched, has recourse to his usual artifices, and besieges at once Gran and Vicegrade, hoping by this means to draw off the enemy's forces from Viwar. Fortune indeed seemed to favour him: for in a few days he not only recovered Vicegrade, but so distressed Gran, not yet sufficiently repaired since the last siege, that it seemed in no less danger of being taken than Viwar.

BUT before the Seraskier could finish what he had begun, the duke of Lorraine, leaving sixteen thousand men to continue the siege of that place, marches with the rest of his army against him, and, on the 2d of Ramazân, appears in sight of the Othmân camp. The Seraskier, imagining he had now gained his point, immediately abandons the siege of Gran, and draws up his army so advantageously, that the enemy could neither surround, nor attack him in front or flank, without great danger. The right wing was defended by the rapid Danube; the left by a ridge of mountains, which extended for several leagues; and the front was covered with wide and difficult marshes. In this situation he continues four days, without motion; either, by delay, to elude the attempts of the enemy, or to destroy them in their passage over the morass, if they should venture to attack him. But the duke perceiving his design, and considering that his army could not, without extreme danger, be exposed in such difficult places, counterfeits a flight; and sounding a retreat, on the 14th in the night, retires with his whole camp.

THE Turks, imagining that the Germans were fled in earnest, boldly follow them; and though often repulsed, continue all night to attack them as they retreat: while the Imperialists proceed on, and leave a space for the enemy both to pass the morasses, and open their front. At length, when they perceived more were passed over than could return without loss, they halt, and so furiously attack their pursuers, who followed them in confusion, that they compel them to fly back to their camp, with great precipitation. The elector of Bavaria, who commanded one of the wings, follows them through the morasses, while the duke of Lorraine does the same on the opposite side, though neither of them knew the other's intentions. Upon this, the Turks, being seized with a panic, in spite of all the Seraskier could do, take to flight in such confusion, that the Janizaries killed and unhorsed their own cavalry, to fly with more speed; so that a greater number were slain by their companions than by the enemy. Their camp, baggage, treasure, provision, and a great quantity of warlike stores, fell to the conquerors^q.

Another account of the battle.

THE Christian historians differ somewhat from the Turkish. The duke of Lorraine, on the news of the Seraskier's being encamped in sight of Gran, as before mentioned, sent out a party; who, on the 4th of August, returned with news that he had besieged that city. Hereupon the duke set forward with 40,000 men; and on the 10th stopped within three hours march of the place. There next day they were surprised with the sight of the garrison of Vicegrade; since they heard nothing of the siege, although attacked for sixteen days, before the blowing up of the tower joining the castle obliged them to surrender. The 13th, he marched in quest of the enemy, who had raised the siege on his approach; and next day came in sight of them, encamped beyond the morass: but, finding the morass impassable, he feigns a kind of fear, and retreated back an hour's march. The Turks, thus deluded, on the 15th and 16th pass the marshy grounds, and coming up with him, hastily charge the right wing of the Imperialists, who repulsed them three times; while the duke caused the left wing to move slowly to their assistance. The Seraskier, perceiving the disorder of his left wing, advanced to attack the imperial right wing himself: but the duke doubling the forces of the a first line, Donewaldt reinforcing it, and the elector of Bavaria at the same time coming to their assistance, the Turks were put into confusion. A. D. 1685.

^p RICAUT & MANLEY, ubi supra.

^q CANT. p. 321. & seq.

HOWEVER, as soon as they were out of reach of the German muskets, they rallied again, and charged as furiously as before: yet at length were routed. This being observed by their right wing, they wheeled that way, to try their fortune once more, and succour them. With this view, a considerable detachment advanced to attack the Imperialists in flank; but being repulsed, the whole army was put to flight; and retreating over the marshy grounds, in the pursuit, above two thousand of them perished there.

b MEAN time the imperial right wing, being acquainted with the passage over the marsh, pursued them that way, and made them abandon their camp; leaving tents, baggage, and all behind them. Although in the first action they lost not above four thousand men, yet double that number perished in the morass, and other ways; besides thirty-eight colours, twenty-three cannon, and two mortars, taken: whereas the Imperialists lost not in all above two hundred men.

In the interim, the besiegers had made such a progress before Newhausel, that on the 19th of the same month, they made a general assault: when the Turks defended themselves with great bravery, and never hung out a white flag, till three thousand of their enemies had entered the breach. But it being then too late, the soldiers put all to the sword, without distinction of age or sex. The governor died next day of his wounds, and out of seventeen hundred of the garrison, remaining out of three thousand, only two hundred were saved.¹

c THE Turkish historians say, this city was taken on the 19th of Ramazân, and several thousands of the garrison slain, with the loss only of a few men on the enemy's side. The Ottomâns, according to the same authors, were struck with such terror at the taking of this fortress, that not only the garrisons of Novigrade and Vicegrade abandon those cities, at the report of the enemy's approach; but the Seraskier himself, though in other respects a man of invincible courage, and a veteran soldier, sent one of his officers twice to the imperial general, to try whether any peace might be made with the emperor; but, as more advantages were expected from the present situation of affairs, he was both times dismissed with a downright denial.

d WHILE the duke of Lorraine was yet engaged in the siege of Viwar, count Lesley, with a small body of troops (P), had laid waste all Sclavonia, routed the Pâshâ of Poshega (Q), and on the 11th of Ramazân, burnt great part of the bridge over the wide morasses of the Drave, and taken Essek; but not being able to reduce the castle, he plundered the town (R), and then left it. Schultz had equal success in lower Hungary; where, on the 10th of the same month, after a long siege, he compelled Esperies, a city of Tekeli's party, to surrender (S); and took Tokay, with several other castles towns, which were garrisoned by the rebels. Merci and Heusler, joining their forces, had subdued Zolnok, Ibraini, Kalo, Little-Waradin, St. Nicholas's Church, and Saraisa. Tekeli's party, being every-where routed, retired to Kassovia (or Kashaw); and strongly fortifying the city, determine to wait there for the troops promised by the Turks, chusing to suffer the utmost extremities, rather than submit to the German emperor.

e Soon after, Caprara, on the 3d of Zilkaadeh, beginning to attack the city (T), Tekeli, to secure his troops from the danger, sends frequent messengers to the Pâshâ of Waradin for assistance. This the Pâshâ promises; but desires Tekeli to come and advise him how the place might best be relieved. Tekeli, putting too great a confidence in him, sets forward, with 7000 of his countrymen; and, before he reaches Waradin, is met by the Pâshâ, who receives him with great honour, quarters his soldiers in the neighbourhood, and desires him to enter the city, with his principal officers. Then he invites the prince to dinner; which being over, an officer, attended by several Janizaries, enters the room, and shews the Soltân's mandate to bring Tekeli in chains to Constantinople. Tekeli, unable to resist, suffers himself to be carried away bound; while his attendants, struck with surprise, and fearing for themselves, stood motionless, nor dared to ask the reason of such treatment.

f PRESENTLY after, the Pâshâ sends for Petrozzi, the principal person among them, bids him lay aside his fears, and take upon him the command of the Hungarian forces, till the

¹ RICAUT, ubi supr.

(P) About 8000 men.

(Q) The Turkish commander, according to the Christian accounts, was called Siaaws or Sbaus Pâshâ: which word, in prince Cantemir's history, is written Sia-vas. This defeat was on the 13th of August. He was killed here.

(R) And burnt it likewise, but did not think fit to attempt the castle. Jones.

(S) The siege began the 19th of August, and the city surrendered the 18th of September, on very honourable conditions.

(T) Kashaw was invested on the 6th of October, and surrendered on the 25th.

A. D. 1685. Soltân's further orders. Petrozzi artfully conceals his resentment, and replies, that although a he knew not Tekeli's crime, and had believed him a faithful servant to the Soltân, yet he did not doubt but his majesty had a very important reason for treating him in that manner: that, however, this affair would not shake the fidelity either of himself, or the Hungarians. These assurances he gave the Pîshâ: but, at his return to the camp, with the rest of Tekeli's attendants, he persuaded his countrymen to a very different conduct. After giving the officers an account how treacherously the prince had been ensnared at Waradin, he told them "it was in vain to expect the restoration of liberty to Hungary, from men who knew not what liberty was, and had no other rule of their actions but the arbitrary will of their governors.— That they should therefore consider what would be most for the interest of themselves and the kingdom, whether to continue in exile, see their country wasted, and be perpetually in fear of prison and chains; or to implore the emperor's mercy, whose troops had in two years subdued almost all the kingdom, excepting Kassovia, and embrace the amnesty offered them."

revolts to the emperor.

THIS last measure being approved by them all, Petrozzi, with the whole army, goes to Caprara, still engaged in the siege of Kassovia; and promising fidelity to his imperial majesty, joins his forces to those of the emperor, and orders them to make incursions upon the Othmân territories. The garrison of Kassovia hearing this, immediately follow their example, and open their gates on the 2th of Zilkaudeh to the imperial general^r.

With several places.

WITH regard to this arrest of Tekeli, our historians tell us, that the great success of the imperial arms in Hungary, as already related, had struck such a dread into the hearts of the Turks, and the malecontents, that they, without any difficulty, yielded Potak, Regents, Ungwar, and Seraw, all belonging to Tekeli; and that several other strong places (U) followed their example: so that the Seraskier, to cover his own ill success, caused that prince to be imprisoned at Waradin (X)^s.

Poles invade Moldavia.

MEAN time the Poles meet with a very different fate in Moldavia: for the king, taught by the ill success of the last expedition, that nothing could be done for his advantage in those countries, unless he could engage the inhabitants in his interests; tries, during the whole winter, by various arts, to gain the prince Constantine Cantemir, and induce him to revolt from the Turks. Cantemir let him know, "that he was willing enough to do as he desired him, could he but see, that, by his revolt, the least advantage would accrue to Christendom; whereas, at that time, it would rather prove detrimental to the king; and, that in case he should consent to revolt, yet the states of the province could never be persuaded to hazard the loss of their estates and children, who were hostages at the Porte, for their fidelity."

Prince Cantemir's advice slighted by them.

SOBIESKI, finding the prince inflexible to his persuasions, in the beginning of summer, sends his forces, under the command of Potocky and Tablanowski, towards Moldavia. Cantemir, informed of this, advises the generals by letter, "to take Kameniek, before they passed the Tyras (or Niefter); since otherwise, as they had experienced last year, their retreat would be cut off, in case they were defeated: and, if they obtained any victories, would not gain the more ground: that their eruption would only expose the inhabitants to captivity and torments; and that he himself was obliged by the severest threats to repair to the Turkish camp, and defend his principality to the utmost of his power."

THE generals, despising the prince's advice, answer, "that they are commanded by their king to endeavour to subdue Moldavia; and therefore cannot disobey his orders: that the siege of Kameniek was difficult and needless; since the neighbouring country being once reduced, the garrison must abandon the town for want of bread: and that they feared no defeat from the Turks, having an army with them sufficient to repel the forces of the whole Othmân empire: they concluded, by advising him to join his troops with theirs; and threatening otherwise to treat him as an enemy."

WITHOUT waiting for a reply, they run a bridge over the Tyras, and pass with their army into Moldavia: but had not marched far, before they were met, at a village called Boyan, by Ayneji Soleyman Pâshâ, with twenty-five thousand Turks, and Selîm Gyeray Khân, with fifty thousand Tatars, who were followed by the prince of Moldavia, with five thousand men. When the two armies came near each other, they stopped, and fortified their camps. The Seraskier and Khân, perceiving the Poles to approach, consult whether they shall attack them, or wait till the enemy either fall on the Othmân camp, or retreat. As they differed in their opinions, Cantemir, desirous of turning every thing, as far as possible, to the advantage of

^r CANT. p. 322, & seq.

^s RICAUT.

(U) As Senetz and Valdecbin, with the castles of Sonna, Angein, Pallitz, Duron, Spadez, Joram, Hingen, Zatmar, and others.

(X) Our author adds, that Tekeli, by his agents at court, so well acquitted himself that orders were quickly dispatched to the Pâshâ to release him, and at the head of the army to proclaim him innocent: but a little lower the readers will find the Turkish account of this affair.

a the Poles, persuades the Seraskier to remain in his post, and prevent the Poles from making any farther progress; alleging, "that a battle was not rashly to be hazarded, since the enemy were numerous, and he (the Seraskier) had but twenty-five thousand men who could be depended on, as the Tatars would scarcely stand the first fire: that if any misfortune happened, all Moldavia, and perhaps Bujak, with the Danubian provinces, would become a prey to the Poles: that, in short, they might be subdued without the loss of a single man, if he would but surround his camp with strong works, and weaken them by continual skirmishes."

THE Seraskier approving this advice, Cantemir, by a trusty person, informs the Poles of all which had passed in the council; adding, that his troops were posted on the western bank of the Tyras, and that they had nothing to fear from that quarter. The Polish generals, on this advice, resolve first to defeat the Moldavians, imagining that they should afterwards meet with less opposition from the Turks. To this end, they immediately march towards the Moldavian camp, which lay one hour's distance from the Turkish. The prince, seeing them come on full speed, wonders, and thinking they had mistaken his directions, draws up fifteen hundred of his men; not to oppose, but to undeceive them by their colours, embroidered with crosses, and other marks of Christianity: but the Poles, regardless of these peaceful and friendly dispositions, fall furiously on them, as if they had been capital enemies.

THE prince, incensed at this treachery, commands all his troops to arm, and repel force by force. This they did with such resolution, that they not only repulse the first body of Poles, consisting of six thousand men; but, in their turn, attacking them, who retired when their first ardor was spent, at last put them to flight. The noise of muskets alarming the Turks, they immediately send several regiments to the assistance of the Moldavians; while the rest of their army unexpectedly assailing the Poles in the rear, within the space of one hour, six thousand of them are killed, and five thousand Kosaks, who were surrounded, obliged to surrender. The remaining troops, finding victory incline to the Othmâns, endeavour to retreat to their trenches: but being intercepted by the Tatars, they take to flight, leaving their camp and baggage, with all their warlike provisions, a prey to the victors.

THIS however was the only good fortune which this year attended the Othmân arms: from all other parts, there came nothing but accounts of the defeat of their forces, with the loss of cities, and even whole provinces. They early in the spring attack Seromero, which last year had submitted to the Venetians; but on the approach of their fleet, immediately retire.

HERE it may be proper to observe, from the Christian historians, that the Maynottæ, a people of the Morea, excited by the ill successes of the Turks on all sides, declared for the Venetians. Hereupon the Soltân having sent some forces to reduce them, they, with the assistance of signor Delphino, attacked three thousand five hundred Turks, with so much vigour, that no more than one hundred and forty escaped either the sword or captivity.

THESE things were the preludes to greater matters: for the captain general Morofini, with the Venetian fleet, joined by the galleys of the pope and Mâlta, both sailed to the waters of Sapienza; and having there prevailed on the Maynottæ to revolt a second time from the Turks, notwithstanding their late agreement, resolved to besiege Koron, as the most commodious place, to support and keep them firm to the republic. With this view, the captain general landed his forces, consisting of eight thousand foot, besides horse, under the command of the count of St. Paul, almost within cannon shot of that city, without opposition.

THE Venetians having, on the 23d of Rajeb (15th of June) according to the Turkish historians, closely besieged Koron, Halil, Seraskier of the Morea, marches to relieve it with the forces which he had ready; and having suddenly taken a redoubt, built for their defence on the top of a hill, from thence annoys their camp with his cannon. But the Maltese, appointed to guard that part, assault the Seraskier's camp, before he could secure what he had gained; and being reinforced by other troops, after a long and bloody conflict, force him from his post. A few days after, he advances a second time; but finding the enemy strongly fortified, after a few skirmishes retires. The Venetians, no longer in danger from the Othmân army, having demolished the walls, surround Koron on the 10th of Ramazân, and after an obstinate defence of the garrison, enter it by storm. The Turks, seeing no possibility of saving the city, offered to surrender: but as this was too late, after all the fortifications of the castle were taken, they were all put to the sword.

ACCORDING to the Christian writers, the suburbs, or out-town of Koron, was quickly taken; and the tower of the fort erected towards the sea, which much incommoded the fleet, effectually battered by two galleys. However, the Turks, on promise of relief, made an obstinate defence; and, July 7, about 6000 of them appeared under Siaus Pâshâ (Y): who,

¹ CANT. p. 323, & seq.

² RICAUT, ubi supra.

^{*} CANT. p. 325.

(Y) This is a mistake perhaps for Halil or Khâlil Pâshâ.

A. D. 1685. finding himself too weak to attack the besiegers, fortified his camp, and from thence much a incommo-dated them, with a battery of four cannon played cross-wise, as well as with his frequent skirmishes. However, the Venetians went on with two mines, one of which, charged with one hundred barrels of powder, being fired on the 24th, blew up part of the wall, but not moving the rock, vented itself another way. The Turks, taking this to be a signal for a general assault, as in fact it was, immediately invested the redoubt and battery, erected on an eminence by the besiegers, for security of their lines; and stormed it so furiously, that they at length took it, and planted thereon twenty of their colours.

they are defeated.

THIS being observed by M. la Tour, who commanded the knights of Mâlta, and was posted nearest, he with great speed advanced, and was the first who leaped into the redoubt, where he killed two Turks who opposed him: but a third behind, tipping off his light helmet, b cut him down, while a barrel of powder which took fire blew him into the air. However, he was followed so close by the other knights, that although many of them fell, yet they recovered the fort, and slew the two hundred Turks who had lodged themselves there. They likewise repulsed the enemy, in another attempt which they made to recover it: but, to prevent being any more annoyed by them, it was resolved to attack their camp on the 7th of August, by break of day. To this purpose, fifteen hundred soldiers landed out of the galleys, one part marching to the left, the other to the right of the trenches, while general St. Paul, with three thousand out of the lines, assaulted them in front. The signal being given, they all fell at once upon the camp of the Turks; who believing the Venetian forces to have been much augmented by the the Maynottæ, and other auxiliaries, were so terrified, that they c fled, leaving the ground covered with dead bodies.

The city sur-
 renders.

THE besiegers, no longer disturbed by the enemy's army, go on briskly with the siege; and on the 11th sprung a mine, which being charged with two hundred and fifty barrels of powder, found in the Turkish camp, overthrew the bulwark, and blew up all who defended it. The breach thus widened, they immediately assault it, yet go no farther than to make a lodgement there; while the forces of Mâlta, supported by those of Brunswick and the pope, attacked another breach, and gained the top of it, where a most terrible fight ensued: but although they were repulsed for this time, they in the afternoon marched out of their lines, to make a fresh assault. Hereupon the besieged erected a white flag: but as the captain general refused any treaty, unless the main tower was first delivered up, it happened that, while this d point was settling, a pistol was shot between two soldiers who fell out, and the bandoleers of another took fire; which so alarmed the besieged, that they cried out treachery! and immediately discharged one of their cannon, laden with small shot. By this means, several who were mounted thereon being killed, the enraged soldiers broke into the town, and put all they met to the sword, without respect to age or sex.^r

Zarnata
 yields.

THIS fortress being subdued, the Maynottæ (Z) likewise take up arms, and besiege Zar- nata: but the garrison understanding that forces were coming from the Venetians to assist the enemy, they deliver up the city.^z

THE taking of this place is represented very differently by our historians. They tell us, that, on the loss of Koron, the captain Pâshâ sailed with his galleys in sight of Cerigo, hoping to e divert the Venetians from any farther attempts this year: but soon retired himself, for fear, to Napolidi Romania. Mean while Morosini, reinforced at Korfu with the Saxon troops, set sail to the coast of Zarnata; which city was surrendered to him by the Aga, commanding there.
 His officer fearing to be put to death for his cowardice or treachery, remained in the Venetian camp, and had a pension given him by the captain general, of thirty pieces of eight a month, after he had received baptism, with twenty Turks more, who consented to the surrender.

Other successes.

WHILE these things were acting, the captain Pâshâ, leaving the command of his fleet to Mezzamama, or Mezzomorto, came and encamped with seven thousand foot, and three thousand horse, within five miles of Zarnata; but, on news of the surrender of that fortress, withdrew his forces under the cannon of Kalamata: yet, when the Venetian forces landed, and f moved to attack him there, he set fire to the magazines, and made his retreat with some small skirmishes (A). The inhabitants also, finding themselves deserted, fired the place, and left it to the enemy; who, not judging it fit for a garrison, demolished the walls. After this, the

^r RICAUT, ubi supr.

^z CANT. p. 326.

(Z) They are the descendants of the ancient Lacedæ- monians, and at this day the bravest people among the Greeks. Though they are not reckoned to have above 12,000 soldiers, yet they never were subdued, or made tributary by the Turks: neither could the Venetians ever give them law at pleasure. Their name is derived from mania, madness; because they rush in battle upon the enemy as if they were mad. The country they inhabit is on all sides surrounded with mountains, which are the chief defence of their province. Cant.

(A) The Turkish historians say the Turks were routed here with great slaughter, by the Venetians under Degen- feld; and that hereupon Kalamita, Passa, and Khielasa, being abandoned by the Othmâns, were dismantled by the enemy. Cant. Othm. hist. p. 326.

a Venetians seized on Porto Vitalo; and Hassan Pâshâ, accompanied with a thousand people, A. D. 1685, brought the keys of Kbielafa to the admiral galley. To crown the campaign, the captain general, happening in his return with some galleys to put into the port of Gommenizza (B), he quickly obliged the garrison to leave him, in possession of the castle^a.

In the meantime, Valier had closely besieged Zing, in Dalmatia; but, after losing a great many men, on the approach of the Pâshâs of Bosnia and Ercegovina, retires from before it. The Turks, flushed with this success, attack Duare: but a few days after, are repulsed with greater loss by Valier, who had raised fresh forces^b.

Our historians say, that Paolo Michael, a noble Venetian, having with one thousand horse joined three thousand Morlâkians, made incursions into Bosnia; and that the Pâshâ being thereby diverted from his intended march into Hungary, sent eight thousand men to besiege the fortress of Duare, in Dalmatia: but that they were beaten off by Valier, in conjunction with Michael, while the Morlâks defeated four thousand others under the Pâshâ himself, as he was advancing to support the siege.

'Tis hardly credible how much the account of these ill successes disturbed the Othmân court, and especially the prime Wazîr, Karâ Ibrâhîm Pâshâ; who, continuing at home, under a real or pretended indisposition, was in fear of being divested of his dignity. To ward off this blow, he has recourse to the method used by other Wazîrs before (C) him, and the only one left: which was to destroy all who were eminent for their warlike abilities; that in case the Soltân should resolve to deprive him of the imperial seal, there might be none so worthy to possess it as himself. He begins the tragedy with Shaytân Ibrâhîm Pâshâ, Seraskier against the Germans, whom he accused of negligence in the battle of Gran, and of converting the soldiers pay to his own use (D). The same fate befalls others, who could either justly or unjustly be charged with any crime. The only person who seemed out of danger, was Ayneji Soleyman Pâshâ, Seraskier against Poland, who had gained so great authority by his victory in Moldavia, that he was universally declared worthy of the Wazîrship itself.

KARA IBRAHIM therefore, finding it not safe to hurt him openly, persuades the Soltân to appoint him Seraskier against the Germans; by whose valour he hoped that Pâshâ would lose the glory he had obtained in the Polish war. Soltân Mohammed, having thereupon ordered him to be recalled from Moldavia, and Buikkli Mostafa Pâshâ (E), left in his room; The Kisler Aga (F), who knew the Wazîr to be Soleyman's mortal enemy, suspecting a snake in the grass, gave the Pâshâ notice to be upon his guard. As soon as Soleyman arrives at Constantinople, he waits on the Wazîr, as if he desired to receive his commands; and pretends so great a veneration for him, that Kâra Ibrâhîm, imagining he had caught the fox, acquaints him with the Soltân's design in sending for him.

WHEN he comes to the palace, Soltân Mohammed, after highly commending his service done that campaign, offers him the post of Seraskier of Hungary. The Pâshâ, seeming to

^a RICAUT, ubi supra.

^b CANT. p. 326.

(B) A town of Akbaia, opposite to Kortcyra. Ibid.

(C) Some of the most eminent Wazîrs have used this artifice. The most skilful in this practice, was Kyoprili Mehemed Pâshâ, who, in the seven years of his Wazîrship, put to death, under various pretences, almost all the old Pâshâs brought up under Morâd IV. The chief of these were Seyd Oglî, the defender of Hungary, against the Germans; and Delli Huseyn Pâshâ, governor of Dalmatia; two of the most excellent and invincible heroes who ever were in the Othmân empire. This Wazîr, after he had obtained a Khatîsharîf (or mandate) for putting the latter to death, sent for him, and with wet eyes pretended to lament his misfortune. But Huseyn Pâshâ, who knew his hypocrisy, answered, O! thou old wizard, like a crocodile, thou first killest a man, and then weepest over his body. Then pulling a gold box out of his bosom, in which he kept 24 pieces of bones, taken out of his wounds; he flung them in his face, with these words; I was raised to the office of Wazîr, and the happiness of dominion, not like thee, by magic arts, but for my fidelity, and effusion of my blood. Cut therefore my head off, if thou wilt, like an infidel: but lay my feet in thy mother's pudendum. This Pâshâ was Selhadar to Morâd IV, who never did any thing without his advice. He was famous for his invincible resolution, in all conditions of life. His ready wit, eloquence, and quick repartees, many excellent actions and sayings of his are recorded, of which our author Cantemir gives some instances.

(D) Our historians tell us, that differences arising in Hungary between the Janizaries and Spahis, Aremzâ-

deb, a man of prudence, was sent to enquire into the cause, and made a report so much to the disadvantage of Shaytân Ibrâhîm, that an officer was sent to take off his head, which was brought to Constantinople the 6th of December. He died, pitied by all, in the 80th year of his age. Being an excellent accountant, he was first employed by Mr. Daws (afterwards Sir Jonathan) a factor in Turkey: during which time a tumult arising, this obscure person was in the hurry made treasurer. He immediately gave Daws notice of his advancement; and wanting money to appease the mutineers, was advanced all that Daws could raise, to the great advantage afterwards of him, and all the English in those parts. When Pâshâ of Egypt, meeting some English ships in his passage, he treated the officers; and on mentioning Sir Jonathan, said he was the best friend he ever had in the world. Jones.

(E) Buikkli signifies having long whiskers: he was under this Soltân, Silhadar, Kapudan Pâshâ, Seraskier of Silistria, and at length, for his victory over the Poles, made Wazîr. From this post he was removed by Abmed II. to the government of Damaskus. But he was recalled and made Kaymakân, by Mostafa II.; who, after the battle of Zenta, offered him again to the Wazîrship: but he desired not to be placed a second time again in that dangerous office, from which he reckoned it one of the greatest felicities of his life that he had before escaped. Cant.

(F) Chief of the black eunuchs. He then bore the greatest sway at court. Cant.

A. D. 1685. decline the honour, answered, that the disordered state of the public affairs, and the terror a still imprinted on the army by the Vienna defeat, required the presence, if not of the Soltân himself, at least of the prime Wazîr, in the camp; and that the authority of a Serafskier was not sufficient to oblige soldiers to do their duty, who seemed more inclined to fly or mutiny, than to fight. The Soltân, moved with this speech, stands musing for some time; which being observed by the Kislar Aga, who had been long the Wazîr's enemy, as well as S. leymân's friend, "Why (says he) O emperor! do you hesitate? if you think the Serafskier's counsel "just and prudent, what hinders you from immediately applying the remedy to this evil? "Divest of his dignity Kâra Ibrâhîm Pâshâ, under whose indisposition, whether pretended or "real, the empire languishes, and appoint this hero both Serafskier and Wazîr."

who is made Wazîr.

THE suspicion which the Soltân had before entertained, that Kâra Ibrâhîm counterfeited b sickness out of fear, being increased by what the Kislar Aga had suggested, he removes the Wazîr from his post, and places in his room Ayneji Soleyman Pâshâ; who immediately seizes his predecessor; and finding him accused of many crimes, banishes him to Rhodes. Then he releases Tekeli, imprisoned by Kâra Ibrâhîm, and by the evidence of Ibrâhîm Aga, chamberlain of Kâra Mostafa, acquits him of the crime with which he was charged by that Pâshâ; whose villanies, as well as pernicious designs against the empire, he exposes to the public. By this means Tekeli is restored to his former honours; and all his effects, which he had been plundered of by the soldiers, returned to him. Affairs being thus settled, the Wazîr, with great diligence, raises an army, and orders all his silver and gold vessels to be turned into money (G), for support of the war.

Arad taken.
Hej. 1097.
A. D. 1686.

BUT before he could bring his forces into the field, the country being still covered with c snow, part of the imperial troops, under Caraffa, on the 18th of Rabio'lawel 1097, had taken St. Nicholas; and another party under Merci, had routed several Turkish regiments conveying provisions to Arad, taken that city (H), and burnt the stores laid up there by the Turks.

ACCORDING to our historians, hostilities began this year by general Heusler taking a convoy of 200 waggons, laden with provisions from Transylvania, for the support of Buda; which early action made Apri Pâshâ, appointed Serafskier in the room of Shaytûn Ibrâhîm, very active to supply the frontier garrisons with men and provisions.

Mongatz
blocked up.

AT this time Caprara having blocked up Mongatz, which was defended by the lady of d Tekeli, who could by no means be prevailed on to surrender the place, her husband made great preparations to raise the siege. As this motion of Tekeli alarmed all the country, Caraffa endeavoured to way-lay him in his march: but the other being informed of his design, directed his course toward Giula, to join the new Pâshâ of that place. Caraffa, having by this means missed of his prize, on the 9th of February invested the fortress of St. Job, three leagues from Great Waradin, and threw in many bombs to no effect; till at length one falling directly on the tower, in the middle of the castle, tore it to pieces: whereupon the Turks immediately capitulated.

St. Job taken. MEAN time Caprara carried on the siege of Mongatz with great vigour. But though e at last the besieged, by their great losses, were able to act only on the defensive, yet at this juncture did the princefs Ragotski take a new oath of fidelity from the soldiers, who cheerfully complied, assuring them from Tekeli's letters, that he would in person shortly raise the siege. But although Tekeli was not as good as his word, yet Caprara was not able to take the town; for the great rains having rendered the ground so soft, that they could not maintain their works, he was obliged to withdraw about the middle of April. To return to the Turkish historians.

* CANT. p. 326, & seq.

† RICAUT, ubi supra.

(G) There was little money at this time; for after the treasuries were emptied with the expences of the last campaign, the Soltân in summer ransacked the treasury of the stables, causing the gold and silver stirrups, with other horse furniture, to be coined, with thirty per cent. alloy, to the value of 2000 purses. Jones.

(H) Our historians say the campaign in 1685 ended by the taking of this place (situated on the Maroz) by colonel Heusler.

S E C T. IV.

The Siege of Buda, and Battle of Mohatz, with Soltán Mohammed's Deposition.

a AFTER several other rencounters, at length, on the 26th of Rajeb (or 7th of June) A. D. 1686. the whole imperial army besiege Buda (I), which had been in vain attempted two years before; and on the 2d of Shaabân make themselves masters of the lower town, with less opposition than was expected. They next assault the walls of the city; and the strongest of all the forts being demolished by the cannon, on the 21st of the same month (July 2d) the breach is attacked with such success, that the besieged were compelled to abandon it: but the workmen who were to cover the victors with a rampart, not coming immediately, many of them are killed by the continual firing of the Turks; who al'o have an opportunity of springing the mines before prepared, which force the Imperialists to retire with great loss.

b THE besiegers, rather animated than discouraged by this repulse, on the fourth of Ramazan (July 15) having demolished several paces of the wall, they renew the assault in the same place. The contest was long doubtful, and so fierce, that above three thousand Imperialists were either killed or wounded (K), before they could mount the breach; and it was with great difficulty that, after a conflict of several hours, they forced the besieged to abandon the first wall. After this the batteries were directed against the second; the greater part of which was also demolished (L), before the arrival of the new Wazîr, with his troops: who, finding it in vain to attack the imperial camp, resolves, if possible, to reinforce the garrison, and amuse the enemy by delays, till he had an opportunity to attack them unexpectedly, when fatigued with the length of the siege. The Wazîr attempts to raise the siege, but without effect.

c WITH this view, on the 22d of Ramazan (August 3d) he sends four Pâshás, with eight thousand horse, and two thousand Janizaries (M), to try if they could pass between the quarters of the Imperialists and Bavarians, and throw in part, at least, of the Janizaries, to relieve the besieged: but the duke of Lorraine suspecting their design, sends a body of horse to encounter them, before they reached the camp; which they did with such vigour, that after a short opposition the cavalry fled, and left the Janizaries to the mercy of the Imperialists. On the last day of the same month (August 9th) the Wazîr sends two thousand Janizaries, with several troops of horse (N), to execute his former design. These proceeding with greater caution, surprise the advanced guards of the Imperialists; and then falling on the Brandenburg camp, with the fury of wild beasts, rather than of men, rush through fire and sword, and at once pass the rampart raised against them: but the Brandenburg troops, being seasonably d relieved by Caprara and Heussler, inclose the Turks, just ready to enter the city; and make such a slaughter of them, that scarce three hundred, and those almost all wounded, escape within the gates.

Two days after, the Imperialists, to shew the besieged how little they dreaded the Wazîr, assault the strongest part of the castle (O), and after a sharp conflict become masters of it. When they seemed, by this means, to be very near taking the city, the Wazîr, on the 19th of Shawâl (August the 18th) for the third time, obliges one thousand Janizaries, supported by one thousand Spahis, and fifteen hundred Tatars, to attempt the relief of Buda: but altho' they behaved with the same bravery as the former, and even penetrated to the trenches of the Imperialists, yet they were repulsed with great loss. The garrison, who to favour the attack e had made a sally with their whole strength, seeing their friends defeated, retire again, with great speed and ill success. By these losses the Othmán army is quite disheartened; and a report being spread, that, when the confederate forces had taken the city, they would attack them in their camp, the greater part of the soldiers, notwithstanding the Wazîr's intreaties, disperse themselves, and return home.

(I) Our historians say, the Turks had not the least intelligence of their design. For the general, their account agrees with the Turkish.

(K) Our historians say they lost near 1000 men, besides officers, and 50 volunteers, several of whom were noblemen, and among others divers Englishmen of quality; while the Turks had not above 200 killed, and 100 wounded.

(L) Owing to the blowing up of the principal magazine, near the castle: after which, July 27th, they in a general assault took the great tower; and in another, advanced as far as the inner tower, though not without great loss. Hereupon the governor Apdi Pâshâ offered to surrender the town, provided a peace was concluded. August 3, the besiegers were repulsed in making a general assault, and alarmed with the approach of 60,000 Turks.

(M) Our historians make but 6000 in all, and say; the Imperialists took 3 pieces of cannon, and 40 standards, after slaying most of the Janizaries. They place this action on the 14th of August.

(N) The Christian writers say about 4000, on the 20th of August, made the attempt.

(O) The Bavarians having played their batteries against the main castle, on the 22d assaulted the tower and took it.

A. D. 1686.

The city sur-
renders.

THE besiegers, being thus freed from the danger which threatened them in the rear (P), on the 13th of the same month (Agust 22d) make the last effort upon the city; which the governor, Apdi Pâshâ, a man very famous for his warlike abilities, for several hours bravely repels: but he being at length slain, the garrison begin to lose courage, and make a faint resistance. At last, finding the match unequal, they display the white flag, and desire quarter: but before the ardor of the Germans could be restrained, a great number of the besieged are slain upon the very walls, so that scarce two thousand of them were received into mercy^a.

Number slain.

OUR historians say, that the Imperialists, after a bloody fight, for above three quarters of an hour, entered the town, and in the heat of their fury, put all to the sword: but that about sixteen hundred retiring within the trenches and works of the castle, begged for quarter; which, after holding a council of war, was granted them, in consideration of the near approach of night, and of the confusion occasioned by the fires in several parts of the city. In this action not above four hundred of the besiegers were slain, and two hundred wounded: but of the Turks, three thousand might have fallen, and two thousand been made prisoners, among whom were several officers of note^b.

BUDA being subdued, the prime Wazîr, who, during the assault, had with tears lamented his own and the empire's fortune, with the rest of his army flies, rather than retreats; while the garrisons of Hatman, and the other adjacent places, abandon their posts, and submit to the emperor.

Other succe-
ses.

THE duke of Lorraine, finding no army to oppose him, divides his forces, and sends part, under the prince of Baden, into lower Hungary, and part into the upper, under the conduct of Caraffa and Heusler. The prince of Baden, with his forces, on the 8th of Zilkaadeh (September the 15th) besieges Simonthorn, and in a few days obliges the Turkish garrison to surrender themselves and castle to his mercy. Then he attacks Kapofwiwar (Q), and takes the city, which he plunders and abandons, because he would not stay to reduce the castle. From thence, having received fresh supplies by Scherfenburg, he marches towards Five Churches; and on the 28th of the same month (October the 5th) arriving with his foremost troops within sight of the city, the garrison, on a belief that the whole army was come, set fire to it, and retired into the castle (R): but the prince ordered three hundred horse to dismount, and extinguish the flames, whereby the greater part of the city was saved for the soldiers to plunder. The garrison, by this time sensible of their mistake, out of shame, endeavour by a sally to recover the town: but were repulsed with loss.

Five
Churches
taken.

HOWEVER, to atone for the fault, they display on the castle walls one black and six red banners, to let the besiegers know that they were resolved to sacrifice their lives in defence of it: but when they saw their strongest works demolished by the enemy's cannon, the prospect of death inspiring them with gentler resolutions, they take down their ensigns, and offer to surrender, on condition to depart with their arms; which being refused, they submit to mercy, and are made prisoners, with the Pâshâ and seven Begs, on the third of Zilhajeh (October 10th). The prince of Baden, after this success, sends Scherfenberg, with part of his army, against Syclos; where that general arriving on the 7th, at the first assault takes the city: then battering the castle, he in several attacks so presses the garrison, that on the 12th, they surrender themselves prisoners of war.

Essek burnt.

FROM thence Scherfenberg is recalled by the prince, who was then at Darda; and hearing that some Turkish troops were still about the Drave, was resolved to defeat them: but the Turks, on the bare report of his approach, fly with such precipitation, that they leave Essek open to the enemy, and burn part of the bridge (S), to prevent pursuit. The prince of Baden, finding they had escaped him, orders the remainder of that bridge, and the other bridges built by the Turks over the Drave, to be burnt. In his return he assaults the castle of Kapofwiwar, which before had been attempted in vain; and so presses the governor, that it was surrendered on the 22d of Zilhajeh (October 29th) on honourable terms.

Seghedin
taken.

MEAN time the other part of the imperial army, commanded by Caraffa and Heusler, had marched to Seghedin, and besieged that city; where, hearing that two thousand Turks, with a strong body of Tatars, were encamped at Schinta, a town six hours distant, with design to reinforce the garrison, Caraffa sends Veterani with several regiments, who rout the Tatars, and take their camp, besides five thousand horses. Soon after the Tatars return, imagining

^a CANT. p. 329, & seq. See also RICAUT.^b RICAUT, ubi supra.

(P) Being also reinforced with 8000 men, under count Scaffenberg, on September the 2d, began to play all their batteries, and making several movements, as if to fight the Wazîr, suddenly attacked the breaches in three places, which they resolutely entered; Apdi Pâshâ being slain on the breach. Jones.

(Q) Or Kapofwar.

(R) Our historians say, the Imperialists, surprising the city, scaled the walls, and entered it sword in hand, while the Turks fled to the castle.

(S) This bridge, according to doctor Brown, is five miles long, and seventeen paces broad, reaching from the Drave to Darda.

a that the Germans were employed in plundering; but being repulsed by the outmost guards, immediately retire. They had not been gone long, before the Wazîr himself appears (T), bringing them back with him. Veterani, although he knew not the Othmân's strength, yet would not retreat for fear of discouraging his men; but drawing them up, undauntedly expects the enemy. The Turks begin the attack, and fight with great fury; but, after two hours doubtful contest, they retire to a hill, where they are covered by their cannon: Veterani follows, and surmounting all difficulties, drives them also from that post, after they had lost in both battles two thousand Janizaries, and as many Tatars. Segbedin was the reward of this victory, on the 5th of Zilhajeh (October 12th); when the exhausted garrison delivered up that fortress.

A. D. 1686.
The Wazîr defeated.

b THIS was the state of affairs in Hungary: but in Poland most part of the year was spent in negotiations. The emperor had invited the Czars of Russia, John and Peter, into an alliance against the common enemy of Christendom; in order to invade the Krîm, and prevent the Tatars joining with the Turks, while the rest of the confederate forces were employed in Hungary. The Czars having answered that they were ready to declare war against the Porte, provided they could be secure against a rupture with Poland; the emperor at length prevailed on the Poles, to renounce claim to Kiow and Smolensko, which had for several ages been the ground of sharp contests, and sign the articles of peace, on the 20th of Jamazio'l (U), 1097^y.

John Sobieski invades Mol-davia without opposition.

c JOHN SOBIESKI, encouraged by this new alliance, resolves on another expedition into Moldavia, as being the chief bulwark of the Othmân empire against Poland. But before he took the field, he resolved to try once more, by his ambassadors, to engage the prince of that country in a treaty against the Turks. Constantine Cantemir excused himself from an open rupture, for the reasons already given, but promised, in case the Turks and Tatars were defeated in the intended expedition, that he would then declare against them; and in the mean time let him know whatever passed in the Othmân camp, as well as order his subjects to supply his army with provisions. The king of Poland, on receipt of this answer, in the beginning of Shawûl, passes the Tyras (or Niester) and advances to Jassi, where meeting with no opposition, and finding store of corn and wine, which the prince had provided for the Polish army, he spends fourteen days in feasting and entertainments.

d MEAN time the Seraskier, Buikkli Mostafa Pâshâ, with twenty-five thousand horse, and eight thousand Janizaries, had already passed the Danube, and sent for Nuraddîn Soltân (X), with thirty thousand Tatars to his camp. These he orders to enter Moldavia, and ravage the country, to be revenged on Cantemir, whose absence was deemed a revolt: but this misery was prevented by Beg Mirza, a Tatar of the Cantemir family (Y), who engaged that in three days the prince would arrive at the camp; as he accordingly did, about the end of the same month.

e DURING this interval, the king of Poland advances farther, with design to drive the Turks out of Moldavia: but, on the second encampment, finds his soldiers began to want provisions, because all their stores had been wasted at Jassi, through negligence of the commissioners. To remedy this inconvenience, he passes the Hierasus (or Pruth) near Czoczura, imagining, that before the Turks approached, he should seize the richest magazines of the Tatars: but, when he was scarce two days march from that city, the Seraskier comes up and surrounds him; while the Tatars set fire to the grass, and cut off the Polish foragers. The king, in despair, offers battle to the Seraskier, who evades it; either thinking sixty thousand Poles too many for him, or else to draw them farther from Poland.

In great distress.

^y CANT. p. 330, & seq. RICAUT, ibid.

(T) Near the bridge on the Danube, with 12,000 men. They lost in this defeat all their cannon and baggage. Jones.

(U) April 3d 1683.

(X) There are two offices among the Tatars, never given to any but the Khân's sons, with consent of the Othmân court, namely, Kalga and Nuraddin: Kalga is as it were the Khân's lieutenant general, who never moves out of Krîm Tartary, but with the whole army of the Tatars. Nuraddin (which in the Tatar language signifies Will) is the next in degree, and is sent with a certain number of forces, as ten or twenty thousand, to the assistance of the Turks. Cant. We judge Nuraddin not to be a Turkish but an Arabic word, the same with Nuro'ddin signifying, the light of religion: Kalga also is by some written Galga.

(Y) This family was very eminent among the Tatars

for nobility and riches. They derive their pedigree from Temûr (or Timûr, the famous Tamerlane); Kantemur, signifying the blood or race of Temur. One of the Kantemirs rebelled for several years, both against the Khân and Soltân, who at last deceiving him by a treaty, and title of Beg, cut him off. His brothers submitted to the Khân, and were placed in the provinces of Ak Kiermân and Kili. His son, Shâbbaz, changing his name, took the surname of Beg Mirza, which passed to his descendants. The Beg Mirza in the text, used often to come into Moldavia, and told prince Constantine, that at the time his ancestors were most pressed by the Khân, one of their family fled to the prince of Moldavia, and turned Christian; on which account he affirmed, that he was prince Constantine's relation. Cant.

SOBIESKI,

A. D. 1686.

Plunders the monasteries.

SOBIESKI, thus distressed, having repassed the Pruth, at Vale Strimba (Z), with great difficulty and loss from the Tatars, discharges his resentment on the Moldavians, whom he gives up to be plundered by his soldiers (A). He himself burns two monasteries at Jassi, seizes the sacred vessels, carries away the relics of St. John of Soczava, with many jewels, the pious gifts of former princes, and carries off the metropolitan, for refusing to deliver them. Afterwards coming to the monastery of the Three Hierarchies, he demands the relics of St. Parasceva (B) of Ephibati: and on the archimandrite's refusal, orders the cannon to be brought, threatening to batter down the doors, and seize the whole treasure: but finding the prior inflexible, either touched with shame, or prevented by his officers, soon after departs. The soldiers, induced by hunger, as well as the king's example, plunder the cities and villages, not sparing any place, religious or profane².

His army
wasted.

HOWEVER, these violences soon met with due punishment: for the inhabitants being dispersed by the cruelty of the Poles and Kosáks, the troops, finding the houses empty, were forced to eat raw flesh unsalted; which occasioned such a flux among them, that five hundred died in the camp every night. Prince Constantine likewise unexpectedly, sending his forces over the province, surprises them dispersed, and takes four thousand prisoners, of whom he burns some, and impales others. When the king arrived at Kotnar, the Tatars, with noxious herbs (C), poisoned the lake which waters that city, so that all the men and cattle who drank of it were destroyed. The thing being discovered, the king avoids the open country, and encamps on the Siretus, surrounded by mountains; which being difficult for horses to pass, the Tatars leave him to return to his country, and march off laden with booty and prisoners.

Disgraced at Nemez.

THE king in his way attacks the castle of Nemez (D), deserted by all its inhabitants, excepting nineteen Moldavian hunters, who by chance happened to remain there. Sobieski, not knowing how inconsiderable the garrison was, assaults the place four days with cannon and bombs, while the hunters defend themselves, and kill above fifty Poles, with the master of the ordnance. But on the fifth day, seeing ten of their number slain, they surrender the city, on condition that the garrison should depart where they pleased. When the king saw only six hunters come forth, carrying three others on their shoulders, struck with admiration, resentment, and shame, he orders them to be hanged; but dismisses them at the instance of Tablonowski: then leaving two hundred chosen horse in the city, marches to Soczava, the ancient capital of Moldavia, and finding it quite deserted, takes and garrisons it.

retires secretly.

ON these successes of the Poles, the Tatars were recalled to glean the straggling soldiers: but on the 16th of Zilkaadeh, being met by the high treasurer, sent before by the king with eight thousand men, they were defeated with great loss. However they took revenge, by cutting off great numbers of the Poles, who were now obliged to disperse themselves through the woods, in quest of fruit to subsist on. The king, perceiving this danger, fled privately in the night, with a few attendants, under the guidance of a Moldavian colonel, leaving the rest of the army with Tablonowski, who followed the king to Tavarovia, about the end of the same month.

Venetian successes.

THE Venetians had this year better success. In the beginning of spring the Morlakhians take Ottokb (a city situated between the two branches of the Cettin) by storm, and put the whole garrison to the sword. The Kapudan Páshá attempts Khielafa (E), but retires on the approach of the Venetian fleet. Part of this fleet being sent to block up the Dardinels, the rest attack old Navarin; which being surrendered on the first day of the siege (F), new Navarin is closely invested. The Seraskier of Morea flies to its relief; but in the way is routed by count

² CANT. p. 332, & seq.

(Z) This, in the Moldavian language, denotes a perverse or unjust valley. 'Tis a place on the Pruth, very unfortunate to the Christians. Konicky, general of the Kosáks, had his trenches forced there by the Tatars, with great slaughter: John Sobieski was forced to retire twice out of it, with great loss: and Peter, Czar of Russia, was there constrained to make peace with the Turks, on terms he did not like. Cant.

(A) The king indeed endeavoured, by letters to the prince, to clear himself, and lay the blame on the soldiers, who acted contrary to his orders: but his own violent proceedings shew, that if they did not commit robberies, and other crimes, by his permission, they did by his example. Cant.

(B) She was mistress of the village Ephibati; which afterwards was possessed by the great Apokaukus, general of the emperor Andronicus. Cant. Mention is made of Apokaukus in the history of the Greek emperors.

(C) This herb is so strong a poison, that being thrown into the rapid river Pruth, a good way above the enemy's camp, all who drink of the water (till the herb is carried down with the stream) die immediately. This, however incredible it may seem to others, the author has seen done himself by the Tatars, of whom not above three or four in all Tartary knew the secret. Cant.

(D) A very ancient city of lower Moldavia, seated on a high mountain, beyond the Siretus, near a river of the same name. Cant.

(E) With 10,000 foot, and 1500 horse: but Cornaro, general of the islands, in conjunction with Morosini, the captain general, landing with 4000 men, slew 400 of the enemy, who left behind six pieces of cannon. Jones.

(F) They left behind forty-three brass cannon. The castle is seated on a rock, and accessible only on one side.

Koningmark

a Koningsmark (G), and the marquis of Kurbon, with eight thousand two hundred men. Making another attempt with three thousand recruits, he is defeated a second time; on which the city surrenders on the 26th of Rajeb (July 7th). Three days after Methone (or Modon) is besieged, and on the 15th of Shaabân (June 26th) delivered up by the garrison (H), terrified by the defeat of the Seraskier. A.D. 1686.

To crown the work, Morofini, on the 10th of Ramazân (July 20th), lays siege to Neapolis of Romania (I); and, though very strong both by nature and art (K), in a few days beats down the walls. On the sixth of the siege, the Seraskier hastens to the relief of the city; but is met by Koningsmark, and presently defeated. However, knowing that if the place was lost he must answer it with his head, he raised a more numerous army; with which, on the 9th of Shawâl (August 18th), at break of day, he attacks the trenches of the Venetians, and takes possession of a hill, from whence he could cannonade their camp. In this exigence Koningsmark advances, and detains the enemy till Morofini came up with the rest of the army. Although the Venetians were superior, yet the Turks fight for seven hours, as if the whole Othmân empire was at stake; but at last are put to flight. Hereupon Mostafa the governor delivers up the castle, on promise of leave to depart.^a Napoli taken by Koningsmark.

Our historians are more particular; according to them, the Venetian army, July 30th, posted themselves on mount Lamida, which commanded the city within musket shot; and from thence vigorously attacked it; yet could not prevent the Seraskier, who lay incamped near Argos, from reinforcing the garrison with three hundred men, under the command of Mostafa Pâshâ. Count Koningsmark, thinking it necessary therefore to dislodge the Seraskier, left fifteen hundred Italians to guard the works about the town, and marched two miles out of the camp to meet the enemy; who having lost two hundred men presently retreated. Hereupon Koningsmark possessed himself of the castle of Argos, and then returned to the siege of Napoli; which by this time was set on fire in several places by the bombs, and their magazine blown up. At length the Seraskier, being reinforced to ten thousand men, fell on the Venetians with great fury: but was received by the general, assisted by two thousand marines, with such bravery, that the Turks retired in confusion, after fourteen hundred of them had been killed and wounded.

The Turks having been very unfortunate this campaign, the Soltân next year, sends a Turk propose Chausb to propose a peace (a thing unusual with the Turks) to the emperor; who made answer, that he could not enter into any treaty, without consent of the Poles and Venetians. Being disappointed of peace, he prepared for war, and imposed great taxes; which added to the discontents of the people. Mean time the Wazîr, who was at Belgrade, contrived how to supply and preserve Zigeth: but for all his vigilance, the Germans from Five Churches, surprised and burnt the suburbs, whereby they made that and the neighbouring places more secure. However, the Turks fearing Alba Regalis would be attacked next, laboured to put it in a good posture of defence, not without much disturbance from the Imperialists: but of all places belonging to the enemy, Agria, or Erla, was in most distress. Tekeli, who was intrusted to relieve it, was often routed; and in one conflict with the Hussars, wounded, while his princefs fortified Mongatz.^b peace.

The Pâshâ of Bosnia, early in spring, besieges Duare, in Dalmatia; but on the approach of the Venetians, retreats with great loss. He makes attempts on the enemy in other places also, but is repulsed with slaughter. The Venetians, elated with these successes, on the 7th of Shawâl (August 16th), under the conduct of Cornaro, attack Zing, which Vallier had in vain attempted the year before; and having battered down the walls, on the second day of the siege, take it by storm, putting all the garrison to the sword. With like success, the Morlakhians make an expedition towards Constantinople; and having by stratagem drawn one thousand foot, and five hundred horse, out of the garrison, kill a great number, and pursue the rest with such vigour, that they entered the city with them, and having plundered, set it on fire. Venetians take Zing. A.D. 1687.

THESE misfortunes alarming the Ulema, and people of that capital, they throw out seditious speeches; alleging, that they were judgments for the breach of peace with the emperor, which could not be averted but by removing Soltân Mohammed, who was the author of that unjust war, and all those who advised or approved of it. Sedition at Constantinople.

^a CANT. p. 335, & seq.

^b RICAUT, ubi supra.

(G) Koningsmark, on the Seraskier's approach with 10,000 men to its relief, marched from before it June 4th; and forcing him to a battle, routed him, with the loss of 500, their tents and baggage. Jones.

(H) They found here 100 pieces of cannon, beside a great quantity of ammunition and provision. Jones.

MOD. HIST. VOL. V.

(I) Or Napoli di Romanina.

(K) Being defended on one side by the sea, and on the other by high and craggy mountains, which rendered the siege difficult.

A. D. 1687.

The Turks
distressed.

THE Soltân on this news instantly repairs to Constantinople, deposes the Mûfti, and employs a emissaries to persuade the people, that not he, but the prelate himself, and Kâra Mostafa Pâshâ, who had been put to death, were the occasion of beginning the war. Farther to gain their good opinion, he sells the jewels in the treasury to pay the soldiers; and the money not being sufficient, lays a tax on the Jâmis, and every house (L). By these arts, the incipient sedition is quashed; and the people induced to contribute more readily for the public service^c.

ACCORDING to the Christian historians, this contribution extended to all the officers, military, civil, and ecclesiastic, tax-gatherers, and rich merchants. But they were still more at a loss for men than money: for scarce six thousand troops arrived from Asia, instead of forty thousand; and the levies fell short in other parts also. This made the court order the Wazîr to endeavour at peace at any rate; and offer the delivering up of Tekeli, as the first preliminary: but the emperor insisting to be paid six millions of gold, in satisfaction for damages, that all places held by the Turks in Hungary should be yielded to him, and equal advantages given to his allies, his answer was considered at the Porte as an absolute refusal to treat.

THE grand Wazîr's army, by a moderate computation, exclusive of the Tatars, Hungarians under Tekeli, garrisons, and parties, was about fifty thousand strong; but that of the Imperialists amounted to sixty-four thousand brave troops, plentifully supplied with necessaries of all kinds^d.

Battle of Mohatz.

MEAN time the duke of Lorraine marched with the imperial army towards Essek, and passed the Drave, with intent to attack the Wazîr, who had encamped about that place: but Soleyman Pâshâ was so advantageously posted, that the duke, instead of venturing to attack him, was obliged to fortify his own camp for fear of being assaulted. The two armies being so near, first try their fortune by skirmishes, and then fall to work with their cannon; which doing most execution on the part of the Turks, the Germans are forced to give way. The Turks taking this for a flight, follow the enemy, who retreat towards the Danube. Yet while the Wazîr proceeds more slowly, by reason of his numbers, the duke of Lorraine encamps at Mohatz, where having refreshed his troops, he set out for Zikli. But he had scarce left his camp, when a great number of Turkish horse appears, and attacks the Germans on all sides, as they moved slowly, in order to detain them till the Wazîr arrived with his whole army.

The duke
attacked.

AFTER three days skirmishing, the Wazîr comes and posts himself in a little wood, through which the Imperialists were to pass. Next day, which was the fourth of Shawal (August 1st), he draws up his army; when observing the front of the Germans to be too wide for the wings to assist each other, commands his troops to annoy the enemy's right wing, with continued, but slight attacks; and at the same time to rush with their whole strength upon the left wing. The Turks accordingly fell upon the left wing with such fury, that they must needs have routed it, but for the cannon placed among the enemy's soldiers, which killed great numbers of the Othmâns as they moved incautiously forward, and made them retreat to the wood. However, they attacked the same wing a second time with a larger force, but with no better success than the first.

The Wazîr
overthrown.

THE duke of Bavaria, who commanded that body, imagining the courage of the Turks to be abated by these two repulses, leads his troops to attack them in the wood: but before he could execute his design, he sees the Othmâns advancing in a body against him. Hereupon he orders his cannon to be placed in the front, loaded with small bullets and pieces of iron; which did such execution, that they were forced to retire in haste. The duke follows them, but had scarce continued the pursuit an hour, when to his great surprise, he sees the Othmân camp intire, and fortified with a strong trench, in so short a time. However, the trenches being demolished by the imperial cannon, the enemy penetrate into the camp itself; and put to the sword almost all the Janizaries deserted by their horse. The Wazîr perceiving things to be desperate, with a few only escapes by flight; leaving the whole camp a prey to the victors; who pursued him with their horse, when he was out of their reach^e.

The Germans
retreat.

OUR historians relate this action with different circumstances from the Turkish. Their account of the battle is this: the duke of Lorraine, joined by the duke of Bavaria, prince Lewis of Baden, Caprara, Heusser, and other generals, having passed the Drave on the 18th of July, marched to Essek, and next day advanced towards the Wazîr, who was strongly and regularly encamped under that fortress, by the direction of some French engineers: for at this time the French began to enter into a confidence with the Turks. The Imperialists finding it

^c CANT. p. 336, & seq.^d RICAUT, ubi supra.^e CANT. p. 337, & seq.

(L) The European merchants who live there, altho' very curious in other respects, could never compute how much this tribute brought into the treasury. But any one may guess, when he knows that in the city alone, exclusive of Pera, Khristopolis (Eskudar or Skutari), Ayub, Bektash, and other adjoining villages, there are above 400,000 houses, besides the markets, inns, shops, and baths; every house paying according to their largeness, or the master's abilities, from 10 to 500 leonines. Cant.

impossible

a impossible either to draw them out to a battle, or force their camp, which was impregnable, and being themselves exposed, by their situation, to one hundred and fifty pieces of the enemy's cannon, as well as in want of provision and forage, they determined to repass the Drave. The Turks believing this to be a kind of flight, made several attacks on their rear: but being repulsed by the signal address of the generals, they suffered them to cross the river unmolested, without laying hold of the great advantages which the passage of it would have given them. A. D. 1687.

THE imperial army having passed the Drave, encamped on the 28th near Mohatz; where they were joined by five thousand German foot, and one thousand horse. Next day, on advice that the Wazîr began to pass that river, all things were disposed for a battle; and the duke, the better to invite him to it, still retreated, being followed by the enemy, who were reported to be eighty thousand strong, besides attendants. At length, on the 12th of August, when the duke had advanced with his right wing within an hour's march of Siclos, the elector of Bavaria, who commanded the left, was attacked by eight thousand Turkish horse, supported by six thousand Janizaries, who had the night before entrenched themselves on the side of a hill, from whence they fired many volleys on the cavalry. But prince Lewis of Baden having observed a very advantageous post on the side of the same hill, he was ordered to take it; which he did with admirable success: for the Janizaries having fired three volleys, and the Spahis as often furiously charged the rear-guard, the brave elector settled his men firm against the frequent and forcible attacks of the enemy. These not being able to endure the fire and unshaken order of the Imperialists, betook themselves to a disorderly and precipitate flight: so that the horse breaking in upon the foot, trampled down the Janizaries, and drove them back to their trenches, into which the Germans entered at the same time, and put the whole army to a shameful rout, leaving their camp, with all their tents and baggage, behind them (M). In this battle eight thousand Janizaries, with their Aga, were killed, three thousand others drowned, and two thousand taken prisoners. Of the Imperialists, only one thousand were slain.^f Pursued and attacked: gain the victory.

THE Wazîr, after this defeat, reinforces the garrison of Essek with several regiments; and Slavonia having left six thousand men to guard the bridge of Peterwaradin, retires to Belgrade. The duke of Lorraine perceiving these places too well fortified to be taken in the two months which still remained of the campaign, spreads a report that he designed to besiege Temeswaer. The Wazîr, deceived by this stratagem, sends the greater part of his army to defend that city. The Othmân forces in Slavonia being by this means weakened, the duke orders Dunewald, with a body of troops (N), to drive them out of that country; and continues himself with the main army, to watch the motions of the Turks in Hungary (O). Dunewald, having passed the Drave on the 2d of Zilkaadeh, sits down before Burzîn, and batters down the walls; so that on the 6th day of the siege, the garrison yield themselves and castle at discretion. invaded;

THIS city being taken, he assaults Walpo, whose governor, by a signal, informs the garrison of Essek, and desires their assistance. But these latter, terrified at the unexpected approach of the Imperialists, undermine the castle, and prepare to fly. Dunewald being informed of this, orders Ladrone, with two thousand horse, to observe the garrison. These imagining that the whole German army was with him, abandon the city with such precipitation, that they left behind most of their baggage, and even forgot to set fire to their mines; upon which the governor of Walpo surrenders, to prevent an assault. With equal success that general takes Posbega, capital of Slavonia, with Bellastin, Patrask, Shirask, Telikham, Walkowar, Erdeli, and several other castles (P), which the Turks had deserted, and reduces the whole country under the emperor's obedience. Mean time Areizaga, Ciokaku, and Polota, surrender to the governor of Leopoldstat; while Agria in Upper Hungary is invested by a small body of Imperialists, and cut off from all supplies. and quite reduced.

THE campaign on this side is crowned with the reduction of Transilvania. The prince of Transilvania that country, Mikhael Apafi, had agreed in the beginning of summer to quit his alliance with the Turks, provided they were once removed from his borders, and admit the Imperialists. But when the duke of Lorraine was preparing to take up his quarters in that province, Apafi denies him entrance; alleging, that his promise of granting quarters did not extend to the submits.

^f RICAUT, ubi supra.

(M) There were found in the camp, 67 pieces of cannon; 1000 quintals of powder; of match 400; 8000 cannon ball; 3000 bombs and carcasses; 10,000 grenades; arms of all sorts; 2000 oxen; 500 horse, and other animals; besides great plenty of provisions.

(N) Ten thousand men.

(O) The season being very wet, and his men growing sickly, they with great difficulty got to Zoluck. Jones.

(P) Particularly Orowitza and Zerneck. Our historians say, the Turks abandoned these and Posbega, on the news of Dunewald's approach.

A. D. 1687. whole army, but only to some regiments (Q). The duke hereupon enters the country, without the prince's consent; and seizing Cibinium and Claudiopolis (R), the principal cities, obliges him to submit to the emperor.

Russian expedition.

THE Russians did not meet with the same success against the Krîm Tatars: for Basilus, prince of Galliczin, being sent against them by the young Czars, with a numerous but confused army, after several days march through the frontier desert, is surrounded by Nuraddin Soltân. The misfortune of being thus cut off from provision and water, is soon followed by a pestilence, which destroys above forty thousand of his men in a short time. For all this, Nuraddin Soltân fearing the Russian army, to oblige them to return, pretends to march towards Kiow, which had the desired effect. But this stratagem would not have hindered the prince from entering Krîm Tartary, if he had not been hastily recalled by the letters of Sophia (S), sister to the Czars.

Poles retreat.

THE Poles, under the command of James Sobieski, the king's eldest son, on the 24th of Shawal (August 2d), appear before Kameniek: but after throwing in some bombs, and discharging their cannon twice or thrice, they, on news that the Turks and Tatars were advanced to Czuczera, raise the siege. Nothing remarkable was performed farther this year between the contending powers.

The affairs of the Morea.

WITH much greater vigour the Venetians carry on the war in the Morea: for landing their forces at Patras, on the 23d of Ramazân, they march three days after, under the conduct of count Koningsmark, against the Seraskier; who with his cavalry attacks their left wing. But being repulsed with loss, he bends his whole force against the right wing, with such fury, that the Janizaries with their swords endeavoured to remove the barricades, which secured the enemy's front: yet is he forced, after receiving a dangerous wound, and losing many of his men, with the Pâsbâ of Valona, to fly to the mountains with the remainder, two thousand of whom are cut off in the pursuit. This victory gained to the Venetians all which remained of the Morea in the hands of the Othmâns. The garrison of the castle of Patras lead the way and fly ^e.

The Seraskier routed by Koningsmark.

ACCORDING to our historians, on the 21st of July, 1687, the whole Venetian fleet, consisting of twenty-six galleys, and six galleasses, besides eighty-seven vessels of other kinds, entered the river of Patras; and although the Seraskier of the Morea was strongly encamped near the town, and two Pâsbâs guarded the banks of the river, yet, by Koningsmark's advice, d they landed immediately. Upon this, a strong party of Turks attacked the Germans, who led the van with great fury, but were quickly put to flight; and the captain-general having cut off all communication between the Turks and the castle, by the entrance of several galleys into the gulph during the night, it was resolved to fight the Seraskier, and attempt his camp. With this view, on the 24th, general Koningsmark drew up his army in order of battle; which the Seraskier perceiving, he detached some of his best troops to try to break their ranks. Finding that this had no effect, he gave the signal for his whole forces to engage, and charge the Venetians in flank, trusting to the great superiority of his troops: but the German foot, who received the first fire, seconded by the cavalry, commanded by the marquis of Corbon, soon put them to flight; whereupon the strong fortress of Patras surrendered ^h.

Lepanto surrenders.

MEHEMED PASHA, who had six thousand men to defend the castle of Rumelia, after blowing up the walls, deserted it likewise. The same is done by Mehemed, governor of the castle of Morea, on sight of the Venetian galleys: and what is more surprizing, the city of Naupactus (Lepanto) strongly fortified both by nature and art, sends deputies to the Venetian fleet which was sailing thither, with offers to surrender.

ACCORDING to our historians, the captain general having ordered the fleet to bring their chace-guns on the head of their ships, to bear on the fortress of Lepanto; the inhabitants were so terrified, that they abandoned the place, carrying what baggage they could on their backs. Thus in the space of twenty-four hours, the Venetians became masters of four strong fortresses f

^s CANT. p. 338, & seq.

^h RICAUT, ubi supra.

(Q) Our historians say, he alleged, that in so doing he should offend the Porte, which would be his ruin: that hereupon the duke said, he would take quarters by force: that being refused quarters at Klausenburg, he proposed to attack it; whereupon the governor surrendered on articles: that no other place afterwards refused to receive the Imperialists into quarters; and that afterwards the duke made a treaty with Apafi and the states to the satisfaction of both parties. About the same time, the archduke Joseph was crowned king of Hungary.

(R) Hermanstadt and Klausenburg. It is wrong to change the Turkish names, especially to give the antient instead of the modern.

(S) Many blame Galliczin alone for the ill success of this expedition: but I have chosen to relate here what I know to be true and unquestionable. CANT. From this, and many other circumstances in this second part of the Othmân history, a suspicion arises, that our author has mixed a great deal of matter from his own knowledge, or other historians, with what he gives us from the Turkish writers, without distinguishing one authority from the other.

a with little or no loss; and sixty pieces of cannon, most of them brass, were found in them; A. D. 1687. besides eight in the Seraskier's camp (who after his defeat marched in haste to Korinth), and  six in that of Mos̄tafa Páshá.

WHEN the affairs of the conquered cities were settled, Morofini, general of the Venetian Korinth defended. army, appears before castle Torneſe and Miſitra, which the governors deliver up, with all the stores, without the least opposition. The only city which made any resistance was Epidaurus Limeria (T); wherefore Morofini, after annoying it extremely with his bombs to no effect, sails with his fleet through the Korinthian bay, directly to Korinth; presuming, that when this last city should be subdued, the passage into the Morea would be shut up to the Turks, and the remaining castles would be much easier to reduce. The Seraskier, on his approach, con-
b sidering that the four thousand men he had with him would not be able to oppose the enemy, sets fire to the magazines, and demolishing most of the walls, retreats into the mountains of Thebes, slaying all the Greeks he met, on pretence that they were the cause of his misfortune. But Morofini perceiving the flames, sent and extinguished them, before the magazines could be all consumed.

AFTER this, he sends Koningsmark with part of his army to Athens, which surrenders, after a short siege; wherein the antient temple, dedicated to the unknown God, was blown up by a Athens surrenders to Koningsmark. bomb setting fire to the powder lodged there¹.

OUR historians place the taking of Korinth next after that of Patras; and besides Torneſe and Miſitra, mention the submission of Saritenæa, Idrapolica, Solona, and the strong fortress c of Mitra. After this, they say Morofini, in his way to Athens, ruined with his artillery great part of the town and castle of Malvasia. According to them, on the 20th of September he arrived at port Leon, six or seven miles from Athens, where he landed his men; and marching to the city, began to batter the castle with four mortars and six cannon, shooting red hot bullets, one of which falling into their magazine blew it up. This, with the Seraskier's retreating from general Koningsmark, who advanced to fight him, brought the place to sur- render, on condition that the soldiers should march out with what they could carry on their backs, but without arms. Accordingly six thousand persons left the city, six hundred of whom were capable to bear arms. Many of the Greeks remained, with three hundred Turks, who were baptized; their intermarriages with the Greeks disposing them to embrace the d Christian religion here, more than elsewhere. There were found eighteen pieces of cannon in the castle. On this news, the inhabitants of Megara abandon that place, which the Vene- tians burnt, as being of no use².

IN Dalmatia the Turks begin the campaign; and, under the command of Atlaglik Páshá, Affairs of Dalmatia. governor of Bosnia, on the first of Jamazio'lawel, besiege Zing (or Singh), which Cornaro had taken the year before; but after assailing it with great vigour for forty days, and losing a great number of men, he is obliged to retire on the approach of the Venetian army. Cornaro, on the other hand, with the assistance of the fleets of Malta and the pope, on the 25th of Shawal, besieges castle Nuovo in Dalmatia, which the Páshá of Bosnia hastes to relieve; and e attacks the Venetian trenches with such fury, that he would have defeated the forces which defended them, had not Cornaro, with the rest of the army and Maltese auxiliaries, seasonably supported them when they began to give way, and obliged the Turks to fly, after they had lost above eight hundred men. For all this the garrison held out, till the Venetians, having taken the city by storm, on the 21st of the same month, they three days after found themselves under a necessity to surrender the castle³.

OUR historians mention certain particulars relating to this transaction, which deserve the reader's notice. On the 2d of September, general Girolamo Cornaro, procurator of St. Mark, Castello Nuevo besieged. landed his forces at a place called Komburt, near the town; and though the Turks were strongly intrenched on the banks of the passes, yet they forced their way, beating the enemy
f out of their trenches. After this, having discovered the condition of the town, which was fortified with redoubts and trenches, it was thought adviseable to make another descent at a place called Zeleucia, which was performed by general St. Paul; when, after five hours stout resistance, the Venetians became masters of the first and second trenches, with the hill of Santa Veneranda, which commands the town; from whence firing red hot bullets into it, the soldiers were compelled to quit their trenches.

MEAN time the Páshá of Bosnia came with all his forces to their assistance; but two The Turks thousand soldiers landing seasonably on the east side of the town, put him and his whole army defeated.

¹ CANT. p. 340, & seq. RICAUT.² RICAUT.³ CANT. p. 341.

(T) Called by the modern Greeks, Mommbasia; by the Turks, Meneuiche; and by the Italians, Napoli di Cant. Malvasia. It is the strongest fortress in all the Morea.

A. D. 1687. to flight. After this, the militia of Malta, advancing to the very muzzles of the enemy's muskets, bravely maintained their ground, though many of them were cut off, and obliged them to retreat under the cannon of the lower fortrefs. The town being thus blocked up, the defendants made a vigorous sally with their best men, but were repulsed with loss. At this time, the Pâshâ of Herzegovina endeavouring to relieve the besieged, was met by a detachment sent to oppose him; who being lately preferred to the government of Bosnia, so fiercely attacked the battalion of serjeant-major Galli, that they were broken, and had been totally defeated, had not major-general Grimani come to their assistance. But at last the enemy was put to flight, leaving seven hundred dead on the spot, besides several great men, whose heads, three hundred in number, being cut off, were fixed on half pikes before the town.

The city yields. FINDING the besieged still resolute, they batter the place incessantly: so that hearing the Pâshâ of Albania was coming to relieve it, and the magazine being blown up, they assaulted the breach, now thirty-six paces wide, and opened their way into the town: but finding the street barricaded with all sorts of lumber, while the men fired upon them from the windows, and the women threw stones from the tops of the houses, they were obliged to retreat again. Yet making another assault on the 29th of September, the defendants capitulated the next day, on condition to march out with their baggage, and be transported to Albania; soon after which, the middle and principal castle surrendered on the same terms^m.

The army mutinies under Siavus Pâshâ. MEAN time, there arises in the Turkish camp, from a slight cause, a very great sedition, which deprived the Soltân of the imperial dignity, and proved an almost irreparable detriment to the whole empire. The Wazîr, Ayneji Soleymân Pâshâ, being informed at Peterwaradin, that Agria would be forced to surrender, for want of provision, if not speedily relieved; commands a thousand Janizaries, and some hundred Spahis, to march thither with supplies of victuals. But the soldiers alleging their being quite spent with that year's service, and accusing him as the cause of all their disgraces, refuse to obey his orders; and when he renews his commands, declare they will not move one step without him (U). These kindlings of sedition were inflamed soon after by a new incident; for the Wazîr having attempted to destroy several Pâshâs, by accusing them to Soltân Mohammed of neglect of duty in the last battle, those officers being informed of the danger by their friends at court, exasperate the whole army against him.

SIAVUS PASHA (X), a stout and haughty man, who was in the list of the accused, which was sent to the Soltân, appeared at the head of these disturbances; and by his persuasion the army demands of the Wazîr the payment of two Kist (Y) due to them. That minister not having the money ready, tells them their pay was on the road, and would be there in a few days. But the soldiers, not to be put off with fair words, command him either to pay them forthwith, or to resign the Wazîrship, since they had a person ready, who was much more deserving of that dignity, and would satisfy their demand. Soleymân Pâshâ hereupon, in fear of his life, secretly flies, and carries to the Soltân the first news of this rebellion; laying the whole blame on Siavus, and some others, whom he accused of treachery in the German war.

Petition the Soltân. SOLTAN MOHAMMED easily credits the Wazîr, and with tears orders him to conceal himself, till he enquired into the designs of the rebels. Soleymân by this convinced of his sovereign's good will, retires to the house of Manolaki, a wealthy Greek, near the palace, where he lay hid for twenty-seven days, unknown to any body, excepting the Soltân, and his friend the Kizlar Aga. Two days after the Wazîr's flight, Siavus Pâshâ calling a council of the chief conspirators at Belgrade, engages them in a design to depose the Soltân, and put several of the great men to death. The rest of the army imagining that the Wazîr had fled to expose them to the enemy, or the Soltân's resentment, desire Siavus to take on him the Wazîrship. He, to gain the Soltân's favour, refuses the honour; alleging, that the dignity could be conferred by none but his majesty, against whom he would not be so wicked as to attempt any thing: and therefore exhorted them, before they proceeded a step farther, to send him a petition, and wait his answer.

^m RICAUT, ubi supra.

(U) Our historians say, the sedition began after the battle of Mohatz at Essek; where the Janizaries and Spahis upbraiding one another with their ill behaviour in the late battle, at length fell to blows: that the Wazîr, having pacified them with money, marched to Peterwaradin, where the soldiers grew so insolent by the incitement of Osmân and Sbaus, Pâshâs, that he was forced to fly to Belgrade; after which they made Sbaus their general. They differ in other particulars from the Turkish historians before us, whose authority, in an affair of this nature, ought we think to be preferred.

(X) A man before this action distinguished for no merit. The Italians write Sciaus, or Sbaus, in our characters. Our historians call him Ogli likewise; and join with him one Ozmân Pâshâ, as a leader in the mutiny.

(Y) That is three months pay, as Ulyse is one month's, and Navcka one day's pay. The Janizaries are paid quarterly.

THIS

- a THIS advice being approved, Siavus, in the name of the whole army, sends an Arzmabzar A. D. 1687. (Z) to Soltân Mohammed, setting forth, "That the forces of the empire were determined to come to Constantinople, not to raise a sedition, or attempt any thing against his sacred person, but to demand justice against the treachery and desertion of the Wazîr: that however, if he was desirous immediately to appease those commotions, he should send to the camp the head of that traitor, and the pay due to the army, by the Tefterdâr, and the Gyumrukchi Husseyn Aga (A)." The Soltân was advised by his most intimate counsellors to satisfy the demands of the soldiers, for his own safety: but he had conceived so great an opinion of the Wazîr's abilities, that he returned no other answer to the Arzmabzar, than that the money was already sent to pay them, and would soon be distributed; hoping the sight of it would soften their resentment to his minister. But the soldiers, persisting in their demand, cry out, that the Soltân is equally culpable with the Wazîr for protecting him, and ought to be deposed^a.

b WHEN Mohammed heard that for this purpose they hastened their march, he sent their leader the seal of the empire, and Mohammed's standard; flattering himself, that Siavus Pâshâ having obtained what he wanted, would not be so importunate for the Wazîr's head; but Siavus considering that the authority conferred on him would not be lasting, while his enemy, in such favour with the Soltân, was alive, receives the ensigns of power with strong declarations of submission from the Silahdar Aga; but withal informs him, that it was not in his power to pacify the army, till the Wazîr, Tefterdâr, and Gyumrukchi Basî, to whose negligence they imputed the present calamities, were executed. The Soltân hereupon sends the Wazîr's head (B); which not contenting the soldiers, Siavus advises his majesty not to draw some fatal consequence on himself, by an unseasonable clemency; assuring him, that if he would follow his advice, he hoped in a short time to extinguish the rebellion.

c THE Soltân having complied on this remonstrance, Siavus Pâshâ endeavours sincerely to perform his promise, and detain the army at Adrianople; but the rebels, instead of obeying his orders, reproach him with betraying them for sake of interest, and going over to the Soltân's party, now he had gratified his ambition; in short, they threaten, unless he leads them on, to cut off his head, and choose another general, who should depose the Soltân, and place Soleymân in his room. The new Wazîr, finding it dangerous to refuse, brings them to Constantinople, where he is received with great honour by Soltân Mohammed; who promises to confer favours on him, even beyond his hopes, provided he would appease the tumults. Siavus Pâshâ first excuses himself for having accepted the command of the army without his knowledge; alleging, that when he saw them bent on some desperate design, he judged it would be of service both to his majesty and the empire. He then said, if the Soltân had granted their first petition, he might easily have suppressed the sedition; but that the rebellion now had taken deep root in their minds. However, he promised on his oath to do his utmost endeavour to extinguish it, at the hazard of his life.

d As soon as the Wazîr returned to his palace, he sent for the chief rebels, and endeavours to dissuade them from proceeding in their designs, by representing, "That the Soltân had satisfied all their demands, and was not to be blamed for the misfortunes brought on by others: that no man of understanding could aim at deposing him, as he had heard some did: considering, that as a wise and warlike prince he was able to defend the empire; while his sons were too young to govern, and his brothers, especially Soleymân, were fitter to be monks than soldiers, being skilled in the laws, but not in arms." The conspirators, confirmed in their former suspicions of the Wazîr's fidelity, feign a readiness to divert the soldiers under their influence from any such design: but as soon as they are out of the palace, they meet in the Orta Jâmi (C); and accusing Siavus Pâshâ with being secretly in the Soltân's interest, in violation of his oath, advise the Janizaries to execute their purposes before they are circumvented by his artifices^e.

^a CANT. p. 341, & seq.

^e Ibid. p. 346.

(Z) It is a petition, presented in the name of the whole province or army, to the Soltân or Wazîr; that of a single person is called Arzuhal, as mentioned in a former note. Cant.

(A) One of the richest men among the Turks, and in such credit with the Soltân, that almost every week he dined at his house, called Findikli, in Pera, almost opposite to the palace. It is now mostly in ruins; an order having been made that it should not be inhabited. The Gyumrukchi is the receiver of the customs. Cant.

(B) As soon as the Chaus came to the prison, he said, I know for what you come; God's will be done: and having said his prayers, was strangled: but first enjoined him two things. I. To let the men in power know that he had given all his slaves their freedom. II. To advise them not to torment his people to discover his money, for that he never had any thing considerable, and the little which he was possessed of, was lost in the camp; only he could wish the Soltân would bestow what furniture and other things there might be in his house at Skutary, on his son. Jones.

(C) A temple in the midst of the Janizaries chambers, where they consult about any matter of consequence; and therefore when the Soltâns are afraid of a rebellion, they chiefly observe what is doing in the Orta Jâmi. Cant.

A. D. 1687. The clergy agree to depose Mohammed. HEREUPON the sedition increasing like wild-fire, the soldiers run armed in great bodies thro' the streets, crying out, the Soltân, both unfortunate and indolent, ought to be deposed, and Soleymân advanced in his room; who by his prayers would appease the divine indignation. They are soon after joined by the Ulema, partly of their own accord, and partly through necessity; on sight of whom the common people, thinking it criminal at such a time to sit still, snatch up what weapons are at hand, and repair to the church of Sancta Sophia. There the Nakîb (D) and Shaykh (E), offer themselves to the rest as leaders and directors of the intended consultation: but before any thing is proposed, they order the Kaymakân, Kyoprili Mostafa Pâshâ (F) to be sent for, in the name of the whole Musulmân nation. When he came, the Sharîf of Sophia, in a long speech, set forth how many provinces and cities had been lost; how much blood and treasure had been spent; and that greater calamities were still to be expected, if the government should be continued in the hands of such an emperor, who took no care of the army or state, and only minded his hawks and his hounds: then putting the Kaymakân in mind of the great services done to the empire by his ancestors, exhorts him to assist in averting the impending danger^p.

As the Sharîf is going on, he is interrupted by a clamour, that the Shâzadeh were in danger: for the Soltân finding, on being informed of this consultation, that there was no way left to prevent his deposition, but to put his brothers to death, had sent some of his chamberlains to dispatch them. But the Bostânji Bashî being made acquainted with this design by some courtiers, bribed by the Soltân's enemies, had surrounded the apartments of Soleymân and Ahmed with a regiment of Bostânji; and having repulsed the chamberlains, informed the assembly of this affair. The rebels, fired with this news, desired the Nakîb and Sharîf of Sophia instantly to proclaim the deposition of Mohammed, and declare Soleymân emperor; since the Soltân's attempt on the life of his brothers was of itself a sufficient ground; and the Bostânji might be bribed, if the design should be delayed.

Soltân's notice.

THE multitude would perhaps by force have deposed the Soltân, and even attempted his life, if the Kaymakân had not prevented it, by pretending to approve their opinion. Having thus gained their favour, he tells the assembly, "That there was no occasion for doing things in a hurry, since the Shâzadeh were securely guarded by the Bostânji Bashî; and advises them to proceed in such a manner, as might both preserve the honour of the Othmân family, and prevent more dangerous commotions; which would be to send the Shaykh Sharîf and Nakîb to the Soltân, in order to declare him deposed, in the name of the Ulema (or clergy), soldiery, and the whole Musulmân nation; then to desire him to leave the palace of his own accord, and resign the empire to his brother Soleymân." This advice being approved of by the whole assembly, the Nakîb and Shaykh Sharîf are sent, much against their wills, with this fatal message; which they humbly deliver to the Soltân, and then ask pardon for doing what they were forced to by the multitude.

The Soltân's answer.

SOLTÂN MOHAMMED heard the messengers with great tranquility, and then told them, "That they had brought him no news but what he expected; for that he had long found the common people were corrupted by the Ulema, desirous of change, and engaged by them in their rebellion, which he might have prevented by banishing them:" next having mentioned the justice of his government, and his many warlike exploits during a reign of forty years, he tells them, "He cannot think of any other pretence for their impious attempt, excepting the breach of peace with the emperor of Germany, and the four last years success of the war: and yet that they themselves first persuaded him to that war; and that the Mufti, the head of their confederacy, by his fetvâh, pronounced the same just.—That instead of endeavouring to appease the divine wrath by fasting and prayer, which was their proper office, they had instigated the people to trample on his authority and the laws, of which they were the guardians." Then, after repeating the many concessions and sacrifices he had made to please the people, and procure peace, concluded, "That although he knew the people by their (the Ulema's) authority, were too deeply rooted and confirmed in their wicked design, yet he also knew that the righteous God would prove his avenger, and severely punish the corrupted people, for the injury then offered to him."

^p CANT. p. 343, & seq.

(D) Or more properly Nakîb Ashraf, the holy overseer, who is the keeper of the Sanjâki Sharîf, or the holy standard. He is the head of the Amîrs, or descendants of Fatemah, Mohammed's daughter, and alone hath power over the rest; for without his knowledge, the Soltân himself cannot so much as strike one of them. He is no way inferior in dignity to the Mufti himself: but because it would be dangerous to trust any man long with so much power, the Soltân often changes him, but cannot take away his salary. Cant.

(E) He is the prelate or the head of a temple; but the Shaykh of Sancta Sophia takes place of all other Shaykhs. Cant.

(F) Son of the great Ahmed Pâshâ, a man for holiness of life, integrity, prudence, and courage, famous above all the rest of the Turks. Cant.

THE

- a THE Nakib, unmoved with the Soltân's speech, uses still greater insolence towards him, and replies, without any sense of modesty; "That he was not sent by the people to hear his apology, but to command him, in the name of the whole Mussulman assembly, to quit the throne: that therefore if he was desirous to preserve his honour and life, he should, of his own accord, resign the government to his brother Soleymân: since, was he to oppose the will of the citizens, they would notwithstanding execute their resolutions." The Soltân hereupon, submitting to necessity, says to the messenger, "Since I see the divine indignation, stirred up by the sins of the Mussulmans, discharged on my head, go and tell my brother, that God's decree is declared by the mouth of the people, and he is appointed governor of the Ali Othmân empire." Soltân Mohammed, having spoken these words, on the third of Moharram 1099 (G), resigns the imperial scepter^a.

- b THE several steps taken in this great revolution, are more fully and accurately related by Rajeb Pâshâ the Turkish, than the Christian historians; from whom we shall only add two particulars farther, to shew the unaccountable vicissitudes, and miserable state, to which human greatness is liable. Upon Soleymân the Wazîr's flight to Constantinople, Rajeb, the Kaymakâm, a man of great abilities, who was his friend, suspecting that the friends of Ibrâhîm, the former Wazîr, fomented the sedition, he obtained an order to remove the Mufti (who the year before had been banished to Prusa) to the island of Rhodes; and another to take off the head of Ibrâhîm, who was imprisoned there. After this the soldiers, in their march towards the capital, beginning to talk of deposing Mohammed, Rajeb, apprehensive of the danger, applied to the Mufti for a Fetwa, to declare all those rebels and infidels, who would not obey the Soltân's commands. But this being refused, and the Kislar Aga insinuating to Soltân Mohammed, as if Rajeb was contriving how to make his peace with the army, it was agreed to send them his head along with Soleymân's, in order to make atonement for the lives of others. Pursuant to this resolution, the Bostânji Bâshi being sent to seize Rajeb, he very readily offered to go with him: but as that officer and his servants went down before him, he stopped short at the head of the stairs, and said, Aga, it would not be amiss if I should take some Chekîns with me into the prison; step in with me for them into my chamber: then, turning quick about, he entered into a room, and passing nimbly into another, through a sort of cupboard door, from thence by a pair of back-stairs, got into the garden, and made his escape by the postern. However, he was afterwards taken, and put to death.

- c MEAN time the Mufti, pursuant to the mandate obtained by Rajeb, was put on board a galley, whose Beg, or commander, being a friend to the Wazîr Ibrâhîm, endeavoured, during the voyage, to sound the Kâpiji Bâshi, whether he had any other order to execute at Rhodes; and this officer not owning that he had any, the Beg, as soon as he arrived there, went directly to Ibrâhîm, to assure him that he was in no danger: Not long after the Kâpiji Bâshi entered, and kissing Ibrâhîm's vest, sat down by him: after which, being asked what news, he said, all was well. Then he drank some coffee, and having smoked his pipe, drew a paper out of his bosom, and gave it to Ibrâhîm, who, on reading it, changed countenance; and happening to have a little child upon his knee, kissed it, with tears in his eyes, and said, What have I done? They seized all my estate; and, not being content therewith, have sent for my life. O treacherous world! This said, he was presently strangled^d.

SOLTÂN Mohammed lived after his deposition for five years, a thing very uncommon, Mohammed: closely confined in his apartment; departing the world in Jomaziô'lawel, 1104. He lived fifty-two, and reigned forty, years, five months and sixteen days. He left, by different wives, seven sons; two of whom, Mostafa and Abmed, were advanced to the empire; the rest died in their infancy.

- f HE was a prince eminent for justice and warlike abilities; of great clemency, and his reign very happy, excepting the last four years of it. There was but one fault which his enemies could reproach him with, and that is his immoderate love of hunting, in the latter years of his reign, to the neglect of state affairs. He is reported by some to have been poisoned by his brother Soltân Abmed, at the instigation of the Wazîr, Arabaji Ali Pâshâ, who having sought the death of certain great men, and meeting with a repulse from the Soltân, by Mohammed's advice, in revenge, suborned the Munejin Bâshi (H) to give out he had discovered by the stars, that Mohammed should depose his brother, and reascend the throne: which artifice the Wazîr made use of to irritate Abmed against him. But it is customary on the death of a Soltân to raise a report of his having been poisoned: besides it is well known that Mohammed, before his deposition, was continually troubled with the gout in both his hands and feet: this, added to the hypochondriac distemper occasioned by his confinement, at last exhausted all his vital spirits^e.

^a CANT. p. 346, & seq.

^d RICAUT, ubi supra.

^e CANT. p. 348, & seq.

(G) Which answers to Saturday the 29th of October 1687; and our historians place this event on the 28th.

(H) He is the chief astrologer, and third of the four officers in the inner Othmân court, who are reckoned ecclesiastics; the other three are, the Hojeh, or Soltân's preceptor; the Hakîm Effendi, or chief physician; and the Ferrah Bâshi, or chief surgeon. CANT.

C H A P. XXI.

The Reign of Soltân Soleymân II.

S E C T. I.

Troubles in the Othmân empire ; the siege of Belgrade ; and battle of Niffa.

A. D. 1687.

20 Soltân Soleymân II.

His timorous behaviour.

A new sedition.

The Wazîr's bravery.

WHEN the Bostânji Bâshi (A) brought Soleymân the news of his brother's deposition, and his own advancement to the Ali Othmân throne, that prince, contrary to every body's expectation, was extremely grieved at the message; "Why," says he, "in the name of the immortal God, do you endeavour to disturb my tranquility? Suffer me, I beseech you, to pass in quiet, in my cell, the few days I have to live; and let my brother rule the Othmân empire, for he was born to govern, but I to the study of eternal life." The Bostânji Bâshi, at first, is amazed at these words; but recovering himself, continues to press the prince; alleging, that the resolution of the Wazîrs, Ulema, nobles, and the whole people, could not be altered, nor Soltân Mohammed restored, without great detriment to the empire. Soleymân, still in suspense, replies, "That he owed too great a reverence to his brother to take possession of his throne, which he had quitted with reluctance: I would come forth, however," continues he, "but am afraid of my brother."

At last the Bostânji Bâshi, impatient of delay, says, "You must give way, most resplendent emperor, to the entreaties and wishes of the whole Mussulmân people;" and with these words, forces him, as it were, out of his chamber, and leads him to the room where the throne was usually placed. When he came there, he first, not without signs of fear, desires his conductor, and the door-keepers, "to take care, lest his brother should be within, since he dreaded to appear in his presence." Having been assured that his brother was removed to another apartment, he at length mounts the throne, and is saluted emperor by all the courtiers. But as soon as the ceremony was performed, he leaps down again, as from an impure place, and demands Abdest (B). This done, he defers returning to the throne; and when the courtiers press him to it, he puts his finger to his mouth, and enjoins them silence (C). At last, notwithstanding his reluctance, he is again seated there; and admits the Ulema and nobles to kiss his robe.

BEING thus advanced, he confirms the Wazîr, Siavus Pâshâ, and commands him to appease the sedition. On the Wazîr's return to his palace, the Bulûk Agalari (D) do him their reverence; but then demand their pay, and a new Bakhsîsh (E), which used to be given to the soldiers at the beginning of a new succession. Siavus Pâshâ, finding the treasuries empty, amuses the officers for some time with words, and then endeavours to separate the chief authors of the disturbances, under pretence of promoting them, in order to send them to remote cities. By this conduct the former hatred of the soldiers is revived against him, when assembled in the Orta Jâmî; they run through the streets, crying out, the Wazîr ought to be put to death, as an enemy to Soltân Soleymân, a deserter, and a violator of his promises.

PRESENTLY after they surround his palace, whither, on the first alarm of their meeting, he had retired with his officers; and on being denied admittance to speak to that minister, attempt to break open the gates: but Siavus Pâshâ repels them with the arms which he found by chance in the palace, and kills above twenty Janizaries. The soldiers, more enraged at this slaughter, rush with their whole force upon the gates, and break them open. Mean time the Wazîr shoots several with arrows from his chamber opposite to the gate, while his officers, about one hundred in number, prevent the rebels from ascending, and force them into the Diwân Khâneh (F). A bloody conflict hereupon ensues, wherein above one hundred and fifty of

(A) The chief of the gardeners.

(B) That is, water to wash his hands, head, and feet, as enjoined by the Korân before prayers.

(C) The Turks draw presages from the first words or actions of their Soltâns, of their future conduct. Cant.

(D) Commanders of the regiments of Janizaries, and the superior officers made from among them. Cant. Bulûk signifies a company of soldiers.

(E) A gift, or bounty bestowed out of kindness, by a new Soltân, to all the chosen troops then at Constantinople. It was first introduced by Soleymân Kanûni; and although it seems to encourage seditions, and has been the source of many rebellions, the Janizaries, for sake of the Bakhsîsh, having often joined with the Soltân's enemies; yet whoever considers the end and design of this law, can never sufficiently admire the divine prudence of the legislator, and his consummate knowledge in politics: for this was calculated to preserve the empire, and be a check to the tyranny and vices of his successors, as well as of his ministers, by being an encouragement to the soldiery to watch over the conduct of the Pâshâs, and reform the government when grown negligent or corrupt. Cant.

(F) That is, the house of judgment, or place where the people's complaints are heard. It is a large hall on the a of the conspirators are killed upon the stairs, and as many wounded. But at last, many of the Wazîr's party being slain, the rest fly to the top of the house, and throw themselves into the street. Upon this, Siavus Pâshâ retires again to his chamber, and in the door kills twelve Janizaries with his sword. At last, rather wearied with conquering than conquered himself, he is beaten down, and killed by the soldiers, who cut his body in pieces, and throw them into the street ^a. A. D. 1687.  He is slain.

RICAUT relates several matters which passed before the death of the Wazîr, not mentioned by our Turkish historians. According to him Sbaus Pâshâ made his entry into Constantinople, on the first day of November, with great solemnity, and presented the prophet's standard to the Soltân, who, moving three steps forward, took it from him, and gave it to Mostafa, the Seliktâr, or Silahdar: then receiving his brother's seal in the same manner, returned the Wazîr another with his own name upon it.

NOTWITHSTANDING this, the fury of the mutineers was not yet abated; for they committed several great men to prison, and had Rajeb Pâshâ strangled: altho' it was believed that the chief promoter of his death was the Wazîr, who envied him on account of his great abilities. They likewise turned out their Aga, and chose in his room the Seliktâr, a man but twenty five years old, who had formerly been a surgeon in the Saray, and of no experience in military affairs. Changes at court.

THIS, however, proved a merit in his character, as it made him the fitter to be governed by them: for now the Wazîr himself was forced to grant them all their demands, and approve in writing such methods as they judged proper for raising money; one of which was to tax the great officers belonging to the late Soltân, down to the astrologers and goldsmiths, most of whom were fined to the full of what they were worth. The next method of raising money was, by admitting to ransom those who were imprisoned. These sums, thus collected, being sufficient to discharge the arrears due to the soldiers, things grew calm for a time, so that, on the 17th of November, Soltân Soleyman went in the morning, by boat, to the Saray of Ayûb, where he was girt with the sword by the Nakîb Effendi; and, when the ceremonies were over, rode back through the city, but with no great pomp. Money projects.

AFTER this he began a reform at court, by lessening the number of hawks and hounds. He reduced that of his horses to one hundred; made one hundred and fifty of his pages Spahis, and changed the rest. The like was done in the court and chambers of the women: by which retrenchments eight thousand purses were saved yearly to the treasury. These proceedings greatly pleased the soldiers; but, the money falling short to pay them, it created new commotions. And now it was the Wazîr's turn to conjure up more, which he performed by the old method, in going over with the rich men once again. Among the rest the Kislar Aga, whom he began with, was forced to pay nine hundred purses, besides his effects to a great value, and then banished to Rhodes. But the money raised still falling short by two hundred purses, the sum was made up by coining the silver and gold taken from the horse furniture in the Soltân's stables. Civil list reduced.

AFTER this things became quiet for the space of two months, during which time the Soltân had thoughts of sending ambassadors to France, England, and Holland, to notify his advancement to the empire: but this uncustomary project was superseded by the preparations for war, and breaking out of new commotions. For the soldiers, assembling with more insolence than before, in a very rude manner demand of the Wazîr the removal of Kioprili, the Kaymaykâm, from his office, which was immediately done, and he sent to the castle of the *Dardanel*s, very glad to get safe out of their hands. At the same time several other officers were discharged, and such as the rebels nominated put in their room by the Wazîr; whom they also forced to renew his oath to stand by them. This done, he set up the horse-tail, as a signal of his march into the field, in order to divert them from their designs; and made Shabân Aga, his Kyehaya, Kaymaykâm, as a man he could trust in his absence to govern the city. But having nominated Zulfikar Effendi, a person obnoxious to the mutineers, to the post of Kyehaya, Tesfuji, the most able and active among them, came and told him, that if he made that man Kyehaya, he would kill him before his face. This affront the Wazîr dissembled, hoping they would soon render themselves odious to the people; as in fact they did, by taxing chimnies, giving orders for quartering soldiers, and raising money by extraordinary methods. The mutineers insult the Wazîr.

MEAN time the Wazîr, in concert with Kioprili, and the Janizar-Aga, procured a Khatti Sharif, importing, "That the grievances of the soldiers having been redressed, and all their Their ring-leader punished.

^a CANT. Hist. Othm. p. 350, & seqq.

second floor of the Wazîr's palace, open towards the stair-case; where people standing may hear what is doing above. The Wazîr sits opposite to the stairs, in an alcove made in the wall. He is obliged to administer justice there Fridays, Saturdays, Mondays, and Wednesdays. Thursday is a day of rest: the other two days are for the Soltân's divân. If hindered by business of state, which is rare, the Chausb Bâshî supplies his place. Cant.

A. D. 1688.

“just demands gratified, it was their duty to be obedient to the Soltân, as well as those officers set over them by his authority, and not to meddle with affairs relating to the government; and that whoever was refractory should be punished as a rebel.” This mandate being sent to the Aga of the Janizaries, he assembled the chief officers, and having read it to them, asked whether they would obey it or not? They answered, yes; for none but the common soldiers joined with the mutineers. But Tesfuji cried out, he is a villain who obeys that mandate. Whereupon he was, by the Aga’s order, carried into an inner room, and put to death. The Wazîr also sent to seal up his house, in order confiscate his estate; as he did by several others of the chief mutineers, whose persons he ought first to have secured.

The Wazîr’s
imprudence.

Soon after the Janizar-Aga, thinking by his own authority to disperse an assembly of the malecontents in the Okmeydân (G); he was no sooner espied by Haji Ali, an Armenian renegade, and a great friend to Tesfuji, but he came up to him, saying, You have murdered our companion, and endeavoured to sow dissension among us: then, striking him with his scymitar, he was immediately cut in pieces. After this the mutinous mob robbed the Tefterdâr’s house of a considerable sum of money, designed for paying the soldiers; and then assaulted the Wazîr’s house. But the Tefterdâr and captain Pâshâ being there, with some other friends well armed, the rabble were repulsed. At length the Wazîr, thinking to pacify the tumult, resigned up his office, which proved his ruin: for now, on the loss of his authority, all his friends forsaking him, the mutineers broke into his palace, and Haji Ali shot him with a pistol, while others wounded him mortally in the belly, after having fought courageously, and killed several with his own hand. He could not be prevailed on to withdraw, saying, that he could not live long, and therefore would not abandon his family to the fury of such miscreants^b.

The faction
quelled.

AFTER this, excited by a rage unheard of among Turks, they break into the womens apartments; and, cutting off the noses, hands, and feet, of the Wazîr’s wife (H) and sister, drag them naked through the streets; and commit other execrable crimes upon the slaves and female domestics (I). That minister’s family being thus destroyed, they rove like ravenous wolves through the city, and kill and plunder all they meet, as if partners with the Wazîr in his guilt. A dreadful face of things appears, and the whole city would have been ruined, if the Ulema, who were the first authors of the tumult, had not composed it: for, assembling at the imperial palace, they there display the Sanjâki Sharîf of Mohammed; and by their criers proclaim, That all Mussulmans, who would not be deemed infidels, should repair to that standard. The summons is obeyed, first by the citizens, and then by the Janizaries, who, that they might not appear rebels, presently lay down their arms, crying out, that they had taken them up not against the Soltân but his enemy the Wazîr, whom having punished, they were ready to do whatever the Soltân should think proper^c.

The manner
bore.

ACCORDING to Ricaud, this commotion was appeased after another manner. The tumult having now lasted three or four days, the rebels seemed to be absolute masters, for there were no officers alive who had any authority over them; when a small accident ruined their anarchy, after they had domineered for five months, killing and displacing the Pâshâs at pleasure. At this time four Janizaries having taken some embroidered handkerchiefs out of certain shops, the shop-keepers made a great clamour, and by the encouragement of an Amîr, all rose, fell on the plunderers, and killed two of them. Hereupon the Amîr, putting a piece of linen on a stick, and holding it up, cried out, Let all true Mussulmans repair to the Saray, and pray the Soltân to put forth the prophet’s standard, and destroy these rebels. Upon this the injured citizens crowded thither, which so encouraged Soleymân, that at noon the standard was erected, and the people, by proclamation, ordered to come and fight under it.

The rebels
punished.

THIS having brought an incredible number together under the walls of the palace, a Sheykh, or preacher, called to them thrice from thence; and asked, whether they were contented with the present emperor? they answered in the affirmative, with three great shouts: but said, they would have the Gyurbas, or ringleaders of the mutinous militia, destroyed. Thirteen of them were thereupon taken and cut to pieces, and the rest fled. The Mufti also was degraded for siding with them; and Tabâk Effendi, who had been deposed by the mutineers, restored

^b RICAUD, vol. iii. in Soleyman II.

^c CANT. ubi sup. p. 353.

(G) A field without the city, where they used to shoot with bows and arrows.

(H) She was daughter of the great and famous Wazîr Kioprili Ahmed Pâshâ, and sister of Kioprili Mustafa Pâshâ, who shortly after retook Belgrade. CANT.

(I) Ricaud does not mention this dragging through the streets. He says, that, although his wife, the daughter of old Kuperlec, gave them all her jewels, yet they treated her inhumanly, and wounded her; on which, it was reported, she miscarried and died: that his eldest daughter, not delivering her pendants soon enough, they cut off her ears with them: and that they sold a younger daughter, with a slave whom they carried away, for six dollars.

a to that dignity. The Nisanji Bâshi, an old man, was created Wazîr, and a young man, 666 A.D. 1682. page of the royal chamber, made Aga of the Janizaries. Other vacant places were supplied; and the next day all being quiet, as if no disturbances had happened, several Armenians and others, who, disguised like soldiers, mixed with the rioters to rob, were discovered and hanged. After this the plunderers were, by proclamation, pardoned, who, within three days, should restore the goods or money to the injured citizens; which had a surprising effect. So that this day might be called the first of the Soltân's reign, who began with suppressing taverns and smoking, in which he was so strict, that one day walking incognito, to see if his orders had any authority, he commanded two poor fellows to be executed for selling tobacco^d.

b BUT this calm did not last long; for a few days after Soleyman having ordered the new Wazîr, Koja Ismael Pâshâ, to seize privately the leaders of the rebellion, and put them to death (K); the Janizaries again take arms, and threaten destruction to both. The Soltân, to prevent the storm falling on his head, by the advice of Kioprili Mostafa Pâshâ (L), throws the whole blame upon the Wazîr (M); spreading a report, that he had acted therein without the Soltân's knowledge; and, to give it the better gloss, banishes him to Rhodes; appointing Tekkiur Dâghi Mostafa Pâshâ in his room.

c THE flames from the capital spread into the provinces. In Rûm-ili Egben Ozman Pâshâ (N) R. Bellier: assembles a considerable body of Spahis, and engages them to demand of the Wazîr the Bakhshish Julus (O), due to them on Soleyman's advancement to the empire. On the Wazîr's pleading inability for the present, they levy the money on the inhabitants of the country, and plunder all Bulgaria, as far as Sophia. In Asia, Gyeduc Pâshâ moves his troops to sedition; and being joined to several thousand banditti, threatens to attack Constantinople itself. Having plundered and subdued all the provinces of the Anadol Beglerbeglik, he marches his army to Isnid Gyebrid (P), and prepares to besiege Krisopolis (or Skutari), thinking the Janizaries were too busily employed to mind him; but they, laying aside their rage the night before the city was to be attacked, pass over and surround it with trenches, on which the Pâshâ retires, and is soon after defeated by the Othman army.

d WHILE the Turkish empire is thus shaken by intestine commotions, the imperial army subdues the most considerable bulwarks of Hungary. Agria, the strongest fortress of Upper Hungary, after four months close siege, is obliged by famine to surrender, on the 20th of Moharram 1099 (Q). The same fate befalls Mongatz, an almost impregnable castle in the same country, fortified by Tekeli, and made the repository of his wife, treasures, and records. After he was seized as before related, and Kassovia lost, his princess, the heroine of the age, assembled there what forces she could, and stored the place with plenty of provision; in hopes to defend it till the war should be finished, or the Turkish army march to her relief. But those forces being withdrawn from the neighbourhood, count Terci, in the year 1098, attempted to take the castle; but after assailing it for several months with cannon and bombs to no purpose, he blocked it up at a distance, and cut off all provision, to such a degree, that the princess Tekeli, conquered rather by famine than the enemy's sword, on the 14th of Rabi'ulawel, 1099 (R), surrendered both herself and castle to the emperor's mercy^e.

e THIS surrender having been made before the instructions which her husband had sent to her on that head came to her hands, he was so incensed, that he destroyed all the places he came at, as far as Peterwaradin, and then fortified himself with some thousand followers in the village of Theleigh, near that city. But general Heussler, on the 6th of February, fell upon him

^d RICAUT, ubi sup.

^e CANT. p. 353, & seqq. RICAUT.

(K) Ricaut says, above 1000 of the Gyurbas, or ringleaders servants, were thrown into the sea one night after another: but speaks of no new commotion thereupon.

(L) According to Ricaut, he was, at this time, removed from the prison of the Dardinels to that of Rhodes.

(M) When troubles arise, this is the only shield which the Soltâns have to defend themselves; and, by sacrificing the Wazîr, they are sure to secure their own safety. It is thought Mohammed IV. would not have been deposed, had he given up Aynesi Soleyman Pâshâ, when first applied to. So that, although the almost unlimited power which the Soltân gives the Wazîr might be dangerous in other states; yet it is the chief, if not only, support of the Othman empire; since the Soltân can, when he pleases, cut off the Wazîr, who will never depose the Soltân, because he must lose by a change; nor can ever hope to usurp the crown; because the Turks have so great a veneration for the Othman race.—Cant.

(N) A man noted for his robberies in Asia. His followers were reckoned the stoutest men in that quarter. He threatened to destroy Iskinder, and even the royal city. At last, being pardoned, he brought with him above 1000 freebooters against the Germans; but was put to death as soon as he came to Constantinople. Cant. Prince Cantemir seems to confound Egben with Gyeduc, if Iskinder be a mistake for Iskudar (or Skutari). Ricaut calls him Yeghen; and makes both him and Gyeduc, whom he names Tedik, generals in Hungary.

(O) Called also Julus Akcheshi, that is, the money of the new, or the renewed empire. The nature of the Bakhshish is explained a few notes before. Cant.

(P) That is, the passage of Izmîd. So is the gulf of Nikomedie called. Cant.

(Q) That is, the 16th of November 1687; but Ricaut puts it on December 16, and says, it surrendered at discretion upon the news of the battle of Mohatz.

(R) January 6th, 1688.

A. D. 1688. in his trenches with such fury, that he was put to flight, leaving six hundred of his men slain, and four hundred taken prisoners; among whom was Genay, the chief commander next to himself^a.

Other commotions seasonably prevented.

THE common people and soldiers at Constantinople, were in hopes that, on the advancement of Soleymân, a prince, as they imagined, of great sanctity, the divine wrath would be appeased, and the enemy repelled. But when, on the news of those misfortunes, they find themselves deceived, they throw satirical libels, both in prose and verse, into the Jâmi and Divân, reproaching not only the Wazîr and other nobles, but the Soltân himself, with negligence and other faults (S). The minister, to obviate farther mischief, orders a guard to pass night and day through the city, prevents nocturnal assemblies, and seizes some persons who talked too freely; but, not to add oil to the flames, dismisses without punishing them (T). At last, b the Soltân's natural timorousness produces a better remedy than courage could have done: for, under pretence of changing the air, he withdraws from the seditious, by removing with his court to Adrianople. The people indeed seemed to have reason to complain of the ill administration of affairs; but did not impute it to the proper persons. How much the treasury was exhausted, and to how great a necessity that opulent empire was reduced, appeared on this occasion: for there was not in the imperial stables a number of horses, mules, and camels, sufficient for the courtiers; nor money enough in the treasury to pay for the hire of what were wanting: so that he ordered the gold and silver vessels, with his jewels, to be publicly sold, in order to supply his necessities. At length, departing on hired horses and chariots, he prevents the sedition just ready to break out.

Turks sue for
peace.

WHEN he arrives at Adrianople, he pretends to apply himself to the care of the war; but, as his devotions were more agreeable to him, he sent Zuo'lfikar Effendi (U), clerk of the Janizaries, and Alexander Maurokordatus (W), interpreter to the Divân, ambassadors to the emperor of Germany: under pretence of informing him of his election (X); but, in reality, to settle a peace upon what terms they could procure^c.

Transilvania
revolts.

THE Turks, brought to this extremity, dispatch an Aga to Apafi prince of Transilvania, with a patent to confirm him in his principality, and orders to demand a considerable sum of money, to pay the garrisons on the Boristhenes (or Nieper); which the declining state of the empire, he said, obliged the Porte to exact: at the same time threatening him with a Tatar d incursion, in case he did not comply with the demand. General Caraffa, being informed of this affair, immediately hastes thither; and so well disposed Apafi, and the states, then met at Hermanstadt, that, rejecting the Aga's proposal, and despising his threats, they, on the 9th of May, 1688, absolutely renounce all obedience to the Othmân Porte; and confirm the treaty made with the duke of Lorrain. Hereby they put themselves under the emperor's protection, and receive his forces into their garrison places (Y), on condition that their privileges, and the exercise of their religion, should be confirmed to them^d.

Alba Regalis
surrenders.

THE Wazîr Tekkiur Dâghi (Z) Mostafa Pâshâ, either through fear of the Germans, or lest the Soltân, in his absence, should be persuaded to put him to death, declines the command of the army, and appoints Rajeb Pâsha Seraskier of Hungary. But before the Othmân forces e took the field, the garrison of Alba Regalis, which had been blocked up all winter by the Imperialists, surrendered (A) on the 19th of Rajeb. May 8, 1688, Caraffa had taken the

^f RICAUT.

^g CANT. p. 355, & seqq. & RICAUT.

^h RICAUT, ubi sup.

(S) Ricaut informs us, that the libels reflected on the Soltân's intention to remove; and that they petitioned the Wazîr to dissuade him.

(T) According to the same author, he seized all the conspirators in their houses, on the eve before the plot was to be executed; and punished them as their crime deserved. Many officers were displaced; and 50 persons, mostly Janizaries, were cut off. But Yeghen thought to be the ringleader, was too great to be meddled with. At last, 2500 purses, the estates of two Kislar Agas who were put to death, coming in seasonably to pay the soldiers arrears, the Soltân removed to Adrianople in July.

(U) Yengbicheri Effendis, a post of great profit; he was in great account at court for his learning.—Cant.

(W) Grandson of Skarlatos, vulgarly Skarlotti, who was Sorguj, or purveyor to the court for sheep and oxen, in the reign of Morad IV. His father, Pantelis Maurokordatus, married Loxandra, daughter of Skarlatos, who, disfigured by the small-pox, was very rich, and fell in love with him. Alexander first practised as a physician; and then, for his skill in the oriental languages, was made Bâsh Turjemân, on the death of the famous Panayotti. He experienced various turns of fortune at that ticklish court, yet died immensely rich. In 1709, his son Nikholas thereupon was made prince of Moldavia, then despot of Walakkia, and his brother John chief interpreter. Cant.

(X) And of renewing the antient amity which his predecessor had violated: for the Turks thought it below the dignity of the empire to sue for peace in plainer terms. Ricaut.

(Y) Cronstadt, or Stephanopolis, after this, rejecting their allegiance, and refusing to admit a German garrison, was forced to yield at discretion, by Velerani, appointed general of that province by count Caraffa. Ricaut.

(Z) So Rodofus, of which he was a native, is called by the Turks. He was raised from a Janizary to the dignity of Wazîr: but did nothing remarkable. Cant.

(A) On the 19th of May 8000 Turks marched out, of whom 300 were soldiers. Ricaut.

a city of Lippa by storm, and the castle yielded in a few days (B). Soon after he reduced Solmoz and Logosb, or Lagos. That general, who commanded the imperial army in the elector of Bavaria's absence, after he had taken Illok and Peterwaradin from the Turks (C), sent Wallis and Heusler to seize (D) Tiral, a castle on the river Tibiskus (or Teisse); which being vigorously pressed, the garrison surrendered on the 28th of Ramazân, with leave to departⁱ.

MEAN time Yeghen Bey was on his march to oppose the elector of Bavaria, who com- Eghen Pâshâ, manded the imperial army, the duke of Lorrain being then sick; and designed to besiege Belgrade; but, before he reached that city, he returned to Sofia, declaring it impossible for him to keep such numerous forces in obedience, unless he had the seal and the prophet's b standard. However, on news of the enemy's approach, he marched back to Belgrade, where all the forces in those parts submitted to his command, as general of Hungary. After this he seized on Hassan Pâshâ, on account of an old quarrel, and would have strangled him, but for the son of the Hân (or Khân) of Tartâry. Then with ten thousand men joined to Tekeli's troops, he resolved to pass the Save, and encamp at Semlin, on the other side; but, upon information that prince Lewis of Baden, in conjunction with Caprara, was marched towards Illok, they changed their resolution, and sent letters by two peasants to the imperial generals at Essek, to intercede with the emperor for peace. But the messengers appearing more like spies than ambassadors, were imprisoned, and no notice taken of what they came about. Soon after which they seized Illok as before-mentioned.

c IN the interim, prince Lewis of Baden arriving at Posséga, capital of Sclavonia, was perplexed The Turks de- how to pass the Save at Proot, since its banks were guarded by two thousand Turks; but feated. Hofskirkin and Serini, passing the river in barges with five hundred Heyduks and three hundred dragoons, routed the enemy, and killed two hundred. Then, more troops ferrying over, they fortified the place. Three days after Topal Pâshâ, joined by two others, arrives with eight thousand Turks, and at midnight attacks the Germans; who, though but thirteen hundred in all, repulse them with vigour. In a second assault they kill five hundred; and then, being reinforced, rally on the Turks, and beat them out of their trenches, killing seven hundred more, and taking their baggage: after which they set fire to the place, and abandon it.

d THE elector of Bavaria being arrived at the Save, was informed that the Othmân army, consisting of twenty-five thousand men, lay intrenched on the other side of that river, with a design to obstruct his passage. Tekeli also was posted with a strong body, in order to receive them at their landing. It was therefore agreed to alarm the Turks that night in divers places, whilst the generals Serini, Strium, and Aspremont, should endeavour to pass at some distance off, with six thousand men. This was effected without any opposition; but at day-break they were attacked by eight thousand Janizaries, of whom six hundred were cut off. During this engagement, which lasted two hours, a bridge was thrown across the river, and the whole army crossed the same day. After gaining this difficult point, the Turks quitted their trenches and fled; while the elector marched towards Belgrade, which was e three days distant^k. Here let us return to the Turkish authors.

THE way being opened to Belgrade by the taking of Tiral (Titul), the elector of Bavaria Belgrade be- directs his course thither with the army; and having repulsed the Turks, who, at the isle of Sabats, opposed his passage over the Save, proceeds to attack the Seraskier, who had encamped round that city: but that general, not caring to wait his approach, set fire to his camp and the lower part of the city, and retired to Semendria. The Germans arriving, lay siege to Belgrade on all sides; and, having demolished the walls, on the 11th of Zio'lkaadeb (or August 26th), give a general assault. After a sharp battle of six hours, the Turks are driven from the walls, and retreat to the castle; but with so little circumspection, that the Germans mixing with them, seize the gate, where a fiercer battle than the former ensues; in which it f is said the whole garrison, consisting of nine thousand men, were put to the sword^l.

It may be proper to enlarge from our own historians, upon the siege of this important Breaches fortress. On the duke of Bavaria's approach, the inhabitants embarked, with all their move- made. ables, for different places along the Danube; yet many were killed and taken in their flight. When they were gone, the garrison set fire to the suburbs; where the army, on their arrival, got a very considerable booty. Having finished their trenches and other works, on the 25th of August, they began from three batteries to play on the castle, with twenty-six pieces of cannon,

ⁱ CANT. p. 358.^k RICAUT, ubi sup.^l CANT. p. 358, & seqq.

(B) In storming the town 500 Turks were killed, and 2000 able to bear arms, made slaves out of the castle. But the women and children were set at liberty. Ricaut.

(C) According to Ricaut, the garrisons of those two cities, on the approach of Caprara, set fire to them, and fled to Belgrade.

(D) A mistake, perhaps, for Titul.

A. D. 1683. besides fifteen mortars. Mean time the garrison, though but three thousand men, made several vigorous sallies, being encouraged by their commander Ibrâhîm Pâshâ, with a promised relief from Ozmân, Pâshâ of Halep, who, with twenty-five thousand men, was then encamped at Nissa, while Yeghen (E), retired to Sofia with his horse, for the foot had deserted him, consumed the forage round the country. After this two other batteries were erected; yet the garrison made a stout resistance, and did great execution with their artificial fire, as well as great shot and bombs; one of which blew up a large magazine of powder.

A general assault in four places.

THE duke of Lorrain, being recovered, came to the camp, but left the whole conduct of the siege to the duke of Bavaria, who, on the 6th of September, gave a general assault in four quarters at once. The elector himself commanded in the front; the prince de Commercy on the right; general Heusler on the left; and Pini, serjeant-major of the regiment of Lorrain, in the quarter near the water. The assailants entered the ditch with much bravery, through showers of bullets, and made themselves masters of the breach. From the top hereof they were dismayed with the sight of another more difficult ditch, well palliaded on the further side, as well as with the loss of their leader count Schaffenberg; also the counts Emanuel of Fustenberg, and Henric of Staremburg, with many others who were slain at the beginning of the danger. In effect, the Germans began to give ground a little, and the advantage must have been lost, had not the brave elector exposed himself on the breach, and threatened death to any who offered to retire. The soldiers awed, and animated by the example of their general, descend the second ditch, and mount to the pallisades with such surprising boldness, that the Turks fled; and, crowding into the castle, separated from the town only by a bridge, hung out a white flag; but some of the most desperate assailants got in after them, and put all to the sword.

The city taken.

THEY entered with the like success in the other quarters; though in that of Commercy one hundred dragoons were cut off, and general Heusler had his thumb carried away with a musket ball: for all this he boldly with his soldiers, in spite of the enemy's fire, scaled the walls, and made himself master of an iron gate, by which they got into the town; where the Germans were insatiable in their slaughter, putting all to the sword without distinction. They had also spilt the blood of the Pâshâ, the Aga of the Janizaries, and other officers, retired into a small trench behind the castle, if the elector's clemency had not interposed ^m.

Success in Bosnia.

AFTER Belgrade was reduced, the Turkish ambassadors arrived in the imperial camp; and declared, that they came to settle a peace, as well as to notify the election of Soltân Soleyman: but the elector told him, he was sent only to conquer Servia and Bulgaria (F); and that, if they had any thing to propose to the emperor, they must proceed to Vienna.

THE prince of Baden had no less success in Bosnia; for, having defeated a considerable body of Turks, who opposed his passage of the river Unna, he pursued them so briskly, that they abandoned Gradiska and Kostaniza. After this, on the 10th of Zio'lkaadeh (or August 15), he was met at the little city of Brod, by the Pâshâ of that province, with the whole army, whom he routed and slew with five thousand of his men ⁿ.

The Pâshâ defeated.

THERE is but a very imperfect account of the affairs of Bosnia, as related by the Christian historians. According to them, prince Lewis, setting out from Possessa, where we left him, passed the Save September the 3d, and marched, upon a false information of the numbers of the enemy, to attack Topal, Pâshâ of Bosnia, who was encamped with fifteen thousand men under Tervat, or Terwent, near the river Okraina, about six miles from Prout. Altho' the prince had not above three thousand horse and three hundred Kroats, yet they repulsed the enemy three times; and then coming so close, that not having time to recharge their fire-arms, they fell on with their swords. On this occasion they performed such wonders, that, forcing the horse to abandon the foot, they slew five thousand on the spot, among whom was the Pâshâ, two Agas, and his Kyebaya, besides two hundred drowned: the rest submitted. In this surprising action the Imperialists lost no more than one hundred and fifty men.

The Rascians submit.

THUS ended the campaign in Hungary; after which the elector of Bavaria was recalled to defend his own territories, threatened by the king of France: who was incensed at the choice made of prince Joseph Clement of Bavaria, to be elector of Cologne, in prejudice of cardinal Furstemberg, whose interest he resolved to support by force of arms. The command of the imperial army by this means devolved on mareschal Caprara, who marched from Belgrade,

^m RICAUT, ubi supra.

ⁿ CANT. p. 359.

(E) As the Turkish historians may be presumed to be right in the names of their generals, Ricaut must have mistaken Yeghen for Rijeb, the Seraskier; and Yeghen, if at all concerned in the war in this part, seems to have been Ozmân Pâshâ, mentioned just before; for he is called by the Turks, Eghen Ozmân Pâshâ.

(F) According to Ricaut, Zulfikar, the ambassador, was invited to the camp by the elector, in order to hear his proposals; and also to a great feast made the 8th of September, on occasion of his success.

a and took possession of Semendria, the capital of Servia (G), and Poskarowert, a small town, both abandoned by the Turks. These successes induced the Rascians to submit to the emperor; and, having made up a body of twenty thousand men, they surprised Waalva and Zolkolova, both on the Drina; killed a thousand Turks, and routed the rest. Mean time twelve thousand of the enemy, most of them rabble, waste and plunder the country about the Morava; but were soon dispersed by general Heusler: while the inhabitants of those parts, provoked by their insolence, took up arms, and seizing on the city of Uziga, killed five hundred Turks, and made two thousand prisoners. A. D. 1688.

b By this time prince Lewis of Baden, having fortified Prout and Gradiska, marched towards Bosnia subaudi Bertzka, the only place unsubdued in Bosnia, on whose approach the Turks abandoned the town. Prince Lewis having, in about nine weeks, reduced that whole province, was called home to resist the French; and left Picolomini to oppose the Pâshâ of Bosnia, who was raising forces in those parts. ed.

ABOUT this time Tekeli, reinforced with a party of Turks and Tatars, ravaged the borders of Walakbia and Transilvania: but on the approach of four thousand Rascians hastily retreated; and endeavoured by letter to draw over the Transilvanians, telling them they must by that time have experienced the insolence of the Germans; and that now was the juncture to redeem themselves and posterity from the barbarous slavery they lay under.^o Tekeli retreats.

c MEAN time the Venetians carry on the war in other parts with more variable fortune. In the Morea the Seraskier is before them in the field, and obliges the garrison of Athens to abandon the city with great loss. Their army soon after march to Egribuz (or Negropont); and, passing the narrow sea, which divides the island from the continent, lay close siege to the city; but are obliged, by the disagreement of their own officers, and bravery of the besieged, to retreat with loss. On which the valiant general count Koningsmark, to whom the Venetians owe almost all the victories gained in the Morea, fell sick and died.^p Venetian success.

d BUT neither of these assertions is fact, if we may depend on the Christian historians, who are very particular in their account of this unfortunate siege. According to them the captain-general Francisco Morosini, newly elected Doge of Venice, resolving to besiege Negropont (H), set sail with the fleet; and the 14th of July landed eight thousand foot and five hundred horse. The city was garrisoned by six thousand men, and its walls, lined with earth, well fortified on all sides with bastions, forts, mines, and cannon; on the right hand of the bridge the Turks had raised a battery, and pitched their tents along the side of the aqueducts; and on the left hand had formed a line of communication between the suburbs and a hill, which had a battery commanding the sea, where Mostafa Pâshâ, one of the governors, was posted; the other, called Ibrâhîm Pâshâ, defended the outworks. There were besides, divers other trenches in different forms, strengthened with palisades, and a deep ditch thirty paces long, reaching to the gate of the city, and covered with a hornwork. Below the mills was another battery of three pieces of great cannon, which commanded the shore. Every work had some soldiers to defend it, especially French, who were skilled in throwing bombs and other fireworks. As a farther strengthening, the Seraskier of the Morea lay six miles off with four thousand men. Negropont besieged.

e THE Venetians made their approaches with little obstruction from the besieged; and, on the 30th, began to batter the town. One of the bombs fell into the Pâshâ's palace, and put things there into great confusion; while the excessive heats, producing malignant fevers in the camp, killed many of the officers as well as soldiers, and made others retire to the fleet; among whom was the brave general Koningsmark, who died the 15th of September following. The Turks defeated.

THE Turks, finding the Venetians to be in these bad circumstances, incommoded them with sallies. On the 16th of August they attacked the Maltese trenches, but were repulsed, and had the fort near the mills taken from them, yet recovered it the next day. This made the Doge, on the 20th, attack the enemies trenches, which extended three miles from the hill to the sea, and effectually covered the soldiers. The marquis of Corbon, with his cavalry, was

^o RICAUT, ubi supra.

^p CANT. p. 359.

(G) The Turks say, the elector, being informed the Othmâns had abandoned that capital, sent 1000 men during the siege to take possession. But, in this case, the Christian writers may be presumed to know best.

(H) It was antiently called Khalcis, and is seated on the famous Eurippus, or Narrow Channel, between the isle and Greece, which ebbs and flows, at certain seasons, many times in twenty-four hours. The city stands at the narrowest part of the chanel (which is there covered with a bridge), and is two miles round; but the suburbs much more large and populous, separated from the town by a deep ditch. The Greeks call it Egripus, a corruption of Eurippus, as Negropont is of it. The inhabitants might amount in all to 15,000 people. It is the residence of the captain Pâshâ, or Turkish high admiral. On a point of land towards the Eurippus is a castle called Karababa, or Black Father.

A. D. 1688

~~~~~

the first who broke in upon the enemy, and opened a way for the foot to come to handy- a blows ; where for two hours the event was doubtful, for the Venetians were repulsed twice or thrice in some places. But at length the enemies horse retired in great confusion, leaving their infantry to the mercy of the besiegers, who pursued them to the very gates of Negropont, with great slaughter, and mastered the suburbs. In this action a thousand Turks were killed, and as many wounded, among whom were the Seraskier's son, and Mostafa Pâshâ. On the Venetian side, two hundred were slain ; and among others, the prince of Wirtemberg mortally wounded.

A bold attempt.

SEPTEMBER the 5th five hundred Turks falling on the quarter of the Sclavonians, beat them out of their trenches, but they recovered them again ; and a breach being made in the tower on the sea-side, at the end of the ditch, engineer Romagnat offered, with fifty men, to b mount the same, although but narrow, and void of any cover from the enemy's shot. The Doge landed to be a spectator of this enterprize ; which on the 8th was executed with so much valour, that they gained the breach : but being very narrow, as well as without cover, and the descent into the town very steep, they were forced to quit it again, with the loss of six or eight men. About the same time, count Waldek and colonel Piltz, advancing with their regiments, one to the brink of the ditch, the other to the foot of the tower, were both cut off, with seven captains, and two hundred men.

A bonnet
taken.

HOWEVER the Venetians, nothing discouraged, raised new batteries beyond the water ; from whence they made a breach in the other tower, and battered the curtain between the c two. But the season being now far spent, and the sickness increasing, there seemed to be little hopes this year of taking the city, which was continually supplied from the camp with men and provisions. For all this, the Doge would not give up the enterprize ; and leaving no means untried to reduce the place, ordered a traverse to be made over the ditch, which was thirty paces wide, to convey the forces under the wall. But this design proved more difficult than was expected, by the violent current of the water, and the labourers being greatly exposed to the small shot of the enemy, who now raised a work in the false bray, to obstruct the progress of the traverse. However they were driven out of this work by the besiegers, who took a small bonnet by the way. Yet the Turks recovered it, though they soon lost it again to the Venetians, who fortified and secured it by a new battery and line of communication. d

General of-fault.

FOR all this the Venetian forces daily diminished by diseases and the sword ; the gallies of Malta and Tuscany now left them also ; yet, far from abandoning the siege, they resolved on a general assault, which was deemed practicable ; and, on the 12th of October, began it about ten in the morning, with eight thousand men, in four several places ; but the besieged poured such volleys of small shot upon the troops appointed to storm the breach, that, after many officers and soldiers were killed, they sounded a retreat, not being supported by those who were to have assisted them. No better success attended the other attacks. In one place they found the entrance into the town obstructed by a very steep descent ; in another, the town being inaccessible without, they stood in the ditch up to the middle in water, exposed to the enemy's shot. The attack lasted for several hours, in which they lost above a thousand men, e and divers officers. The gallies also suffered much on this occasion.

The siege raised.

It was now found impracticable, from the decrease of their troops, to make another attack. But to avoid the shame of quitting the siege, after consuming all the summer before the place, it was proposed in council to continue there all winter : but the foreign troops declaring they would not stay, the siege was raised, with the loss of many in getting away <sup>a</sup>.

Wine taken.

THUS ended the unfortunate siege of Negropont. On the other hand, the Venetians had better success in Dalmatia ; where Kain (I), of which Steaglik (K), the deposed Sofâ of Bosnia, was governor, with several thousand soldiers, was by them taken ; besides the castles of Verlikka, Quonigrad, and Grassach<sup>r</sup>. On the 17th of August, Klin was invested by the procurator Giro- f lamo Cornaro ; and a breach being made in the outer wall, the Venetians became masters of it by the 2d of September, the besieged retiring within the second. By the 4th several new batteries were raised, and the defendants magazine of powder was blown up by a bomb : for all this they maintained the castle and lower town with great resolution. At length the regiments of Corbon and Sebenica being ordered to cross a water, which was all the defence the town had on that side, the soldiers swam over with their swords in their mouths, while the Turks retired from their intrenchment into the castle. The besiegers, thus left in possession of it, presently cut off

<sup>a</sup> RICAUT, ubi sup.

<sup>r</sup> CANT. ubi supr.

(I) Doubtless a mistake for Klin, the Alif being very like the Lam in the Arabic characters.

(K) Ricaut calls him Atlagik.

a the pipes, and destroyed the aqueducts which conveyed water to the castle. Hereupon the A. D. 1688. Pâshâ, on the 12th of September, surrendered at mercy.

AFTER this general Cornaro, having a design upon Narento, an antient port, where formerly Narim de- commodities arrived from Thrace, Servia, Bosnia, and other parts, sailed with his forces to the town of Narim, built three years before at the mouth of the harbour. There landing some troops, and battering the place from a galley, the garrison fled, most of whom were killed, and the rest taken by the Morlûks, who afterwards ravaged the country, and returned with great plunder<sup>s</sup>.

IN the interim the Turkish ambassadors were come to Vienna, and being introduced to the emperor Leopold, in the name of the Soltân, presented the letters Julus Nameh (L), informing him of Soleymân's election; but made no mention of peace, in hopes the Germans would first propose it, and so render the negotiation more easy. When they find themselves baulked in their expectation, they offer to his imperial majesty his choice of a short truce or a peace: that in case he desired the former, all Hungary should continue in his hands; Transilvania be tributary to both empires; Kameniek dismantled be restored to the Poles; and Belgrade to the Turks: but if a peace was more agreeable, some part of Hungary, with Belgrade, should be restored to the Othmân empire.

LEOPOLD, having consulted with the ambassadors of the other confederate powers, returns this answer: That although, from the present state of things, he had great hopes not only of recovering the rest of Hungary, but also of subduing the whole Turkish empire, yet he was ready to agree to a peace, provided the kingdom of Hungary, with the provinces belonging thereto, Sclavonia, Kroatia, Bosnia, Servia, Bulgaria, and Transilvania, should be resigned to him; Moldavia and Walakhia remain free; the exercise of the Romish religion permitted throughout the Turkish empire; the Franciscan friars put in possession of the holy sepulchre at Jerusalem, and Tekeli delivered up to him. The Poles demanded, that the antient boundaries of their kingdom should be restored; and all Krîm Tartary, Moldavia, Walakhia, and the whole country extending on both sides of the Borysthenes as far as the Danube, resigned to them. And to shew themselves greater friends to religion than the other confederates, they insisted, that all the Christians, who lived under the Othmân government, should be free from tribute. Lastly, the Venetians, besides the Morea, the several isles and cities elsewhere already in their possession, demand the sea-coast of Negropont, from Korcyra to Korinth; and part of Dalmatia, with the demolition of the havens of Dulcigno and Antivari.

THE ambassadors immediately inform Soleymân of the answer they had received; and undoubtedly the peace would have been settled, had not the most Christian king, jealous of the great advantages which the Germans had gained against the Othmân empire, proclaimed war, without any just cause, against Leopold; advising the Soltân, by his ambassador Chateau-neuf, not to make peace with the emperor (M), since he would the next year penetrate into the heart of Germany; and had actually four hundred thousand men ready for that expedition. He adds, that if the event should answer his wishes, he would reserve to himself all Germany, with Vienna its capital; but restore Hungary to the Soltân. These encouraging promises reviving the spirits of the Turks, Soleymân neglects his ambassadors (N), whom he sent to sue for peace, and thinks of nothing but war.

HE first applies himself to settle affairs at home, and as soon as the Germans were retired to winter-quarters, sends the greater part of his forces against Eghen Ozmân Pâshâ, and Gyedûk Pâshâ, who had almost the whole year disturbed the Othmân empire; which was freed from this danger by their taking the two rebels prisoners<sup>t</sup>.

ACCORDING to Ricaut, Yeghen Pâshâ, after his flight from Belgrade, quarrelled with Norad-dîn Gâlgû, son of the Khân of Tartary; who thereupon calling him coward, and saying he was fitter to command thieves than soldiers, Yeghen ordered him to be strangled before several Tatar lords. On complaint of this outrage at the Othmân court, the Wazîr endeavoured to palliate the matter in favour of Yeghen, who, when he was Janizar Aga, had saved his life in a mutiny. But the Khân himself arriving at Adrianople, to consult about the operations of the ensuing campaign, so warmly urged the affair, that Yeghen was by the Divân sentenced to be put to death. On this news he flew into open rebellion, wrote to his old master Yedîk to do the like in Asia, and plundered the country. But the Pâshâ of Sofia being

* RICAUT, ubi sup.

† CANT. p. 359. See also RICAUT.

(L) Or more properly Namci Julusi Humarûn, that is, The letters of the most sublime new dominion: so are stiled the Soltân's letters which he sends to all Pâshâs, and to the neighbouring princes with whom he is at peace, to notify his accession to the throne. Cant.

(M) Likewise by transmitting vast sums into Poland he so far corrupted the avaritious king, that, though he did not quit the alliance, yet he usually took care to come no sooner into the field than it was time to leave it. Ricaut.

(N) Ricaut says, that the ambassadors having proposed to Leopold the quiet possession of all he had conquered, the emperor, by what fatality our author knew not, not only rejected this, but, contrary to the custom of nations, imprisoned them in the castle of Puffendorf, near Vienna, for some years.

A. D. 1688.  ordered to take him dead or alive, he fled into Albania, to his old friend Mahmud Bey a Ogli; who, having been before gained by the Porte, cut off his head, and sent it to the Soltân.

Gyedük's
success.

MEAN time the followers of Yedik (or Gyedük) increasing in Asia, the ministry, to pacify them, promised to employ them in the Hungarian war, and make Yeghen their general. But as soon as news was brought of that rebel's death, the mind of the Porte altered; and orders were sent to the Kaymakâm, not only to prevent the Asiatics from passing into Europe, but also to destroy them in their own country. Accordingly he attacked and defeated a large party of them near Skutari. Yet this did not discourage Yedik, who, with six thousand men, marched towards Prusa; and having defeated the Pâshâ of that place, with the Nesirân, or militia, caused himself to be proclaimed king of Anatolia. After this he laid siege to Angora b (Enguri, or Ancyra) which was forced to redeem itself by the payment of eighty purses, each containing five hundred dollars.

He is slain.

HEREUPON the Turkish court returned to their old method of fair promises, assuring Yedik and his accomplices both of pardon and reward, in case they would return to their duty. But this had no effect; for under pretence of zeal for religion, which they alleged was corrupted by the then governors, they summoned all the inhabitants of Anatolia to defend the same. At length the Beglerbeg of that province being honoured with the title of Testish, or inquisitor, first exposed to the people the perfidious designs of Yedik against the faith; and then, with six thousand choice men, attacked his camp with such success, that he gained a complete victory. Most of the commanders were either slain (among whom was Yedik), or taken; and the c men who survived the battle, suffered to return to their respective homes. In the mean time, Rajeb Pâshâ was made Seraskier, in the room of Yeghen, whose nephew, with forty of his followers, and the governor of Widdin, put in by Yeghen, being taken, were put to death <sup>u</sup>.

Affairs of the Morca.

THE domestic enemies being suppressed, the Soltân is more at liberty to prepare against the foreign. And first, in order to secure the southern provinces against the Venetian arms, he sets free Liberius Gheralkbari (N), who had been confined in the galleys; and appoints him prince of Mania, or the Maynottæ. He was induced to this partly by the success of his arms in Moldavia, which convinced him that a Christian governor could much more easily keep his Christian subjects in obedience than a Turkish; and partly by the assurances of Liberius, that all the d people of Morea were alienated from the Venetians, for endeavouring to force on them the Romish religion; and that therefore, they would soon submit again to the Othmân dominion, in case a prince of the Greek church was made governor of that province (O).

Seghedwar
taken.
Hej. 1100.
A. D. 1688.

THE affairs being settled, Soleymân, to terrify the enemy, and animate his own soldiers, declares, that he will command the army in person against the Germans; and having raised as many troops as he could, marches towards Servia, as if he intended to besiege Belgrade: but being informed at Sofia, that Seghedwar (or Sigetb), famous for the martyrdom of Soleymân I. had been forced by famine to surrender (P); and that the imperial army, which he imagined had been wholly employed against the French, was marching from Belgrade against him with great expedition; he, in a fright, stops at Sofia, and leaves the army to the conduct of the Seraskier Rejeb Pâshâ, with orders not rashly to hazard a battle, but only prevent the progress e of the enemy. The Seraskier being come to the river Morava, in sight of the Germans, and deceived by his astrologer (Q), who, from his observation of the stars, promised him certain victory, bravely attacks them; but is obliged to retire, with great loss, to Nissa. Yet his eyes were so far from being open at this misfortune, that having recruited his forces, he engages them a second time, depending on the predictions of the same astrologer: however, being quickly defeated, and almost his whole army destroyed, he escapes with a few followers, perceiving too late the vanity of his superstition. After this the Germans over-run at once all Servia, take Widdin, Nissa, Shabrkyoy, and burn Siopia, a city of Bulgaria <sup>w</sup>.

The Seraskier
routed.

<sup>u</sup> RICAUT, ubi sup.

<sup>w</sup> CANT. p. 360, & seqq.

(N) Better known to Europeans by the name of Liberaki, which is a corruption of Liberius, according to the manner of the Greeks. He was a native of Mania, the ancient Lakonia. He in his youth served in the Venetian fleet; then turned pilot for several years; but at length taken by the Turks, was sent to the galleys; from whence he was set free for advice mentioned in the text, and honoured with a Sanjak, but no Tûg, under the title of Mania Beghi. CANT.

(O) The truth of this we shall find verified in the beginning of the 18th century.

(P) After it had been blocked up for two years, and the articles signed on the 28th of January 1688-9 by the emperor. But Kanisa and Great Waradin, though brought to the like extremity, held out still. RICAUT.

(Q) Although the Turks are forbidden sorcery, and all kinds of divination; for the Korân expressly declares, Kiulli Munejimîn Kiczzabûn, that is, All astrologers are liars; yet they easily give credit to their predictions, fancying that the heavenly bodies are the instruments by which Providence performs every thing; and which, by their figures, express what ought to be done. Likewise, that on the foreheads of all men are written, in their mother's womb, whatever is to befall them, according to the harmony of the stars. The Wazir's courts are full of such prophets, but they never dare foretell unhappy events. CANT.

- a As the merit of a victory depends much on the knowlege of the strength of both armies, A. D. 1668.
 an historian cannot shew greater partiality, or want of skill, than in omitting to mention what <sup>the</sup> number of men each consisted of. According to the foregoing account of the Seraskier's <sup>great battle.</sup> defeat, the reader will be apt to conclude, that the Turks were much inferior to the Imperialists in force; whereas, if the Christian writers may be credited, they had twice or thrice the advantage in numbers. Prince Lewis of Baden having reinforced Belgrade with two thousand foot, and fortified Semendria, marched with his army and encamped near Morava: but on news of the Turks retreat, on the 2d of August, he pursued them towards Nissa with the rest of his army, which consisted only of eighteen thousand men; whereas the Turks amounted to forty thousand, besides undisciplined troops. They had not marched far, before their out-guards <sup>The Turks</sup> were attacked by a body of Tatars; two of whom being taken, informed them, that a great <sup>routed.</sup> body of Turks and Tatars, under Soltân Galga, the Khân's son, designed to attack them on one side near Passarowitz, while the Seraskier inclosed them on the other side with an army of fifty thousand men, in order to cut off their provisions. The prince thereupon resolved to dislodge the Seraskier, who was encamped within two hours march; and on the 29th of August, advanced briskly against him. On this unexpected motion the Turks retreated for three hours; when coming to a pass, they stood their ground, but were soon routed, and dispersed in the woods, with the loss of four hundred horse and twelve standards. Many were killed afterwards by the Hussars, who hunted them; and the roads strewn with arms and cloaths, which, to escape the better, they threw away.
- c ENCOURAGED with this success, owing chiefly to the conduct of the generals Veterani and Picolomini, the prince repassed the Morava, in order to attack Soltân Galga, encamped with his <sup>The Tatars</sup> Tatars beyond that river, before he could join with the Turkish cavalry lately defeated. As the road lay by a very narrow passage through a thick wood, half an hour's march in length, which opened into a small plain, five hundred men were sent under count Solaro to secure that passage. In this design they were opposed by three thousand Janizaries, and a good body of horse. But general Heusler coming to their assistance, so advantageously posted himself within the woods and thick bushes, that he maintained the pass till next morning, when prince Lewis advanced with his main force in a great fog, and posted himself before the wood. On the right hand he was sheltered by thickets and bushy grounds, almost impassable; and his <sup>The Tatars</sup> left wing extended to the bank of the Morava.
- d BUT before the cavalry could arrive the fog dissipated, and unexpectedly discovered the whole Turkish army drawn up in order of battle, just fronting the imperial infantry; which the <sup>Join the</sup> Turks instantly attacked with such unusual violence, that prince Lewis had scarce time to range his second line in a posture of defence. However, the Imperialists stood the shock from their great and small shot with much firmness; then playing their parts, the fight grew very hot for two hours together within pistol-shot; when the musick of the cavalry, which now came up, sounding without the forest, the enemy was struck with such fear, that they retreated into the neighbouring wood, and thence into a plain behind it, where they intrenched themselves. Here being followed by the Imperialists, the cannon was played hotly on both sides <sup>for an hour and half</sup>; after which the Turks retired to another trench, encompassed with a ditch of water, and accessible only in one place.
- e HEREUPON count Palfi was ordered with his regiment to enter the wood, and sound all his warlike instruments, in order to make the enemy believe some great body was advancing to fall <sup>Both armies</sup> on their rear, while count Picolomini with the van attacked them in front. This he did with such resolution, in spite of their cannon, that they presently quitted that post also, and retreated in disorder through the woods, followed by the Imperialists, who would have made a dreadful slaughter, had not the ways been narrow and unknown to them: however, they pursued them to their camp at Patafchin, which they abandoned, leaving behind all their artillery (R), ammunition, provision, and baggage. In their way to Jagodina on the Morava, whither they <sup>Both armies</sup> fled in great disorder, numbers of them were cut off by the Hungarians and Rascians; who brought also to the camp many prisoners, and thirty-six pieces of cannon of the largest size *.
- f THE prince, after he had refreshed his forces, began his march to Nissa, twenty leagues distant, through woods and mountains. The Turks had still most of their army intire, and <sup>Battle of</sup> were besides reinforced with twenty thousand men; yet on his approach, the Seraskier quitted that city, and encamped near it by the side of the Nissava. The prince pitched his tents within a league of Nissa, near a little river which falls into the Nissava; and on the 24th of September, about five in the evening, possessed himself of the sides of the hill over the enemy's camp, in spite of all their opposition. This done, lest the Turks should fortify their camp in

* RICAUT, ubi supra.

(R) One hundred and five brass cannon, and three mortars.

A. D. 1668. the night, he resolves to attack them off-hand ; extending his right wing towards the foot of a the hill, and his left along the plain to the banks of the Nissava. The Serafskier hereupon caused the greater part of his cavalry, drawn up on the declivity of the hill, to charge the infantry of the left wing ; but seeing them advance with their cannon in front, they wheeled about towards the right wing, and attacked them at the foot of the hill on the flank, which could not be secured.

The Turks
overthrown.

THIS produced some confusion among the Hussars ; but being timely supported by other troops, the Turkish horse must have been routed, had not some of their own troops fired on them, and forced them to stand their ground. However, the main body under Heusler, being ordered to attack the enemy on the hill, after a long conflict gained the top ; whither the duke of Croy, who commanded towards the river, soon after arriving, the Turks were quickly driven b from thence with great slaughter. Notwithstanding this, the enemy's horse rallying again in the plains, made another vigorous assault on the left wing, but were repulsed ; when the Janizaries, who were making new trenches, fired on them, and forced them to stand another charge, which they did with great firmness against the Hussars. However, these being succoured by the regiment of Caprara, at last forced them intirely to quit the field, and furiously pursued them to their very camp. Mean time, another party of horse attacked their main body ; but count Staremborg coming to their assistance, the enemy was put to a disorderly flight, and pursued till night parted them.

IN this action ten thousand Turks were killed, and not above three hundred Germans ; which was the more surprising, as the former were reckoned to amount to eighty thousand, c the latter to scarce fifteen thousand men. The booty too was very great, consisting of thirty pieces of cannon, many thousands of tents, and divers standards, besides store of provision.

Tekeli defeated.

AFTER this second victory, prince Lewis ordered Nissa to be strongly fortified, and sent out a party, who having advanced as far as Dragoman, within four hours of Sofia, brought word that the Turks had deserted the fortress of Mostâfa Pâsbâ Palanka, and other castles in that abandoned country. The news of this great defeat was carried to court by Mostafa Aga, who had been sent thither with letters by Julfigar, the Turkish ambassador at Vienna, and Widdin taken. detained for some months by prince Lewis. Mean time that general, being informed that Orsowa and Fetislau were burnt, and Tekeli, with some Turkish troops, was encamped near Widdin, where he had a stately house, resolved to return that way to the Danube, and defeat d him. Accordingly, setting out October 4th with but a few forces, on the 14th came unexpectedly on the enemy, who hastily getting in order of battle, to the number of twelve thousand men, maintained a doubtful fight for some time with unusual bravery ; but at length were routed, leaving one thousand slain, with a great quantity of ammunition and provision behind them. The castle, refusing to surrender, was so battered, that on the 19th the besieged, to the number of two thousand five hundred fifty-nine, capitulated to be convoyed to Nikopolis, whither Tekeli had fled before the battle ; and there, with tears in his eyes, came out to meet them. The taking of Widdin was the more important, as it secured all the country gained by the two last victories, and cut off relief from Temeswar, and other Turkish garrisons in Hungary.

S E C T. II.

Administration of Ahmed Kyoprili, with the Recovery of Belgrade, and other Conquests.

The treaty renewed ;

UPON the news of these misfortunes, Soleymân hastens from Sofia to Adrianople, and e returns an answer, till then deferred, to his ambassadors at the German court ; ordering them to insist only on the restoration of Belgrade, without mentioning the other provinces of Hungary. But Maurocordatus finding such things could not be proposed, conceals his orders, and pretends the Soltân would not give up any thing, excepting what he had before-mentioned. Yet afterwards being reminded by his colleague that both their lives would be in danger, if they should be found to neglect the Soltân's commands, he communicates the real state of the affair to the emperor, and receives such an answer as he expected ; for although Leopold, who was unable to carry on the war with success against two enemies, would gladly have made a truce upon terms, yet he was obliged to put off the affair to another time ; because the Turkish ambassadors had not full power to make a peace ; and he thought it dishonourable, after so f many victories, to send any of his own to the Porte, as it were to sue for peace.

but put off.

THUS great advantages were lost which were never to be procured again, only to preserve a trifling punctilio. Soltân Soleymân, before he left Sofia, with consent of his council, had agreed

- a agreed to almost all the demands of the confederates ; and caused instructions to be drawn up for his ambassador, to the following purpose : “ that he should use his utmost endeavours to procure a peace, and give no ear to the French promises ; that he should labour to persuade the emperor to restore Belgrade, and make it the limit of both dominions ; that in case of any scruple, he should first offer Kanisia, then Giula, Temeswar, or else Great Waradin, instead of it ; that to content the Poles, he should propose to demolish Kameniek, and if that would not do, to surrender it. Lastly, as to the Venetians, that they should keep what they had taken, and no mention be made of Negropont. These instructions were carried back by Mostafa Aga, who brought the letters from the ambassador y.” A. D. 1668.

- MEAN time the two armies in Poland do nothing but shew themselves to each other, being divided by the river Tyras, or Neister. But the Czars of Russia raising, it is said, four hundred thousand men, send them, with fourteen hundred cannon, under the conduct of Basilus Galliczin, against the Tatars. Yet these vast preparations were rendered useless by the Czar’s own regiment, which revolted while the Russians were besieging the city Or, commonly called Præcop (S) ; and by drawing into their party many of the most considerable officers, the army is forced to return home without success. In their retreat they are attacked by the Tatars, and through the perfidiousness of their intestine enemies, suffer a great loss in the rear. At their return, Peter Alexiowitz, who then reigned alone, making a strict enquiry into the sedition, shuts up his sister, who had been the chief cause of the rebellion, in a monastery ; banishes Galliczin, as privy to the conspiracy, to Archangel, and confiscates his estate ; kills, like wild beasts, twelve thousand Streltzi’s (T), publicly in the market places and streets ; and having abolished this military order, forms a regular militia after the manner of other Christian princes. Russians besiege Or. Obligated to retreat.

In the Morea this year the Venetians besiege Monembassia, (or Malvasia), and cut off all provisions ; while Liberakhi, lately made prince of that country, attempts to relieve the city, but is repulsed with loss z.

- THIS war in the Morea requires a more particular account from the Christian historians ; but before we proceed to it, it will be proper to speak of what passed in Albania. Count Pico- lomini, who commanded in those parts, sent word in October to prince Lewis, that all the Albanians having submitted to him, he intended soon to subdue the country from Skutari to Novibazâr, but wanted forces ; hereupon the prince sent him three regiments under the prince of Hanover. With this reinforcement, he marched from Procopia to Pristina and Klina (or Klin), where six thousand Arnauds (or Albanians) met him, with thirteen hundred carts of provisions. After this, he arrived at Kazianek, a little city with a castle ; from whence he marched to Scopia (or Uškopia), whose Greek and Turkish inhabitants had abandoned it, and fled to Mahmûd Pâshâ, encamped in a valley with ten thousand men. But these were so terrified at the bare shouts of the Germans, and noise of their cannon, which they fired for joy, that they fled also in great confusion into the woods, where many were killed by the Hussars ; and two thousand carts recovered, which had been pressed in the country to carry off the inhabitants into slavery. Affairs of Albania.
- e PICOLOMINI marching forward, burnt the antient seat of Ladislaus Cziocchi, and then returned to Kazianek, where his distemper, supposed by some to be the plague, greatly increased. From thence he removed to Panni, where he heard that the governor of Pyroth, having invaded the enemy’s country, and defeated a party of fifteen hundred Turks encamped near Dragoman before-mentioned, some hours from Sofia (U), was afterwards defeated by several larger bodies who came against him. After much fatigue he arrived at the city of Prosserin, where he was met by the archbishop of Albania, and patriarch of Klementa, with eight thousand Arnauds, both Greeks and Turks, who came to submit themselves. Soon after this, the brave count departed this life, to the unspeakable grief of the whole army, the command of which devolved on Veterani. Places reduced.
- f LET US now come to the affairs of the Morea. After the Venetians had withdrawn the last year from before Negropont, the Doge, Morosini, who had still an eye upon it, wintered with the fleet at Napoli di Romania, and ordered the chanel on both sides to be well guarded. For all this, the captain Pâshâ broke through with several gallies, and landed five hundred men, with proper instruments to repair the breaches, which was accordingly done. Mean time, Morosini wanting forces to renew the siege of that place, resolved to attack Napoli di Malvasia, whither he sent ten gallies and twelve galliots to assist the Maniots in building two forts near the town bridge, in order to block up the place. At the same time Liberakhi, or Liberio, Bey of the Morea, Venetians attempt against Liberakhi.

y RICAUT, ubi supra.

z CANT. p. 363.

(S) It stands on the Isthmus, which gives entrance to the peninsula of Krîm, called from thence by some Pre-copenstan Tartary.(T) Or Sterlits.

(U) Said here to be six or seven hours ; but only four in the former place.

A. D. 1688. Morea, lay encamped at Xeromerto, or Misselonghi, near Lepanto, with one hundred Turks,<sup>a</sup> one hundred and fifty Sclavonians, and some Venetians, who daily deserted to join the ensigns Bossina and Vito, gained over by him two years before. To put a stop to this desertion, ten chekins a head were offered to such as brought any to the camp; which had the desired effect.

THEIR next attempt was to destroy Liberakbi, either by alluring him to their camp, or render him suspected by the Turks. To this end they sent one Dambi, formerly an intimate of his, to Urakori, near Lepanto, where, having delivered his commission, Liberakbi told him, he should readily have complied with the request of the Doge, who was his godfather, but was too deeply engaged with the Turks to desert them: for that he had not only married the late prince of Moldavia's widow, with an estate of twenty thousand crowns, by favour of the Wazîr, but his wife, children, and two friends, were in pledge for his fidelity. However,<sup>b</sup> he gave Dambi several lights into the state of affairs; promised further information to the Doge, and sent him back in opposition to Ali Bey, who would have carried him to the Seraskier, then lying at Zeytûn with four thousand men.

Besiege Mal-vasia; but are repulsed;

ON Dambi's return, the Doge set sail for Malvasia, and laid siege to the place both by sea and land. The garrison consisted of no more than seven hundred soldiers, which, with the inhabitants, made about two thousand souls. The streets were narrow, but the houses strongly built; and the upper rooms filled with earth to cover them from the bombs. Mean time, in June, the villages about Salôna, which is near Zeytûn, refusing to pay the Kharach, or poll-money, demanded by Liberakbi, he marched against them: but after a bloody fight was defeated by the country people, under the conduct of Kharopoliti. Soon after it was resolved<sup>c</sup> to leave some thousand men at the pass of Korinth, under Dambi, to prevent the Seraskier from entering into the Morea; while to block up Malvasia some regiments were ordered to raise certain redoubts on the side toward the gardens, and a squadron of galleys posted there to assist the forces on shore.

THE Doge in the mean time, removed from the forts of St. Nicholas, which was the old Malvasia, to the new forts built at the bridge, whence they played with four fifty pounders on the town; which was not idle neither with its cannon. But on a sudden, a furious storm arose, which favoured the Turks; for it filled their cisterns with water, while it shattered the fleet, and overthrew the tents of the Christians on land. The hurricane being over, and the batteries raised, they plied the town incessantly both by sea and land, with their cannon and bombs,<sup>d</sup> by which they hoped to reduce it; for when they had made wide breaches, they had neither men nor other preparations to storm them. They failed also to burn the galliots and other vessels, which the Turks had drawn close under the walls, for want of four ships which stayed behind. At the same time, the officers and soldiers on shore approaching the town nearer than was safe or necessary to view the action, several were slain with musket-shot, and among the rest admiral Venier, the best sea officer belonging to the republic; while the besieged, from the concourse, apprehending an assault to be intended, sallied, and put them to flight with some slaughter.

block it up.

AFTER this, the Doge despairing of taking the place by force, caused it to be blocked up; and having battered down the suburbs from his ships, sailed away, intending to spend the remainder of the summer cruising in the Archipelago. But being seized with a violent fever, and a report flying that the captain Pâshâ was at sea with a strong fleet, it was thought proper to return to Venice, whither they directed their course the 15th of September. While the Doge performed quarantine at Spalato, news came in the beginning of November, that the provveditor-general Molino had succeeded in his design against Trebigno, having possessed himself in that country of ten towers, seven of which he had demolished, and garrisoned the other three, to check the incursions of the Turks<sup>e</sup>; to whose historians we shall now return.

Kyoprili

made Wazîr.

ABOUT the end of this campaign, Soltân Soleymân labouring under a dropsy, by advice of his physicians, removes from Adrianople to his other capital, where he puts to death Rejeb Pâshâ, Seraskier of Hungary, for fighting with the Germans, contrary to his orders. He likewise banishes the Wazîr, Tesekiar Dagbi Mostafa Pâshâ, to Malgara, a little town near Rodos, as a man unqualified either for war, or the administration of affairs; and advances in his room Kioperli Mostafa Pâshâ, Kaymaykam of Constantinople. The new Wazîr immediately sends for the Mufti and Kadio'laskers, with the rest of the Ulema, and generals of the army; who being met, he orders the interpreters of the law to give their opinion, whether it was proper to desire peace of the Germans, or recover by force what the confederates had unjustly seized? The Mufti first declares, that it was not contrary to the divine law to desire peace, even of infidels, in times of necessity. The same opinion is embraced by the Rumeli Kadio'lasker: but the Anadol Kadio'lasker (X), either by the Wazîr's instigation, or because he saw his provinces<sup>f</sup>

<sup>a</sup> RICAUT, ubi supra.

(X) That is, the Kadio'laskers, or military lord chief justices of Europe and Anatolia, or Asia Minor.

a out of danger, maintains it to be more eligible that all the Musulmans should perish by the A. D. 1688. sword, than to make Eynallak with the Gyawrs; since thereby the honour of the prophet and the Korân would be wounded.

THE Wazîr Kyoperli, who approved of this speech, thereupon said, "That as often as he <sup>Speech in coun-</sup> had considered the conduct of the ministry for seven years past against the emperor of Ger-<sup>cil</sup>; many, he could not sufficiently wonder at the imprudence of the Othmân generals, the blind-nefs of the counsellors, and the fearful or perverse minds of the interpreters of the law :
 that the two first minded nothing but to raise large armies, and fill the treasury by any means ; while the Ulema, content with their stipends, and preferring ease to labour, never concerned themselves whether the Othmân state was well administered, or thought of reforming the vices of the people, which was the source of all the present calamities ; but immediately approved of the proposals of peace, and almost forced it on the Musulmâns. That when God, still more provoked by this infidelity, debarred them of peace upon honourable terms, they returned to their old practice, and cast the blame due to the subjects upon the emperor : that having obtained their ends, they foretold the soldiers, at their departure, out of the law, that the Gyawrs would be driven from the Othmân borders : that yet this did <sup>censures for-</sup> not happen ; and it was no wonder God did not assist the Musulmân forces, since good <sup>mer ministers.</sup> works, purity in the soldiers, and justice in the rulers, those necessary conditions on which <sup>and peace ad-</sup> the prophet Mohammed promised them success, had all along been wanting : that for his <sup>wifers.</sup> part, to demonstrate the truth of what he spoke, he desired only twelve thousand true followers of the Korân, men pure in heart and mind, with whom he trusted, by God's assistance, to humble the numberless forces of the Gyawrs, in such a manner as to oblige them to restore all they had taken from the Othmân empire."

To this speech the Mufti replies, that although the Wazîr had traced out the true causes of the corruptions, and the misfortunes consequent thereupon, yet they could hardly be corrected by the method he proposed ; since the army wanted spirit, and the treasury money, the sinews of war. He added, that all people were in hopes of an approaching peace, raised by the letters lately sent by the ambassadors at Vienna. Upon this, the Wazîr asks who were the ambassadors, and what peace they were sent to make ? The Mufti having informed him of the whole state of that affair, he is fired with indignation ; and in a long speech, shews, how much d the authors of that embassy (of whom he deemed his predecessor to be the principal) had acted against the good of the empire. At last, raising his voice aloud, he cries out, "I account the ambassadors, with those who sent them, to be Gyawrs ; and as such, do I think they will be treated in the divine judgment : for no true Musulmân, versed in the precepts of the Koran, could have involved the Soltân, a prince of great mildness and simplicity, in so heinous and execrable a crime."

THIS strong disposition of the Wazîr to war is greatly encouraged by the French ambassador, <sup>War resolved</sup> who possesses the whole court with such a confidence in the arms of France, that a Galibeh <sup>on.</sup>
Divan (Y) being called, it is unanimously resolved to prosecute the war with the utmost vigour.
 However, that the treaty begun at Vienna might not seem to be broken off without some reason, the Wazîr writes to acquaint the emperor's council ; "that he had heard some persons c were arrived at Vienna under the title of ambassadors from the Porte, and had proposed terms of peace in the Soltân's name ; but that they were impostors, and had either forged the letters, which they pretended to have received from that prince, or procured them from the former Wazîr, without the Soltân's knowledge."

MATTERS being thus settled, he prepares for an early campaign, by applying his whole care to the raising an army, and providing warlike stores. But finding what the Mufti had <sup>His artful</sup> said to be true, that the Othmâns were seized with such terror, there were but little hopes of <sup>mandate for</sup> raising forces capable of opposing the Germans ; that the treasury was exhausted, and the <sup>raising soldi-</sup> people every-where unwilling to perform their duty ; he takes a different method of levying <sup>ers ;</sup> f troops from that used by his predecessors, which he executes with wonderful art and success.
 The former Wazîrs, in their mandates, had required all persons, whose duty it was to attend the wars ; but he publishes a Fermân in another strain : he says in it, "That as he found it necessary to trust the command of the Othmân army against the haughty Germans, to none

<sup>b</sup> CANT. p. 363, & seq.

(Y) So is called the Soltân's Diwân, held ever Sunday and Tuesday, under a Kubbch, in the large hall of the outer court, named Babi Humayûn, or the sublime Porte. The prime Wazîr presides in it, and has on his right hand, the Rumeli Kadio'lasker ; on his left, the Anadol Kadio'lasker, with the Mufti (if summoned), and the rest of the Kubbch Wazîrs ; and lower, the Tefterdâr. The Reis Effendi, and other chiefs of the Kalemij, stand by :

but the military officers, as the Aga of the Janizaries, Spabilar Agasi, Silbâdar Agasi, and the rest, sit without the Diwân, at the gate of Babi Humayûn. The Soltân hears out of a window, over the prime Wazîr's head, all that is done. The Wazîr is dressed in white silk, with a triangular turbân ; the other great officers of the Diwân, in brown garments.—Cant.

A. D. 1688.

“ but himself, so he would not employ in this expedition any soldiers forced into the service, a
 “ as knowing the will was of more value with God than the deed : that he would only put “ the Musulmans in mind, that by the precepts of God, and his prophet, every one is com“ manded neither to avoid martyrdom, nor despair of success, in defence of the law, and the “ extirpation of infidels : that every Musulman therefore, who thought himself obliged by this “ law, and had resolution to suffer every thing for the faith, ought to come and list himself “ in his army : but that he who was doubtful, was afraid of being a martyr, or detained by “ affairs which he believed would excuse him before God from the service, should have the “ liberty of staying at home ; where, after purging himself from all criminal actions, he ought “ daily to intercede with God for the army’s success. It was added, that even though such “ a person should be of the military order, yet he should not only be exempt from punish- b “ ment, but also enjoy his pay during his absence.”

its surprising
effect.

By this artful mandate both the soldiers and people of Asia are roused as it were from a profound sleep : for till then, whenever they were called to the wars, the greater part, for fear of the punishment threatened to the unwilling, hid themselves, and escaped the enquiry of the Pâshâs, partly by gifts, and partly by artifice and false pretences. But when they find themselves called on, from motives of religion, to war against the infidels, not only those who received the pay, but others who had been dismissed the service, prepare for the campaign, for fear of being accounted cowards, or Gyawrs, in case they staid at home. Thus what the former Wazîrs could not effect by the severest threats, or by the Pâshâs, Kapuji, and Cbaush, Kyoprioli Mostafa Pâshâ accomplishes without any difficulty, by one word of the Korân ; and c raises more numerous forces than any Wazîr had done since Kara Mostafa Pâshâ.

Reforms the treasury.

HAVING by this method assembled an army, he turns his thoughts towards purging the treasury of money unjustly raised, and filling it by more honourable means. He finds the state of accounts in no less confusion than that of other affairs ; for the Wazîrs, and other great men, in the time of peace, had consumed most part of it under various pretences : they had also for bribes granted to some an exemption from tribute, and laid on others a greater burthen than they could bear. Afterwards, on the war breaking out, the Tefterdârs had invented various schemes to fill their empty coffers, by which they had so impoverished the citizens, that nothing was heard but the cries of people calling for the vengeance of God on their oppressors. The Wazîr, with great application, removes all those abuses ; restores d to the treasury all the money which his predecessors, the Pâshâs, and secretaries had taken away ; establishes new laws for raising tribute, and orders that no person of a different religion should be exempt from it. Whereby the Greek monks, before exempt, became subject to the Haraj (Z), which he divides into three parts, that none might suffer by an unequal assessment ; enjoining the richer sort to pay ten Leonines a year, those of a middle rank six, and the poor only three dollars.

Seizes church
treasure.

ALL the money which the devotion of their ancestors had left to the treasurers of the Jâmi, he brings into the publick treasury ; and answers the Muteveli, who call it sacrilege, that wealth designed for religious uses, ought to be employed in religious wars ; adding, that it was more conducive to the Musulmân interest, to maintain with it the defenders of the holy edifices, than e enemies and robbers. He restores to their former integrity the judicial proceedings, which till then had been almost intirely venal ; punishes the judges convicted of corruption with great severity ; rescues those who are oppressed by false accusations without respect of persons ; and prevents every-body from being injured. He orders that neither corn, nor any other provisions, should be violently demanded from the subjects (A), but purchased with ready money, at such a price as they should think proper. By these measures having acquired a great reputation for prudence, justice, and sanctity, he prepares for the campaign ; and lest so many alterations might in his absence occasion a sedition against the Soltân, he persuades him to remove to Adrianople in the spring <sup>a</sup>, where we leave the Wazîr for a while, to see what was doing in the interim in Hungary.

Reforms the
lawyers.<sup>a</sup> CANT. p. 365, & seq.

(Z) A set tribute, which all persons, not Mohammedans, are obliged to pay to the Turkish emperors, if he has a mind to be a subject of the empire. This tribute the Korân has fixed to be 13 drams of pure silver for all persons come of ripe age. But in time, this sum being thought too small, three rixdollars were set upon each person’s head, under Mohammed II. and his three successors ; which was afterwards lessened or increased at pleasure, till this Kicprili divided it as in the text.—
 The Greek monks, ever since the taking of Constanti- nople, had been exempt from the Haraj, or Karaj, by virtue of a writing given by the pretended prophet Mohammed, to the monks of Sinay ; but Kioprili alledged this privilege to be spurious, or, if genuine, to extend only to the Sinaite monks. Cant.

(A) This piece of justice recommended Kioprili to all the Christians residing in Turky. His equity extended alike to all persons, without regard to their religion, of which prince Cantemir gives instances.

HITHERTO

- a HITHERTO the imperial arms had been prosperous to a surprising degree: but now the empire being furiously attacked within the very bowels of it by the arms of France, which obliged the several German princes to provide for their own security, many of the troops who served in Hungary were called home. So that the main burden of the war fell on the emperor, which was carried on with various success, but for the most part prosperous, whilst under the auspicious direction of prince Lewis of Baden. However, the year 1690 began not very favourably on Leopold's side; for the prince of Holstein, who in Veterani's absence commanded the army in Albania, hearing that the Turks ravaged the country, he marched to Prisserin, or Prissina, with some troops to meet them. From hence, on the first of January, he detached the prince of Hanover and colonel Strasser with sixteen hundred men, to relieve the pass of Kasseneck, besieged by the Turks; where arriving next day, they posted themselves with their backs to a morass, and planted four field-pieces against the Turks, who durst not attack them in that place: but keeping to the hills and woods, they detached one thousand Tatars into the plain, on sight of whom, Strasser quitting his advantageous post, forced them to retreat.

A. D. 1688.
Kasseneck besieged.

- MEAN time the Germans, being now in the open field, found themselves surrounded by thirty thousand of the enemy, against whom they maintained a battle from nine till three in the afternoon; when having spent all their powder and ammunition, they were at last totally defeated. Here the prince of Hanover, colonel Strasser, and count Solari, with most of the officers and soldiers, were slain on the spot, and most of the prisoners died of their wounds. However, five or six hundred men, by favour of the night and woods, got safe to Belgrade. On the fourth, Picolomini's regiment, which was to join Strasser, under count Montecelli, having had no advice of the defeat, drew near to Kasseneck, and was presently surrounded by the Tatars; but the count retreating towards a morass, over which there was a bridge, sent a lieutenant with thirty horse to guard the other end of it. The Tatars, after some time, attacked them on both sides; but the lieutenant being relieved by two companies, they defended themselves valiantly till night; under shelter of which, they retired to Prisseren, and thence marched to Prokopia.

The Germans
defeated.

- By this time Veterani, appointed general in place of Picolomini, arrived with some troops from Transylvania at Nissa; which being a place open to the attack of the enemy, he fortified as well as he could. Mean time the pass of Kasseneck surrendered: but to pass by several small advantages of this kind gained by both parties; Kanissa was so straitly blocked up, that on the 16th of March, the garrison being greatly reduced, the Pâshâ sent two Agas to count Bathiani, offering to surrender, in case he was not relieved in four weeks. But that being refused, on the 19th the place was surrendered, on condition that the inhabitants should march off with their arms and moveables into the Othmân dominions. The Pâshâ himself brought the keys of the city in a gilded basin, hanging on a gold chain, and delivering them to the count, said, I deliver into your hands the keys of a fortress, the like whereof there is none in all the Othmân empire. This strong city was yielded rather through divisions among the officers, than for want of provisions, of which there were enough for four months. On the walls were mounted fifty-six brass and ten iron cannon. There were found also three thousand seven hundred and forty muskets, with abundance of warlike stores.

Kanissa sur-
renders.

- It would be endless to take notice of every little action which happened before the opening of the campaign. But it is worth observing, that, in order to make way for greater ones, the French ambassador at the Othmân court, after long solicitation, procured a Baratz, or commission, declaring Tekeli prince of Transylvania, with the same power and privileges as had been granted to Beiklem Ghabor. Of this investiture Tekeli gave notice by his circular letters, bearing date the 26th of June, to all the cities and provinces, forbidding them to give any assistance to the Germans; and requiring them to join with him and the Turks, who were coming to deliver their country from the terrible oppression of the Imperialists. In effect, the many troops of Tatars which had already entered Walakbia, and the increase of Tekeli's troops, much alarmed the German generals; so that all the forces in and about Transylvania were ordered to march, under general Heusler, towards the passes which lead to Walakbia. At length, about the middle of July, the Tatars coming up the Danube, appeared before Widdin, with four galleys and sixty other vessels, having five thousand men on board, and began to fire on the town. On this news, general Trautmansdorf marching with his troops to the relief of the place, so plied the enemy with his cannon from the bank of the Danube, that they were compelled to fall lower down the stream to the other side of the river. After this, having furnished the town with a garrison, and provision out of the boats which attended him (on the Tinok), he returned to the rendezvous at Jagodina.

Tekeli's promotion.

Widdin attacked.

- BUT in August, general Veterani receiving advice that the grand Wazir was on his way towards Nissa, ordered all the troops in those parts to march to that city; where having left a garrison of three thousand foot and five hundred horse, he went back with the rest of the army.

A. D. 1689.
 The Wazîr
 advances.
 Hej. 1101.
 A. D. 1689.

army, and encamped at Alexin<sup>b</sup>. Now let us return to the Turkish historians, and attend the motions of the grand Wazîr; who, about the beginning of Shawal 1101, marched with the whole army towards Belgrade; and being informed in his passage thro' Kiz Darbend (B), that several thousand Germans from that city were coming to strengthen the garrison of Nissa, he sends Selim Gyeray, Khân of the Tatars, with part of the Turkish army, who falling upon them, now within sight of Nissa, soon puts them to flight. This victory revives the hopes of the Othmâns; and the Wazîr, to render God propitious to their arms, orders prayers to be made without intermission, both day and night, at Constantinople, Adrianople, and in the camp. Finding likewise that there were in the army a great number of boys unfit for arms, brought by profligate persons for detestable uses, he commanded by proclamation that all boys should be sent back, and if any should be discovered with any person for the future, he should be put to death without further examination; since that sin, above all others, deprived those polluted with it of the divine blessing; and the most pure God could not favour with his presence the camp where such an impurity was practised.

Takes Shahrkyoy, and Nissa.

HAVING made those regulations, he marches into Servir, and assaults Shahrkyoy (C), a little city, which being better fortified by nature than art, five hundred Hayduks, who were in garrison, finding no succours appear on the fourth day, surrendered the castle, on condition of leave to depart (D): and when the Janizaries would have plundered them, they are restrained by the threats of Kyoprili-ogli, who told them it was neither honourable nor of advantage to take away the arms of the Gyawrs, since they could not injure the Mussulmâns with them. He then admonishes those Hayduks not to go to Nissa, because as he intended to besiege that city, if any of them should be found there when it was taken, they could not expect to escape death. The Hayduks however, as soon as they left the Turks, retire to Nissa.

PRESENTLY after, the Wazîr lays close siege to that city, which was defended by count Staremburg, with three thousand German foot, and fourteen hundred horse. Although that general made a brave defence, more with a view to gain the Imperialists time to secure Belgrade, than with any hopes to save the place; yet the Turks pushed the siege with such vigour, that on the 25th day (E) the garrison surrendered, on condition of going out with their arms. Some of the Shahrkyoy Hayduks, though in disguise, being discovered by the Janizaries, are forced by torture to confess all their companions, who were mixed with the German troops, and Staremburg obliged to deliver them up to the Wazîr. He hangs part, and condemns the rest to the galleys, laying the same injunction on Staremburg, and under the same penalty, not to retire to Belgrade, towards which city the Wazîr marched; and having by the way taken possession of Semendria and Widdin, whose garrisons had abandoned them, comes in sight of it in the month of Zilkaadeh<sup>c</sup>. But before we enter upon the siege of this important fortress, it will be proper to add some particulars from the Christian historians relating to that of the places already mentioned.

Widdin taken.

WHILE the siege of Nissa was going on, prince Lewis of Baden joined Veterani at Jagodina, where matters were concerted for the relief of that city; but news arriving of general Heussler's defeat by the Seraskier and Tekeli in Transilvania, it was resolved to march thither with the greater part of the army; so that nothing could be done towards raising the siege, the Germans being then very weak in Servia. The Wazîr understanding that prince Lewis was on the retreat, and had withdrawn his forces from Widdin and Semendria, detached part of his army (which was reported to be thirty thousand foot and fifty thousand horse, besides fifteen thousand Tatars daily expected) to besiege Widdin: whose garrison at that time being no more than eight hundred men, they surrendered on the 29th of August, before any breach was made in the walls; and on the 11th of September joined the prince's army.

Semendria
 stormed.

MEAN time the garrison of Nissa being reduced to two thousand men, by the continual playing of cannon and bombs, and the counterscarp taken, general Staremburg surrendered on the 8th of September, on condition of marching out with bag and baggage, arms, and all other marks of honour. But the enemy did not faithfully observe the agreement: for the Turks robbed and disarmed many; and the Tatars pursued them as far as Semendria, with design to cut them off. They found 90 cannon and mortars in Nissa, from whence they marched

<sup>b</sup> RICAUT. ubi supra.

<sup>c</sup> CANT. p. 368. RICAUT.

(B) That is, the Virgin's passage (narrow gate or gap); one of the two passages over Mount Hæmus; the other is called Kapuli derbend, or the passage of the gate. On the east entrance of this passage are the ruins of a beautiful gate, supposed to be the work of Trajan, eight hours from Tatar Pazajik, and twelve from Philipopoli. To the west of these passes is the village Dragoman Kioy, the last which was conquered by the arms of Leopold. CANT.

(C) The same with Piroth in the Christian historians.

(D) Ricaut says, there were but one hundred and fifty men in garrison at Piroth; and that after three or four days siege, they conditioned to be conducted to Nissa.

(E) It was summoned on the 14th of August, and surrendered the 8th of September. Ricaut.

a directly to Belgrade, by way of Semendria; whose garrison, though consisting of no more than A. D. 1689. one thousand men, under lieutenant-colonel Weingartler, bravely sustained a storm of their whole army; but being overpowered were all put to the sword<sup>d</sup>.

As soon as the Wazîr arrives at Belgrade, he calls a council of the Pâshâs, to deliberate whether it was better to proceed by way of siege or blockade. They all advise the latter course, alleging, "That the city being well fortified by nature, and wonderfully strengthened by new works (F), as well as defended by a garrison of eight thousand Germans, besides many regiments of Bulgarians and Servians, could not be subdued within the campaign, nor besieged without great loss: that if the garrison should make a vigorous resistance, and repulse the Othmâns, they would immediately lose the courage they had hardly yet recovered by their present successes: but that if the Wazîr, leaving Belgrade behind him, would with his army pass the Save, or fortify the banks, to prevent the enemy from passing, the garrison would that summer, or at farthest in winter, be obliged by famine to surrender. They added, that nothing was to be feared from the imperial army, since the greater part of it was employed in the war against France; and the rest, being abandoned by the Hungarians, would be more solicitous to defend their own camp than attack the Othmâns." Belgrade besieged and taken, by blowing up of the magazines.

b THE Wazîr, though far from being of this mind, gives way to the majority, and surrounds the walls of the city for several days: But being informed that the Imperialists were hastening to its relief, he sees his error in complying unseasonably with his officers, and instantly opens the siege with one half of his army, appointing the other to hinder the enemy from passing the Save. By this change of measures he gained the city: but probably would have failed in his design, if, on the eighth day of the siege, a tower had not blown up by means of a bomb, or by treachery, and demolished great part of the wall. For, hereupon, the Turks crying out, that it was an evident proof of God's miraculous assistance, rush into the breaches before the Germans could prevent them, and for an hour resist the whole force of the garrison; who, overpowered by numbers, are then forced to retreat, after a great loss, though not unrevenge. A few, with their general de la Croy, escape in boats across the Danube<sup>e</sup>.

According to the Christian historians, there were not above three thousand two hundred men in Belgrade fit for service. The Wazîr invested this city on the first of October with his troops; who having fired their artillery without waiting till the 8th (on which day the duke of Croy arrived by boat), stormed the palisades like madmen. Next morning the blue steeple of the castle, which was the principle magazine for powder, took fire, which was soon put out: but in the afternoon it took fire again, and blew up with such violence, that it quite overturned the great bulwark which defended the castle, and destroyed one thousand of the garrison, who were drawn up as well on the parade as on the walls. So that there were not men enough to defend the breach against the enemy, who were ready to take advantage of the blow, and might have entered with whole squadrons. The duke of Croy also was wounded, and half buried in the rubbish of his lodgings.

It is thought this misfortune happened by the treachery of a Turk, disguised in a German habit; or of some Frenchmen, who had been employed in the magazines, and had that morning deserted. However, the besieged made the best resistance possible, till their remaining magazines and store-houses took fire, and blew up one after the other, in such a dreadful manner, that not only the greater part of the garrison perished, but one thousand Turks, at that time storming the walls and entering the city, were also destroyed; while such as remained alive were forced to retreat to their camp, unable to proceed for the smoke. But so soon as it had cleared up a little, the enemy observing the consternation which the remaining people were in, returned, and rather entered than stormed the city, where they found very few Christians living, or houses standing. Most of the boats were sunk with the rubbish which fell into them: those who escaped, saved themselves by swimming over the Danube or Save. General Aspremont, who got off with the duke of Croy, being blamed afterwards for neglect on this occasion, was cleared by an attestation under the hand of prince Lewis of Baden<sup>f</sup>.

THE Wazîr having thus reduced the bulwark of all Hungary sooner than he expected, sends five hundred Spâhis, each with two horses, and as many bushels of meal, to the relief of Temeswar, which the Germans had blocked up for three years, after finding it impracticable, by reason of its difficult situation, to take it by assault. The city was defended by Koja Jâffer Pâshâ (G), whose authority was so great with the soldiers, that although many perished by

<sup>d</sup> RICAUT, ubi supra.<sup>e</sup> CANT. p. 370.<sup>f</sup> RICAUT, ubi supra.

(F) The architect was Andreas Cornaro, a Greek of Kandia. He is charged by some authors with betraying Belgrade, but unjustly; for being taken by the Turks, and discovered to be an architect, he was obliged to perform that service, and others: for which he was well rewarded. CANT.

(G) That is, old Jaffer. He was famous for his military skill, prudence, and integrity. He fought several battles with the Germans, and held out Temeswar and Belgrade against them. He was slain at the battle of Zenta by the rebellious Janizaries. CANT.

A. D. 1689. famine, yet the rest refused to feed upon cats and dogs, which are esteemed impure animals <sup>a</sup> by the Turks. They were now reduced to such a degree of necessity, that when the Spâbis arrived, the Janizaries seized on the meal like ravenous wolves. This occasioned a dispute which ended in a bloody fight between the two parties (H) : of whom a great number on both sides being killed upon the sacks, the rest of the Spâbis, with their Pâshâ, are forced by the Janizaries to a speedy flight.

Lippa reduced, with other places.

KYOPRILI PASHA having repaired the ruins of Belgrade, passes the Danube, and taking Lippa, drives the German garrison from Orsova. He then assaults Essek, a city at the conflux of that river with the Drave, in hopes by subduing it to secure his new acquisitions from the enemy's incursions, and recover Sclavonia : but he was forced to abandon his design, by the resolution of the garrison, joined to the approach of winter ; and especially by the alteration <sup>b</sup> of affairs in Transilvania <sup>c</sup>.

Essek attempted.

AFTER the loss of Belgrade, the duke of Croy having rallied about four hundred men, marched by the way of Titul and Peterwaradin to Essek, drawing all the force he could out of the garrisons to secure that place ; which the Wazîr had ordered the Pâshâ of Bosnia to attack, while he passed the Danube and besieged Lippa, on the Marosk, near Arad. At his approach the Germans quitted Lugos and Karanzebes. Lippa surrendered for want of all provisions, on very honourable conditions, after continual storms by the enemy, who lost eight hundred men to ten of the besieged. Mean time, on the 29th of October, Husseyn, Pâshâ of Bosnia, appeared before Essek with twelve or fifteen thousand men, who, thinking to carry the place at once, immediately stormed the counterescarp ; but were repulsed with great <sup>c</sup> slaughter by the garrison, though consisting only of two thousand men. The Pâshâ finding himself mistaken in his account, began to open trenches and raise batteries ; with which, by the fifth of November, they had demolished almost all the houses in the town, and seemed to prepare again for a general storm ; but the duke and other generals having entered into the counterescarp with undaunted resolution to oppose them, they attempted nothing, as if struck with fear. The duke then returned to his lodgings, where three Turks were brought to him ; who being asked why the enemy had made so violent an assault without either trenches or earth to cover them ? answered, That their design was to have taken the town, if possible, before the Christian army arrived, which they heard was hastening to relieve it. The duke hereupon sent out all the music in the town to some troops beyond the Drave, with orders to march to <sup>d</sup> and fro in the night, causing different marches to be beaten, and trumpets sounded from several quarters ; which so alarmed the Turks, that they immediately raised their camp, and fled towards Bosnia. The news of this deliverance being carried to Vienna, the duke of Croy and general Staremberg were mightily cried up for the stratagem <sup>e</sup>.

The siege raised.

Transilvania taken, and recovered by Tekeli.

Let us now look into the affairs of Transilvania. About the beginning of this year Michael Apafi (I), prince of that country, died without issue, and left all his dominions to the emperor of Germany. On the other hand, the Turks had appointed Tekeli to be prince, and sent to his assistance the Serafskier, with ten thousand Turks, the Khân of Tartary, and Constantine Brankovan (K), prince of Walakhia. The confederate forces, under his conduct, penetrate into Transilvania, through the mountains of Walakhia, at the foot of which they unexpectedly inclose Heusler, general of <sup>e</sup> the German troops appointed for defence of that province. Heusler, finding himself drawn into this danger by the treachery of Brankovan, endeavours to open a passage with his sword, and bravely sustains the first onset of the enemy. Yet in the heat of the battle the Hungarians deserting the Germans, attack them in flank, who, terrified at this perfidy, attempt to escape by flight : but being inclosed by the enemy, are almost all either slain or taken ; and among the latter, Heusler himself <sup>f</sup>. According to the Christian historians, the Turkish army consisted of sixteen thousand horse, two thousand Janizaries, and five hundred Talpats. With these, Tekeli, under whom were nine Pâshâs, marched over mountains towards the pass of Terezwar, about three leagues from Kronstadt ; where general Heusler lay encamped, with seventeen hundred horse, and five thousand Transilvanians, called Zeklers, from the province so named, under general Tolecki. The Imperialists, nothing dismayed at the appearance of such unequal forces, with their right-wing furiously attacked and put to flight the left of the enemy ; who would have been intirely defeated, had the Zeklers seconded so good a beginning : but they flying without firing a musket, the Germans, after a long and bloody fight, were put to the rout. In this action, six generals, among whom was Tolecki, were killed, besides five

<sup>c</sup> CANT. p. 370, & seq.

<sup>b</sup> RICAUT, ubi supra.

<sup>d</sup> CANT. p. 371, & seq.

(H) Ricaut mentions nothing of this affair. He only says, that on the news of the march of the Turkish horse being ordered for Upper Hungary, the Germans were so alarmed, that they quitted the blockade of Great Waradin.

(I) He was of no great family, being son only of the chief magistrate of Cibimina.—CANT.

(K) Known in Europe by the three names, of Kantakuzenus, Brankovan, and Bassaraba ; all which he pretended belonged to his family, though in fact they did not.—CANT.

- a hundred horse : the rest retreated to Hermanstadt with thirteen standards, twenty-nine colours, with four pieces of cannon having been taken by the enemy, who lost three thousand men <sup>k</sup>. A. D. 1689.

TEKELI, after this victory, marches farther, and is received by all the inhabitants of the province with great acclamations. But before he could establish himself in his new acquisition, the prince of Baden, hearing that Belgrade, which he intended to have relieved, was lost, marches his forces into Transilvania, and having taken several cities, endeavours to subdue the rebellious prince. Tekeli, diffident of his strength, on the news of the other's approach, abandons Cibinium (or Hermanstadt) and retires again into Turky, from whence he never after ventured to return <sup>l</sup>.

- To enter into particulars from the Christian historians : prince Lewis having, on the news of Heusler's defeat in Transilvania, departed from Jagodina in Servia, with all the force which could be spared, as hath been already mentioned, passed the Danube near Semendria ; and on the 16th of September arrived at Karansebes. On the 21st they marched through the Iron Gate, a pass which leads into that province, and encamped near the ruins of Vulpia Trajana, a Roman colony, where many of the nobility came in to him ; whilst the Rascians entered Walakbia, and put all to fire and sword with the utmost cruelty. October the 3d, he came to Hermanstadt, the capital, and thence to Medies, where several parties of the enemy were defeated. All this while Tekeli and his troops never shewed themselves, keeping at least six leagues distant from the Imperialists. As soon as he arrived at Czick, on the borders of Walakbia, the prince of that country left him to secure his territories against the Rascians ; and afterwards the Transilvanians deserted him. Mean time, being pursued by prince Lewis, he was chased through the whole country ; and at length was near being surprised about Marienburg. Hereupon affrighted, he fled by the pass of Bocz into Walakbia ; and thus ended his short reign in Transilvania.

- On the first of December prince Lewis arrived at Zatmar, on the Samos, in Upper Hungary ; Orsova at what time the Wazir's son, with fifteen thousand men, ravaged the country, and summoned St. Jobs ; but the prince having no more than two thousand horse with him, durst not venture out against them. However, being joined soon after by Negrili with two thousand more, he pursued a body of twelve thousand Turks, who ravaged the parts about Clausenburg, and drove them quite out of Transilvania. The campaign concluded on this side by the surrender of the Isle of Orsova (in the Danube, and borders of Walakbia) to the Turks, for want of ammunition. The governor, upon the articles granted, desired to be conducted to Belgrade ; and although the Turks were honest enough to tell him, that it was then in their hands, he would not believe them, but insisted to be convoyed thither. In this at length they obliged him, to the fatal cost of him and his people, who were six hundred men, besides women and children : for, when they came to that city, all the men were confined in prisons, where most of them died, excepting those under twenty, whom they circumcised, and compelled to become Mohammedans. As for the women and children they were sold, and all the effects of the unhappy captives seized <sup>m</sup>. Let us now proceed to the war in other provinces.

- In the eleventh month of the same year (L), the king of Poland at last brings also his forces into the field, and passing the Tyras (or Niester), enters Moldavia ; but Cantemir, prince of that country, knowing what troublesome guests the Poles used to be, forbids the inhabitants, under a severe penalty, to sell or carry any corn to them. This obliges the king, who had already passed the Hierafus (or Pruth) at Stephanasti, to send back some of his troops to procure provisions from other parts. These troops coming to Soroka, a city on the Tyras, and finding it destitute of defence, yet full of stores, take it without opposition ; and leaving a strong garrison, return with the provisions to the camp.

- The king relieved by these supplies, marches as far as Yakobeni, a valley five miles from Jassi ; but hearing that Buyukli Mostafa Pâshâ, with Nûradîn Soltân, were advancing against him, he resolves to return to Poland. The provisions brought from Soroka being spent, he is again obliged to pass through the mountain country, where they are closely followed by the Tatars, who kill or take prisoners a great number of them, as they are gathering fruits in the woods. His return would have been very difficult, if the prince of Moldavia, desirous to drive out the Poles, but not destroy them, had not diverted the Seraskier from a pursuit, by telling him that they were then near their own borders, and unable to do the inhabitants any hurt. Had that general advanced with his army, scarce a Pole could have escaped : for they were so greatly distressed by famine, that the horse voluntarily submitted to the Tatars (M) ; declaring, that they would rather be captives than expire with hunger.

Of

<sup>k</sup> RICAUT, ubi supra.

<sup>l</sup> CANT. p. 375.

<sup>m</sup> RICAUT, ubi supra.

(L) Which falls in August 1690.

(M) There is hardly an example in history, of an army, which was ever so dispersed without fighting, or reduced to so much misery ; although the Polish historians

A. D. 1689.

Venetian victories.Kanina
taken.

Other successes.

The Wazîr
triumphs.Affairs of Hungary.

OF all the Christian powers, the Venetians alone met with success. In the beginning of the campaign, Monembesia (or Malvasia), the only place which opposed them in the Morea, and had been blocked up for two summers, is besieged by them, and soon obliged by famine to surrender (N). At sea, their admiral Daniel Delphino puts to flight the Kapudân Pâshâ, near Mitylene, after sinking and taking several of his ships. Afterwards, Cornaro reduces Kanina and Valona; while in Dalmatia, Fin Ali Pâshâ (O), governor of Hercegovina, assaults Nisikbos and Kuzzos, but is defeated, taken prisoner, and his forces dispersed<sup>n</sup>.

RICAUT makes no mention of this defeat of the Kapudân Pâshâ, but is particular in his account of the taking of the following places. The Venetians landed on the 11th of September at Valona, and drove seven thousand foot, and fifteen hundred horse, who opposed them, beyond the fortress of Kanina, situate on the top of a high craggy rock, four miles distant. Against this fortress they raised batteries in twenty-four hours, and attacking it furiously on all sides, the Turks, after the town was entered, yielded, on condition of marching out with their baggage. Mean time general Spar marched ten miles in pursuit of the fugitives, who on sight of him confusedly fled. The captain-general after this appeared with his whole army before Valona; and on the 18th sent a menacing summons to the garrison, who, as if designing to make stout resistance, sent no answer, but in the night silently stole away. They got in both places one hundred and thirty-four pieces of cannon, some brass, some iron.

As for the affair of Hercegovina, or Arzigovina, as our author calls it, the Pâshâ Kin Ali, with three thousand men, had a design to surprise the new conquered Greek subjects of the Venetians at their Easter devotions; but the people of Nixikhi (or Nisikbos) being informed of it, on his approach, left their churches, and after a sharp conflict routed him, slaying seven hundred of his men; and having taken, carried him in chains to Kataro. With the like happy success was the strong fortress of Filiporikh, near Glamez, taken and destroyed by order of general Molino. But the affairs of the Venetians did not succeed so well this year by sea; for in March two of their men of war, the St. Iseppo and St. Mark, being attacked near Kandia, by Mezzo Morto, Dey of Algiers, with ten Soltâna's, after the bravest resistance that could be imagined, the latter was blown up, and the other taken, although it sunk in the night with all its cannon, four hours after<sup>o</sup>.

THE campaign being over in Hungary, the Wazîr returns with his army to Adrianople, where he is received by the people as their deliverer: but the physicians being of opinion that the air of that city did not agree with the Soltân, who laboured under a dropsy, Kyoprili departs with him to Constantinople, which he enters in a triumphant manner. For three days there were rejoicings, accompanied with feasts and games, which the French ambassador gave, with no less expence than the Turks; thereby to shew them how acceptable the defeat of the Christians was to the most Christian king.

AFTER this, the Wazîr applies himself to raising a new and more powerful army than the former, to prosecute the Hungarian war, the command of which he resolves to take in person. He appoints Mostafa Pâshâ to be Seraskier against the Poles; and Kaplân Ali Pâshâ against the Venetians. This last, encamping at the river Celidnus, restrains the Albanians, just ready to revolt. He also takes possession of Kanina and Valona, reduced by the Venetians the year before, and now deserted by them<sup>p</sup>.

As to the affairs of Hungary, it would be too tedious to relate every action which happened before the opening of the campaign in 1691. The brave prince of Hanover we find so early as January marching against count Tekeli, at the pass of Terez; but advancing before his troops, was shot dead from an ambuscade near the village of Sernist. On the other hand, the castle of Tacket, and fort Waradin, were taken by colonel Pobland; who also defeated the general of Walakhia near Karansebes, and hindered a great body of Turks and Tatars from breaking into Transylvania. Of these he killed above a thousand, and took three hundred prisoners, besides much booty. In February, the garrison of Great Waradin were defeated by rians conceal it with much care, and extol their king's triumphs. I saw certain Tatars bring back each seven Poles fettered. They were become so weak with hunger, that they could make no resistance. Their captors, not having food sufficient for them, sold them almost all for three Taokhimits apiece.—CANT. Neither prince Cântemir, nor count Marfigli, in his Etat. Milit. Emp. Othm. tell the value of this coin.

<sup>n</sup> CANT. p. 373, & seq.<sup>o</sup> RICAUT, ubi supra.<sup>p</sup> CANT. p. 375.

(N) Ricaud says, that turning the blockade, which had held seventeen months, into a formal siege, they battered the city both by sea and land. Hereupon the inhabitants, tired out, presently surrendered on the 12th of August, on condition of being transported to Candia.

(O) Fin is the name of certain devils, of a grosser kind than Shaytan (or Satan). They are supposed to be male and female, and get children. Those who use their parts to the prejudice of others, are called Fin, and said to have the mind and cunning of those devils. CANT. He is written Zin Alee in Ricaud, Z being used for J consonant.

a count Nigrelli; and although the Turks took the castle of Novi, yet the Kroats defeated them A. D. 1689.
near that place, and killed a thousand upon the spot.

NOR were they less unfortunate at Lugos, where colonel Pobland drew the garrison into an Lugos and ambush; and pursuing them to the castle, had it surrendered after eight hundred and fifty of Kbonadraken.
the defendants were slain out of one thousand. Soon after, the garrison of Segedin having surprised the city of Kbonad, and killed all the inhabitants, the Turks abandoned the castle in the night. In March, the governor of Essék sent out Percilia, who, with 400 men, surprised and destroyed Inik, with all in it; routed a body of Turks and Tartars, killing twelve hundred; and returned with a great booty. In like manner Antonio, the famous Rascian captain, took the castle of Karakowar, situated on a high rock, by stratagem. After this, he attacked ten b ships sailing from Widdin, with provisions for Belgrade, and took two of them; two others fell into the hands of the Rascians near Modava, and the rest returned. He likewise by artifice dispersed a thousand Turks on their march to surprise Lugos.

IT being now June, when the year began to be fit for greater actions, count Guido of Sta- Titul sur*remberg* drew together the troops from several parts to Sauseberg; during which the Rascians prised.
surprised Titul, and put four hundred Turks to the sword. Mean while, Veterani, the general in Servia, hearing that 300 ships laden with provisions, under the convoy of four thousand men, were designed from Widdin to Belgrade, he sent Pobland and Antonio to intercept them with four thousand men. These drawing together so close that they appeared not to be above four hundred, the Turks detached one thousand Janizaries first, and then another party, out c of which one thousand were killed, besides many drowned in their retreat; but the ships escaped by getting to the other side of the river. Soon after this, a party of Rascians took four hundred waggons laden with provisions, between Belgrade and Temeswaer. Another party attacked Katbina Mostâfa, and slew fifteen hundred of his men, near Mitrovitz, which the Turks thereupon quitted<sup>1</sup>.

ALL things were now ready for the Hungarian expedition; but the Wazîr deferred setting Soleyman out on account of Soleyman's illness; for he feared that if the Soltân should die while he was dies.
absent, one of Mohammed's sons might succeed, and deprive him either of the Wazîrship, or command of the army. At length Soltân Soleyman, exhausted by an inveterate dropsy, dies on the 26th of Ramazân 1102 (P), having lived fifty-two years, and reigned three years nine d months.

SOLEYMAN was from his infancy a valetudinarian, of a gross body, low stature, a pale and Hejrah 1102; bloated face (Q), with eyes like an ox, a black oblong beard, with a mixture of grey hairs; A. D. 1691.
of a heavy understanding; easily moved by the whispers of his chamberlains, and the Koltûk Person and Wazîrleri (R): but none among the Othmân Soltâns was more eminent for sanctity, devotion, character. and (S) observance of the law<sup>2</sup>. Ricaut says, that as books were his entertainment in his confined life, so he seemed to have had an affection for them in the choice he made of Kupriogli for his favourite, who was esteemed a learned man in that country, and to have had the best library of any man in the whole empire: however, Soleyman was no other than a dull, heavy, simple, and weak man, fitter to be a Derwîsh than an emperor<sup>3</sup>.

<sup>1</sup> RICAUT, ubi supra.

<sup>2</sup> CANT. p. 375, & seq.

<sup>3</sup> RICAUT, ubi supra.

(P) June 11th, 1692.

(Q) Ricaut says, he had a long and lean visage, but not an ungraceful aspect. In other respects he agrees with the Turkish historian.

(R) So called from having alone the privilege of touching the Soltân when he walks or gets on horseback, or of supporting him under the arm-pits: which last word Koltûk signifies. They are the chief courtiers, who have a prospect to be made Wazîrs or Pâshâs, when vacancies happen; and among them are the six chief officers at court.—Cant.

(S) The Turks have no Soltân, whose holiness they so much extol. They even ascribe miracles to him. Among the rest, they say, when first placed on the throne, he leaped from thence, and went to a cistern; where finding no water, he, by pronouncing the word Bismillahi, brought water out of the marble; and having taken Abdest, commanded it to return in again. On other occasions, he knew not the most common affairs of life. One day he took some round fishes roasted for cakes, and next day asked for more of those cakes.—Cant.

C H A P. XXII.

The Reign of Ahmed II.

A. D. 1691.

21 Soltân
Ahmed II.Numerous army of vo-luntiers.A plot laid against the Wazir.Deceived by a mute.

THE death of Soleymân, though long expected and wished for, yet filled the Othmân court with new and secret commotions. The nobles, with almost all the people, were for advancing either Mostafa or Abmed, sons of Mohammed; and some were even for Mohammed himself, whom they had deprived of the crown. The choice of any of these was dangerous to the Wazîr: for if Mohammed should be restored, he was apprehensive of his life; as being suspected to have been pretty deeply concerned in the sedition which deposed him. On the other hand, if either of that prince's sons were elected, he was afraid lest those youths, who had been liberally educated in the palace, contrary to the custom of the other Shehzâdehs, and already instructed in the administration of affairs, might divest him of both his employments.

IN order therefore to avoid the danger, he resolves to advance Abmed, younger brother of Soleymân, and not superior to him in wisdom. Accordingly, by the authority which he had gained among all the people, by his successes the last year, he procured him to be unanimously saluted Soltân, the second day after his brother Soleymân's death. However, lest the malecontents should take occasion from the new Soltân's stupidity to raise a sedition, he departs with him to Adrianople, in the beginning of Shawal, where he applies himself intirely to preparations for war. The Musulmâns, excited by the success of the last campaign, voluntarily come from all parts, in such numbers, that there never was before so numerous an army seen in the Othmân camp. The Wazîr hereupon orders the Pâshâs not to bring more forces into the field than had been appointed: since being to fight against the Gyawrs, he said, there was no occasion for a great army; which besides might want provisions before they reached Buda.

BUT the soldiers, regardless of this order, flock together in still greater numbers: declaring it was not for hopes of pay, but out of zeal for their law, that they entered into the service: and therefore could be content with their wallet, and place their whole happiness in either becoming Gâzi (A), under so successful a general, or being crowned with Shehâdet (B).

THE Wazîr's fame thus greatly increasing, envy, the perpetual attendant upon merit, could not but cast her darts upon him from the court, her favourite residence. The Kizlar Agasi, and other officers of the inner palace, uneasy to find that Kyoprili Ogli was now possessed of the interest which before they had in the Soltân and people, who now despised them, all conspire his destruction; and abusing the stupidity of their master, fill his mind with suspicions against the Wazîr. They inform him, that the prime minister was contriving to depose him; and had prevailed on the Janizaries to set up Mostafa, son of Mohammed, as soon as he should decamp from Adrianople. The Soltân, persuaded by this accusation, asks what he thought was to be done? The Kizlar Agasi advises him to send the Baltajilar Kyebayasi (C) to tell the Wazîr he wanted to speak to him, and then to do as he thought fit, when he had him in his power.

DURING the time this eunuch was suggesting these things to the Soltân, Dilsîz Mohammed Aga, a mute (D), held the curtain of the door; and discovering by the motions of their lips and hands, that they were concerting to depose the Wazîr, hastens to that minister, and gives him, by signs, an account of the whole affair. While he was yet telling his story comes the Baltajilar Kyebayasi, and acquaints the Wazîr that the Soltân in haste wanted to speak with him. Kyoprili Ogli finding by this, that the mute's account must be true, immediately orders a horse to be got ready for him, and the messenger to go before, telling him that he would presently follow. When he is gone, the Wazîr sends privately for the Janizar Aga, and some other Ojak Agalari, whom he knew to be his friends; and having, in a speech, related the services he had done the empire, by recovering several provinces lost by his predecessors, and what he was likely farther to do by the numerous forces he had raised, tells them, that all was going to be overturned, and they, with himself to be removed from the army, by the artifices of some at court, who had persuaded the Soltân, a prince of great goodness, but unskilled in the administration of government (E), that the Wazîr and Janizaries were plotting to depose

(A) Gâzi, or Ghâzi, signifies one who conquers in a religious war, or on account of religion.

(B) That is Martyrdom; for the Mohammedans hold that all who are slain in battle against Gyawrs, or infidels, die martyrs.

(C) The chief officer of the regiment of the Baltaji (hatchet men, or battle-axes); he is subject in other respects, to the Kizlar Agasi.—Cant.

(D) There are many of these in the palace, whose only business is to hold up the curtain before the door of the room, where the Soltân is talking in private with any of his great men. Nor are either they, or the dwarfs and buffoons, ever employed, as most Europeans have affirmed, to put persons privately to death, or even sent on any serious message. Cant.

(E) And who knows not how to return any answer to what is proposed to him but Khoosh, Khoosh.

him.

a him. He adds, that as he foresaw one of the haughty courtiers would succeed him, who might reduce the Othmân affairs to a worse condition than ever, he was therefore willing to remind those his friends, that after his removal or death (which, he said, he wished for, that he might not see the approaching ruin of the empire), they would take on them the care of the state, which the emperor was incapable of: "for, concludes he, I scruple to make any resistance to my Soltân's commands; and therefore have determined to-morrow, with your consent, to resign to him the seal of the empire, and desire leave to go to Mekka <sup>a</sup>."

THE Janizar Aga, and the rest of the officers, on hearing the Wazîr's speech, call the Soltân <sup>Sounds the</sup> stupid, imprudent, simple, and cry out, that he is swayed by his courtiers like boughs shaken <sup>soldiery.</sup> by the wind: adding, that if he should persist in his design, they had rather depose him than b Kyoprili Oglî, the defender of the law, the restorer of the Othmân empire, and the invincible general. They promise to shed their blood in defence of a single hair of his head; binding themselves by oath never to suffer any other general during his life, and to execute his commands with the utmost alacrity. The Wazîr, who had sent for the officers only to sound how they stood affected to him, finding that he might depend on them, sends an answer by a Talkbîsh (F), "That as he was mounting his horse, he was informed that the soldiers, for some injury received from the courtiers, were raising a sedition; that he imagined he might safely defer his obedience to the Soltân's command, in order to put a stop to it: that with such a view he had sent for the officers of the army, and would acquaint his majesty next day with the course that should be taken for appeasing the commotion."

c NEXT day he informs the Soltân by another Talkbîsh, that he had done his utmost to extin- Ruins his guish the latent flame among the soldiers; but found them so presumptuous as to refuse to return to their duty, till the Kizlar Agasi was dismissed, and his secretary delivered up to a trial. He therefore intreats his majesty, that now the army was ready to set out, and himself full of hopes of success, he would not, by an unseasonable indulgence to his officers, stop the progress of victory, and expose himself to great danger. The Kizlar Agasi, who, by this letter, perceived his designs were betrayed to the Wazîr, desires the Soltân to sacrifice him, though a faithful servant, he said, to the good of the empire. But Ahmed refusing, through fondness to the deceiver, the Wazîr sends a third Talkbîsh, which obliges the Soltân, for fear of worse consequences, to do as he had desired. Accordingly the Kizlar Agasi was banished d to Egypt, and his secretary, when brought to the Wazîr, was ordered to be hanged in his habit, with a silver ink-pot at his girdle.

THAT minister being thus confirmed in his post, to cut off all opportunity from the other court-officers to make the like attempts against him, three days after he removes the army out <sup>Takes the</sup> of Adrianople, and encamping near the city, prepares every thing necessary for the campaign. Here he receives with great honour an ambassador from William III. king of England, who came to offer his master's mediation for settling a peace (G). The Wazîr declares he was ready to agree to one upon honourable conditions; but in reality, intended only to amuse the Germans, till he made himself master of Buda. With this view, he marched with his army to Belgrade; but being there informed that the Imperialists, under Lewis, prince of Baden, e had taken the field, and were advanced to Peterwaradin, he directs his course thither; on whose approach the German general pitches his camp near Isankamen, on the banks of the Danube, and strongly fortifies it.

THE Wazîr soon after comes up, and places his troops to the right of the imperial camp, in order to prevent their return. At the same time five thousand Germans, marching in haste to reinforce prince Lewis, are intercepted, and inclosed by the Turks, in sight of the emperor's army, so that not one of them escaped being killed or taken prisoners. The Germans, who before had designed to attack the Othmâns, on this disaster lose their resolution; and their general too late perceives his error, in suffering himself to be shut up in so narrow a space, where he could neither open his troops, nor defend them from the enemy's cannon: so that f there being no other way to extricate himself from this dangerous situation, he resolves to force a passage with the sword. While he meditates this design, the Turks, flushed with their late success, rush furiously on the German camp, as if they would destroy the whole army at one effort. The battle continues for six hours doubtful, with equal courage, but with unequal

<sup>a</sup> CANTEMIR Hist. Othm. p. 377, & seqq. in Ahmed II.

(F) That is, a relation, or account; the name given to the letters sent by the Wazîr to the Soltân about publick affairs; which, if rejected, is reckoned a great sign of his being in danger. The Talkbîsh must be written by the Ris Effendi, or high chancellor, and carried in form. Cant.

(G) Ricaut places this affair in the reign of Soleymân, and says, the ambassador, Sir William Ruffey, set out for

Constantinople on the 12th of June (which was the day after the Soltân died). He proposed a Uti possidetis; but the Wazîr, seeming to be intent on war, did not declare himself on the subject. Sir William's arriving so late, for he did not get to Adrianople till June, was owing to the Germans slowness; who, though they wished for peace, were very dilatory in giving him their instructions.

A. D. 1619 strength. The Imperialists, now turning despair into resolution, pass the Turkish trenches; and the Turks, out of shame for loss of the victory snatched out of their hands, drive the Imperialists back into their works, which they, in their turn, penetrate.

The Wazir
slain.

AT last, when the victory seems inclined to the Othmâns, the Wazîr, to dismay by his presence those who still resisted, with his own troop attacks the right wing of the Germans, where he saw the greatest opposition; but in the heat of the battle, being wounded in the temples by a musket bullet, he falls from his horse; and by his death, transfers the victory, already obtained, to the Germans: for his chamberlains, confounded at this unexpected disaster, call their companions, and other officers present, to take up their master's body; during which time the Tubulkbâna (B) ceases to sound. This cessation occasions great disorder among the Othmân troops now victorious: so that the horse, seized with a panic, abandoning the foot, first take to flight, and are soon followed by the Janizaries. The Imperialists, who were fighting, not with the hopes of victory, but that they might not die unrevenged, beholding the unexpected flight of the enemy, advanced but slowly, that the Janizaries might have opportunity to retreat; for their strength was so spent, that they could not have stood another engagement.

The Turks
overthrown.

THE rest of the Turkish foot, when they perceive the Janizaries to fly, quitting their cannon and camp, follow them with the utmost precipitation. There fell in the battle twenty-eight thousand Turks, but not above three thousand Germans, exclusive of the above-mentioned five regiments. However, when Leopold was informed of the victory, he is reported to have said, that he should be unwilling to conquer often upon such terms, since he could scarce repair the loss of eight regiments in three years; whereas the Soltân could supply the loss of even eighty thousand men in eighty days. After this victory, the prince of Baden recovers Lippa, taken by the Turks the year before, and closely besieges Waradin; while the Turkish army continuing their flight to Belgrade, there stop, and make Ali Pâshâ their Seraskier <sup>b</sup>.

Recovery of Thos.

THUS the Turkish historians write. Let us now see if our historians agree with them. The Wazîr being arrived at Belgrade with an army of one hundred thousand men, besides a vast number of ships and gallies, one hundred of them were sent, with four thousand men under command of a Pâshâ, to attack Titul; which, on the fourth day, was surrendered by captain Thos, on condition that the garrison, consisting of only one hundred and twenty Germans, and two hundred Rascians, should be conducted to the imperial army. But when they came to march out, the Pâshâ's lieutenant would not suffer the Rascians to pass, giving orders to put them all to the sword. Thos, resolved not to bear this treachery, came to such high words with the Pâshâ, that the latter drew his scymiter; but Thos, being too quick for him, shot him dead with a pistol, and then another Turk near him. The breach now being irreconcilable, he caused his men to fire on the Turks; whence ensued a most desperate fight. But the Imperialists being over-powered by numbers, they were almost all slain, after killing five hundred of the enemy.

Prince Lewis
marches to Salankemen.

MEAN time, prince Lewis being arrived on the 29th of July at Peterwaradin, next day sent word to the Wazîr, by a spy who was taken, that he was marching towards him with his whole army; which soon after, by reinforcements, amounted to sixty-six thousand and seventy men. With these he advanced first to Carlowitz, and then to Salankemen (C); where being informed, that the whole Turkish army had passed the Save, and encamped at Semlin (or Semelin) on the Danube, opposite Belgrade, he marched on the 12th of August within cannon-shot of the Turkish camp. This being posted on a rising ground, not to be attacked without great disadvantage, it was resolved next day to march back to Salankemen, where their provisions were lodged; the enemy being too strong in shipping for their vessels to attend them.

The 16th, the imperial forces began their march, which the Turks mistaking for a flight, on the 17th attacked their rear, but were repulsed with loss. It was now expected that next day there would be a general battle. But, instead of that, the Wazîr, following the advice of the French, who were about him, marched half a league beyond them (D), that he might cut off their communication with Peterwaradin; and there the Turks posted themselves with such expedition, that in twenty-four hours they had fortified their camp with regular walls the height of a man, and bastions planted with cannon, leaving only a passage for coming in and going out of the camp.

<sup>b</sup> CANT. Hist. Othm. p. 381, & seqq.

(B) Warlike musick, which in battle is always near the Wazîr, and continually playing to animate the soldiers; so that if it happens to cease, the Janizaries take it for an ill omen, and can scarce be restrained from flight. CANT.

(C) Or Slankemen; which, according to count Mar-

figli, who gives a plan of the battle, is a ruined castle on the south side of the Danube, opposite to the mouth of the river Tesfe. Etat. milit. de l'emp. Ottoman. part ii. p. 96.

(D) Count Marfigli says, he made this forced march under favour of the night.

a THIS was an unlucky step for the Germans; for by that means, not only fourteen hundred A. D. 1691. recruits fell into the enemy's hands, and were all slain excepting thirty, but they also intercepted one hundred and fifty waggons carrying provisions to the imperial army from Peterwaradin, which was their grand storehouse; besides one hundred ships belonging to their fustlers. The Imperialists, after this loss, perceiving no deliverance but in their swords, on the 19th, armed with despair, by break of day put themselves in a posture of battle, and marched directly towards the Turks; so that about noon both armies, drawn up, faced each other at a small distance. The prince of Baden commanded the right, and count Donerwaldt (E) the left wing.

b THE Turkish army consisted of about one hundred thousand men (F), of whom sixty thousand were the best soldiers in the Othmán empire; besides fifteen thousand of the veteran Janizaries. They were advantageously posted, having the Danube on their backs (G), and in their front a deep ditch, with earth thrown up behind them. However, their left wing (H) lay somewhat more exposed than the right. On the other hand, the greater part of the imperial infantry was divided into twenty battalions, flanked with two regiments of horse, and the greater part of the biggest cannon. The rest of the army was drawn up in the usual form: and on the signal of a bomb, all marched in an equal line, till within two hundred paces of the enemy; and then the cannon on both sides began to play. At first it was intended to attack the enemy's left wing (I), before the right, to give room for the foot, who were placed on the rising of a hill, opposite to the main intrenchment of the Turks, which was fortified c with eighty pieces of cannon: also to charge the enemy's horse drawn up below the hill in the plain, with intent, after having overthrown them, to force through the camp, to that part where the enemy was less fortified.

It seems the right wing, happening to be somewhat too forward, began the engagement before the left, hindered by the high grass and bushes, could come up. But, being arrived at the very intrenchments of the enemy, the Janizaries fired on them so furiously from their breast-work, that the regiment of Souches was forced to give way, till the foot joined them. And now both cavalry and infantry advancing to the very brink of the trenches, the latter made several attacks on them; and though sometimes repulsed, yet being relieved and directed by the brave dukes of Holstein and Aremberg, they continued the fight from three in the afternoon till night. In this time, all the superior officers of the infantry were killed, excepting d count Guido of Staremburg, and prince Charles of Vaudemont, who yet were both wounded.

MEAN time the enemy attacking their left wing, and flanking it, were bravely repulsed by Castelli and Hoffkerchen: but the Turks rallying all their horse into a body, fell on with greater e fury, and charged the brigade of general Sarau, which belonged to the right wing, and cut down two battalions; while those of Offing, Beck, with the old regiments of Staremburg and Brandenburg, suffered very much. So that till six o'clock fortune favoured the Turks; at which time things were in such a desperate condition, that the generals began to despair of saving one man; for there was no place of retreat for them. However, animated by their danger, the Imperialists began to redouble their endeavours; but were ready to turn their backs, when those who kept the baggage, and remained for reserves, advanced to their relief. At the same time, the main body of the army, under the Brandenburg generals Burfu and Brandt, coming up seasonably to succour count Sarau, he rallied again, and defended his post till an hour before night; when the brigades of Hoffkerchen and Castelli, with the right wing commanded by prince Lewis, advanced towards that side of the enemy which was not intrenched; and at last, forcing their camp, drove them from the rising grounds where they had planted their cannon.

As soon as this was observed by the Hungarians and Rascians, who now wanted to escape, f they resumed courage, and came thundering on, cutting down all before them in the camp, which opened a way for the right wing to advance: so that the Turks being thus hemmed in, and attacked on all sides, in a narrow ground between their trenches and the Danube, they were defeated and began to fly. The horse, for the most part, escaped by the opening made for the right wing; but the infantry continued to defend themselves so resolutely in their trenches, that although the field was yielded to the Imperialists, yet they received here their

(E) Or Tinewold, as Marfogli calls him: he commanded the horse, prince Lewis the infantry.

(F) Our author in another place, says, that the Wazir had drawn from all parts no fewer than 10,000 good experienced soldiers; besides 10,000 ordered for Great Waradin, under the Seraskier Topal Hussyn, Pâshâ of Silistria. Afterwards they were said to amount to 87,226 horse and foot, being counted as they crossed the Save: besides 3000 seamen, some Szakis, and the rabble attending armies.

(G) The Danube also covered their left flank, as it did the right of the Imperialists. Their right wing, which consisted of the cavalry under the Seraskier, was not so well covered. Yet, being very numerous, they flanked the imperial horse.

(H) Rather the right more than the left; or the infantry, which was more intrenched with the Danube, covering their flank.

(I) Rather it should seem the right wing, for the left was attacked first.

A. D. 1691. <sup>a</sup> greatest loss; for this action cost the life of the duke of Holstein, serjeant-general, with a deluge of blood, to subdue the already conquered enemy. The remainder of the Turkish cavalry, among whom was the prime Wazîr himself, were forced to break their way through the narrow spaces between the lines; in which attempt many were slain, drowned, or mortally wounded. Among these last were the prime Wazîr, Seraskier, and Aga of the Janizaries, who all died of their wounds at Belgrade (K).

Their loss
great.

BESIDES these, and many more principal officers, the Turks were computed to have lost at least twenty-five thousand men (10,000 of them Janizaries), to three thousand one hundred and sixty-one of the Imperialists; among whom were many officers of note: and their wounded amounted to four thousand one hundred and thirty-six. Here the prince of Baden, to say nothing of the other generals, got immortal honour; and the booty was very great: <sup>b</sup> for besides one hundred and fifty-four pieces of cannon, there were a great number of ensigns, with the grand Wazîr's standard; ten thousand tents; ten waggon-loads of copper-money in the Wazîr's tent; fifty-four trunks in that of the treasurer, twelve in silver; and twenty-four chests of Kaftâns, or vests.

THE news of this great defeat coming to the Soltân at Adrianople, he made Ali, Pâshâ of Scio, and Kyehaya to Kyoprili, grand Wazîr in his room, and sent him to Belgrade. Thither Sir William Hussey and Mr. Collier designed to accompany him to mediate a peace. But Sir William dying on the 14th of September, an end was put to the treaty; and the French ambassador encouraging the Turks by a powerful invasion in Germany, a continuance of the war was resolved on: notwithstanding the great distress which the Othmân empire was in for <sup>c</sup> want of men, money, and bread.

Other advantages.

MEAN time, a consequence of the battle of Salankemen, besides the taking of Lippa by Veterani, was the desertion of Brodt, in Sclavonia, by the Turks; who were defeated likewise in several small rencounters: but the prince of Baden's main design was upon turning the blockade of Great Waradin into a formal siege, which he did in October. However, although the Turks, to avoid a storm, deserted the city, and half the fortress was destroyed by a bomb falling into their magazine of powder; yet winter coming on, and the besieged resolutely holding out, he was obliged to turn the siege again into a blockade, after building a fort which commanded the fortress.

Affairs of the Arabs,

IN the beginning of the year 1692, two Arab Amîrs infesting the country about Damaskus, <sup>d</sup> stopped the karawans going to Mekka, till they paid Kafar, or custom, and the arrears due to them from the Soltân, on account of the pilgrims, were discharged. In February, a Persian ambassador arrived at Adrianople, with three hundred thirty-eight persons in his retinue, and sixty camels laden with presents for the Soltân. He was lodged in a magnificent palace, and had his kitchen furniture all of silver. He came to congratulate the Soltân on his accession to the throne; and made the longer stay, under pretence of renewing the antient leagues, in order to pry into the weak condition of the Turks; who, to conceal their distresses from him, wanted him to be gone. About the same time Tekeli arrived at court, where, at the solicitation of Chateau Neuf, the French ambassador, he had great honours done him by the Wazîr; after which he returned to Hungary <sup>e</sup>.

of the Poles,

DURING the transactions at the Save, the Poles, in the last month of this year, pass the Tyras (or Niester), and make an expedition into Bassarabia; but being pressed with want of provisions, they, on report of the Seraskier, Buyukli Mostafa Pâshâ's approach, return home without doing any thing remarkable.

and Venetians.

MEAN time the war between the Venetians and Turks is carried on by artifice rather than arms: for the latter became masters of Garbusa, an almost impregnable castle in Kandia, by the treachery of a Spanish officer (L). They attempt the same at Suda and Spina Longa; but the Venetians, more watchful of those fortresses, discover their design, and put the conspirators to death.

Wicked Wazîr.

IN the interim, Arabaji Ali Pâshâ (M), Kaymaykam of Constantinople (a man inferior to many in abilities, but to none in wickedness), being made Wazîr by Soltân Ahmed, in the room of Kyoprili Oglî, he revives the talk of peace, and lends a favourable ear to the ambassadors of Christian princes; especially Paget (N) the English, and Collier (O) the Dutch, who were <sup>f</sup> sent

<sup>b</sup> RICAUT, in Achmet.

(K) The Turks say, he died in the field of battle, not flying, but in possession of the victory. Which party is to be believed? The Turks perhaps in the first article, the Germans in the second.

(L) Named Aloysius, to be revenged on the governor of Garbusa, who, as he said, had ravished his wife. Cant.

(M) Arabaji signifies a waggon maker, or waggon driver; a surname given him, either as having been such, or because of his stupidity. Cant.

(N) He was of a noble family, very learned, and well skilled in the Greek and Turkish languages, besides other sciences; was very prudent, and perfectly understood the way of obtaining any thing from the Turks, among whom he left a very good name. Cant.—This was lord Paget.

(O) Born at Smyrna, where his father was consul; and having in his youth learned the functions of an ambassador, as well as the Greek and Turkish tongues, he was reckoned

- a sent for that purpose to the Porte. But being informed by Maurocordatus, that Germany A. D. 1691. was so exhausted of men and money, that very probably the emperor could not support the war above a year or two longer, he immediately cuts off all hopes of peace (P), and applies himself wholly to renew the war; pursuing such measures as might at once supply the exigencies of the treasury, and remove out of the way men of superior abilities to his own. Accordingly, he puts to death many eminent persons of the first rank, under various pretences, and confiscates their estates. Not content with this, he orders even the Janizaries and common soldiers, distinguished for their bravery, to be thrown privately by night into the sea; that no person might be left alive, who should be esteemed more worthy of the Wazîrship than himself.
- b THIS cruelty being frequently complained of to the court, and those persons, whose lives were spared by accident, or Arabaji's ignorance, representing to the Soltân, that by this means all the defenders of the Othmân empire would be destroyed (Q), Abmed at last, after six months, removes him from his post; and having stripped him of his wealth, unjustly acquired, advances Tarpofski Ali Pâshâ (R), governor of Damaskus, in his room.
- THE new Wazîr concerted measures for settling a peace: but the ambassadors, who had been four years at Vienna, returning home, and being bribed, 'tis said, by the French ambassador, excite the Turks to continue the war, representing, that Germany was exhausted of its strength; that the emperor, being one hundred millions in debt, could not raise supplies; and that both Hungary and Germany were afflicted with a dearth: which representations were not so false as agreeable to the Porte.
- c THE Wazîr therefore laying aside all pacifick measures, applies himself to renew the war: but because the number of Janizaries was extremely lessened by the German sword, and Arabaji's cruelty, while the soldiers, terrified by the late defeat, could not be assembled with expedition, he sends the Seraskier with what forces were ready towards Hungary, with orders to defend the borders, relieve the Turkish cities, and avoid a battle with the Germans. He indeed kept the imperial troops from approaching the Save; for being weak, they were not desirous of an engagement; but could not hinder Heusler, lately set at liberty, from obliging Waradin, blocked up the year before, to surrender for want of provisions on the 21st of Ramazân 1103<sup>c</sup> (May 25th 1692). Hej. 1103.
A. D. 1692.
- d HEUSLER, before the Turks got into the field, drew together all the forces he could, in order to reduce the place by siege. To this end, in May 1692, he raised two bulwarks opposite those of the enemy, called Rungar and Kapudan; he caused a bridge also to be laid from the Palanka of Olofchi to the old city, notwithstanding the sallies of the Turks: so that by the 7th the Imperialists had surrounded the city, and lodged themselves in the ditch. After this, the bombs and cannon played furiously on both sides, till the 19th, when the heavy cannon coming up, and a larger breach being made, the besiegers, who before rejected the summons on the 28th, seeing the Imperialists preparing for the assault, thought fit to capitulate, on condition of being convoyed to Panzova. There were found in this important fortress 5000 measures of barley, 1000 of wheat, 300 sacks of rice, 50 vats of flour, 50 brass guns, 22 mortars, 70,000 pounds of good powder, 723,000 of decayed powder, 3500 cannon balls, 30,000 pounds of unwrought, and 4300 of wrought, iron. The garrison, to the number of 1200 fighting men, and in all 12,000 souls, were detained without the city, till the Turks had released the garrison at Pescobara, who had been detained there contrary to articles.
- e THE Othmâns being desirous of revenge, in June detached a strong party towards Essek, with a design to make an incursion into Sclavonia; but were repulsed here, as well as at Titul and Titz, by the Rascians, while the Kroats plundered and burnt Bebatz and Ostrosatz. In July the Turks attacked the fortress of Portsen near Peterwaradin, but were forced to give over the enterprize; which yet they attempted a second time, no less in vain.
- f THERE happened no considerable action on either side in Hungary this campaign, only the Kroats and Rascians made an incursion towards Meydan with good success; and the latter had the luck to break into Morava, and take 200,000 dollars, after defeating the Turkish convoy<sup>d</sup>.

<sup>c</sup> CANT. Othm. Hist. p. 383, & seqq.

<sup>d</sup> RICAUT, ubi supra.

reckoned the wisest and most civil of all the ambassadors among the Turks. As he also freely entertained the courtiers, greedy of wine, he got out of them all the Wazîr's secrets. Cant.

(P) Ricaut says, it was looked on as injurious to the Othmân empire, as being proposed on the foot of uti possidetis; for thus, Transilvania was to remain to the emperor, and Tekeli to be delivered up. Ragusa to pay tribute no longer to the Porte, and to be discharged from its arrears. Poland required the surrender of Kaniisk, Podolia, the Castelli on the Dorysthenes (or Nieper) Moldavia, and Walakhia: also, that the Porte should make good all future damages by the Tatars. The Venetians required Livadia, Athens, and Thebes, in lieu of the Morea, and other territories towards Lepanto and Dalmatia.

(Q) Ricaut takes notice of the cruelty, as well as inexperience of this choleric old Wazîr; and says, he was banished, after being ordered to be strangled by the Soltân, for applying to him to turn out the Kaymaykam of Adrianople.

(R) Tarpus is a sort of cap worn by the Turkish women, of which this Wazîr seems to have been a maker in his youth. Cant.

A. D. 1692.
 Affairs of Moldavia.

ABOUT the same time, the Serafskier of Bâbadâghî, Daldabân Mostafa Pâshâ, in conjunction a with Arap Pâshâ, governor of Trebizond, in the end of the month of Zilkaadeh, enters Moldavia. There being joined by the prince of that country, and twenty thousand Tatars, under the command of Shabbâz Gyeray Soltân, marches towards Soroka; but being detained for several days by a bloody flux, at the town of Orbeyus, four days distant, gives the Poles, till then negligent, time to fortify that city, and reinforce the garrison. As soon as the Serafskier was recovered, he hastes, and lays siege to Soroka, whose garrison was at first terrified; but finding that the enemy had only seven small field pieces, and two mortars, they resume courage, and destroy great numbers of them by sallies in the night. At length the Serafskier, finding that the walls could not be undermined, as built on a rock, and that winter approached, is obliged to retire after thirty days siege, and the loss of three thousand men <sup>c</sup>.

Soroka besieged.

THE siege of this place is represented very differently by our historians. According to Ricaut, the Serafskier Mostafa Pâshâ, on the 27th of September, with 30,000 men, sat down before Soroka, whose garrison, consisting of no more than 600 soldiers, bravely resisted so great a power. For though the Turks on the 1st of October advanced their trenches to the ditch side, yet they lost 600 men in storming the place; and though by their continual firing they made great breaches, yet the besieged, with indefatigable industry, repaired them in the night. On the 6th likewise, they beat the enemy out of the ditch, and countermined their sappings. However, early on the 9th, one of them having thrown down part of the wall, they began the assault, which the Poles bravely withstood for four hours, driving them from the walls, as often as they advanced, and planted their colours. In this action, the besieged c took three standards, and killed 800 of the enemy; then prosecuting their success, drove them out of most of their posts and lodgements, slaying 1000 of their men. The Turks, dismayed at these repulses, raised their camp in the night, with such precipitation, that they left behind them two great guns, and three mortars, with ammunition and provision <sup>f</sup>.

*Poles refuse
 peace.*

AT the end of the campaign, the Khân of Krîm Tartary, Kior Sefa Gyeray (S), by advice of Daltabân Pâshâ, sends Darwîsh Shabân Aga, one of his officers, to the king of Poland, offering to restore Kaminiek, with all Podolia and Ukrania, in case he would renounce his alliance with the emperor. But the Poles, who had conceived new hopes of subduing all Moldavia, from the ill success of the Turks against Soroka, pay no regard to the Khân's proposals.

*Venetian
 affairs.*

THE same year the Venetians, having entirely subdued the Morea, resolve to turn their arms d against Kandia; and transporting their whole army to that island, think to surprise Kanea. But the Turks, informed of their design by a French ship, had put so strong a garrison into the city, that the Venetians are repulsed with great slaughter, and obliged to retire, after a siege of fifty days (T). With equal success Soleymân Pâshâ, governor of Arnaud, defeats the Monte Negrini, meditating a rebellion; he likewise recovers Zuffa and Panduriza. The Serafskier of the Morea, encouraged with those advantages, makes several incursions upon the Venetians; but attempting to seize Naupactum (or Lepanto), is repulsed with great loss. Worse luck in Dalmatia attends the Pâshâ of Hercegovina, who endeavouring, by Ali Beg, to recover Gracow, the besiegers are suddenly attacked by the enemy, and being put to flight, their general is taken prisoner. e removed.

*The Wazîr
 Hej. 1104.
 A. D. 1693.*

THE campaign of 1103 being ended, the Soltân next year has twins born to him at Constantinople, Selîm and Ibrâhîm (U). As this had never happened to any Soltân before, the Turks considered it as a presage of future success; and for eight days celebrate the Donanma (W), with other sports usual on such occasions. Amidst these rejoicings, the Wazîr Toposchi Ali Pâshâ endeavours to renew the negotiations of peace; but being reprehended by the Mufti, and Soltân Ahmed declaring it done without his knowledge, he is deprived of his dignity, as a betrayer of the law and the empire. His successor, Buyukli Mostafa Pâshâ, endeavouring to put a stop to the rapines committed by several great men, through the negligence of former Wazîrs, some of the offenders murmur openly, and others form a secret plot

<sup>c</sup> CANT. ubi supra. p. 385.

<sup>f</sup> RICAUT.

(S) This was the only prince of the family of Chobân Gyeray, mentioned before in the history, who arrived to the dignity of Khân, which he did not enjoy above one year. After his deposition, the empire of Tartary returned to the legitimate Gyerays. CANT. Kior signifies one blind of an eye.

(T) Ricaut says, they had hopes of carrying the place, if 1000 French, in their service, had not, at their first landing, deserted, and gone over to the Turks.

(U) Ricaut observes, that in the midst of these rejoicings, a fire broke out in three different places, which burnt 4000 houses, and 2000 shops. At the same time, one of the Menâra, or steeples, of Soltân Soleymân's mosque fell to the ground; which was esteemed an evil omen, presaging the next campaign to be a bad one. About the same time, according to the same author, Soltân Ahmed began to be afflicted with the dropsy, the fatal distemper of his family.

(W) So the Turks call their public rejoicings for a victory, or a fortress taken. On such occasions the shops are kept open day and night, all sorts of diversions, and even wine allowed to be drunk publicly. CANT.

against

a against him ; but their assemblies being disturbed by the Janizar Agasi, his friend, and the ringleaders either put to death or banished, the city is restored to its former tranquility. A. D. 1692.

WHILE the new Wazîr was employed in making preparations for war, and had now encamped without Constantinople, the Sheykh of Prusa, Misri Effendi (X), erects his standard in that city ; and lifts above three thousand volunteers, under the title of Darwishes, without pay, or allowance of provision, merely in the name of God, and in confidence of the divine assistance. With these he comes to Adrianople ; and marching to Selim's temple, at the time of noon-day prayers, first performs his orisons with great devotion, and then makes a speech ; in which he tells them, " It was revealed to him from God, that the cause of the Othmâns ill success of late was not the valour of the Germans, nor the sins of the whole nation, but the ill conduct of seventeen great men, and governors of the empire, as the Wazîr, Janizar Aga, Kaymakâm, Tefterdâr, Reis Effendi, and others whom he named : that unless these were put to death, no advantage could be hoped against the Germans, but greater calamities, and even the destruction of the whole empire were to be expected ; that there being no occasion for a numerous army against the infidels, he had, by God's command, collected a body of soldiers, few in number, and unarmed, but animated by a divine power, and untainted with sin ; with whom he would undertake, not only to stop an innumerable host of Gyawrs, but likewise drive them from the borders of the empire." Sedition begun by Misri Effendi.

THE noise of this affair bringing together great numbers, not only of the common people, but Janizaries, Spahis, and others of the better sort, the Sheykh harangues them for four hours together. The Wazîr being informed hereof, and fearing a sedition, sends the Kaymakâm to desire the Sheykh to come to him : but Misri Effendi answers, " That he was the servant of God, sent to the people of God, to declare what had been revealed to him ; and could see no reason why he should abandon his call, in obedience to such a Gyawr as the Wazîr was." The Kaymakâm perceiving, on account of the people, that he could use no compulsion, returns to the Wazîr, tells him what he had heard, and advises him instantly to disperse the assembly, since the Sheykh's whole discourse tended to sedition against the nobles, and probably the Soltân himself. The Wazîr having sent for the Janizar Aga, and other officers, branded by Misri Effendi with the name of infidels, they send to inform Ahmed, by a Talkbîsh, that the Sheykh, with a body of soldiers disguised like Darwishes, was in the Selimiyah, giving odious appellations to his majesty, and charging the great officers of state with being infidels, as well as friends to the Germans ; whence he declared, that the divine blessing could not be expected upon the Othmân court. The Wazîr alarmed.

THE Soltân, enraged by such misrepresentations, orders the rebel to be seized ; and since he could not be put to death, as wearing the green turban (Y), to be banished with his followers to Prusa. Buyukli Mostafa hereupon sends again the Kaymakân, attended by the Janizar Agasi, and a good number of soldiers, who, in the Soltân's name salute the Sheykh, still holding forth, and inform him, that his majesty hearing of his sanctity, desired to enjoy his conversation, and that he would instantly come to the palace. Misri Effendi told them, " That although they seemed to be sent rather by Sheytân than the Soltân, yet that he would go where-ever they led him : he added, that, to convince them he spoke nothing of himself, they should, in a few hours, receive tokens of a divine evidence." Having said this, he mounted the Soltân's chariot, attended with the guards ; and passes with great honour through crowds of people : but as soon as he is at some distance from the populace, he is put into a covered waggon, and conveyed to Rodos, from whence he is transported to Prusa (Z). Gets him banished.

HIS prediction however was fulfilled two days after by a great whirlwind and storm, which threw down almost all the tents in the camp ; some of which falling on the fires prepared for dressing dinner, and the flames catching hold of some others, above a thousand tents were consumed in one hour's space : nor were the rest saved without great difficulty. The people looked on without giving their assistance, saying, it was a judgment for banishing the servant of God, and witness of the truth. The Soltân himself, struck with terror, sends the Sheykh a respectful letter, and, " intreats his pardon ; confessing himself deceived by the treachery of his ministers ; and desiring him to return to Adrianople, in order to give the army his benediction." Misri Effendi answers, " That he knew at the first the fault of his banishment was in the great men, and not in the Soltân : that he had therefore long since forgiven, His prediction verified.

(X) He was in great renown for his sanctity ; yet many thought him too great a favourer of the Christian religion, for some expressions in the divine poems which he published, and ordered to be sung in the Jami. Cant.

(Y) Which belongs to the Amîrs, or kindred of Mohammed, mentioned in a former note,

(Z) Ricaut mentions this sedition of a learned Turk against the Soltân, as well as the Wazîr, and ministers in general. He places it on the 15th of October, 1694, and says it was quashed by the Kaymakâm, who seized the preacher, and put to death the chief ringleaders ; among whom were a rapacious Pâshâ, two Agas, eleven officers, and an astrologer, who could not foresee his own fate. These tumults were followed by reports of strange prodigies and apparitions, with which the Soltân was very much affrighted.

A. D. 1693. "and even forgotten the crime; but that he could not return to Adrianople, because the spirit, which had prompted him to the first journey thither, would not permit a second."

Fire at Constantinople. MEAN time a fire happened at Constantinople, which burnt down 20,000 houses and shops. This disaster was succeeded by the news that the new Amir of the Arabs, descended from Mohammed, threatened to besiege Bassora (or Basrah), in the Persian gulf, to which he pretended an hereditary right: so that the Soltān was obliged to send troops over, under the command of the Pāshā of Bosnia, to reinforce the militia of those quarters. But being arrived in the neighbourhood of that city, which is all a flat country, the Arabs let out the river by sluices, which overflowing the camp of the Turks, six or seven thousand of them perished in the waters, and the rest were all put to the sword.

Jeno taken. SINCE the taking of Great Waradin, Giula and Jeno had been much streightened by the Imperialists. The latter particularly having been for some time blocked up by Heussler, that general, on the 16th of June began to attack its suburbs, which he took; and having, in a few days more, by his bombs and cannon, made a breach in the city walls, the Turks, not willing to abide a storm, capitulated on the 27th of the same month. Presently after which he went and took the fortrefs of Philagoras<sup>h</sup>.

Belgrade besieged. ABOUT the same time, the Wazir marches from Adrianople, with a design to penetrate by Tekeli's route into Transilvania (A). But hearing at Distra, that the Germans, after taking Jeno and Villagothwar, had besieged Belgrade, he returns towards Chenghe Daghlar, and with no less danger than difficulty, conducts his army through the streights of those mountains, scarce wide enough for an unarmed man to pass. The German general being informed that the Wazir was attempting the conquest of Transilvania, went slowly on with the siege, which had continued twenty days already (B). But when he found Buyukli Mostafa had passed the mountains, he pushed it with such vigour, that by his cannon and mines he had, in eight days, not only demolished the outer walls, but also shaken the inner, in such a manner, as seemed to render him master of the city, although defended by sixteen thousand Othmāns; if the Wazir, leaving behind him his baggage and larger cannon, had not, on the eighth day, advanced to its relief.

The Tatars overthrown. THE Germans perceiving, from the smallness of their numbers, that they could not at the same time carry on the siege and make a stand against the Wazir, who was about to attack their camp, break up, and pass the Save with their whole army. The Othmān general taking their retreat for a flight, informs the Soltān that he had gained a victory; but not daring to cross the river and attack their camp, he sends Selim Gyeray Khān, with his Tatars, to ravage the adjacent provinces of Hungary, and cut off the Germans from all opportunity of procuring provisions. The Khān roving about incautiously, is surrounded at Khonad by the Imperialists appointed to guard those parts, under the command of Hoffkerchen; and shut up in so narrow a space, that he could not make use of his horse, or find any means of escape. Being thus reduced to the necessity of submitting or starving, if he continued in this situation, and finding no other way to get out of it, he engaged the Tatars in a project never before heard of, or practised among them: this was, to kill their horses, and fall upon the enemy on foot with their swords. So unexpected an attack at first confounds the Germans, till, resuming their courage, they inclose them a second time, now almost escaped, and make such a slaughter, that except the Khān, and a few of his attendants, scarce a man of them was saved<sup>i</sup>.

Defeated at Giula. RICAUT gives no account of this action, but does of another of the same general, before Giula, on the 19th of October, citing his letter to the duke of Croy; in which he says, that he fell on the Turks and Tatars unexpectedly, drove them beyond the first Palanka, and made his dragoons pass the ditch on foot: that the enemy were very strong, consisting of 40 troops of horse, 1200 Janizaries, and 2800 Tatars, who came to convoy provisions into the fortrefs: that 1000 of these last were killed, 2500 beasts taken, and all their provision burned. He adds, that he was preparing to follow the Tatars who were marching to Debresin; and perhaps the defeat of them may be the action ascribed to Hoffkerchen by the Turkish historians.

Brunzen Maydan taken. THE Imperialists had this year one other piece of success against the Turks: for count Batheim, Ban of Kroatia, Dalmatia, and Sclavonia, having marched from the river Unna and Kostannizza, on the 19th of September arrived at Brunzein Maydan (C); which was one of the Soltān's magazines, and famous for the iron and copper mines in its neighbourhood. Next day the

<sup>g</sup> CANT. ubi supra. p. 386, & seq.

<sup>h</sup> RICAUT, in Achmet.

<sup>i</sup> CANT. p. 390. See also RICAUT.

(A) Ricaud says, he left Adrianople the 26th of June, O. S. with that design; but hearing the siege of Belgrade was intended, he marched that way with 80,000 men, and supplied the garrison with 3000 men.

(B) According to Ricaud, many blunders were committed in the management of this siege, under the duke of Croy, which ended about the 10th of September 1693;

for the trenches were not opened till 13 days after the place was invested: neither was the fleet for hindering provisions coming to the town ready before it was invested; nor the cannon brought before the place till five weeks after it was invested.

(C) It stands on the river Sana, between Kasanzwitz and Bibacz, to the east.

a artillery began to play ; and for two hours the Turks defended themselves bravely : but at last, the pallisades being cut down, the city-walls were forced, and above 500 men and women put to the sword, among whom were two chief commanders, and a third taken, with many other persons of note. They found a great number of bombs, some 200 weight, store of brass curiously wrought, and other rich plunder, which they carried off, and then burned the city, with its suburbs, to ashes. This loss chagrined the Porte ; but they were more alarmed at a fire which happened at Constantinople on the 26th of August, and burned down one fourth part of the city <sup>k</sup>.

WHILE the Imperialists were revenging on the Tatars the many defeats given by them to the Poles and Polish armies, the Poles themselves, either amused with new offers from *Selim Gyera*y, or deterred by former misfortunes, continue unactive (D). The Venetian arms are likewise quiet in Greece. However, in Dalmatia they besiege Klobukhi, under the conduct of Erizzo, governor of Katarri (or Kattarro), but are repulsed with considerable loss by the Pâshâ of Hercegovina ; who notwithstanding is soon after defeated by Canegotti. <sup>Poles and Venetians inactive.</sup>

MEAN time the Wazîr returns to Adrianople ; but while he expects to be rewarded for raising the siege of Belgrade, and driving the enemy from the borders of the empire, he is deprived of his dignity on a very slight occasion. For going out one day to divert himself with hawking, the Koltûk Wazîrleri, who had long been his enemies, take a handle from hence to persuade the easy Soltân, that he neglected the affairs of state, and minded nothing but his pleasures. Hereupon Ahmed takes from him the imperial seal, and gives it to Shâm Tarabolus Ali Pâshâ (E). However, not to seem ungrateful for his services, the Soltân takes away neither his estate nor his liberty, but makes him also governor of Damaskus ; a rare example among the Turks. <sup>The Wazîr changed.</sup>

ALI PASHA considering the distressed state of the empire, and despairing of victory, as soon as he is advanced to the Wazîrship, endeavours to make peace with the Germans and Poles (F), exclusive of the Venetians : but as, on one hand, the emperor refused to treat on any terms, unless they were parties ; and on the other, the French ambassador, by presents and great promises, had gained both the nobles and Ulema firmly on his side, they unanimously opposed that design. The Wazîr being thus disappointed, in the end of the year 1105, sends the Seraskier into Hungary, who assaulting Titul, is repulsed with great loss by Caprara, general of the Imperialists ; but the Germans were not able to improve this victory ; the emperor, intent on the war with France, having left but a small army in Hungary <sup>Peace opposed.</sup>.

TITUL, in the Turkish account, seems to be a mistake for Peterwaradin ; and one of the most famous actions in all this war is here passed over in silence. The imperial army in 1694, not being so numerous as it used to be, the marshal count Caprara who commanded it, understanding, that the Wazîr intended to attack Peterwaradin, entrenched himself about that place. In effect, the Wazîr did arrive with his army in view of the Imperialists ; but instead of falling on them, he also entrenched himself ; and, what till then was unheard of, began his approaches against the retrenchments of the enemy. Count Caprara, surprised at this novelty, found it expedient to make another retrenchment between the former and the town ; to which, upon occasion, he might retire ; and to furnish it with mines before the ditches, in order to stop the Wazîr's progress. To this general account of the matter given by count Marfigli <sup>m</sup>, who, according to his method, has also inserted a plan of the whole with explanations, we shall add the particulars from Ricaut. <sup>The Germans attacked at Peterwaradin by the Wazîr,</sup>

THE imperial troops increasing but slowly, they resolved to act only upon the defensive, and therefore to remain encamped at Peterwaradin, within the retrenchment of last year. On the 9th of September the Turkish army arriving from Belgrade, under the Wazîr Ali Pâshâ of Tripoli (G), appeared in sight of the Imperialists, who had scarce time to repair the damages made the day before by a storm, which had carried away all their tents, broken their bridge of boats, and sunk several of their ships. On the 10th, the whole army came within half an

<sup>k</sup> RICAUT, ubi supra.

<sup>1</sup> CANT. p. 390, & seqq.

<sup>m</sup> L'Etat. Milit. Emp. Oth. p. 98, & seqq. part ii.

(D) Ricaut observes, that the French ambassador procured an ambassador from the Porte to be sent to Warsaw ; so that it was generally believed a peace would be concluded : but he says, the Venetians neither did, nor attempted any thing in the year 1693.

(E) That is, Ali Pâshâ, governor of Tripoli in Syria.

(F) Ricaut says, that about May 1694, the Polish ambassador was dismissed from Adrianople, re infecta ; and that the mystery of his embassy (which was properly to the Tatar Khân, who gave him audience, his letter being directed to that prince), could never be unravelled ; for that though he pretended to treat of peace in the name of all the confederates, the rest knew nothing of it : but it was supposed to have been an artifice of the French to bring Poland into a separate peace ; which perhaps had taken effect, had not the ambassador too earnestly insisted on the surrender of Kaminiek, with all the provisions, arms, and fortresses ; besides the uti possidetis, which term the Turks mortally hated.

(G) According to Ricaut, this Pâshâ of Tripoli was different from the Ali of the Turkish historians. That author makes two of the name, and says, one was made Wazîr early in March ; and being soon after deposed, was succeeded by the second Ali of Tripoli, who arrived from Asia the 18th of April following.

A. D. 1694. hour's march of the imperial intrenchments; the foot took their quarters next to the German front; the horse to the left of their foot; and on the left of those was camped the Tatars. Their fleet consisting of 110, came likewise within cannon-shot of the imperial ships, and cast anchor in a line of battle.

NEXT day it was thought the Turks would have stormed the imperial camp; for they appeared within 800 paces of the retrenchment, behind the earth of a ditch, which covered them so well, that the imperial guns could but little annoy them. On the 12th, the camps and fleets began to fire furiously on each other: the attack of the Turks seeming to be a formal siege both of Peterwaradin, and the imperial camp; for they plied both with their bombs and cannon till the 18th, when they shewed themselves beyond the imperial intrenchments, but were quickly driven back by the Hussars. They likewise drew a new parallel line 60 paces nearer to the imperial camp, and were busy to close it with their line of communication. On the 19th, the German left wing, with great guns and muskets, from an eminence, very much annoyed the first line of the Turks, who ran, horse and foot from all sides, to strengthen their left wing; and that evening, six battalions of Brandenburg foot arriving, the enemy seemed less brisk in their attack.

who is repulsed.

BUT what most incommoded them, was the loss of 25 of their provision ships taken by the governor of Titul, who also sunk three frigates; and fifteen hundred Tatars cut off in an incursion by general Bassompierre. The son of the Khân being among the slain, that prince incensed, threatened to return with his troops. For all this, the Wazîr persisted in his attacks till the 13th of October, when the rains falling for seven days successively, so that the soldiers were up to their knees in the trenches, he at length drew off in the night<sup>n</sup>. These terrible rains, says count Marsigli, convinced the Wazîr of his folly; nor could he have succeeded in his design, had his army been double the number<sup>o</sup>. The Turks thus ended the campaign; but the Germans, after this, added Giula to their other conquests. Let us now return to the Turkish historians.

Venetians take Khios:

THE Polish and Russian forces this year also continue to guard their own frontiers, neither power performing or attempting any thing remarkable. The Venetians alone push the Turks this campaign with vigour, and effect that which would have gained them the dominion of the sea, if they had known how to use their good fortune with prudence and moderation. Early in spring, they send out a fleet by invitation of the inhabitants of Khios, devoted to the Romish religion (H), and attack that island. Silahdar Hassan Pâshâ, who was then governor, had resolved to make a brave defence; but finding the Christian inhabitants endeavour to deliver up the town without his consent, and having but a few Turkish forces in garrison, to avoid being made a prisoner, surrenders the place himself (I). The Venetians hereupon, to oblige the pope, shut up the Greek churches; and partly by force, and partly by artifice, compel the inhabitants to conform to the Romish church: acting also in many other things contrary to justice, and the terms of the surrender.

Threaten Smyrna:

HAVING settled at pleasure the affairs of Khios, they resolve to besiege Smyrna: but the French, English, and Dutch consuls, meeting them in their march, intercede for that city; urging, among other reasons against a siege, that almost all the warehouses there were full of merchandize of their respective nations; and that if they should be destroyed or plundered by the soldiers, the republick would be responsible to their masters for the damage with interest. Upon this the Venetians desist from their design, and return with their fleet. In Dalmatia, however, under the command of Delfini, they take Kiklut and Klobukh, which last they attempted the year before. The Seraskier, Soleyman Pâshâ, governor of Albania, endeavouring twice to recover the former, is both times repulsed: for which reason, being accused of negligence to the Soltân, he is deprived of his post, and succeeded by Elmas Mehemmed Pâshâ, governor of Bosnia, lately sent from the Saray.

Success in Dalmatia.

<sup>n</sup> RICAUT, ubi supra.

<sup>o</sup> L'Etat Milit. ubi supra.

(H) Originally from Italy, chiefly Venice. They possessed the greater part of the island; the Greeks the rest; and enjoyed more privileges than the other subjects of the Othmân empire. After the Vienna defeat, they became spies for the Venetians, and sent them an account of whatever was done in the Turkish fleet. When the Venetians had conquered the Morea, they resolved to deliver up their island to them: but first founded the Greeks, who, believing they could depend neither on their integrity nor protection against the Turks, sent notice to the Kâpudân Pâshâ to be on his guard. The Latins having discovered this, invite the Venetian admiral, who comes and takes the city, as mentioned in the text. The Venetians, now masters, exercise cruelty equally on the Greeks and Turks; forbid the exercise of their religion; and deem them rebels, unless they frequent the Romish churches. But next year, the island being taken by Medzomorto, they were justly treated in the same manner themselves. Cant.

(I) Ricaut only says, that the Venetians by surprise, with little difficulty, took the island in a few days; that at first both the castle and forts capitulated; and on the 19th of September 1694, all was delivered up. Lastly, that the Turks were struck with a terrible consternation at the news.

a WHILE the Othmân arms are successful in all parts of Europe, a new sedition breaks out in Asia. Amîr Mobammed, one of the Arab princes, with several thousands of his countrymen, plunder and spoil the karawân going in pilgrimage to Mekka (K). A. D. 1694.
The Arabs
in arms.

AFTERWARDS, augmenting the number of his troops, he besieges Mekka itself : but touched with reverence for the place, and the dread of sacrilege, retires from before it. The Beglerbeg of Shâm (or Damaskus), attended by the other Pâshâs of those parts, is sent against him : but the Shaykh defeats them all by a stratagem, and puts them to flight <sup>p</sup>.

b THE Amîr Mobammed, in the foregoing paragraph, seems, from circumstances, to be the Amîr mentioned before from Ricaut, who about this time speaks of the Sharîf (L) being in arms ; and having plundered a very rich city, he says, that his army, which observed exact discipline, was divided in two parts : that one division remained with the Sharîf, encamped between Mekka and Medina ; the other in the province of Bâfrab, to oppose the Pâshâs on that side, and cut off all communication with Hâlep, or Aleppo. At length the Mufti, from a sense of the empire's low condition, wrote to the Sharîf, exhorting him to peace ; declaring, that he could not, without betraying the Musulman interest, persist in war against the Soltân, at a time when the Othmân empire was oppressed on all sides with enemies. This letter of the Mufti was seconded by exhortations from many Pâshâs, Mollahs, Kâdis, Shaykhs, and other religious : even Kalailikos Ahmed Pâshâ, who was sent with forces against the Sharîf, became an advocate for peace, making use of the pen instead of the sword. These admonitions in behalf of religion, had so good effect, that first several Arab princes fell off from their alliance with the Sharîf, and at length the Sharîf himself desisted from hostilities. Persuaded to peace.

c THE year 1695 began with a terrible fire in Constantinople, which consumed 4000 houses and shops : however, preparations for war went on both by sea and land <sup>q</sup>. Mean time, the empire being surrounded with so many enemies, and almost intirely ruined, Soltân Ahmed, in the year 1106, leaves (M) the world, having lived fifty years, and reigned four. Ahmed dies.
Hej. 1106.
A. D. 1695.

d IN his temper and disposition, he intirely resembled his brother Soleymân, to whom in devotion he was a little inferior ; but was of a somewhat more lively, though not acute genius. He listened to the calumnies raised by his domestic officers ; and on their suggestions, often for flight causes, changed the most important affairs. He affected to appear a lover of justice, though, by reason of his stupidity, he could not discharge the function of a judge ; and believed every thing which his friends, bribed by the contending parties, represented to him <sup>r</sup>.

RICAUT gives a more advantageous character of him ; as that he was a very good-natured prince, who feared no hurt himself, nor intended harm to any body : that he was of a lively, free, jocund humour ; being both a poet and musician, so that he made verses and sang them. He played well also on the Citern and Koloffeo, after the Persian manner. The same author says, that the cause of his death was a great defluxion on the lungs ; that in his last agony, he desired to speak to his brother Mostafa : and that Mostafa not being to be persuaded to go to him, he ordered him to be told, all his desire was, that he would permit his son to live <sup>s</sup>.

e He had large black eyes, a pale complexion, a round sandy beard, with a mixture of black ; a strait and long nose, a middle stature, with a prominent belly, occasioned rather by the dropfy than fat <sup>t</sup>.

<sup>p</sup> CANT. p. 391, & seq.
<sup>t</sup> CANT. ubi supra.

<sup>q</sup> RICAUT, ubi supra.

<sup>r</sup> CANT. p. 394.

<sup>s</sup> RICAUT, ubi supra.

(K) After the time of Selim I. 40,000 gold crowns were paid yearly to the Arabs of the desert between Damaskus, Bâgdâd, and Mekka, by way of bounty, under the denomination of Surreh, as if paid them for securing the roads, but, in reality, to restrain them from robbing the karawâns. Now the Surreh not being sent for some years, on account of the Hungarian war, was the occasion of this attack. But the most illustrious

Khân of Tartary being taken among the pilgrims, the Arabs obliged him to carry their complaint to the Soltân ; and he never rested till the arrears were paid. Cant.

(L) This must be understood of the prince of Mekka, who pretends to be a descendant of Mohammed.

(M) The 27th of January, 1694-5. Ricaut puts it on the same day.

C H A P. XXIII.

The Reign of Mostafa II.

S E C T. I.

Transactions to the Battle of Olash.

A. D. 1794;
1212 Mostafa II.

AFTER Ahmed's death, the Wazîr Shâm Tarabolus Ali Pâshâ attempts to set aside Mostafa, eldest son of Mohammed IV. as Kyoprili Mostafa Pâshâ had done on the death of Soltân Selym II. but not with the like success. To gain this point, he calls a council of the principal officers of state, and exhorts them to place Ibrâhîm, the son of Abmed, a prince of three years old, on the throne; alleging that it was unjust to give the crown from the son of a Soltân who died in possession of it, to the son of one who had been deposed. These were his pretences: but his true reason was, that he feared to lose, under a prince of vigour, and versed in affairs as Mostafa was, that absolute power over the state and army which he had enjoyed under Abmed, and hoped to continue, without danger or controul, under his infant son. But before he could gain the great men to his opinion, Nezîr Aga, the Hazandâr Bâshi (N), informs Mostafa of his brother's death; and releasing him from his confinement, calls on him to assume the Othmân sceptre. The prince readily agrees to such grateful advice; and, while the Wazîr is consulting about the election of a Soltân, without his knowlege ascends the throne, where he is first saluted emperor by Chalik Abmed Aga (O), and Cherkies Mohammed Aga (P).

Confirms the Wazir.

THIS election being notified to the rest of the courtiers, it was extremely agreeable to them, and all met to kiss the Soltân's robe. The Wazîr himself, finding his designs prevented by the domestic officers, hastens, with an air of joy in his countenance, to pay his devoir; and is presented with a robe lined with fables by the new emperor; who dissembling his resentment, orders him to take care of the affairs; and the third day after declares his intention to command the army in person against the Germans (Q). He examines, orders, and disposes every thing; appoints great cannon to be cast, and directs the military preparations: nor was he unmindful of his father's faithful officers, dispersed in distant countries; these he rewards with new posts. Among the rest, Elmas Mohammed Pâshâ (R), his father's most beloved chamberlain, is sent for out of Bosnia, and first made Nishânji Pâshâ (S), then Rekiub Kaymaykâm (T). By this means he gains such a reputation, that the people revere him as a sun rising from behind a thick cloud; and the soldiers come voluntarily, offering themselves to serve under him the ensuing campaign.

Puts him to death.

ALL things being ready, early in the spring he commands the Wazîr to encamp without Adrianople. Three days after, disguising himself, to know what was said of him and his ministers by the soldiers, he finds, that they still supposed every thing to be directed at pleasure by the Wazîr, without his knowlege. As this increased his resentment against that great officer, he resolves to destroy him; and perceiving, while he examines the warlike stores, that the carriages of the larger cannon were not sufficiently strengthened with iron, sharply reprimands him. The Wazîr, to clear himself, casts the blame on the Topchi Bâshi (U): but this

(N) Or keeper of the treasure deposited in the women's Saray. He was soon after made Kizler Aga, and continued so the whole reign of Mostafa, with so much authority, that the Wazîrs feared him. But after Mostafa's deposition, the rebels laying on him the blame of all which had been done amiss, he was sent to Egypt. Cant.

(O) Chalik signifies maimed or wounded. He was Imrabor, but would never accept of a Pâshâlik. There was another of the name, who was made Janizar Aga by the rebels under Abmed III. Cant.

(P) He succeeded Chalik Abmed Aga as Buyûk Imrabor, or great sword-bearer; was afterwards Pâshâ of Halep; then of Jerusalem; and lastly, Seraskier of the Morta, as he now is. Cant.

(Q) According to Ricaut, on this occasion, there having been only 15 purses left in the treasury by Abmed, the great officers and Ulema were taxed; the Wazîr in a million and half, besides five millions in jewels. The queen mother advanced seven millions and a half in ready money; and half a million was taken from the widow of the late Soltân.

(R) For his great beauty called Elmas, or the diamond, by Soltân Mohammed IV. He was discrete, sober, and prudent, free from covetousness (a rare instance among the Turkish nobility), and a great lover of justice; except when reasons of state obliged him to make away with rivals. Though not so experienced in war as other old Pâshâs, the defect was supplied by good natural parts, and a wonderful quickness in executing affairs. Cant.

(S) He who sets the Tura, mark, or character, of the Soltân's name at the top of all the Fermâns, or orders which are made. This is a very honourable place. Cant.

(T) That is, Deputy stirrup-holder, who is appointed to transact affairs when the Wazîr is at war. Cant.

(U) Overseer of the cannon, and soldiers thereto belonging, with the Kambaraji, or gunners. The powder, balls, and rest of the artillery, are under the care of the Jebiji Fâshi. Cant.

latter,

a latter, in his own defence, declares, that the Wazîr had refused to give him the iron that was wanting. The Wazîr not being able to deny this, Soltân Mostafa orders him to be put to death, and his body to be exposed for three days in the Sirik Meydân <sup>A. D. 1695.</sup>

He is succeeded by Elmas Mohammed Pâshâ before-mentioned, a person of most acute genius, and worthy that dignity; but not without the murmurs of the old Pâshâs, who resented that they should be commanded by a youth unexperienced in affairs. However, Soltân Mostafa, regardless of these murmurs, passes the Danube (W), with his army, near Belgrade, and takes Lippa (X). Afterwards he reduces Titul, and demolishes the walls of both places. Mean time, being informed by the Tatar scouts, that Veterani, with 7000 Germans, from Transylvania, was within eight hours march of the imperial army, commanded by Frederick Augustus (Y), elector of Saxony, he sends Mahmûd Beg Oglî, Beglerbeg of Rûm-Ili, with the light-armed forces to intercept them, and follows hastily with the rest of his army. The second day he comes in sight of the Germans, who might be called the most courageous troops which Germany ever produced: for, without any sign of fear, they halt; and in a manner challenge to battle the Turks, pouring upon them in prodigious numbers.

MAHMUD BEG OGLI, though much superior in strength, orders his troops not to engage, but only keep the enemy in play till the arrival of the Soltân, who immediately orders his Janizaries to attack them on all sides. On the other hand, the imperial general, leaving two regiments to guard the camp, had drawn out but 5000 men into the field; who yet so bravely sustain the shock of the Othmâns, that, after a short opposition, they are obliged to retire. The Soltân perceiving from a distance so unexpected a slaughter of his men, in a rage advances; and killing several of the runaways with his own hand, urges the rest to renew the fight. The Turks, excited by the shame of their repulse, passing by the left wing of the Germans, attack their camp surrounded with carriages, and break into it, though with considerable loss. Veterani seeing this, leads back his troops; and falling on the plunderers, makes a greater slaughter than before.

HEREUPON the Turks again fly without stopping, till met by the Soltân: who, seeing Shahîn Mohammed Pâshâ, reproaches him in these terms; "He was guilty of a great error who called thee Shahîn, that is, the falcon, since thou doest not, like a falcon with rapacious talon, strike at thy enemy's head; but like a crane, draw after thee a company of fugitives." Shahîn, stung with these expressions, rallies with Mohammed Beg the flying troops; and resolving to conquer or die, makes a third attack upon the Germans. The Janizâr Aga, reprimanded by the Wazîr, does the like by the dispersed Janizaries. Thus the fight being renewed, continues for several hours with great ardor; and the Germans would probably have withstood all their efforts, if Veterani had not, in the heat of the battle, been obliged by a wound (Z) to quit his horse, and get into a waggon; for on sight of this, the Imperialists, destitute of a commander, retire.

HOWEVER, this retreat was performed in so good order, that Soltân Mostafa, perceiving it dangerous by pursuit to drive such valiant hearts to despair, privately orders the Mufti, by some means, to keep the Othmân army in the camp. This that prelate effects by a Fetvâ, declaring, That it is contrary to the precepts of the Korân to pursue too closely a flying enemy; and that he would lose the crown of martyrdom, who should perish in such a case. And indeed the Soltân had many important reasons for restraining his soldiers from any farther engagement; since the death of 1000 horse and 1500 foot, slain on the enemy's part, had been revenged by the slaughter of the chief officers of the army (A), with about 10,000 common soldiers. The Soltân therefore, leaving the Germans to make a secure retreat, leads back his forces towards the Danube. In this march he takes Logush and Karansebes, places destitute of defence (B); and demolishing * CANT. in Mostafa II. p. 395, & seqq.

(W) He set out the 10th of June, with an army of 50,000 men, ordering, among other regulations, that no man should be served by boys, or ride into cultivated grounds. Ricaut.

(X) On the 7th of September 1695, putting all the garrison to the sword: for the Turks having got a good way before, the elector of Saxony, who had a somewhat stronger army, not able to overtake them, on account of the bad ways, after four days march, was obliged to turn back to his former camp, leaving the enemy at liberty to attack Lippa; which they took by storm, after four hours desperate engagement. Ricaut.

(Y) Called by the Turks, Naal Kiran, or the horse-breaker; on account of his wonderful strength when young. Cant. The elector was advanced again, in hopes to overtake the Turks at Lippa; but they being reinforced with 6000 Tatars, were marched towards Transylvania to attack Veterani in his camp, where he had 6500 men. Ricaut.

(Z) He was shot through the body with a musket-ball, and cut over the head with a scymitar, of which wounds he died. All his men were cut to pieces, having had to deal with 18,000 Janizaries, and 40,000 Spahis. Ricaut.

(A) Mahmûd Beg Oglî, Beglerbeg of Rûm-Ili; Shahîn Mehemed Pâshâ; Îbrâhîm Pâshâ, brother of Kojah Jaffer Pâshâ, and others of the first rank.

(B) According to Ricaut, the Soltân, for these exploits, got great esteem among his great men; altho' nothing could be ascribed to his experience, nor did he give any great

A. D. 1695. demolishing them, returns triumphant through Walakbia (C) to Constantinople. On the other <sup>a</sup> hand, Frederick Augustus having rather shewn his troops to the enemy, than led them to battle, without any trophies sends them into winter-quarters.

The Poles
quiet.

THE Poles, either on account of the king's indisposition, or deterred by their former losses, do not venture to re-enter Moldavia this campaign; content with having secured their conquests, and defended their borders from the perpetual incursions of the Tatars. These never failed every year to lay waste Podolia and Pokutia, as far as Leopolis, and take the inhabitants prisoners, who confided too much in the Polish arms; nay the winter was hardly over, when Kaplân Gyeray, Khân of Krîm, assaulted the very suburbs of that city, carried off four pieces of cannon from the very gate, and returned with above 14,000 prisoners; having been within a little of seizing general Yablonowski himself (D). Peter I. Czar of Russia, with a <sup>b</sup> design intirely to destroy this pest, in the beginning of summer attacks Azak (or Asof) the strongest bulwark of Krîm Tartary; but his soldiers, not being yet used to sieges, he was forced to retire (E) without success.

Venetian
affairs.

THE war was carried on most successfully this year against the Venetians (F), who, flushed with their conquest of Kbios (G), claimed the dominion of the sea; and the Turkish ships not daring to appear, frequent consultations were held at the Porte, for the restoration of their naval power. In these Mezzo Morto (H), at that time no more than the commander of a single ship, made a figure: for being sent for to the council, he not only advised them against a defensive war, which the majority was inclined to, but undertook to recover Kbios himself with four Soltâns only, and eight galleys. The admiral Amujeh Oglî Huseyn Pâshâ, at this <sup>c</sup> proposal, treats him with contempt, as a presumptuous rash man; and even adds threats to his reprimand. But the Seraskier, Mesrî Oglî (I), who had the chief direction of the war against the Venetians, approving of his scheme, delivers to him the ships which he wanted <sup>w</sup>.

Defeated by Mezzo
Morto.

WITH these Mezzo Morto sails for Kbios, followed soon after by the whole Turkish fleet; and after taking two of the Venetian ships, appointed for the defence of the haven, obliges the rest to fly (K). The garrison, who before contemned the Turks, on sight of this defeat, quite lose their courage. They never imagined, that the Turkish fleet, so often defeated, could be repaired so soon; or that there was any person among the enemy able to teach them the art of naval war: so that trusting solely to their fleet, they had taken no care to fortify their city. And as their whole business there had been to shut up the Greek churches, and commit other <sup>d</sup> violences in breach of their faith, so now finding themselves unable to defend the place against so numerous an army, they turn their resentment against their fellow citizens; and calling them traitors, resolve to plunder and kill them. The Greeks seeing themselves in this dangerous situation, endeavour to mitigate the fury of their tyrants, and incline them to mercy, by giv-

<sup>w</sup> CANT. ubi supra, p. 397 & seq.

great indication of bravery: for in all actions he kept at a distance, and out of musket-shot; yet he wrote several letters to his mother, and several Pâshâs, extolling his actions, and declaring, that he had slain 10,000 Germans, and taken 3000 prisoners.

(C) In passing through Walakbia, strict discipline was kept. A Tatar was hanged for taking a kid by force; and two Turks for robbing a bee-hive. The Soltân stopped a while about Widdin, and crossed the Danube opposite to Nikopolis.

(D) Ricaut inserts a letter of the Polish general himself, who gives a different account, viz. That on the 10th of February, 1695, Zabas (or Shabaz) Gherey, son of the Khân, encamped with 70,000 Tatars, in the plains of Crakowian Leopolis, with design to plunder, and carry off slaves, which they did for eight days: that next day the general gathering only 3000 men, making a sally to secure the suburbs, was attacked by the enemy, who strove to force the outworks, fortified only with hedges, and a wall of matts; but after thirteen desperate attacks in four hours, were repulsed with great slaughter: that they then got between them and the city, with design to keep the Poles employed on that side, while they broke through the hedge on the other side; but after two hours assault, were repulsed with great loss, though the number was unknown. Of the Poles, only 100 were killed. Next day the Tatars marched homeward.

(E) According to Ricaut, the Russians took Asof after 57 days siege, the Khân of Krîm arriving there two days after the surrender.

(F) They however have success in the Morea, from whence a strong party of them advance as far as Thebes; when, after giving the Turks an intire defeat, they ravage all the country, and carry off a great booty, besides a vast number of prisoners. Ricaut.

(G) It is by the Turks called Sakis, which signifies Maslick, because the island abounds with it. It is commonly named Scio by Europeans.

(H) Mezzo, pronounced Metzo.—An African, born of Moorish parents, famous for his piracies when young, from Tunis. Being so grievously wounded in a fight, wherein he was taken by the Spaniards, that his life was despaired of, he got the name of Mezzo Morto, or half dead. After 17 years imprisonment, he was redeemed, and fell to his old trade with great success. For his services at Kbios, he was made captain of a galley; and when the Soltân was going to confer on him the honour of admiral and Wazîr, with three Tûgs, he was allowed to retain his sailor's habit. When urged by the other Wazîrs to lay it aside, he said, the Turkish dress did not suit with sailors, and that fine cloaths were the greatest reproach to a mariner; so that since then, all the admirals and captains of ships have worn the sea habit. He instructed the sailors and marine forces in the art of fighting at sea. Cant.

(I) Next to Koja Jaffer for bravery. He was so called as being the son of Egyptian parents. Cant.

(K) Ricaut says, they were worsted in two engagements at sea, to the great wonder of Europe, and loss of their reputation; and that the Turks, had they followed their blow, might have destroyed the whole fleet.

ing

a ing them strong proofs of their fidelity : but finding the calumnies of their accusers prevail against them, for want of a better remedy, they inform the Seraskier of the danger they are in. A. D. 1695.

THAT general, imagining this to be a stratagem of the Venetians to prevent a sudden attack, defers undertaking the siege of Khios ; and so gives the Venetians time, after plundering the inhabitants and churches, to embark with their effects on board the ships remaining in the harbour (L). Next day the Seraskier, acquainted with the flight of the Venetians, takes the city ; and dragging out from their lurking places such as their ships could not contain, puts them to death. He likewise constrains those Khians, who had turned Romanists, either to conform to the Greek church, or submit to captivity ; and restoring to the Greeks the churches taken from them, shuts up those of the Latins (M) : thus retaliating on the latter all the acts of tyranny which they had exercised on the former (N). Nor was their misfortune much alleviated by a victory gained by them near Argos, in which 400 Turks were said to have been slain. They desert Khios.

IN Arabia, the rebel Shaykh Amîr Mohammed is defeated by the pilgrims guarded by Arslân Pâshâ, governor of Tripoli, with some troops ; and that dangerous wound of the Othmân empire healed for a time. Soltân Mostafa, on his return to Adrianople, solemnizes, with great pomp, these victories, as so many happy omens of his reign ; and appoints Mezzo Morto, by whose conduct he had recovered Khios, high admiral. He likewise rewards the rest, who had distinguished themselves in this campaign ; while the Turks in general, animated by their late successes, on issuing his commands for raising a more numerous army, list themselves voluntarily in great numbers. But, before he had made the necessary preparations for the field, Frederick Augustus, elector of Saxony, at the end of the year 1107, besieges Temeswaer, with the imperial army. The Soltân on this news, hastes to its relief ; on whose approach the Germans abandon the enterprise, and encamp eight hours distance from that city, with a resolution to wait for the Othmâns. The Arabs defeated. Hejrah, 1107. A. D. 1696.

THE Othmâns soon after come up, and pitching their tents in sight of the enemy, by advice of Tekeli, who attended on the Soltân, fortify their camp with strong ramparts, as well as wide and deep trenches ; a method unusual with the Turks. The night following the imperial general resolves on a bold attempt, which would have been very glorious, if crowned with success. There lay between the two camps a place full of briars, surrounded with a marshy ground, scarce an Italian mile over ; but so thick, that a person unarmed could not pass through it. Here he orders twenty-four different paths to be cut ; and at day break, the army, with as many cannon, to march through, and attack the Turkish ramparts. The soldiers execute these orders with great bravery ; and having discharged their artillery three or four times, make a vigorous assault on the Soltân's camp : but unluckily for the Imperialists, they happened upon the strongest part of it, where the Janizaries, and Mesrli with his Egyptians, were posted. For all this, they penetrated their trenches, and made a great slaughter, which struck such a terror into their whole army, that the Soltân himself left his tent, and retired to the farthest part of the camp : but soon after they are overpowered by numbers, and repulsed with great loss of men, besides their twenty-four cannon. The Turks attacked, and Germans repulsed.

c THIS victory was chiefly owing to the Wazîr Etmas Mohammed Pâshâ, who first, with his men, stopped the fury of the Germans, now pressing to the Soltân's pavilions ; and by his example encouraged the Janizaries, thrown into the utmost confusion by the sudden irruption of the enemy. After the Germans had given way, they were intirely routed by the Bostânji (O) ; who, though designed only for the Soltân's guard, and never employed before in any military service, were, in this danger, sent by Mostafa to assist the Janizaries. However, there were slain on the side of the Turks, Mostafa Pâshâ, governor of Temeswaer, the Wazîr's

(L) Ricaut only says, that all things being put in a consternation at Scio, from the two defeats suffered by the fleet, the Venetian commanders most shamefully abandoned the island in the night ; leaving some troops, who were abroad to guard the isle, to be made slaves of.

(M) When Mezzo Morto had taken the island, the Latins earnestly desired the same privileges from whence they had excluded the Greeks : but the latter representing, that they could not be safe, while mixed with the Latins, who had lately betrayed the town, and would do so again, the Soltân, on the Kâpudan Pâshâ's report, condemns them all to the galleys, and their effects to be distributed among the Greeks. Nor could the French ambassador get them exempted from the galleys upon any other condition, but that they should renounce the Romish, and profess the Greek religion : so that at present there is not the least sign of a papist in Khios. Cant.

(N) According to Ricaut, they hanged up four ; two of whom were deputies appointed to protect the Romish religion. Some however escaped, with 40 of the chief families, who left all their possessions and immovables behind them : by which revolution the Greeks gained a full ascendant over the Latins.

(O) Or gardeners, instituted with a view, that, while they exercised themselves in the culture of gardens, they might be accustomed to heat, cold, and other severities of the weather ; and so become fitter to bear the fatigues of war. From them were formerly chosen the Azapli, or furious, the lowest kind of soldiery ; and out of these the Janizaries. But these latter being now recruited out of their own sons, and such as will enlist, the Bostânji are employed only to guard the Soltân's palace, dress his gardens, and row his barge. They are commanded by an officer, called Bostânji Pâshi, and never were used before this action, as soldiers to repel an enemy. Cant.

A. D. 1696. brother, and many other officers of note, besides several thousand Janizaries and Egyptians.<sup>a</sup> Of the Germans, those only were killed who were found in the trenches. The rest of the army stood the whole day in order of battle, expecting the Othmâns: but the Soltân, content with the present victory, orders the Mufti, by a Fetva, to prohibit any farther engagement; and a few days after, marching eastward, puts an end to the campaign*.

Turks how posted.

As our historians are silent with regard to the Germans cutting roads through the bushes, so they mention other circumstances of moment not related by the Turks. According to them, the elector of Saxony, on the 30th of August, N. S. marched from his camp at Olasch; and, having given out, that he designed to besiege Temeswaer, the Turks passed the Danube in order to observe his motions. On the 20th of September the elector advanced, and repulsed some of the enemy's cavalry with considerable slaughter, and next day was informed, by a Chausb<sup>b</sup> taken prisoner, that the Janizaries were advantageously posted on the right side of a morass, their quarters reaching to the banks of the Temes: that another body of them encamped to the left, along the banks of the brook Bege, against which place their cannon was pointed, as being the only passage for an enemy to come at them; and that their camp was so well fortified on all sides, that they were not to be attacked without much difficulty and danger.

Battle of Olasch.

To invite the Imperialists to a battle, the Turks, on the 24th, sallied out of their intrenchments, and in two hours time made other lines, where, having planted their artillery, the cannonading began briskly on both sides. On the 26th, they advanced in order of battle; and having, under cover of bushes, shrubs, and some trees, posted themselves between Temeswaer and the Imperialists, the latter marched directly to attack them: but they were so fortified with the bushes and ditches, that it was difficult to come at them. They had also a bog behind them, and a marsh on their left, besides three ranks of waggons chained together in the front; so that the attack seemed almost impracticable: however the generals being resolved upon it, at five in the evening six battalions of foot, sustained by two regiments of dragoons, under general Heusler, marching into the bushes, charged the Turks in flank, whom they galled exceedingly with their fire.

The armies fight with various success.

THE enemy's horse hereupon advanced, and charging the imperial line with great fury, 1200 of their best horse broke through two Saxon battalions, notwithstanding their brave resistance. But lieutenant-general Zinzendorf, with some regiments of horse belonging to the same line, beat them back, and again closed the line with Saxon battalions; after which he attacked the Janizaries in their intrenchments, and beat them back from their post. For all this, the enemy's foot being reinforced, and their horse taking the Germans in the flank, they were obliged to retire; only two regiments of dragoons, commanded by the young prince of Vaudemont, advanced to sustain them, and repulsed the Turkish horse. But the Janizaries returning to the charge, the dragoons suffered very much by their fire, officers as well as soldiers; when general Heusler, bringing up another regiment to their assistance, beat back the enemy to their intrenchments, although he was himself dangerously wounded.

MEAN time another body of Turkish horse charged a body of Germans on the second line, who received them in such a manner as gave a check to their fury. Then Roses advancing with the horse of the same line, drove them back, and pursued them above nine Hungarian miles, at which time victory began to declare in favour of the Imperialists; and that general had orders to give over the pursuit. However some other squadrons of horse followed them to their intrenchments, from whence the Turks made so fierce a fire, both with great and small shot, that they were forced to retire, and were pursued by the enemy's horse, who put into disorder another of the imperial regiments which fell in their way. Roses, observing this, advanced with the regiment of Caprara, and, charging the enemy in flank, cut off above 1000 of them.

HEREUPON the whole line marched forward, and pushed the Turks into their trenches; where they were in such a consternation, that the Soltân himself, with much difficulty, obliged them to keep their ground, and defend their intrenchments, killing several, who would have fled, with his own hand.

Their losses.

AT length the approach of night put an end to the battle, which the Imperialists would have renewed the next day, but that the Turks had so fortified their camp before morning, as to have rendered it almost impregnable. The Imperialists lost here a great many men, besides several brave officers, particularly general Heusler, and major-general Poland, who died of their wounds: they likewise lost some cannon in the heat of the action, because their carriages were shot to pieces. On the other hand, the Turks had above 8000 men killed, according to the report of a Pâshâ taken prisoner in the battle†.

* CANT. p. 400, & seqq.

† RICAUT, in Mosafa II.

a THE Poles, besides their usual slowness, were prevented this year from raising an army, by the death of John Sobieski, after a long illness, on the 17th of Zilkaadeh (P); whence ensued the cabals which attend the election of a new king of that nation. Mean time Peter, Czar of Russia, assisted by officers and gunners brought from Germany, with a larger and better disciplined army than the year before, assaults Azâk (or Asof) with such vigour, that the garrison, after being reduced to 400, surrendered the castle on the 18th of Zilbajeh (Q): and their example is soon followed by those of the castle of Luttikh, opposite to it.

A. D. 1697.
Russians take Asof.

b WHILE the Russians prevail on this side, the Venetians besiege Dulcineum, a port famous for the resort of the Turkish pirates; but are obliged by the garrison to raise the siege, after they had bravely repulsed Omer Beg, Pâshâ of Arnaud, from their trenches: although it is likely they would have received a notable defeat, had not Liberakhi, prince of Mania, drawn his countrymen, by a stratagem to revolt, so that the Othmân forces being thus weakened, the Seraskier thought fit to retreat. The Venetians, on the other hand, content with defending their former acquisitions, apply themselves to repair Hexamilion (R), in order to secure the Morea by land.

Venetian affairs.

AT sea, Mezzo Morto, Kapudân Pâshâ, regulates the fleet, in a manner before unknown to the Turks; avoids engaging, as his predecessors used, without regard to wind or situation; and watches all the motions of the Venetians; who, struck with admiration at his conduct, dare not hazard an engagement; so that nothing memorable was performed on either side the whole year.

c MOSTAFA having led back and disbanded his army at Adrianople, removes to his other capital, which he enters with as much pomp as if his victories had been far superior to those of the conquerors of Constantinople, Hungary, and Egypt (S). Yet the greatest ornament of this triumph was the 24 pieces of cannon taken from the Germans near Temeswaer, followed by several noble captives taken in the former battle against Veterani. On the third day after this public entry, the Soltân visits the monument of Abu Ayûb Ansîri, where he is girt with a sword by the Shaykh of that Jâmi <sup>2</sup>.

Mostafa's
triumph.

d ON the 1st of November an ambassador from Persia (T) arrives at Constantinople, and on the 20th makes his entry into Adrianople, in great pomp, with a retinue of 150 persons; and had audience of the Soltân. The business of his embassy was to get Babek Soleyman Bey removed from his government of Karamania, on account of his unquiet disposition; to have a place assigned the Persians to pray in the temple of Mekka, separate from other nations; and that precedence might be given in the Holy-Land to the Armenian patriarchs, before others of the Christian sects who were subjects of the king Persia. After 25 days stay, the ambassador was answered, that Babek, being an hereditary prince, could not be removed without breach of the law: that the temple of Mekka being holy, and free alike to all Mohammedans, no separate place could be assigned in it to the Persians: lastly, that, in the time of the Wazîr Mostafa Pâshâ, the pre-eminence in the Holy-Land had been given to the Franks in so solemn a manner, that it could not be taken away or violated. Indeed, at his request, a place of devotion at Balata in Constantinople was restored to the subjects of Persia, as having formerly belonged to the Armenians; but after his departure it was taken away, and the Armenian commissary could find no redress <sup>2</sup>.

Persian ambassador.

e THE ceremonies before-mentioned being over, the Soltân applies himself wholly to warlike preparations; orders 36 large ships of war to be built, designing part of them against the Venetians, and part against the Russians (who, since the taking of Azâk (V), had begun to raise a fleet in the Euxine Sea), with a great number of gallies and galliots. He honours Mezzo Morto, the admiral, habited in a mariner's dress, with three Tûgs, and gives him the command of the whole sea, with the islands in it. He likewise bestows handsome rewards on the rest of the sea officers, who had distinguished themselves in former expeditions. To supply his army he enrolls 12,000 Yamaghi Janizaries (U), and 8000 Levendi (W); exercises daily the

Preparations
for war.

<sup>2</sup> CANT. p. 402, & seqq.

<sup>2</sup> RICAUT, ubi supr.

(P) June 6, 1697.

(Q) The 6th of July.

(R) A wall six miles long, built across the Isthmus of Korinth, with a town not far off to the south-west.

(S) Ricaut says they did not brag there much of their success this year, although they had, in reality, withstood a greater force of the Christians than for many years before; which they, in a great measure, ascribe to the valour of the Soltân himself.

(T) This must be understood to have been sent by Shâh Selim II. otherwise called Soleyman Huseyn, who succeeded his father Shâh Seîm I. son of Shâh Abbas II.

in 1694, and was dethroned in 1722, by Mahmûd, son of Mir Vaez, or Wâis, commonly called Mirîwâis.

(V) This seems to confirm Ricaut's account, that Asof was taken at the time when the Turkish historians say the siege was raised.

(U) These newly listed, or taken occasionally out of the Jebeji, or other new troops.—CANT.

(W) A corruption of some Italian word. It denotes the marine forces; a disorderly kind of men, but brought under some regulation by Mezzo Morto. They are 14,000 in time of peace. In war the Soltân raises any number for six months, paying them for that time twenty-

A. D. 1697. the soldiers and courtiers in Kyaghîz Khaneh (X) in the use of arms; and having published a a Fermân, orders the whole strength of the empire to be assembled at Adrianople about Hedre- lez<sup>b</sup>, or St. George's day. To enable him to do all these things, his first care was to provide money, by laying taxes on the people and employments. He likewise made a new regulation in the coin, never thought of by any of his predecessors, and unprecedented in any country except in England the year before; which was, that all the pieces of gold and silver current through the Othmân empire should be stamped with his own name. In consequence of this the French five Sol-pieces, Venetian Chekins, and Dutch lion dollars, many millions of which had been imported in a few years, were carried to the mint; and when recoined were delivered out for bullion, or other coin. He likewise reduced the charges of officers as much as conve- niently could be: among the rest, Tekeli's pension suffered a great retrenchment, no more than b five dollars a day being allowed for the maintenance of himself, his consort, and retinue;
only to help them, they were licensed to sell wine, which was at that time prohibited. Accord- ingly the prince set up a wine-cellar within the Greek liberties, where he followed the vintner's trade to great advantage

French vanity.

THE French presuming on the obligations which the Porte had to them, grew very imperious; of which we meet with an instance in the case of the Pâshâ of Kayro's Bankier, the most considerable Jew in Egypt. This Jew being complained of by the French consul in that city, for being wanting in some punctilio of respect which he claimed to himself, Chateauneuf, the ambassador, made such a noise about it, threatening to depart home, if satisfaction was not given, that the Wazîr thought fit to send for the Jew from Egypt, and imprison him. How- c ever, soon after the French influence began much to decline, when the court came to discover that they were busy in making peace with all the confederate powers then at war with them, although at first the ambassador confidently denied it.

<sup>b</sup> CANT. p. 403, & seqq.

twenty-five dollars. It is the only branch of the Turkish militia wherein Christians are admitted. Cant.

(X) That is, the paper-shop, or house; so called from paper-mills formerly there; now a foundery for ammunition. 'Tis a very pleasant place, near the suburbs of Ayûb. In the meadows about it the Soltân's horses graze in spring; and the mud of its river has supplied Constantinople with very good bricks and tiles, which have been used in the buildings erected there for so many ages. Cant.

S E C T. II.

Battle of Zenta, and panic of the Turks.

Rebellion in Asia.

THE Soltân all the while was very intent on preparing for the campaign: but the troops d of Asia were detained by the progress which the rebels made in that part of the empire; where they were grown so powerful, that they were forbidden by proclamation to transport themselves into Europe, on penalty of having their houses demolished, their Timârs and Ziamets destroyed, with all the lands they held of the Soltân. These menaces so incensed them, as being soldiers, that they cut off the ears and noses of all they took prisoners, and in that condition sent them to Constantinople. However, soon after, the Soltân promising them a general pardon, 10,000 deserted the cause, and came to serve him in his war.

Mostafa sets forward.

MOSTAFA was now at Sofia in his march to Hungary, where the Imperialists had been forced to raise the siege of Bibacz; and though for want of recruits from several parts he had not above 40,000 men, yet he was resolved to proceed. He was so well pleased also on e hearing the prince of Conti was elected king of Poland, that he ordered the Wazîr to write Tekeli word that he had declared him king of Hungary, and at the same time sent him his commission, with a letter superscribed Orla Majjar Krâli, To the king of Hungary. This miserable prince was gone to the baths of Prusa, or Bursa, in Anatolia, for the benefit of his health; and though he was then grievously afflicted with the gout and palsy, was hurried away in a waggon by the Chaussh, without the least regard either to his dignity or indisposition. At length the Soltân marched to join the forces already in Hungary<sup>c</sup>. But it is time now to return to the Turkish historians.

Marches to Belgrade against the Germans.

THE Soltân relying on this military force, though informed that the king of France had concluded the war with the emperor, yet rejects the peace offered by the English and Dutch f ambassadors, boasting that he was alone able not only to repress but subdue him. Towards

<sup>c</sup> RICAUT, ubi supra.

<sup>a</sup> summer therefore he marches his troops to Belgrade, where, on mustering his army, he finds it to consist of 135,000 men; besides the families and servants of the Pâshâs (a very great number of which attend the camp), with a multitude of other useless persons. To this strong army the emperor had only opposed 46,000 Germans, under the command of prince Eugene of Savoy, with orders not to attack the Turks, or engage in battle without compulsion; but only to guard Peterwaradin, and the other fortresses of Hungary, situate on the Danube. A. D. 1687.

THE Turks having extorted this intelligence from the prisoners by torture, it is resolved in council to avoid the Germans encamped at Segedin, and penetrate into Transylvania. This advice was given by Tekeli, who alleged that it would be easy to subdue that country, both because the emperor's general had drained the garrisons of their men, and the Hungarian rebels, assembled to the number of 50,000, offered to join the Othmân troops. The army, having passed the Danube, was ordered to move towards Temeswaer: but in his second day's march, hearing that the Imperialists were advanced to Titul, he again calls a council, wherein it was determined to attack the enemy, lest while the Soltân was in Transylvania they should take Belgrade; and by defeating them lay all Hungary open to the Turkish arms. To put this design in execution, the Soltân orders his fleet to mount the Danube to the mouth of the Teisse, and marches his land forces towards Titul.

MEAN time the Germans, though but 6000 horse, perceiving the approach of the Turks from the high mountain on which that fortress stands, to prevent their passage, fortify its banks with ramparts and cannon. The Soltân, perceiving himself braved by so small a body, orders several Pâshâs to cross the river in open boats (Y), promising to the soldiers fifty gold crowns for every German taken alive, and 25 for every head. Not knowing that the banks were fortified, they pass over without any order: but when several thousands of them were gotten on the other side, and their number began to increase, the Germans, who were quiet at first, discharge their cannon among the thickest of them, and, mounting their ramparts, attack them sword in hand. The Janizaries, terrified with the unexpected noise of the cannon, and taking to flight, three thousand of them were slain: nor could one have escaped, if the fleet had not luckily come up in the nick of time, and seized the isle in the middle of the Teisse; by which means the Janizaries cross the river lower down, and then march in a body against the enemy's ramparts. Hereupon a second but slighter engagement ensues: for the Germans seeing the Janizaries continually increase, to avoid being oppressed by numbers, retire first to the city, and thence to the plain of Kobila (Z). In the evening some Haydûks, who staid behind, set fire to the castle, and then follow their companions <sup>d</sup>.

THE Soltân hereupon passes the Teisse with the rest of his forces, and marches towards the enemy, still encamped at Segedin. Finding in the plain the bridge left intire by the Germans (through design or haste), he turns his army towards the Danube, and stops at the lower end of the isle formed by that river opposite to Peterwaradin. Here in a third consultation it is resolved to besiege that fortress; and running a bridge over the stream, pass the army before the Imperialists could march thither from their camp. This bridge was computed a work of two days, and might have been finished the second day, if some of the garrison of Peterwaradin, concealed in the island with four cannon, had not, when they saw the Turks near the bank, pierced several of their boats with great shot. For although, on the coming-up of the Othmân fleet, they are obliged to quit the isle, yet they prevented the Turks from finishing the bridge till the third day, and by that means deprived them of the victory.

FOR prince Eugene, who, on the news of the Soltân's march, had left Segedin, with great expedition arrived that day at sun-set, and passing by the enemy's camp, hastens to the head of the bridge, in spite of the endeavours of Shabbaz Gyeray Soltân (A), who, to stop his swift progress, had, with 12,000 Tatars, burnt up all the grass; so that neither forage nor water were to be found for the space of nine hours. On this unexpected arrival of the Germans a fourth consultation is held, whether it was proper to attack the enemy in such an open plain, before they had fortified their camp, or to wait till they should assault the Othmâns in their trenches.

THE prime Wazîr endeavours to persuade the Soltân to the former opinion, alleging, "That it was not honourable to suffer the enemy, who were so near, to escape without offering them battle: that the impatience with which God had inspired the soldiers for a battle, sufficiently declared that then was the time to defeat the enemy; and that if this ardour should be repressed, it was to be feared it would throw the whole army into a pernicious

<sup>d</sup> CANT. p. 404, & seq.

(Y) Called Dumba, which the Turks carry in waggons to serve for the foundation of bridges run over rivers.

(Z) So the Turks call that large plain which reaches from the Danube to the Teisse, between Titul, Segedin, and Peterwaradin. CANT

(A) Was Khân after his father Selim Gyeray, under Abmed III. but soon after was surprised and slain by the Cherkassians, as before related. CANT.

A. D. 1697.

opposed by Jâffer Pâshâ.

“ languor, or excite in them thoughts of sedition, for want of other employment.” This a opinion of the Wazîr was boldly opposed by Koja Jâffer Pâshâ, an experienced soldier, who had been present in almost all the battles against the Germans. He urged, “ That he had “ observed, whenever the enemy fought in an open plain, in which they could at pleasure open “ their front, advance, or retire, they had always gained the victory, even though the Oth- “ mân troops were much superior in number; whereas they had never so great an “ army in the field as at present: and that they were now commanded by a general of “ approved valour and conduct, who, as he imagined, would not provoke the Turks to a “ battle, unless he had placed his own troops to such advantage, as to be in a manner sure of “ victory.”

THE Wazîr observing almost all the Pâshâs to be swayed by Jâffer’s opinion, to prevent it b taking place of his own, stiles him an infidel and traitor for giving such advice, as if he had been bribed by the enemy, to prevent the Soltân from taking wholesome counsel. Jâffer Pâshâ, finding the Wazîr’s obstinacy could not be surmounted any other way, desires the Soltân to remove the curtain (B), and hear in person what he had to say for the advantage of the Oth- mân interest. This being granted, Jâffer goes on, “ But if, brother, you have gained such “ high favour with God, that he inspires you with counsels, and assures you of the events, “ you cannot blame me, if, not knowing it to be so, I do not believe it. I am content to be “ laid in irons, by his majesty’s order, while you attack the enemy; and if, within an hour or “ two, you do not betake yourself to a shameful flight, I will submit to suffer like a stinking “ dog, whatever punishment his majesty pleases to inflict: but if, which God forbid, my c “ prediction should be fulfilled, may you give an account of your imprudence to the Deity “ and the Soltân.” He added, “ That whatever happened to himself he should adhere to “ his former opinion, and advise not to engage the enemy, but only fortify their trenches,
 “ and wait to be attacked: that by this means, although the Othmâns should not prove vic“ torious, yet he could with certainty promise they should not be defeated: that even in case
 “ the enemy should pass by their camp, and advance to the head of the bridge, he was of “ opinion they ought not to march out against them, but surround them with ramparts; “ which would oblige them, for want of provisions, either to attack their camp, or pass the “ Danube, and so give the Turks an opportunity of falling on them in their passage, without “ any hazard.” d

The Soltân
doubtful.

THE Soltân, although he approved of Jâffer’s advice, yet adjourns the council till next day;
 but commands his men to keep in their trenches, and the Chausbi (C) to beat back those who,
 of their own accord, had already taken the field. This not being sufficient to restrain the ardour of the soldiers for a battle, the Mufti proclaims by a Fetva, That whoever should fall in such a battle would not only lose the crown of Shebadet (or martyrdom), but also lament their unseason- able boldness in hell.

Moved at last to besiege Se-gedin.

MEAN while prince Eugene, having advanced as far as the bridge, and with the waters of the Danube refreshed his troops, almost dead with thirst and heat, drew them up, and in this posture remained all night. The Turkish soldiers were on this occasion seized with great terror, thinking that they had been restrained from fighting by their general’s fear, which they c considered as the worst of omens to the Othmân affairs. The Wazîr making use of these discourses in the camp, to expose Jâffer Pâshâ to the Soltân, urges how fatal that officer’s too great caution might prove, unless immediately obviated: for that the enemy could not be deprived of necessaries, since they had the Danube open, and were masters of all the towns above them; while by the Othmân inactivity time was lost, the army languished in idleness, and the Ger- mans every day strengthened °.

BUT although the Soltân could not consent to attack the Germans, yet he complied to go and besiege Segedin, the Wazîr suggesting that it could not hold out above ten days: that, when taken, the whole country between the Teisse and Danube would be reduced to the Oth- mân obedience, and the neighbouring parts of Hungary laid open to be wasted by the Tatars: f that the German army was so heavy and fatigued as not to be able to follow them: that they might indeed besiege Belgrade, but could have no hopes of succeeding against a place provided with such a strong garrison, plenty of provisions, and a fleet at hand to throw in ° CANT. p. 405, &amp; seq.

(B) When upon an expedition a Galibe Diwân is called, the Soltân sits indeed in it, but in a particular place, with a Perdeb, or certain curtain, drawn before him, where he can hear all that is said, without being seen. Cant.

(C) There are two sorts of Chausb. The first are employed in the Wazîr’s Diwân, to receive petitions of the plaintiff; to carry the Wazîr’s orders to the judge;

and put his sentence in execution. The others, called Alay Chausbi, are made in time of war, to carry the Wazîr’s orders to the Pâshâs; to take care that the horse stand in a straight line; to give the signal of battle; to sound a retreat, and the like; in which they are not half so dexterous as the regular Aids de camp. Cant.

supplies;

a supplies : that however, the more effectually to secure it, Jâffer Pâshâ might be sent there as governor, whose abilities in defending cities had sufficiently appeared in the siege of Temefwaer. A. D. 1697.

As this part of the Wazîr's advice was given with a view to remove Jâffer Pâshâ from the Soltân, and then find occasion to put him to death, for a warning to others, Mostafa, who perceived it, would not consent, under pretence that Jâffer's counsels would be necessary in the army. Next morning, being the 5th of Jomazio'lawel, at day-break, he set forward with his forces, and after nine hours march pitches his tents near a lake, with a bridge over it, where the Germans had lately encamped. Next day, leaving Kyuchûk Jâffer Pâshâ (D) behind, with 500 horse, he proceeds before day to Zenta, a castle, little noted before, on the banks of the Teiffe, with extraordinary expedition. Marches to Zenta

PRINCE Eugene, on hearing the Tubulkhâna, imagined it was the signal for battle, and drew up his troops to receive the Turks : but when he understood by his scouts that they were marching to Zenta, taking this to be a flight, he orders the Hungarian horse to hasten before, and leaving behind the heavier and weaker part of his army, immediately follows, with less prudence than courage, at the head of only 16,000 men. The Hungarians that night coming to the lake, find the Turks sleeping, who expected nothing less than the enemy, and cut off the whole party, excepting the Pâshâ's chamberlain. This person, who escaped by means of the darkness, immediately flies to Zenta, and informs the Wazîr of this disaster, and the approach of the Germans. That minister, to prevent the report from raising new commotions in the camp, immediately beheads the messenger of it ; and informs the Soltân that the Hungarians had indeed surprised Jâffer Pâshâ, but were afterwards defeated by the Othmân forces. He had scarce made this report, when some Tatar troops arrive, and inform the camp that the whole German army were pursuing the Othmân forces with the utmost speed, and were now just at hand. Prince Eugene follows.

HEREUPON the Soltân commands his men to halt, and a bridge to be thrown over the Teiffe, which was performed in four hours. At noon the Soltân passes over first on horseback, and when the Wazîr came to kiss his stirrup, puts him off with a stern countenance ; at the same time bidding him take care to convey over safely whatever was in the camp, for that if the enemy should take but a single waggon he should suffer an ignominious death. The Wazîr, knowing it required at least two days to transport every thing, and that his ruin was inevitable if he should ever appear before the Soltân, at first sends over eight cannon with their ammunition, and allows the Spahis, with the troops commanded by the Pâshâs, to pass, but stops the rest ; alleging, that the remainder of the cannon and army, which was the greater part, ought to be detained for defence of the camp, in case the enemy should attack it in the rear. Mostafa flies.

THESE forces were scarce gotten over next day at noon, when the Wazîr being informed the Germans were within three hours march of the camp, that he might not die without his rivals, sends for all the Pâshâs who had already passed over with their troops, under pretence of consulting them. They being obliged to obey his order, return on foot, as the waggons on the bridge would not allow horses to pass ; and being all assembled, except the Kaymaykâm, Buyukli Mostafa Pâshâ, the Wazîr tells them, " That the enemy being now in sight, they " who had refused to fight when they had a convenient place and opportunity, should now be " forced to do it, without those advantages : that they had but one happiness left, to be Gazi, " if they conquered, or Shebîd, if they died valiantly ; and as one of those inestimable privileges waited for him that day, he thought it unreasonable to defraud them, his brethren, " of the right they had to be partakers with him. Behold, therefore, continued he, paradise " open before you, which I command you, by the divine injunction to enter, and enjoy the " delights promised by our prophet : but if you refuse to obey the law, and my orders, my " sword (which he shewed) shall deprive you both of the life which you desire, and the " paradise which you despise." The Wazîr says.

THE Pâshâs, not daring to oppose the Wazîr in the midst of the camp, or knowing how to escape, pretend obedience, and retire to the trenches ; which being too extensive for the forces which remained, they began to form a lesser trench within the greater. The soldiers indeed complained, and reproached the Wazîr to his face with their imminent danger, yet obeyed his orders, as their own safety was concerned. Mean time the German army appears, and covers the whole plain ; at which sight the Soltân, enraged, sends repeated *Khatishârif*s to the Wazîr, commanding him to send over the Janizaries, cannon, and ammunition, let what Resolved to die fighting.

(D) Being taken here by the Germans, he gave them an exact account of the state of the Othmân army ; for which he was set at liberty after the battle. Nor was he, at his return, punished by the Soltân for this treachery, but restored to his dignity. However he died the next year. Cant.

A. D. 1697. would become of the other carriages. But Elmâs Mohammed conceals these orders from the the Pâshâs, and answers the bearer, that he had rather die fighting valiantly with his sword, than be put to death by the Soltân; and stops the Janizaries from passing. In this he is assisted by the negligence of the herdsman, who, seeing the Germans approach, drive all the cattle appointed for drawing so many thousand waggons into the river. The stream forcing them against the bridge, they endeavour to mount it, and thus sink three of the boats on which it was founded; so that no more than one man at a time could make a shift to pass upon planks laid across.

Battle of Zenta. THE imperial forces arrive about three hours before night; and imagining the Turkish camp to be only guarded by the carriages, fall on at once, but are repulsed with considerable loss. Therefore when they find, that, besides two rows of waggons chained together, the Turks were fortified by a double trench, and that the forces on this side the river were much superior in number to their own, they resolve to go another way to work. The chanel of the Teisse, when swollen by the autumnal or winter rains, is full of water, which falling in summer, leaves a space of thirty paces at the foot of the western banks of the river, which are high and craggy. Here prince Eugene orders a trench to be dug a little below the Turkish camp, and several regiments to fall on the enemy that way within, while he attacked them without. And lest the Soltân, to reinforce the Wazîr, should repair the bridge, he plants two cannon near the head of it, which quickly demolish it. To prevent this, Mostafa had ordered Arnaud Abdi the Kyehaya (E), with four cannon, to fire from the opposite bank; but having nothing to secure the engineers but a place covered with reeds, he was forced to remove them, after several of them had been killed.

The Turks overthrown. INDEED every thing seemed to conspire the destruction of the Turks: for the Janizaries themselves, having repulsed the Germans from the outer trench, retire into the inner, and declare their resolution to defend it. But the Wazîr, with the rest of the Pâshâs, endeavouring to divert them from their purpose, first by intreaties, and afterwards by force, they turn their despair into rage, and destroy not only the Wazîr and Pâshâs, but all their own officers, excepting their Agâ Delli Bâlta Oglî (F). In the midst of this confusion part of the German forces seize the outer trench abandoned by the Turks, and feign to attack the inner; with a view to draw the enemy from that side of the camp next the river, and by disposing their own men along the bank, render the assault more easy. These appearing suddenly at the head of the bridge, the Othmâns struck with terror, employ their whole strength in that part, to hinder the Germans from entering. The inner trench being left thus negligently guarded, the Imperialists, who were on that side, seize it, and fall in the rear upon the Turks fighting at the river; who, now inclosed, and pressed on all hands, fight bravely, though in confusion. But at length, having in vain attempted to force a passage, in the space of three hours are all slain to a man.

THE account Ricaut gives of this famous battle is as follows. The Imperialists under prince Eugene, having marched towards Titul and the Teisse, to meet the Turks, strongly entrenched themselves. Hereupon the Wazîr assembles all his Pâshâs, fifteen in number, and leaves the Soltân on the other side of the river, with part of the army: the Arnauds observing the Germans advance to attack them, endeavoured to pass the bridge and fly. Their example the Janizaries intended to follow, saying they were deserted by the Spahis: but the Wazîr interposing with his Pâshâs, to prevent their flight, and killing a great number of the Arnauds, they mutinied, and killed him. However, some Spahis posting themselves at the farther end of the bridge, would let none pass over. By this time the Imperialists, having put themselves in order of battle, furiously assailed the Turks on all sides, who, at the second attack, began to give way; and being strangely terrified at the great slaughter which was made, threw themselves headlong into the river, where the major part of them were drowned. So considerable a number of men was never before known to have been destroyed in so short a space of time; for the whole action did not last above two or three hours.

Direct fighting. By the lists there appeared to have been killed 14,070 Janizaries, with their Agâ; 73 Ojâk and Bulâk Agulari; 3700 Topchi and Jebeji; 7000 Arnauds (G). The Wazîr Elmâs Mo-

<sup>f</sup> CANT. p. 407, & seq.

<sup>g</sup> RICAUT, in Mustapha II.

(E) He was inferior to none in courage and political knowledge. After the battle of Zenta, being the only surviving Pâshâ, he was honoured by the Soltân with three Tûgs, and ordered to conduct the forces to Belgrade. And as this was what never happened to any before (for all the Pâshâs are created by the Wazîr, and receive from him their badges of authority), he obtained the name of Pâdishâh Cbiraghi. He was afterwards made Pâshâ of Egypt. Cant.

(F) Surnamed Delli, or the Mad, on account of his excessive daringness, in rushing on the enemy. Cant.

(G) They are the bravest and boldest of all men in war, as resolute, yet more discreet, in attacks than the Janizaries. They are so expert in shooting, as to make nothing of taking an egg or apple from off their wife's or mother's head with a bullet, at 200 paces distance. Cant.

a hammed Pâshâ, fifteen Pâshâs of three horse-tails (H); twenty-seven Pâshâs of two or one horse-tail; besides a great number of the usual attendants on Turkish camps: so that the whole number of the slain may be justly computed (I) at above thirty thousand. The only person who escaped was Mahmûd Ebn Oglî (K) Pâshâ of the Arnauds; who, being twice wounded, was saved by the strength of his horse, which conveyed him over the river. However, the Othmâns did not fall unrevenged, for six thousand Germans are said to have perished in that expedition (L).

SOLTÂN Mostafa, who was a melancholy, as well as idle, spectator of this misfortune, was seized with such a panic, that at midnight, without any guide or light, he abandons his camp, although there was nothing to be feared from the Germans; who, fatigued with toil, could not repair the bridge in sight of his numerous army. He directs his course towards Temeswaer, putting to death Kâpuji Bâshî, Shabân Mohammed, a Venetian by birth, as a dignified Christian, and bribed by the Germans to suggest pernicious counsels; only because he advised him not to leave his camp dishonourably, and by an unnecessary flight give the enemy, who had destroyed but a small part of his army, an entire victory. To add to the misfortune, the night was so dark, that the Soltân's retinue, unable to discern the road, turning too much to the right, towards the Teisse, fell into marshy grounds, from which they were obliged to free themselves by leaving their horses and baggage behind. At length, about sun-rise, Soltân Mostafa comes to the place where a battle had been fought the year before with the Germans; and there changing his horse as well as habit, unknown to all, flies with the utmost speed to the city whither he was bound.

THE army arriving at noon near the same place, and perceiving neither the Soltân, nor any of the great officers among them, are struck with great surprise; which being increased by a rumour that the Soltân was taken by the Hungarians, or betrayed by his followers to the enemy, the soldiers disperse themselves different ways, every one anxious how to escape the Germans, whom they every moment imagined to be at their heels. In the evening, when they came to Temeswaer, the governor, who had been ordered by the Soltân to conceal his arrival, lest the Germans hearing of it should invest him there, shuts the gates against them; which increases the rumour of Mostafa's being taken, as well as their distress: for, having been too much in haste to bring provision with them, both men and beasts were ready to die with thirst; and if there were any stinking puddles to be found in the dried-up morasses, about Temeswaer, those who were strongest (M) seized them, and excluded the rest.

AT last, after the Othmân army had, for three days, been like a ship in a stormy sea, without either rudder or pilot, Soltân Mostafa, finding there was no danger from the Germans, discovers himself to his soldiers. These testify their joy on sight of him, as if he had returned in triumph, and cry out, they regard not their misfortune, since they were assured of their emperor's safety, and would take a severe revenge upon the enemy. Next day Mostafa leads his troops towards Belgrade, and being met at Ali-bunar (N), by Amûkje-ogli Housseyn Pâshâ, governor of that city, whom he had sent for, as there were present no other Pâshâs honoured with three Tûgs, he confers on him the Wazîrship. After a short stay at Belgrade, he returns, in the end of Jomazio'lawel, 1109, with his army to Adrianople.

THIS was the fate of the Turkish forces after the battle. As for the Imperialists, they continued all night in the place of victory, apprehensive of some stratagem usual among the Turks, but next day passed the Teisse, and gleaned up what Tekeli (O) had left in the camp. After this, being discouraged from the siege of such strong cities as Temeswaer and Belgrade, by the

<sup>b</sup> CANT. p. 411, & seq.

(H) The most eminent of whom were Koja Jaffer Pâshâ, Mosli Oglî, who recovered Khios, Kiesli Halil Pâshâ of Dyabekr, and Fazli Pâshâ of Sherculi (Shabr-zâl). This last was famous for his learning (whence called Fazli), and other excellent qualities. He was, for his fine writing, made Kyehâya by the Wazîr Elmas Mohammed. Cant. Ricaut mentions all the Pâshâs above recited.

(I) The Turks were never known to fight so stoutly; for not one was taken alive. And had not the Janizaries, before the battle, slain their commanders, men renowned for valour, 'tis generally thought, that, with their assistance, they might easily have repulsed, if not defeated, the Germans, who were much inferior to them in number. Cant.

(K) Beglerbeg of Rûm-ili (or Rumelia), whose family has there a great estate. Cant.

(L) The emperor, in his letter to William III. king of England, inserted by Ricaut, says, that in this battle, fought 10th August 1697, the Turks were 30,000 strong; that 10,000 were killed on the spot; and that the bridge being too narrow for the rest to get over, they threw themselves into the river, and were most of them drowned: that 72 cannon were taken, and some thousands of waggons laden with provisions; and that only 500 Germans were killed, and as many wounded.

(M) Prince Cantemir, who was in the army at that time, gives a particular account of the confusion and distress it was in.

(N) The fountain of Ali, between Temeswaer and Belgrade. As it lies very high for a prospect, the spies commonly meet there. Cant.

(O) After the defeat, knowing the bridge could not be repaired by the Germans in so short a time, he staid all night in the camp, where he plundered all which was most valuable; and by that means got greater riches than he could have done from the Soltân's pension, which was hardly sufficient to maintain him. Cant.

A. D. 1698.  lateness of the season (P), they turned their arms against Bosnia, took the castle of Doba and Mogla, set fire to Saray, the capital of the country, and reduced almost the whole province. In this distress the Turkish forces appointed to guard the same, not knowing what other method to take, go to Dâltabân Mostafa Pâshâ (Q), who then happened to be at Bickkia, a town of Bosnia, and force him to take the command upon him. Under his conduct the Turks resume their courage, and not only repress the victorious Germans, but oblige them to retreat beyond the Save, and take from them four and twenty castles, situated on both sides of that river.

Russian and Venetian inclinations to peace.

If we turn our eyes to other quarters, we shall find, that the Russians this summer employ themselves in fortifying Azak and Luktikh with new works, without any disturbance from their enemies; while the new king of Poland, Frederick Augustus, before elector of Saxony, is busy to gain the nobles, and prepare for the next campaign. Not long after the Venetians send a fleet into the Mediterranean; and Kiel Mehemed Beg (R), with his gallies, attempts Tinos: but being repulsed by Bartolomeo Moro, quits that island. Several other slight battles happened at sea with various success. The Turkish fleet, taking three pirate ships, carry them to Constantinople: on the other hand, as the Turks, after a short dispute, twice seemed to avoid a fight, the Venetians challenge two victories<sup>1</sup>.

<sup>1</sup> CANT. p. 414—422.

(P) However, on the 30th of October, some troops were detached towards Karansebes and Vipalanka; which being invested on the 4th of November, by general Rabatin, was taken by storm on the 6th, and all the garrison of 800 men put to the sword, with the loss only of ten Germans; and thus the campaign ended. Ricaut.

(Q) Famous for his warlike virtues. From a simple Janizary he at length became Janizar Aga; and from walking on foot about the city, instead of on horseback, both day and night, to see if order was observed, got the name of Dâltabân, that is, unshod, or barefooted. He was, by the Wazir Housseyn Pâshâ made governor of Baghdâd, and sent against the Arabs, whom he defeated, though 120,000 strong, and killed 32,000, with only 12 regiments. He also recovered Bostra [a mistake for Bâsrah, or Bassora] from them. Cant.

(R) There are in the isles many Begs, who have one galley at least; wherewith they trade in time of peace, and exercise piracy in time of war. Mehemed Beg was richer than the rest, and kept three galleys at his own charge. The name of Kiel was given him, for having a bald and scurfy head. The Greeks called him Kafida. Cant.

S E C T. III.

The peace of Carlovitz, and deposition of Mostafa.

SUCH were the events of this campaign. The beginning of the next might be justly said to confirm the Turkish proverb, An enemy does never perfectly know the state of his enemy. Soltân Mostafa, after his return to Constantinople, makes all possible preparations for war; but with a mind troubled, and foreboding ill success. The Turks, who had before entered voluntarily into the service, are now backward in obeying even the Soltân's commands, and inflexible either to intreaties or threats. Mostafa, while he passes in disguise through the assemblies of the people, frequently hears these words from the citizens and soldiers, “the Othmâns to defeat the Germans is a thing beyond their power. God has publicly testified, that he is on the side of the Gyawrs. He has signified his decree in that respect by sufficient tokens. It is in vain therefore to shed such torrents of Musulmân blood, while we are to contend as well against God as man.” The Soltân, who knew how necessary peace was to recover the exhausted state of the empire, earnestly wished for it: but was prevented from proposing it, lest the enemy should become elated, and the honour of the Othmân empire diminished. The German emperor was no less impatient on his part for an end of the war: not that he despaired of victory against the Turks, but he feared that, if the king of Spain should die before the war was finished, the disputes which would arise concerning the succession might stop the progress of his arms. However, he thought it dishonourable to desire peace of a conquered enemy, and of his own accord offer him the palm. The English and Dutch ambassadors, indeed, were at hand to mediate a peace: but their offers having been so often rejected, they chose rather to hear peace sought for, than to propose it.

Maurokordatus's contrivance to compass it.

THE chief interpreter of the Othmân court, Alexander Maurokordatus, perceives the inclination of both parties; and as he was no less sagacious and fond of glory, than devoted to the interest of the Porte, resolves to raise himself a great reputation by rescuing the Turkish empire from destruction. As his hopes of this were chiefly grounded on the pacifick disposition of the Wazir Housseyn Pâshâ, he, in a visit to him, turning the conversation upon the subject of peace, tells a tells him, that by considering the present situation of affairs in Chriſtendom, he could with certainty affirm the German emperor was very deſirous of a peace with the Othmâns. The Wazîr answers, it was not probable that the emperor, ſuſhed with his late victory, and full of hopes, would accept of peace, though offered, much leſs deſire it. Maurokordatus replies, it might ſeem ſo indeed: but that if a week's time was allowed him to ſound the Chriſtian ambaffadors, he would engage to procure not only the emperor's conſent, but even his requeſt for a negotiation.

HAVING eaſily obtained leave, Maurokordatus waits on the ambaffadors, and pretending, "That he came of his own accord, in gratitude for the favours he had received from the emperor, and to demonſtrate the fidelity due from him as a Chriſtian; ſaid, he knew the emperor, from his apprehenſions of a French war, was very deſirous of peace; that he would not diſcover this to the Turks, leſt it ſhould make them more large in their demands: but that, if they would confide in him, with a power to manage the affair as he ſhould think proper, he would undertake to ſettle a peace on ſuch terms as the emperor might reaſonably deſire." In the mean time he required of them an oath of ſecrecy, alleging the danger both himſelf and family ſhould be expoſed to, if ſuſpected by the Turks of the leaſt unfaithfulneſs. The ambaffadors replied, "That the emperor would not perhaps reject honourable conditions of peace, yet would never aſk it of the Porte: but that in caſe the interpreter, in his own name, would propoſe the affair, he would lay a great obligation on his imperial majeſty."

c MAUROKORDATUS, returning to the Wazîr, gives him a very different account: for he tells him, he found, by the Chriſtian ambaffadors, that the emperor was not only not averſe to peace, but very deſirous of it, and had requeſted them, by any means, to put an end to the war. The Wazîr ſeemed by this ſpeech to be raiſed from the dead; and embracing the artful framer of lies (S), ſays to him, "If you execute this divine work, and reſtore the wiſhed-for tranquility to our empire, you may be aſſured that you will highly oblige the Soltân, and for ever endear the memory of your ſervices to the rulers of the Othmân ſtate." By theſe artifices of Maurokordatus both the Turks and Chriſtians are induced to ſpeak a little more openly concerning the affair of peace, and think they may do it without detriment to the honour of their reſpective maſters, becauſe each party being deceived by the Othmân interpreter, imagines the firſt propoſal came from the enemy.

d As ſoon as theſe things became public, Feriolé (T), the French ambaffador, endeavoured, by bribes, promiſes, and other arts, to prevent a negotiation; alleging, that his maſter had only made a ſhort truce with the emperor, and that in a few years he would invade Germany with a greater force than ever. But the Othmân court having, by fatal experience, often found the infincerity of French promiſes, that ambaffador's efforts are to no purpoſe; and he is ordered to deſiſt from his deſign.

MEAN time the Turks, omitting no meaſures proper to ſtop the progreſs of the Germans, Hoſtilities Soltân Moſtafa, in the end of Zilkaadeh, 1109, removes to Adrianople; from whence, on the firſt of the next month, he orders the Wazîr to march with the army towards Hungary, while he ſpends the ſummer in the village of Akbunar (U), expecting the iſſue of the conferences relating to peace. In the ſame hopes both armies, the Imperialiſts at Peterwaradin, and the Turks near Belgrade, continue without motion, and only guard their borders. The like is done by the Ruſſians and Poles. The Venetians indeed have a ſlight engagement, near Mitylene, with the Othmân fleet, which is put to flight; and in Dalmatia attempt to take Stolaz by ſtratagem, but are forced to retire. The Seraskier, on the other hand, endeavours to reduce Cing; but on the approach of the Venetians raiſes the ſiege.

Thus much for the ſtate of hoſtilities this campaign. Let us now ſee what paſſed with regard to peace. The preliminaries having been ſettled at Conſtantinople, ambaffadors were appointed by all the princes engaged in the war. The Turks choſe Rami Mehemed Rais Effendi and Alexander Maurokordatus, honoured with the title of Beg and Mahremî Eſrar (X); the emperor, count Pettingen and count Schlik, his privy-counſellors; the Czar of Ruſſia, Proko-

* CANT. p. 422, & ſeqq.

(S) Alexander, who had a perfect knowledge of the eaſtern languages and poetry, ſeems herein to have followed the inſtructions of Sheykh Saadi, the famous Persian poet, eſpecially where he ſays in his Gyuliſtân, "A lie which does a [good] work, is better than truth which breeds confuſion." CANT.

(T) He ſucceeded Chateaufort; was haughty and obſtinate; oppoſed the Porte in many reſpects, and demanded ſeveral things contrary to the uſage of the Othmân court: which cauſed ill blood, and ſometimes danger; of which our author produces inſtances. Yet he was endowed with many virtues, was courageous, liberal, an agreeable companion, of eaſy acceſs, a moſt ſincere and conſtant friend in all times. He fell at laſt into a frenzy, and was ſent chained to France. CANT.

(U) That is, the white fountain, near Adrianople.

(X) That is, to whom ſecrets are diſcovered. He invented this name himſelf, and long ſolicited the princes of Moldavia and Wallakia to give him the title of moſt illuſtrious in their letters, inſtead of moſt excellent, which uſed to be given him as chief interpreter, and is not reckoned ſo honourable as the other. CANT.

pius:

A. D. 1698. pius Bogdanowitz Woznicini; the Poles, Stanislaus Mikhelowski, Waywod of Poznania; and a the Venetians, Ruzini; Paget and Collier, the English and Dutch ambassadors, were to act as mediators of the peace. They all met about the end of the year 1110 at Carlowitz, between Peterwaradin and Belgrade, where they pitched their tents on both sides of the river of the same name.

At first there arose disputes concerning the place of conference, the seats of the ambassadors, and the order in which they were to visit each other. The Turks insisted on having the first place, which was claimed by the emperor's ambassadors: next to whom the Polish plenipotentiary demanded to sit, which was objected to by the Russian, and all the rest, excepting the Venetian minister, who claimed the next seat to the English. The contest on this head grew so high at last, that what had been already done must have come to nothing, had not Maurokordatus found out an expedient to reconcile the ambassadors, now incensed beyond measure against each other. He proposes that a round building should be run up for the place of conference with as many doors as there were parties, each facing the country from whence the ambassador came: that the tents should be ranged in the same manner round the building; and on the first day of the conference, the ministers, proceeding from their pavilions with an equal pace, should reach the house at the same time, and saluting one another at the entrance, take the seats next to them (Y).

Peace concluded.

Hej. 1110.

A. D. 1698.

THIS expedient being approved by all, after many conferences and disputes, the peace wished for by the whole world, excepting the French, is at last concluded on the 26th of Rajeb 1110 (Z), and the instruments signed by all the ambassadors. The emperor made a truce for 25 years, upon condition that all Transilvania should be resigned to him in the same extent as it had been held by Mikhael Apafi, and his predecessors: that Temeswaer should be left to the Soltân; and to prevent its being blocked up by the adjacent castles, Lippa, Khonad, Karansebes, Lugos, Herkonisia, Bech, Bechkerek, and Sabbia (A), were to have their walls demolished: that the navigation of the Teisse and Maros should be free to the subjects of both empires; and the country between the Danube and Teisse, called Bachkâb, remain in the emperor's hands: that the boundary of the eastern part of Hungary, belonging to the emperor, should be a right line drawn from the mouth of the Maros towards the banks of the Teisse, to the mouth of the Bossut, where it falls into the Save: that towards the south the Save should part the Turkish from the imperial limits, till it receives the Unna; and that no new castles, besides Belgrade and Peterwaradin should be erected, or old ones fortified, anywhere within those boundaries.

Terms agreed on by all parties.

THE Russian ambassador made a truce only for two years (B), upon the foot of each party possessing what he had taken. The Poles made a truce on the like terms with the Soltân; namely, that they should have Kaminiek, Podolia, and Ukrania, restored to them, in the same extent as possessed by them before Soltân Mohammed's first expedition into Poland: and, on the other hand, resign Soczawa, Nemoz, and Soroka in Moldavia, to the Turks. The Venetians obtained these conditions, that all the Morea, as far as Hexamilos, should belong to them; and the firm land, with Naupaktum (or Lepanto), Prevesa, and the castle of Romania, which had been demolished, should be restored to the Turks: that the bay of Korinth should be common to both; and the Venetians possess Lenkade, with the adjacent islands. The yearly tribute paid by the islands in the Archipelago to the Venetians was to be abolished; and Zakynth to be declared free from the like burthen by the Turks. In Dalmatia, Knin, Cing, Kiklut, Verlika, Duare, and Vergoraz, were to be left to the republic, and fixed as the boundaries of their dominions on that side. The Ragusians were to continue free, and the Venetians to retain the castles of Castelnuovo and Risano, with what they possessed in the neighbourhood. Both parties were allowed to fortify their borders with new fortresses; or to repair those which were decayed, excepting Naupaktum, Prevesa, and the castle of Romania before-mentioned (C).

(Y) The tent or house appointed for the conferences had four doors, at which the several ambassadors entered; and, after mutual compliments, took their seats, placed in the middle of the tent, one opposite to the other, in such a manner, as that there could be no exceptions taken, or dispute about precedence. The secretaries were placed behind their respective ambassadors, at a small table, where they took down the minutes of articles. Maurokordatus stood a while behind the Rais Effendi; but afterwards was ordered to sit on the ground after the Turkish manner. The doors were guarded by an equal number of Turks and Germans. Ricaut.

(Z) This year begins June 29th, 1698; so that the 26th of Rajeb falls on January the 15th, 1698-9.

(A) Ricaut has Czanad for Khonad, Bersche for Bech, and Sabia for Sabbia.

(B) But afterwards, on sending an ambassador to the Porte, the time was enlarged to 30 years, on condition that the Russians should retain Asof, and all other places on the Nieper taken from the Turks; only Kasikermen, near the mouth of that river, was to be demolished, and left to the Turks. Neither could our author, Ricaut, find that the Russians could obtain a free trade in the Black Sea, with all the instances they made for it.

(C) Ricaut has given the treaties made with the several confederate powers at large. The conferences began about the middle of November 1698, and by disputes were spun out in that cold place, till the new year began. The Russians were the first who signed the treaty; the Poles and Germans signed two days after; the Venetians last of all.

- a THE Turkish ambassadors, at their return to Adrianople, receive royal rewards for their services from the Soltân; who having settled a peace with all his enemies, disbands his army, and departs for Constantinople. There committing the whole administration of affairs to Husséyn Pâshâ, he removes with his court to Karîshîrân (D), to divert, by hunting, his regret for the loss of so many provinces. But the people, especially the soldiery, grow uneasy at this recess of their Soltân, after so many toils, as if the peace was granted them for no other end but to watch and censure his words and actions. They blushed not to say in their assemblies, that he seemed disposed to imitate his father in all things; and that, like him, after applying the first years of his reign wholly to the affairs of state, he was now resolved to follow dogs and hunting, though he was yet young, and not so conspicuous for his services to the Othmân empire as Soltân Mohammed: alleging that he had recovered nothing from the enemy, nor done any thing deserving the thanks of the public during the late war, except in hindering the enemy to penetrate farther into the empire. They therefore conclude, that since his father, illustrious for so many victories, was deposed on account of his excessive fondness for hunting, it was to be feared that a like, if not a worse, fate would attend the son, who was much inferior to him<sup>1</sup>.

A. D. 1698.
First murder against the Soltân.

Haj. 1111.
A. D. 1699.

- To avoid those reproaches, Soltân Mostafa takes a method, often tried, and retires to Adrianople with the Wazîr, and all the great officers of the empire; which had the desired effect. During his stay there, in the month of Rajeb, 1111 (E), he is informed by letters from the Khân of Tartary, that the Czar of Russia having changed the habit and religious ceremonies of his country (F), had introduced those of Germany, and raised a very numerous army, disciplined after the German manner: that he was preparing a fleet with the utmost expedition, as well as building new cities and castles on the Don, Nieper, and other rivers: that therefore the Soltân ought to take care, lest, while he was at ease from the Germans in the west, a new Nemche Gyawr (G) from the north did not endanger the Othmân empire; since nothing could hinder the Russians from over-running all Krim Tartary in the first campaign, before the Othmâns could come to its relief: that it was necessary therefore either to settle a firm peace, or immediately to declare war, before the enemy could strengthen themselves; and that if the Soltân should doubt the truth of this report, he would do well to send a trusty officer, who might examine it on the spot.

Russian preparations.

- d HEREUPON Soltân Mostafa sends his master of horse, Kibleli Oglî, son to the Wazîr's sister, without that minister's knowledge, into Krim Tartary; with orders strictly to pry into the conduct of the Russians, and immediately return, without acquainting any person with the occasion of his journey. For all this charge Kibleli Oglî, before his departure, secretly informs his uncle of the Soltân's commission. Husséyn Pâshâ, for fear this spark should become a greater flame than what had been extinguished, directs his kinsman to come to him, at his return, for instructions what to say before he went to the Soltân. Kibleli obeys his uncle's orders; and, being returned, goes to him in disguise, and acquaints him, that the Russians had built a large fleet at two places, Varoneshi and Azak (H), and were every day increasing it; that they had fortified Taganorok in a surprizing manner; and that above 20,000 workmen were employed in building new fortifications: that the works at Kamenzatón, above the Nieper, were already finished, and the cataracts of that river opened fit for navigation: That the Tatars had nothing secure beyond the Kberfonesus; and were perpetually annoyed by the incursions of the Kofaks.

false report detected and punished.

- e THE Wazîr, considering that if these and many other facts of the like nature were related to the Soltân, they would occasion a more dreadful war than the former, desires his nephew to conceal them, and persuade his master that the Khân's report of things was a mere fiction, aggravated after the usual manner of the Tatars, impatient for plunder: that the Russians had, indeed, during the war, begun several castles, but had now discontinued their works; were desirous of nothing more than preserving the peace and commerce between both nations; and for that end would soon dispatch an ambassador extraordinary to the resplendent Porte. Kibleli Oglî, furnished with this false story, next day waits on Soltân Mostafa, as if just come from his journey, and tells him exactly what he had been taught. The Soltân not suspecting his fidelity, is extremely incensed against the Khân; and, in a letter, severely reprimands him for his false information. The Khân, perceiving by this that the Soltân had been

<sup>1</sup> CANT. p. 425, & seq.

(D) A town between Chorlo (or Chîurli) and Purgaz, near the road to Adrianople, where is a fine palace built by Mohammed IV. for the conveniency of hunting in that pleasant country, whose hares are famous for their swiftness. CANT.

(E) December, 1699.

(F) The first is true; the last false. CANT.

(G) That is, a new German infidel; in allusion doubtless to the Czar's introducing the German discipline. For Nemche with the Turks signifies Germany, or Germans.

(H) Vronitz and Ajof.

A. D. 1699. imposed on by his master of horse, answers, that he never dared presume to offer falsehoods to his majesty, but judged that Kibleli Oglı, bribed by the enemy, had concealed what he had seen and heard in the Krim, and perhaps had accused him of falsehood, because he had not received such rich presents from him as he expected: adding, that the account which he had before given his majesty was as evident as the light of the sun, and that Kibleli Oglı himself would not deny it, in case he was strictly examined.

THIS answer of the Khân being delivered by unknown persons to the Soltân, as he was coming out of the Yâmi, he immediately sends for Kibleli Oglı, who, threatened with death in case he did not declare the truth, acknowledges that every thing which the Khân had asserted was fact; and humbly begging pardon for his crime, alleges, that what he did was by persuasion of the Wazır, whose commands he could not refuse on account both of his authority and relationship. The imposture of both being thus detected, the Soltân deprives Kibleli Oglı of his post, and banishes him; but soon after orders him to be put to death. At the same time removing Husseyn Pâshâ from the office of Wazır, he banishes him to a village near Sillebria, tho' without touching his estate. After his removal, the Wazırship, by a very rare example, was vacant forty days, till the arrival of Dâltabân Mostafa Pâshâ, governor of Baghdâd, whom the Soltân had resolved to advance to that dignity, for having subdued the Arabs (I); and during this interval Silabdar Hassan Pâshâ had the administration of affairs under the title of Vekil<sup>m</sup>.

Dâltabân made Wazır.

As soon as the new Wazır was invested with his office, he calls for a list of the castles which the Othmân empire was possessed of before the last war with the Germans; and finding by it that a great many towns beyond the Saave, which he had taken from the Germans when Pâshâ of Bosnia, were restored to them by the peace, he is extremely provoked, declaring that the persons who had made the peace were no less Gyawrs than the Germans themselves, since they had delivered up, without any necessity, so many places reduced to the Othmân obedience by his own blood; and had given Kaminiek, a city designed by Soltân Mohammed for the bulwark of the whole empire, as well as a noble monument of the Musulman religion, by the erection of a magnificent Yâmi, in exchange for three towns of Moldavia, filled with Christians. Not content with reproaching the makers of the peace, he resolves to break it, and particularly to declare war against the Poles, whose weakness, while Seraskier on that side, he had observed; and the rather, as the confused state of Europe, on the death of the king of Spain, was such, that neither the emperor, nor any other Christian power, could assist them.

Plots against the Mufti.

HIS next business was to seek a handle for declaring war, lest the people, thinking the truce violated, might fear the event: but having no pretence to accuse the Poles of a breach of the treaty, he declares, that the Othmân ambassadors had acted contrary to the Korân, and the Soltân's command, by giving up more than their orders would justify; for which reason he resolves to put them to death. But perceiving that the Mufti's authority would be a great obstacle in this affair, since he had not only approved of the peace by his Fetva, but was also a profest patron of the ambassadors, he determines to dispatch him privately, in reference to his office. With this view he feigns a sincere friendship for him, often visiting him in a familiar manner, and discoursing with him about public affairs. At last, when he thought the matter ripe for execution, he invites the Mufti to a splendid entertainment, directing some of his chamberlains suddenly to strangle that prelate with a cord, when the water was pouring out for him to wash his hands.

*His Kyeha-
ya's treachery.*

BUT this plot, through his own imprudence, proved his ruin: for having discovered the secret to his Kyehaya Ibrâhîm Aga (K), the latter, to ingratiate himself with the Mufti, goes with the Kasâb Râshî (L), and informs him of the danger. On this the Mufti, pretending sickness, throws himself on his bed; and, in a faint voice, answers the Wazır, now come to invite him (M), that he was extremely sorry his sudden indisposition should prevent his going:

<sup>m</sup> CANT. p. 428, & seq.

(I) This Pâshâ having been falsely accused during this expedition, by Râmi Reis Effendi, as if favouring the Arabs, an officer was sent to take off his head: but finding he had subdued them, and that it was dangerous to execute his commission, he returns and tells the Soltân how matters stood. After this, Dâltabân, knowing the Mufti's covetousness, and great interest with the Soltân, whose preceptor he had been, sends him a present of 60,000 gold crowns. Feizallah Effendi, in return, offers to get him made Wazır (Husseyn Pâshâ being sickly, and become unfit for affairs by his drunkenness); which he accordingly performed. Cant.

(K) For this treachery he was, by the Mufti's application, made Pâshâ of Saloniki; and on account of his lameness named Topal Ibrâhîm Pâshâ, that is, Ibrâhîm Pâshâ the lame: but died a few months after in horrible torments, as it was said, calling on the name of his master. Cant.

(L) Or chief butcher; whose business is to see that none but sound and fresh meat be brought to market, or sold above the stated price. There is another made in time of war, to buy cattle for the army. He was named Kara Mehemed Aga, from his blackish complexion, and was the richest Turk in his time: for he often lent 500 or 1000 purses at three days notice, but was stripped of all at last; as is commonly the case with such men, on a false accusation. Cant.

(M) The Wazır and Mufti, who hold the highest offices

a going : but that he would send his son, the Nakib Effendi, to supply his place. When the Wazîr was gone, the Mufti sends for the Reis Effendi, Râmi Mehemed Pâshâ, lately made a Kubbeh Wazîr (N), and Maurokordatus; who being made acquainted with the design against them, it was agreed, by some accusation, true or false, to procure the Wazîr to be removed; and, if possible, to be put to death. The Mufti undertakes this province, and next day informs Soltân Mostafa, that the Wazîr was engaged in some new designs destructive to the whole Othmân empire; had secretly lifted a very numerous army; made his dependants officers in it; and ordered them to excite the soldiers to demand a rupture of the peace, with a charge to depose his majesty, if he refused to gratify their desires".

THE Soltân readily believing what that prelate, for whom he had a great esteem, falsely charged upon the Wazîr, orders him to be sent for; and, having loaded him with reproaches, commands him to be put to death (O), without suffering him to speak in his own defence (P), and gave his post to Râmi Mehemed Pâshâ. But from the Wazîr's blood, as from a copious fountain, torrents of human gore flowed out. The Ulema, citizens and soldiers of Constantinople, hearing what had happened at Adrianople, began to complain openly of the present administration; declaring, "That the new Wazîr, Mufti, and other great officers, were traitors; and that their whole management tended to the ruin of the empire: that for this purpose they had persuaded the Soltân to put to death Dâltabân Mostafa Pâshâ, one of the greatest heroes of the age, who had twice signalized his abilities against the Germans and Arabs; so that supposing he had been guilty of some misconduct, he should rather have been banished, that he might, when occasion required, be let loose upon an enemy: but that they, being jealous of his merit, would not suffer him to live; and had raised to the Wazîrship Râmi Mehemed Effendi, a good scribe indeed, and a learned man, but unfit for such an office: that this was the reason of persuading the Soltân, thereby become haughty, to reside at Adrianople, and wander in the woods, while the capital of the empire, by absence of the court and tyranny of governors, was reduced to the lowest poverty: that to disgrace it the more, Kyoprili Abdo'lla Pâshâ (Q), a youth of eighteen, who, except the glory of his father, had nothing to recommend him but his marriage with the Mufti's daughter, was appointed Kaymaykâm; as if no bounds could be set to the Mufti's will, who wanted but little of engrossing, with his family, the whole Othmân empire: that all the best Mollahships were filled by his young sons, or those who could purchase them; for that his house was become the office of avarice, where justice and ecclesiastical dignities were sold to the rich, instead of being bestowed on men of integrity and learning."

SUCH discourses as these sufficiently indicated the people's readiness to revolt: all they wanted was a leader, and plausible occasion; which last is soon given them by the Kaymaykâm himself. For in Moharram 1114, after the Janizaries had received their pay, the Jebeji,
New provocation given by the Kaymaykâm.

<sup>a</sup> CANT. p. 430, & seq.    <sup>o</sup> CANT. p. 432, & seq. See also MOTRAYS'S Travels, vol. i. c. 13. p. 230.

sices in the state, never meet without great previous ceremonies; the Mufti sending a proper officer to know if the Wazîr is at leisure for a visit; the Wazîr sends his officer to conduct him. Being come in his chariot to the Wazîr's palace, he is led under the arms by two other domestic officers to the stair-case, where the Wazîr meets him on the first step, and salutes him. Then going up, the Mufti follows, and, with both hands on his breast, blesses the people on both sides, with a peace be with you. Being come into the room, he is seated on the right hand of the Wazîr. Cant.

(N) He was of mean birth, and applied himself to learning and poetry. When he had finished his studies, and left the academy (where he got the name of Râmi), he frequented taverns, where, being handsome, and having a sweet voice, as well as skill in music, he got a tolerable livelihood. He was removed from this way of life by the famous poet Nâbi Effendi, by whose instructions he was esteemed at court a good writer, for he outdid all the Turkish writers in quickness of wit and elegance of expression. He was first promoted by the Wazîr Elmas, and made Reis Effendi by Husséyn Pâshâ, who joined him with Maurokordatus in making the peace; although in effect he did nothing but what the latter proposed. After the rebellion he was made Pâshâ of Egypt, under the Wazîr Husséyn, and thence removed to Cyprus, where his constitution being proof against the bad air too long, an officer was sent to put him to death; but he died while saying his prayers. Cant.

(O) Motraye, who was then at Constantinople, passes over this remarkable event with as little notice as if he had been a thousand miles off. He only says, that Usseim Pâshâ, having, in October, desired leave to lay down his Wazîrship, one Altâban Mustafa, a Georgian slave, a bold, haughty, unpolite man, who could not write his own name, succeeded him, and was strangled some weeks after, occasioned, as it was said, by a quarrel with the Mufti. Travels, vol. i. p. 218.

(P) The history of this affair is told at large by prince Cantemir, in a note, p. 414, & seq. where the folly, as well as injustice of the Soltân, appears to a surprising degree in putting Dâltabân to death, on the bare accusation of the Mufti, without allowing him the hearing, though he had something of importance to impart to him. Being asked, at the place of execution, what it was he had to say to the Soltân, he answered, that he could impart it to none but him: although he should not then behold, without horror, the face of such a Soltân as put those to death who faithfully served him. Cant.

(Q) The son of Kyoprili Mostafa Pâshâ, slain in the battle of Salankamen, 1691. After these troubles, growing wiser with age, he acted with more moderation; and after he had quelled a rebellion, was made Pâshâ of Sivas (or Sebastia in Anatolia) by Soltân Ahmed III.—Cant.

who

A. D. 1697. who are next in order, went to the houses of the Kaymaykâm and Tefterdâr, desiring also to be paid : but Kyoprili Abdo'lla putting them off from day to day, about forty of them go to the Diwân, while he is hearing causes, and by an Arzûkal beseech him to grant their demand in turn. This petition firing his youthful blood, he reproaches the Jebeji in very injurious language, and bids them wait, because there was no money in the treasury. The soldiers, provoked at this treatment, in going off return the Kaymaykâm's reproaches with great sharpness, on the very stairs of the Diwân, and so loud that the by-standers could hear almost every word.

THE Kaymaykâm being informed of this, commands the Muhzurs (R) to seize and carry them to their chief officer, to be put to death : for it is a capital crime among the Turks to contradict, or use reproachful terms to any judge, especially the Kaymaykâm, who is supposed to be the Soltân's vicerent. The Muhzurs using force, are resisted by the Jebeji, who, raising a tumult in the street, in the usual phrase of the soldiers, Yoldash Yokmidur ? Are no companions at hand ? call out for assistance. At this cry the Jebeji, flocking from all parts, rescue their fellows from the officers of justice, and returning to their quarters, there give an account of what had happened ; adding, that it was in vain to expect their pay, whilst the distribution was in the hands of a boy, whose brains were turned by his high and undeserved dignity. The resentment thus kindled, is inflamed by Karakash Mehemed, a man of great boldness, and fond of changes in the government ; who, exciting the whole assembly to revenge the injury, they immediately take arms, and run to the Kaymaykâm's palace.

THE Kyoprili Abdo'lla Pâshâ being informed of their approach, escapes through a back-door, while the Jebeji, on their disappointment, run about in parties to stir up the Janizaries and Ulema. Next day the leaders of the sedition meet in the At-meydân (S), and there bind themselves by oath either to destroy the Wazîr, Mufti, and other oppressors of the people, or perish in the attempt. In this assembly Firâri Hassan Pâshâ offers to be their leader, and is, by them, appointed Kaymaykâm (T) in the room of Kyoprili Oglî. The Nakib Kiazibi Mehemed Effendi (U) assumes the office of Mufti, and Dorojan Ahmed Pâshâ, a person of no note, who had been recalled from his Pâshalik, and lived privately, is made Wazîr by the rebels. Kul-kyebaya Chalik Ahmed Aga is appointed Janizar Agasi, and Diw Ali Aga (X), who had been deprived of the post of Kul-kyebaya, is restored to that office. By their advice the conspirators shut the gates of the city, and suffer no man to go forth unless sent by themselves, to prevent the Soltân being informed of their designs. After this they plunder the magazines of the arms kept there ; and prepare themselves for war with the empire.

MARCHING IN ARMS towards Adrianople. SOLTÂN Mostafa, when he heard of this sedition, sends Mostafa Effendi, the chief secretary, to enquire into the reason of so great a rebellion in his capital city, with a promise to grant all their desires : but, arriving at the gate on the eighth day of the sedition, the guard force him from his horse, and carry him to the At-meydân, where the people seizing him as a spy, before their leaders could restrain them, beat him almost to death, and tortured him to such a degree, to make him confess what the Soltân was doing, that they left him neither sense nor speech to declare any thing. Yet this (which they imputed to his obstinacy, rather than their own cruel treatment) incensing them more against the Soltân, they assemble above 50,000 soldiers on the 19th day ; and, leaving the city, resolve utterly to destroy Adrianople, as the rival of the capital, in case the inhabitants should dare to oppose them. Being come to Hapsa, a town not far from thence, they send to inform the Soltân, “ That they had not taken up arms either to fight against him, or the Musulmâns, but only to oblige the evil ministers to submit to be tried by the divine judgment of the Korân ; but that, if he should use the sword to decide this affair, they would repel force with force ; and he would be accountable to God for the needless effusion of Musulmân blood.” They likewise privately warn the inhabitants of Adrianople, not to appear in arms, if they would avoid being plundered ; since they came not to fight with their brethren, but to punish the betrayers and oppressors of the Othman empire<sup>z</sup>.

<sup>z</sup> CANT. p. 433, & seq.

(R) Their name is derived from Ibzar, to bring, because their business, besides guarding the Wazîr's palace, is to bring the guilty, and if any are to be confined, to keep them till the next Diwân.—To put malefactors to death there is a body taken out of the Muhzuri, who, from the Falanga, or instrument used in beheading, are called Falangaji. Cant.

(S) Or Hippodrome, built by Justinian, near St. Sophia, and still used to air and exercise the Soltân's horses.—Cant.

(T) Motrayes says that Firalli having strangled the Kâpîji Bâshi, who was sent to strangle him, he hid himself among his women in Constantinople, and appeared on being cried by a public crier.

(U) He was of the race of Amîrs, and had been Mufti in the reign of Mohammed IV. He was called Kiazibi, or liar, as being thought much given to lying. Cant.

(X) He was the only one of the rebel party who escaped the pursuit of Abmed III. flying to Fezayri, or Algiers ; so that he could never be found. Cant.

<sup>a</sup> THE Soltân, on this message, assembles his European troops with the utmost expedition, A. D. 1699. and orders them to march under the conduct of the Wazîr, Râmi Mehemed, against the rebels : who, by a Fetva of the Mufti, Feyzo'llah Effendi (Z), are declared Gyavrs ; and <sup>Army join them.</sup> those promised a crown of martyrdom, who should die fighting valiantly against them. But, when both armies were in fight, the Nakib Effendi, who acted as Mufti among the conspirators, holds up the Korân to the Soltân's forces, and desires them to consider, " That they " were brethren of the same religion, the same blood, and subjects of the same dominion : " that the people of Constantinople had not taken up arms to overturn the empire, or attempt " any thing against the sacred law ; but to punish the infidels and contemners of the law, " agreeably to its precepts ; and that if they endeavoured to oppose so pious a design, they " would draw upon themselves, not only the indignation of God, but likewise the severest " punishments." The Soltân's troops are so affected with this speech, that they abandon the Wazîr, and join the rebels, saluting them brethren.

THE Wazîr, in this desperate state, flies with two servants in disguise to Varna ; and from thence back to Constantinople, concealing himself for some time in a house which he had in the suburbs of Ayûb. Mean time the rebels encamped under the city, at Solâk Chesbmehi (A) ; and from thence send to demand the heads of the Wazîr, the Mufti with his sons, and Maurokordatus. The Soltân, expecting this, had sent off the Mufti two days before, but with several Bostânjis to attend him, with design to stop his flight, if the danger increased : finding therefore the rebels more obstinate in their demands, he sends for him back, and delivers him <sup>The Mufti tortured.</sup> up, with his two sons. As soon as they have him in their power, they fix nails in his knees ; and, by other horrid cruelties, endeavour to make him discover the immense treasures he was reported to have amassed : but, being a man of great courage, he bears all with singular patience ; and utters not one word, excepting to desire vengeance from God on such an impious and ungrateful people. At length, exhausted with so many torments, he is put to death ; and his body (B) thrown into the river, as if he had been an infidel, and unworthy of burial.

THE Soltân, perceiving from these circumstances that the people were more exasperated against him than he had imagined, sends to Dorojân Ahmed Pâshâ (C), the Wazîr of the rebels, the seal belonging to that employment, and confirms the other officers chosen by them in their posts, with a promise to grant all their demands, and deliver up to them the Wazîr <sup>Mostafa resigns the throne to Ahmed.</sup> and Maurokordatus, who were fled, as soon as they should be taken. But, growing more presumptuous by the Soltân's condescension, they concert measures to depose him. For this end, they dispatch a letter to Abmed, brother of Soltân Mostafa, desiring him, since they scrupled to enter the imperial palace with an armed force, to come, if possible, to the camp, either with or without his brother's leave, and the army would immediately proclaim him emperor.

SOLTÂN Mostafa, intercepting this letter, continues long in suspense, whether he should kill his brother, or voluntarily resign the scepter to him. Many of his domestic officers advise the fratricide ; alleging, that the conspirators would be obliged to confirm him in the throne, in case there were no other heirs to the empire. But the Soltân abhors such a deed, and resolves <sup>e</sup> to commit himself to the Divine Providence. He goes therefore to Abmed, and, embracing him with great affection, informs him, that he was universally desired to fill the throne ; and first

(Z) He was a native of Wân in Armenia, and of the Amîr race. In the time of Mohammed IV. when Munderis, or master of the Soleymâniyah school, he was appointed Shehzadeh Hoja, or preceptor to the Soltân's children, Mostafa and Abmed. After having often changed, contrary to custom, his ecclesiastical employments, he was created Mufti, and continued in that dignity for seven years ; a thing unheard of among the Turks. He was a man of no great learning, and more crafty than wise : yet had such an ascendant over the Soltân, that he never did any thing without consulting him, nor could refuse him any thing. He was so covetous, that he took presents with both hands ; would ask for them if not offered him ; and would for money give any Fetva desired of him, whether right or wrong. The eldest of his four sons he appointed Nakib, and conferred rich Mollahships on the other three, though but young ; which gained him the hatred of the Ulema, as well as people. What was worse, he encouraged them, like another Eli, in all sorts of extravagancies. Cant.

(A) The fountain of Solâk, so called, either because the builder was of the order of the Solâki, or else had lost a hand. It is in a field a mile from Adrianople, in the road to Constantinople. Cant.

(B) As the laws of the Korân, and the empire, forbid putting a Mufti or Mollah to death (the highest punishment of the whole order of the Ulema and Kâdis being banishment), the rebels, to excuse their treatment of him, declared he was a Gyavur ; and would not allow his body Mohammedan burial, but hired a Greek priest to put him in the ground. This man got some person to drag him along, while he went before singing, instead of the burial hymn, Ordure be upon thy soul ; and, at last, flung it into the river, having first, it is said, perfumed it with frankincense, and repeated two Turkish verses, whose sense is, neither yours nor ours, he is gone directly to hell ; with which the Turks were so pleased, that they both praised and rewarded the Pâpâ for his ingenuity. Cant.

(C) So called by the rebels, because like Doroshenko, Hetmân of the Kosaks, who was called Doroshân by the Turks. But he was before named Damad Ahmed Pâshâ, that is, Abmed Pâshâ the son-in-law ; because he had married the sister of the Wazîr Amur Oglî Hussyn Pâshâ, and granddaughter of Kyepirli Mostapha Pâshâ ; the handsomest woman in her time, but so lascivious, that she kept many gallants, especially Franks. Cant.

A. D. 1699. salutes him Soltân. At his departure he speaks as follows: "Remember, brother, that while I a " governed the empire, you enjoyed the utmost liberty; I desire you will allow me the same.
 " Think also, that although you by right ascend this throne, as having been possessed by your " father and brother, yet that the instruments of your advancement are treacherous rebels,
 " who, if you suffer them to escape with impunity, will quickly treat you as they do me (D)
 " at present." Having said this, he retires to the same chamber in which he had kept his brother; where, six months after his deposition (E), he died of a distemper contracted through melancholy. He reigned eight years and some months.

His character. SOLTAN Mostafa was a prince of great expectations in the beginning of his reign; but fortune afterwards blasted them. He had greater advantages from nature than both his predecessors: for he was of a mature judgment, great application, and strict sobriety. Neither covetous in collecting, nor profuse in distributing, the public monies. He was a good archer, and expert horseman. A lover of justice (F), and very devout in his religion. He gained great reputation by the peace of Carlowitz; which, having been in vain attempted by his father and uncles, he settled, by wonderfully reconciling all parties.

His person. HE was, as to his person, of a moderate size; his face round, and beautified with red and white: his beard red, thin, and not long: his nose short, and a little turned up: his eyes blue, and his brows thin and yellow. In the spring he used to have spots break out in his face, which disappeared in the winter. He left no son alive (F), although he had been father of several. He was particularly fond of Ibrâkîm (G), son of his uncle Abmed, whom he always carried with him; and designed, as was thought, for his successor, in case he died without issue<sup>a</sup>.

<sup>a</sup> CANT. Othm. Hist. p. 435, & seqq.

(D) Abmed followed the advice of his brother, and, probably, by that means, escaped an early deposition. However that fate befel him at last: for he was deposed in 1730, by a sedition of the soldiery, which a corrupt administration had given occasion to, and his nephew Mahmûd advanced in his room. Abmed died in 1736.

(E) More properly his abdication, which is a voluntary deposition; by which he prevented a forcible one.

(F) His treatment of Doltabân calls in question both his judgment and justice.

(F) Motraye says he left three sons, Jesus, Mustafa, and Mahomet. Trav. vol. i. p. 247. Perhaps Mahomet is a mistake for Mahmûd, who succeeded Abmed III.

(G) He was a hopeful and good-natured prince; but died at Constantinople after I left that city. Cant.

B O O K XX.

C H A P. I.

The history of the dispersion of the Jews; or an account of their distressed state, from the destruction of Jerufalem to the end of the last century.

<sup>a</sup> WE concluded the second part of the antient history of the Jews, with an account of <sup>Impiety of the Jewish nation at the time of their dispersion.</sup> the dreadful siege of their once celebrated metropolis; the horrid slaughter of some myriads of its inhabitants; and the dispersion and miserable slavery of the rest of the Jewish nation †: all which, we there observed, beset them as a just punishment for their horrid and complicated impieties, which were by that time grown to such a monstrous height, that Josephus himself scruples not to say, That, if this dreadful vengeance had not fallen upon them, the earth would, of its own accord, have opened itself to swallow up those ungrateful miscreants. Although the thing which, above all others, aggravated their guilt, was their rejecting and crucifying the so long promised and expected Messiah; who, in consequence of their unbelief, injustice, and horrid ingratitude, expressly, and in the clearest <sup>b</sup> terms, denounced all those woes which have happened to them exactly according to his divine and infallible prediction. However had the divine vengeance stopped here, and had God contented himself with the destruction of a city and a temple, in which his worship had been so impiously prophaned; and with the dispersion of a rebellious nation, whom he had so often tried to gather under his wings; or had the effects of his vengeance fallen only on the guilty, especially on the chiefs of the nation, the Scribes and Pharisees, who were deepest in the guilt; there would have been nothing surprising in all their punishment, how heavy soever.

<sup>c</sup> BUT that it would have continued from generation to generation, and from age to age; <sup>Their woful state ever since.</sup> that their posterity should have already groaned under the same severe captivity almost seven-teen centuries, without the least glimpse of relief or abatement, is what may justly fill us with wonder: especially if we add to it, that the Jewish nation, as unhappy and numerous as it is over the world, hath preserved itself so long, under all the contempt and hatred, ill treatment and cruelty, and sometimes under the most bloody persecutions raised against it, almost in all the places of their dispersion. Such infinite difficulties and discouragements have they met with from Christians and Turks, as well as all other sorts of nations, that their history is hardly any thing but a continued series of woes and miseries, of injustice and violence, the most flagrant calamities, and bloody cruelties exercised against them: so that one cannot but wonder, how a people, whom he might rather have expected to find long since drowned in those seas of blood which had been drawn from them, should yet subsist in so many parts of <sup>d</sup> the world; unless we suppose, that the Divine Providence has preserved them hitherto for some great and glorious purpose. <sup>Preserved hitherto by Divine Providence for a miraculous conversion.</sup>

AND, if neither the length and dreadfulnefs of this their last captivity, nor the learned books which have been since written by Christians against them, exposing the poor shifts which their rabbies have been driven to, as well as the many palpable lies, forgeries, false glosses, and interpretations of the sacred books, to keep up their desponding hope in a Messiah not yet come, have not hitherto been able to open their eyes to their fatal errors; if all attempts made by Christians, whether by fair arguments or by violence, have hitherto proved ineffectual to persuade them to seek for truth, peace, and happiness, in the gospel of Christ; and, if they have all along preferred a miserable and ignominious slavery to their temporal, as well as eternal, a welfare, we may justly conclude, that the divine wisdom and goodness, which hath so wonderfully preserved them through such a series of ages, and through such vast difficulties and dreadful persecutions, designs their conversion in his own time to be altogether as miraculous as that of the heathen world. When that glorious and happy time will come is one of those inscrutable secrets, which God hath been pleased to reserve in his own disposal<sup>a</sup>: although, we cannot read the sacred books of the Old and New Testament with any attention, without observing indisputable promises of their call and total conversion. But, as this last is out of our province, we shall readily refer our readers to those many and learned treatises which have been written on the subject, particularly those which the reader will find in the margin<sup>b</sup>; whilst we confine ourselves to what more properly relates to their history, their dispersion over the b world, their various settlements in the east and west, their sufferings, their learned men and writings, false Messiahs and miracles, their academies and famed professors, their disputes with Christians and other nations, as well as among themselves; likewise to such material occurrences as have happened to them since the destruction of their city and temple by the Romans, to the close of the foregoing century, beginning with those who retired immediately after the sad catastrophe into the eastern, and ending with those who settled in the western, parts of the world, from which they came to be distinguished into eastern and western Jews (A).

† See before, vol iv. p. 287, & seq.

The chief subject of this history.

Jewish accounts fraught with fables.

Their chronology very imperfect;

By this vast scope of time, place, and matter, which this chapter comprehends, the reader will easily imagine, that we do not intend to give a full and regular history of the whole nation, c in every place of their dispersion, much less a chronological one through every age to this time, which would rather require some volumes; and, consequently, can have no place in a work so comprehensive as this. Neither would the greater part of it be either instructive or delightful to him, as most of our knowledge of it is fetched from the Jewish writers; who are justly noted, not only for their more than ordinary partiality to their own, and hatred as well as contempt for other nations, but likewise for their constant dealing in the most palpable falsehoods and absurdities. In reality, they outdo all the fabulous writers in the number, variety, and extraordinariness, of their miracles and surprising events; the sublime character of their doctors, saints, and martyrs; the exaggerated descriptions of their schools, academies, and cities; their riches, populousness, and a vast number of other pretences. The whole d calculated indeed to raise the credit of the Jewish nation above all others, even under all the disadvantages lately mentioned; but in effect these stupendous stories are couched in such positive and unguarded terms, and with such magisterial confidence, as serves rather to expose either their imposture or credulity (B). To this if we add, that they are the most wretched chronologists,

<sup>a</sup> Acts i. 7. <sup>b</sup> Vid. int. al. JOSE. MEDE, JURIEU, MEKLING, RHOD, and a late treatise on the restoration of the Jews and Israel. Bishop SHERLOCK on Prophecy, & al. plur.

(A) We must here take notice to our readers, that, by this distinction, we do not mean that antient one which was made between the Jews, who were transplanted beyond the Euphrates; and whose situation being easterly from those of Judea, Syria, Egypt, &c. were called eastern, and these western. But, by the former, we mean those who have dispersed themselves through the eastern part of the world, such as Turkey, Persia, Egypt, Palestine, &c.; and, by the latter, or western, those who have been, or still are, tolerated in Italy, Spain, Portugal, France, England, Germany, and other provinces of Europe, where they have had, or still have, very considerable settlements.

Besides this distinction, the European Jews divide themselves into northern and southern; the former of whom, being those who for many ages lived in Germany, Denmark, Poland, and other northern provinces, not only differ in their liturgy, ceremonies, and in some of their tenets; but, being more strict adherers to them, do hate and despise the southern ones, which are those chiefly of Spain and Portugal, who are not only more remiss in all these respects, but go even so far as to make outward profession of popery in those countries, for the sake of enriching themselves; and scruple not to go to mass, to confession, to worship the host, cross, relicks, &c.; or even to take priestly orders among them, and enter themselves into their convents, as we shall have further occasion to hint in the sequel.

(B) To give at once a satisfactory proof of this, we shall subjoin some instances of it by way of specimen to the rest. First, most of their eminent men, either for sanctity or learning, have not only been very conversant in miracles, but their very conception and birth have been accompanied or preceded by some signal prodigy; whilst their lives, and even deaths, have been signalized with a much greater number and variety of them.

We begin with the famed Simeon Jochabdes, the pretended author of the book of Zohar, said to have lived a little before the destruction of Jerusalem; and the first who ventured to write down the sublime mysteries of the Cabbala, which had, till then, been only conveyed by the angels unto the patriarchs, till Moses; and by him revealed to the seventy elders, from whom it passed from mouth to mouth unto his days, when he undertook, for the first time, to commit them to writing in the book above-named, as we have had occasion already to mention in a former part (†).

They tell us, among other things, that he and his son did, in some miraculous manner, escape the cruelty of the emperor Titus, who had condemned them to die, and went and hid themselves in a cavern, where they found leisure to write the book above-mentioned, not without the assistance of the prophet Elijah, who was sent to him, from time to time, by God, to explain to him such mysteries of that divine science as were above his reach. The book thus miraculously compiled, Simeon

(†) See Ancient History, vol. i. p. 596, note (B).

a chronologists, not only in the imperfect calculations of time, in which they vastly differ from us and other nations, as the reader may see by the short account which we shall give in the margin came forth to communicate the contents of it to such disciples of his as were fit to receive those sublime mysteries; and whilst he was uttering them, such a resplendent light filled the whole house, that they were not able so much as to cast their eyes on him; and at the same time a fire surrounded the place, which kept all other persons from coming in. At length the double miracle ceased; by which they perceived, that the light of Israel was gone out; upon which, one disciple kissed his hand, another his feet, and vast numbers came to attend and honour his funeral.

Whilst they were carrying him to his grave, a voice was heard in the sky, crying out, Come to Simion's nuptials; he will enter in peace and repose in the bridal chamber. A bright flame likewise surrounded the bier, as if to set it on fire; and, on his being let down into the grave, another voice was heard, saying, This is he who hath caused the earth to quake, and the kingdoms to tremble. These are some of the wonders, they tell you, of the author of Zohar, whom they look upon as the chief of all the Cabalists; altho' his book doth not appear to have been so much as known among the Jews till 1000 years after.

Nor are they less lavish of their prodigies, even to some of the ancient doctors, whom the nation ought rather not only to have been ashamed of, but to have even execrated, for their impostures, and for the dreadful calamities which those brought upon them.

Of this number was their famed Akiba, who set up for the forerunner of the false Messiah Cosiba, who appeared under Adrian, and took upon him the name of Bar Chochab, The son of a star; and of whom we shall have occasion to speak more fully in the sequel. Akiba, according to them, was descended from Sifera, general of J. bin, king of Tyre, by a Jewish mother (1), who had kept the flocks of a rich inhabitant of Jerusalem forty years, when his daughter became enamoured of him; and, being ashamed to marry an obscure shepherd, advised him to go and spend twelve years in study at some academy, which our author does not name; and, upon his promise of doing so, was privately married to him (2). He went accordingly; and, at the end of twelve years, brought home twelve thousand disciples; at sight of whom, she bad him go again another twelve years; at the end of which he came home to her with twenty-four thousand. She met him in tears, and, with her cloaths rent, told him, that her father had disinherited her on his account. However, the old man had no sooner set his eyes on him, but he altered his mind, fell on his knees before his son-in-law, and bestowed a handsome fortune on him. What they add, concerning the death of his pretended twenty-four thousand disciples, who died every one between the feasts of Easter and Whitsuntide, for some misbehaviour to each other, and their being all buried in a valley near Tiberias along with their master and his first wife, is no less extraordinary.

As to his learning and writings, they tell us wonders of them (3): they assert that he could account for the least title in the sacred books. They even add, that God had revealed things to him, which he had concealed from Moses; and that the Mishna and Talmud have collected one thousand of his sentences, which are esteemed so many judicious and infallible decisions: moreover, that a large volume would hardly contain all the memorable things which he wrote and did (4). They also affirm, that he was permitted to enter into paradise, as well as the famed Rabbi Achai, to whom he was to give his sister in marriage. These are some of the wonders which they tell us of the celebrated Akiba, who was nevertheless the pretended forerunner and strenuous fautor of that false

Messiah, whose imposture brought as great a destruction on the Jewish nation under Adrian, as their former had been under Vitus. This we shall see in the sequel, where we shall take notice of the sad catastrophe of both by order of that emperor.

In like manner they extol several of his disciples, particularly those who follow Rabbi Judah, the son of Elai, not only for having been the prince of orators, but much more so for not having committed one single sin during his whole life. He became the chief of an academy, and his comment on Leviticus, is stiled, by way of excellence, The Book. He fasted most of the year, lived upon herbs and roots; and was ranked among their greatest saints after his death; insomuch that his tomb, which they placed on a hill covered with olive-trees, near the little town of Zaitun in Galilee, was visited and revered by all the Jewish devotees.

R. Chanina, the son of Chachinai, another of Akiba's disciples in the same reign, and one of the five judges of the Jewish tribunal at Japhneh, is reported to have married when young, but to have left his wife and home to study the law; to which he applied himself with such assiduity, that, upon his return, he neither knew his wife, house, nor family. Another, named Elcazer Gbisma, became so profound an arithmetician, that he could calculate the drops of water that were in the sea (5). We omit several others of less note to come at the most celebrated of them, called, by way of excellence, Mehir, or enlightener, and was stiled, The light of the learned, as his master Akiba, was The light of the world; which title descended likewise on his disciple Judah Hakkodish, or the saint of whom we shall have further occasion to speak. Mehir married a wife who became more learned than he, and whose decisions bear a much greater authority; insomuch that she is reckoned in the rank of the Tanaites, one of the highest classes of their doctors. She has left 300 traditions, which she had learned from 30, or, according to others, 300 masters. She one day, among the rest, took upon her to correct one of her husband's interpretations, in such a manner as displayed, if not a greater judgment, at least a higher degree of charity; for some loose fellows having by their noise interrupted him in his study, Mehir immediately pronounced a curse against them out of the civth psalm, Let the sinners be consumed out of the earth, &c. verse ult.; upon which she checked him with some emotion, telling him, that the curse of the Psalmist was levelled against the sins, and not against the sinners; for that if the former were rooted out of the world, there would be none of the latter left in it (6). It is pity his resentment caused her end to prove dishonourable and tragical to her. For we are told, that she suffered herself to be so far deluded by one of her husband's disciples, who acted in concert with him, as to appoint a private meeting with him, in which being caught, and unable to outlive her disgrace, she went and hanged herself; soon after which Mehir married another, which he took care should not eclipse his fame as this had done.

All these, as was lately observed, were the disciples of Akiba above-mentioned; and this sketch of the surprising things which the Jewish Rabbies have wrote of them, will suffice to give our readers an idea of their swollen stile and fondness for the fabulous sublime. We shall only add, what they say farther of the famed university of Leher, or Bithur, in which their master and his false Messiah had refuted themselves against the army of the emperor Adrian; and which had 400 schools or colleges, each college 400 professors, and each professor 400 disciples; all which formed such a potent army, that the defence they made against the Romans made not only

(1) Gantz Tzemach David, p. 99.

(2) Ex Ketuboth, fol. 62. ap. Fogenseil in סוטה p. 312.

(3) Idem Ibid.

(4) Zacbut in Juchasin, p. 62.

(5) Bartoloc Bibl. Rabin tom iii. p. 271.

Wolf. J. b. ecc. & alib. pass.

(6) Gantz Tzemach, Wagens, up. sup. 300. b. See also Wolf. Bibl. Rab.

sub voc.

margin (C); but that they are the most negligent in that important point, leaping over whole a scores of years, if not sometimes more than a whole century, to make their fabulous conceits coincide, of which we may have occasion to give some pregnant instances in the sequel; it will be no wonder that we decline a task, which would make us continually liable to stop, either to confute some of their absurd fables, or rectify their wretched anachronisms.

For, with respect to this task, they appear wholly careless and unconcerned about it; and, as long as they know that their people never read any of our books, and wholly rely upon their own, they are in no pain about any objection we raise against them, or any error or falsehood we prove against them.

Eastern Jews, still more unknown to us.

WITH relation to the history of the eastern Jews we are still more in the dark. The Jews themselves being ignorant of what hath happened to their brethren in those remote countries; b and having received but a very imperfect intelligence from thence, either from books written there, or from any epistolary intercourse. Their chronologers have indeed taken the pains to transmit the names of those doctors who have presided at their most celebrated schools, both in the east and in the west; but they speak rarely of those whom they style the chiefs or princes of the captivity, in the former. We find at most but three of them mentioned from Huna, who was the first of them (D), to the time of the finishing of the Talmud, that is, during the

Judea, but the whole earth to quake; there being none of them but was stout enough to pluck up a cedar by the root upon a full gallop.

(C) We need not here repeat what we have observed in our ancient history of the imperfect calculations of the ancient Jews (7), before the Babylonish captivity. And though it was in some measure rectified, as we have elsewhere shewn under the Maccabite princes (8), yet was this amendment far enough from being so exact as those of other nations. Besides, their writers made no scruple to compute their years from different æras, such as from the flood, from Abraham's or Jacob's descent into Egypt, others from the exod, from their being formed into a monarchy, from the first or second destruction of the temple under Nebuchadnezzar, Titus, &c. And it doth not appear, that they began to reckon from the creation till after their Gemarra was finished, at which time they fixed that for their common æra.

But in this, we must observe, that the Jews since fix the birth of Christ in the year of the world 3760, contrary to our chronology, which fixes it at the end of the 4th millenary, so that they come short by 240 years from ours; for add that number to 3760, and that makes up the whole 4000 years. But, besides this, they have another, which they call the lesser reckoning, in which they throw off all the millenaries, and reckon only the years that have elapsed since the last; which being added to the 240 years above-mentioned, brings it exactly to the christian æra. Thus when we read of any of their famed Rabbies who flourished, or of any persecution or other considerable event that happened to them in the year 460, according to this lesser calculation, the above-mentioned addition of 240 to that number will bring it to the 700 of Jesus Christ, and so of the rest. Our readers will not be displeased to have a farther and fuller idea given them of this new way of the Jewish computation which is taken from the year of our Christian æra 1674, which was with them, according to their short reckoning, the year 4777, or 435th year, their chronology ran thus (9):

|                                 | From the |
|---------------------------------|----------|
| Creation                        | 5435     |
| Flood                           | 3779     |
| Confusion of tongues            | 3439     |
| Birth of Abraham         | 3487     |
| —of Isaac                | 3387     |
| —of Jacob                | 3327     |
| Descent into Egypt       | 3197     |
| Birth of Moses           | 3067     |
| Exod, and the giving of the law | 2987     |

|                                                                     | From the |
|---------------------------------------------------------------------|----------|
| Entrance into Canaan                                         | 2347     |
| Anointing of David king                                      | 2547     |
| Building of the temple                                              | 2507     |
| Captivity of the ten tribes                                         | 2231     |
| Destruction of the first temple                                     | 2097     |
| Beginning of the Mede and Persian monarchy            | 2046     |
| Building of the second temple                                       | 2027     |
| Beginning of the Greek monarchy                              | 1932     |
| Cessation of prophecy                                               | 1982     |
| Beginning of the Asmonean kingdom                            | 1772     |
| Beginning of the Christian æra                                      | 1674     |
| Ruin of the second temple                                           | 1607     |
| Compiling of the Mishna                                      | 1534     |
| Reign of Constantine the Great                               | 1401     |
| Origin of the Manean sect                                    | 1382     |
| Completing of the Talmud or Gemarra of Babylon | 1196     |
| Ditto of Jerusalem                                    | 1167     |
| Birth of Mohammed                                            | 1184     |
| Beginning of the Ishmaelitish , or Mohammedan faith   | 1080     |
| Maimon's writing his Haicad                           | 500      |
| Jews banished out of France                           | 279      |
| —out of Spain                                                | 183      |
| — Portugal                                                   | 175      |

(D) This chief did not flourish till about the end of the second century of the Christian æra, and was contemporary, according to the Jewish chronologers, [except D. Gantz, who makes him near a century more recent] with the famed Judah Hakkodish, or the saint of whom we shall speak in the sequel; and was chosen chief of the oriental Jews about an. Ch. 220, or 222. Before him we meet with no mention of any; and we may affirm, that in the west that dignity did not begin till after the destruction of Jerusalem; for till then, those that dwelt in the east sent their gifts to Jerusalem, or if they were of the schismatic leaven, to mount Garizim; and the chiefs of both being under the Roman power, their authority was inconsiderable.

Some critics (10) indeed pretend, that, soon after the destruction of the metropolis, the Jewish nation divided itself into three bodies, each of which chose a chief over them. Those which remained in Judea continued under the chief of the Sanhedrin; those that refuged themselves in Egypt set up a patriarch over them, who is mentioned by Adrian: and those of Babylon appointed another, whom they stiled the chief of the captivity; tho' it is still pretended, that that of Judea had some kind of jurisdiction over the whole nation; which was the opinion of Origen and St. Jerom; and is farther confirmed by the emperor Adrian's mentioning but one patriarch

(7) See vol. i. p. 604. sub note (Q) p. 609 & seq. p. 612, and notes, p. 733, & seq. vol. iv. p. 3, & seq. p. 71 (K) & alib. pass. (9) See Basnage hist. des Juifs, lib. vi. c. 29. Gothofred. cod. Theod. tom. viii. c. 21. Vide Basnage, ubi sup. lib. iii. c. 4.

(8) See Anc Hist. (10) Vide

2 the space of three whole centuries; which is a plain proof that they knew little of them, or, at least, that those so much boasted dignities were inconsiderable there, and had little or nothing in them that could raise the honour or credit of the Jewish nation; as the learned Mr. Basnage, whom we have chosen to follow in the most material transactions of this history (E), hath

*Chiefs or princes of the
captivity.*

over the whole Jewish nation; and whose authority extended over Egypt, as well as over the east. The former of these is indeed more than probable; since Egypt being subject to the Romans as well as Judea, the patriarch of the last, or of Tiberias, being the only one acknowledged in the Roman empire, the other seems of course to have been subject unto him. But as to that of Babylon, who was independent of the Romans, it is more likely that the Jews chose him there to exempt themselves from the homage and tribute which those of Judea exacted from them. It were presumptuous to affirm any thing positively in so dark and disputed a matter; and we shall trouble our readers no farther with it.

(E) We do here readily acknowledge, that we have, for the most part, chosen to follow that excellent author in the sequel of this chapter, not only as his history of the Jews from their dispersion is the most elaborate and diffused, but as it hath hitherto been esteemed by the learned the most exact and accurate; and hath stood the test of so many editions in other countries, as well as in Holland; insomuch that the editor of that of Paris, the famed Dupin, who published it without the author's name, hath not been able to accuse him of any one material error or omission; though he hath made no scruple to curtail and castrate it of a great number of facts and remarks which he thought would displease those of his own church.

We have had two editions of it in English; the first by Mr. Tho. Taylor, A. M. ann. 1708, which the author himself owns to be faithful and exact; and the other, which is rather an abridgment of it, by J. Cruth, M. D. F. R. S. in two vols. 8vo. and printed in the same year—But we have chosen to follow the last French edition, which Mr. Basnage hath not only much enlarged, but hath cleared it from all the little cavils raised against it on the other side of the water; for on this side his work hath met with all the kind reception which it so justly deserves.

In his preface to this new edition, that learned author hath not only acknowledged and corrected every fault, supplied every omission, which hath been objected to his first, and exposed the unfair practice by which his pirated and mangled history was ushered into the world by Mr. Dupin, and his learned licenser Arnoudin, but hath been at the pains to confute a great number of objections raised against him, with more prejudice and partiality than reason or candor, from those of the Roman church; among which we may reckon those of the learned father Hurdouin, written chiefly in vindication of his own chimerical systems, which yet his whole society were so much ashamed of, as to oblige him to recant it, notwithstanding the great honour and commendation which they foresaw such a public act must reflect on the Jewish history and its author, a person, in all other respects, the least in favour with the jesuitical society.

Some other libels, as we may justly stile them, came out against his learned work from the same Romish quarter; one in particular written by Mr. Simon, though published by his kinsman Barat, ann. 1714; to say nothing of some others from the monkish tribe, not worth mentioning here; all which the author hath likewise condescended to give a full and satisfactory answer, either in the said preface, p. 10, & seq. or in the body of the book; on which, for that reason, we shall not dwell longer.

But there is still an extraordinary one which we cannot, in justice to the author and ourselves, omit taking notice of, as it came out from a very opposite quarter; and, by its menacing stile and aspect joined to a more than common display of learning, seemed to threaten no less than the utter explosion of that great and learned work, and the ruin of its author's character. This singular piece was published under the pompous title of Entretiens sur divers sujets d'Histoire, de Religion, Lit.ature, & de Critique; but the writer, who was likewise a minister of the French reformed church, and had been library-keeper to one of the late kings of Prussia, prudently conceals his name, as well he might; and, to give his censures the greater sanction, puts them into the mouth of a pretended Jew, but half converted to Christianity, by way of dialogue; in which himself bears no other part than that of commending, applauding, and sometimes backing, his objections with some specious proof, but more frequently by prefacing them with expressions the most derogatory, and reflecting on his antagonist, or with some fulsome encomium on his pretended Jew. The two first dialogues being merely introductory to his design, and to apprise the reader, how this Aboab (that is the Jew's name) came by his stock of polite literature, we shall say no more of it, but proceed to the third, where the threatened censure on the Jewish history begins at p. 126, and ends at p. 244. Aboab comes punctually at the hour, is so eager to vent his spleen against his adversary, that he breaks out with this exclamation, Di magni horribilem & sacrum libellum! and then opens his first heavy charge against our historian, which is, that he hath falsely accused the Jews of preferring their Talmud to the Sacred Scripture, by their comparing the latter to water, and the former to wine.

We have formerly observed †, that the talmudists compared the Written Law to water, the Mishna to wine, and the Gemarra to hippocras, or a rich compound wine. the fact is so undoubted, that no Jew, before his pretended Aboab, ever denied or pretended to disprove it; and he is the first, if not the only one, who hath attempted to expound that proverbial saying in a quite opposite sense. The method he takes to do it is no less new and singular; water, says he, being the most useful and necessary liquor, especially to the Jews, on account of their frequent washings and legal purifications, it plainly follows, that the comparing the written law to it must imply their giving the preference to it on this very account.

A man indeed must have the stupidity as well as impudence of the worst of Jews, to father such an unheard of exposition on a talmudist, so contrary to their avowed sense of it, and to the manifest import of the gradation from water to wine, and from common wine to the most excellent and cordial of that kind. Mr. La Croze therefore rightly judged, that such an unfair and unjust censure would better sit the mouth of a Jew in nubibus, than the pen of a protestant: though, in order to qualify him for that part, and to give some colour of reason to his censure, he hath been forced to supply him with some quotations out of the Greek poets, and other parts of literature; for which the talmudists always expressed a more than ordinary contempt. But there was still, it seems, a farther occasion for furnishing his Aboab with all this pompous shew of literature, as the bulk of his censures were to be merely critical, and of the lowest of that kind, and every Hebrew, Greek, or Latin word, mis-accented or spelt, and other as palpable as unavoidable errors of the press, were to be brought in as so many undeniable proofs of the Jewish historian's ignorance of the learned languages; though had he but revised his own short dialogue with half that critical accuracy, he must have observed a much greater number of such inaccuracies, if not much more palpable blunders, than he hath been able to spy out in that voluminous work. But for such a severe and exaggerated examen of those errata, his censures

(†) Annot. bib. vol. iii. p. 5. note B.

Royal lineage not confined to them.

hath fully proved in his. And yet some of the Jews pretend that these chiefs were superior in dignity and authority to the patriarch of Judea; because all that were left of the race of David are affirmed to have left that province, and to have retired into that of Babylon, where they conclude the sceptre, mentioned by Jacob, is only to be found (F); so that these princes of the captivity are, according to the Jewish tradition, affirmed to have been set up in lieu of the royal dignity; and that they have the same right with the ancient Jewish monarchs, over the whole nation wheresoever dispersed; and whether they pleased to assume or disclaim it (G). But here they grossly contradict themselves, merely to raise the authority of these Babylonish chiefs, who afterwards flourished a considerable time, and in great splendor there, above that of the patriarchs, who were more obscure, and of shorter duration, most probably to keep up the notion of the regal power being still extant in the former; and to evade the objection which the Christians raise against them, of its having been long since extinct; for their very genealogies plainly shew, that the elder Hillel, the chief of them, was of the tribe of Judah, and of the seed of David, being descended, according to them, from Shephathiah, the son of Abitail, the son of David (H). The western Jews pretend, moreover, that some of the most considerable families of the tribes of Judah and Benjamin went and settled in Sephard, or Spain; and that it is among them that the royal line is best preserved; on which account they have looked upon the rest of their nation with a singular contempt, and arrogate to themselves a superiority over them: though we should think, that if any could justly claim such a merit over the rest, it should be those who, instead of abandoning their native country to go and seek their fortune either in Spain or Babylon, preferred the living in it among the dreadful dilapidations of their metropolis, and other cities, and with a view of calling the dispersed thither again, and raising it as much as was in their power out of its ruins. We shall leave it to the Jews to dispute these points among themselves; and only add, that all this artifice of theirs will by no means prove what they design by it, viz. the existence of the sceptre or royal dignity, since those Babylonish chiefs were then subjects to the kings of Persia, and so could have no pretence to either. We shall find a more proper place to speak of their pretended grandeur, pompous installation, and other particulars, related of them by the Jewish writers; and thus much shall suffice to have premised concerning their swollen and fabulous stile; their fondness for sublime fictions and miracles, in order to keep up the people's desponding expectation of a Messiah, as well as to raise an implicit faith and sovereign regard for those doctors and their writings. By all which our readers will easily see, what dependance can be had upon historians and masters, whose main authority is founded on heaps of the most absurd miracles, as are only fit for a Jewish creed. We shall therefore resume the thread of their history, and proceed to give an account of the most material events that have happened to that nation since the destruction of their metropolis.

against it would have appeared as impertinent and contemptible for their number as they are in their nature. And such we dare affirm every candid reader will believe, and all that will be at the pains to read will find them, at the first sight; though much more, if they will be at the trouble of perusing the full and satisfactory answers, which the learned author hath condescended to give to each of them, in his preface to that new edition of his work; for which reason, we shall dwell no longer upon that idle heap of impertinent censures, being no farther concerned with it than to justify what we had asserted in our antient history, which was the very first point which that pretended Jew undertook to confute. The reader will easily guess at the rest of his performance by this his first coup d'essai, and excuse us from following its author farther in it, especially, as nothing material hath come out from that or any other quarter against the work above-mentioned since its author's full reply; but, on the contrary, a general approbation of the one, and encomium on the other.

(F) These accordingly quote a concession of Judah Hakkodesh, who is reported to have owned, that if Huna above-mentioned had come into Judea, he would have been obliged to have acknowledged him his superior, that Babylonish chief being of the seed of David by king Jehoiakim, whereas he (Judah) was of the tribe of Benjamin, and only of the royal race by the females. But this passage, so derogatory to the Jews of Palestine, seems rather to have been inserted in the Jerusalem talmud long after the extinction of those patriarchs, and when the Babylonish chiefs had got all the authority in their own hands. Neither is it credible, that Judah Hakkodesh, who was dead before Huna had been chosen to his dignity, or at least before he came to take possession of it in Judea, could make him such a compliment before his election, especially as his progenitors were equally of the tribe of Judah, and of the Davidic race, as we shall shew from the very genealogies of the Jews.

However that be, those chiefs have always distinguished themselves by the title of Rabona; whereas they give the Jewish pontiffs only that of Rabbies. They likewise assume the title of Nassi, or prince; on pretence that it is only with them that the royal race of David subsists in its full vigour; though that title is often taken in a much lower sense by some of the western Jews, especially in Germany, Poland, and Italy; where they give it those who have only the superintendency over about 20 synagogues.

(G) So says the book intituled Jad Khazabha (11), Capita sive principes captivorum qui sunt Babylone vice reges sunt constituti, licetque ipsis imperare in omni loco, sive placeat illis sive non placeat.

(H) We may further add, that this pretended retreat of the royal race into Babylon, is not only without foundation, but it appears, on the contrary, that they subsisted still in Judea in the time of Adrian, particularly in several of the relations of Jesus Christ, who never, that we can find, left their antient dwelling to go into Babylon; so that it is a mere Jewish fiction, that they were all to be found in the latter, and none in the former.

(11) Tracl. de Regib. cap. iv. de Aixmalatarcha.

- a WE need not repeat here what we observed near the close of their history, of the desolate condition to which both city and kingdom were reduced; or of the dreadful slavery to which the greatest part of the surviving Jews were condemned by the conqueror (I). Those that survived this sad catastrophe, and escaped the fury of the Romans, retired, some into Gallilee, and a much greater number into Egypt and Cyrene, where we shall find them again raising new rebellions, committing horrid massacres, and bringing again the victorious Romans against them. A learned countryman of our own<sup>c</sup>, however, hath imagined, that the Jewish Sanhedrin was not immediately destroyed, but only removed to Jamnia, and thence to Tiberias, where it subsisted till the death of Judas the saint; and that there were likewise academies set up in other cities, whilst the nation was still governed by a patriarch. But all this is said on the bare authority of their tradition, which is little to be depended upon where the Jewish honour is concerned, and is eminently false in this (K); for it doth not appear that that supreme court had the least shadow of power or authority left it by the Romans; but, on the contrary, that the whole nation was oppressed all manner of ways, on account of their frequent and bloody revolts; insomuch that they were not even permitted any exercise of their religion, unless they paid the annual didrachma to the emperor's treasury (L), over and above the other heavy taxes formerly laid on them; and we find that Titus, who appropriated that tax to his own use, as well as his successor Domitian, made them pay it with the utmost severity; insomuch that they stripped men of all ages and conditions, to discover whether they were circumcised, in order to extort that tax from them<sup>d</sup>. And is it credible, that a people, become so odious and oppressed, would be allowed to keep up such a supreme court, and endowed with such an extensive authority; or that, if Titus had made any such concession, Josephus would not have taken notice of it, both for the honour of that emperor, and the credit of his own nation? And as to Domitian, he is known to have hated the Jews too much to have suffered them to enjoy any such signal privilege, and was rather a persecutor, than a friend or benefactor to them: it must therefore be under his successor Nerva, who proved a much more favourable prince to them (M), that we must seek for the first appearance and institution

<sup>c</sup> LIGHTFOOT, op. posthum. p. 70,<sup>d</sup> SUTTON, lib. vii. XIPHIL. in Vespas.

(I) Were we to credit the exaggerated calculation which some Christian authors have made of the number of inhabitants in Judea (12), amounting, according to them, to 66,240,000, one would hardly suppose it to have been so far depopulated by the loss of 13 or 14 hundred thousand, which Josephus reckoned to have perished in this war; but that there would be still a sufficient number to have kept it from such an utter desolation as the Jewish historian represents it. But if the former is visibly wrong and exaggerated, the latter seems no less so on the other side; since we find in Judea, about sixty years after the destruction of the temple, a sufficient number of them to put a numerous army on foot, to fortify fifty castles, and to make a stout defence against the emperor Adrian, besides the city of Bitber, which held out a long and stout siege against him. All which shews plainly, that either there were a greater number left in the country than his account would intimate, or, at least, that they were not so far dispersed, much less destroyed or enslaved, but that they could quickly rally again, and resettle themselves in it.

(K) This tradition, founded on some predictions of the Cabala, says, that this translation was performed about forty years before the destruction of Jerusalem; whereas it is plain that Christ, St. Stephen, and St. Paul, appeared before, and were condemned by, that court sitting then in the metropolis; and Josephus informs us that it subsisted there still in the time of the Jewish war. Neither doth it appear from his whole history to have been removed to any other place. Those that say, that Titus granted that favour to the Jews at the request of Jochanan, the then patriarch of it, not only contradict those which pretend it was removed forty years before, but even Josephus, who would not have omitted so singular an instance of that emperor's condescension to that pontif, who, if any such there was, must have been dead before the siege of that place. Lastly, it contradicts the common notion both of the Jews and Christians, who affirm, that that supreme court had no power to sit in any other place but in Jerusalem, as we have had occasion to shew in our antient history (*); and our Saviour seems to hint as much when he said (Luke xiii. 33.) that it could not be that a prophet should perish, or be condemned to death, out of Jerusalem; since the sanhedrin alone had the power of passing that sentence on him.

(L) This was a yearly tax, which each Jew was formerly obliged to pay to the temple, and amounted to about 1s. 3d. of our money; but which Titus, after the taking of Jerusalem, ordered to be paid to Jupiter Capitolinus (13); and was so much the heavier and disgraceful, because it obliged them to buy their liberty of religion with that very money which they used to contribute for the preservation of it, and the service of the temple.

(M) This emperor made three ordinances in favour of the Jews, viz 1st, That all those, that had been accused of impiety on account of their religion, should be released; and those that had been banished on that account, should be recalled; which shews that if Domitian had had any such favourable design towards them, as some attribute to him, he had been assassinated before he could accomplish it. 2dly, He forbade the molesting of the Jews on account of their religion; and 3dly, He ordered them to be discharged from the grievous taxes which had been imposed on them on that account in his predecessor's reign; all which seems farther proved by a medal of that prince with this legend,

Calumnia fisci Judaici sublata.

From this some have imagined, that the impost of the didrachma, mentioned under the last note, was also taken off; but Origen doth so positively assure us, that it was

(12) Vid. int. al. Villalpand. de vision. Ezech. explan. tom. ii. p. 3. disput. xv. disput. iii. cap. 52, & alib.
 (*) See Ancient Hist. vol. i. p. 525. (H).

(13) Xiphilin, in Vespas. 217.

institution of these Jewish patriarchs, rather than in the two preceding reigns, during which a they had met with nothing but cruelty and oppression; and therefore cannot be supposed to have been able, under all those calamities, to have recovered themselves from their total dispersion; and to have been in a condition to obtain this new dignity, much less to have raised it to such a degree of authority.

The rise of the patriarchs of Judea.

THESE are generally looked upon, not without good grounds, to have been rather of the Aaronic or Levitical race, than of the tribe of Judah, which, in these parts of Judea, was either extinguished, or, at least, so far depressed, that they were not only in no condition of resuming their former power, but the very least attempt to do it would have rendered them obnoxious to the resentment of the jealous Romans; but that the priests and Levites should be suffered to assume the power of teaching the people, and to that end to set up schools, b to appoint masters over them, and at length to instal one at the head of the rest, with the title of Rosh Abbot, or head of the fathers, to which the Greek one of Patriarch answers, and came to be most in vogue, is the more probable, because neither their tribe, which had nothing to do with the regal dignity, nor their office, which was then confined to matters of religion, could give any umbrage to the Roman power, especially as their authority over their flocks did chiefly owe its gradual growth to their great reputation for learning and piety, and consisted chiefly in deciding of cases of conscience, and other controversies about their religion, and establishing the wisest and most effectual rules for the re-establishment and durable settlement of it. And as the towns of Tiberias, Japhne, or Jamnia, and Lydda, appeared to them the most commodious c to set up the first academies in, not, in all probability, without the government's permission, this might give occasion to the Jews to affirm afterwards, that the Sanhedrin had been removed to those cities. These Patriarchs having likewise gained some great reputation for their extraordinary learning, zeal, and piety, might, in time, not only bring a great concourse of other Jews from other parts, as from Egypt, and other western provinces of their dispersion, but likewise prove the means of their patriarchal authority being acknowledged there. From them they ventured, in time, to levy a kind of tribute, in order to defray the charges of their dignity, and of the officers under them, whose business it was to carry their orders and decisions through the other provinces of their dispersion, and to see them punctually executed by all; that some shadow of union, at least, might be kept up among the western Jews. d

Academies set up at Tiberias, Lydda, &c.

Their gradual rise and power.

Fabulous list of patriarchs mentioned by the Jews.

They likewise nominated the doctors who were to preside over their schools and academies; and these were, in process of time, stiled chiefs and princes, in order to raise the credit of that dignity, or to imply the great regard which their disciples were to pay to them. These chiefs became, at length, rivals of the patriarchs; and some of them possessed both dignities at once: which caused not only great confusion amongst them, but oftentimes very violent and bloody contests. However, as the Jewish rabbies have trumped up a much older æra for this patriarchal dignity, and have given us a succession of them down to the fifth century, in which it was abolished, it will not be amiss to give our readers the substance of what they wrote of it in the margin (N); and, at the same time, to shew them the absurdity and falshood still paid in his time, that it is likely this ordinance freed the Jewish nation only from the disgrace or calumny of those heavy fines which had been imposed upon them on account of their religion, or, as Domitian stiled it, impiety.

(N) According to them, the first patriarch was Hillel, sur-named the Babylonian, because he was sent for from thence to Jerusalem, about 100 years before the ruin of their capital, or thirty years before the birth of Christ, to decide a dispute about the keeping of Easter, which on that year fell out on the Sabbath-day; and it was on account of his wise decision, that he was raised to that dignity, which continued in his family till the said 5th century. He was likewise looked upon as a second Moses, because he lived like him 40 years in obscurity, 40 more in great reputation for learning and sanctity, and 40 more in possession of his patriarchal dignity. They make him little inferior to that law-giver in other of his excellencies, as well as in the great authority he gained over the whole Jewish nation. The wonder will be how Herod the Great, who was so jealous of his own power, could suffer a stranger to be raised to such a height of it, barely for having decided a dispute which must, in all likelihood, have been adjudged by others long before that time.

However Hillel was succeeded by his son Simeon, whom many Christians pretend to have been the venerable old person of that name, who received the divine infant in his arms (14). The Jews give him but a very obscure patriarchate; though the authors above quoted make him moreover chief of the sanhedrin; and Epiphanius says, that the priestly tribe hated him so much for giving so ample a testimony to the divine child, that they denied him common burial. But it is hardly credible, that St. Luke should have so carelessly passed over his twofold dignity, if he had been really possessed of them, and have given him no higher title than that of a just and devout man.

He was succeeded by Jochanan, not in right of descent, but of his extraordinary merit, which the Rabbies, according to custom, have raised to so surprising a height, that, according to them, if the whole heavens were paper, all the trees in the world pens, and all the men writers, they would not suffice to pen down all his lessons. He enjoyed his dignity but two years, according to some, or five according to others; and was the person, who,

(14) Luke ii. 25, & seq. Vid. int. al. Baron sub an. 1° N. 40, p. 58. Allat. de Simon. p. 2, & seq. & Calmet sub voc.

a falshood of that pretended succession to this imaginary dignity. By all which they will plainly see, that it did not begin to appear in Judea till about the time of the emperor Nerva, lately observing the gates of the temple to open of their own accord, cried out, O temple, temple! why art thou thus moved? We know that thou art to be destroyed, seeing Zechariah hath foretold it, saying, Open thy gates, O Lebanon, and let the flames consume thy cedars. Upon this, he is further reported to have complimented Vespasian, or rather, as some have corrected the story, Titus, with the title of king, assuring him, that it was a royal person who was to destroy that edifice: on which account they pretend that general gave him leave to remove the sanhedrin to Japhne, as was lately hinted.

The Jewish writers add, that he likewise erected an academy there, which subsisted till the death of Akiba; and was likewise the seat of the patriarch; and consisted of 300 schools or classes of scholars. Another he erected at Lydda, not far from Japhne, and where the Christians have buried their famed St. George. He lived 120 years; and being asked, what he had done to prolong his life? he gave this wise answer; I never made water nearer a house of prayer than four cubits: I never disguised my name: I have taken care to celebrate all festivals: and my mother hath even sold my head ornaments to buy wine enough to make me merry on such days; and left me at her death 300 hogsheads of it, to sanctify the Sabbath. The doctors that flourished in his time were no less considerable, both for their number and character, particularly the famed Rabbi Chanina, of whom the Bath Col (†) was heard to say, that the world was preserved for the sake of him; and R. Nicodemus, whom they pretend to have stopped the course of the sun, like another Jeshua.

He was succeeded by Gamaliel, a man, according to them, of unsufferable pride; and yet of so universal authority over all the Jews, not only in the west, but over the whole world, that the very monarchs suffered his laws to be obeyed in their dominions, not one of them offering to obstruct the execution of them (15). In his days flourished Samuel the Less, who composed a prayer full of the bitterest curses against heretics, by which they mean the Christians, and which are still in use to this day. Gamaliel was no less an enemy to them; and yet both have been challenged, the former as the celebrated master of our great apostle, the other as his disciple in his unconverted state; for take the D mem from לנידע, and there remains לנידע, Saul; and the word Kalon, or lesser, in the Hebrew, signifies paulus, or little, in the Latin; and as for the D mem, it being the first letter of the word Min, a heretic, it was thus taken from the name of Samuel, to shew that Saul did turn Christian (16). The apocryphal author of the recognitions pretends, that the Gamaliel mentioned in the Acts was actually a Christian, but secretly, and suffered to remain among the Jews by the consent and advice of the church (17). Baronius hath not only followed that fabulous author, but pretends that Gamaliel was buried afterwards in the same tomb with the proto-martyr Stephen, both whose relicks were pregnant with miracles. It is surprising, if Gamaliel was originally a patriarch, and prince of the sanhedrin, St. Luke should give him no better title than that of a pharisee, and doctor of the law, and in great repute among the people; and that, instead of presiding in the council, he should only represent him as a member of it, and giving his opinion among the rest of his brethren (18). There is moreover a manifest anachronism in making him succeed Jochanan, who outlived the ruin of the temple. He could not therefore be the person mentioned in the Acts.

Simon II. his son and successor, was the first martyr who died during the siege of Jerusalem. The people so regretted his death, that an order was given, instead of ten bumpers of wine, which were usually drank at the funeral of a saint, to drink thirteen at his, on account of his martyrdom. These bumpers were in time multiplied, they tell us, to such a shameful height, that the sanhedrin was forced to make some new regulations to prevent that abuse.

These are the patriarchs, which the Rabbies tell us preceded the destruction of the temple; and we need no farther confutation of this pretended dignity, than the silence of the sacred historians, who not only make not the least mention of it; but assure us all along, that they were the high priests who presided in the sanhedrin; and before whom all cases, relating to the Jewish religion, were brought and decided. It was the high priest who examined and condemned our Saviour; that condemned St. Stephen; that forbade the apostles to preach in Christ's name; and who sat as judge on the great apostle at the head of that supreme court. The same may be urged from Josephus, who must needs have known and mentioned this pretended dignity, if any such there had been; and yet is so far from taking the least notice of it, that, like the evangelists, he places the pontiffs alone at the head of all the Jewish affairs; and names the high-priest Ananus, as having the care and direction of the war against the Romans; which is an evident proof that there were then no such patriarchs in being †.

To all this let us add, that, if there had been any such remarkable succession, the talmudists would have preserved it to future ages; whereas neither they, nor any of the antient authors of the Jewish church, make any mention of it; but only some of their doctors, who have written a considerable time after them; and of whom we have had occasion to speak in a former part as of writers to whom little credit can be given in points of this nature; especially as there are such unsurmountable contradictions between them, as no authors, either Jewish or Christian, have, with all their pains, been hitherto able to reconcile (19).

Their succession, according to the generality of those rabbies, stands as follows;

- 1 Hillel, the Babylonian.
- 2 Simeon, the son of Hillel.
- 3 Gamaliel, the son of Simeon.
- 4 Simeon II. the son of Gamaliel.
- 5 Gamaliel II. the son of Simeon II.
- 6 Simeon III. the son of Gamaliel II.
- 7 Judah, the son of Simeon III.
- 8 Gamaliel III. the son of Judah.
- 9 Judah II. the son of Gamaliel III.
- 10 Hillel II. the son of Judah II.
- 11 Judah III. the son of Hillel II.
- 12 Hillel III. the son of Judah III.
- 13 Gamaliel IV. the son of Hillel III.

According to Gantz Tzemach David, who hath reduced them to ten, they are:

- 1 Hillel, the Babylonian.
- 2 Rabban Simeon, the son of Hillel.
- 3 Rabb. Gamaliel Ribona.
- 4 R. Simeon, the son of Gamaliel.
- 5 Rabban Gamaliel. his son.
- 6 R. Jehudah, the prince.
- 7 Hillel the prince, his son.
- 8 Rabban Gamaliel the Old.
- 9 Simeon III.
- 10 R. Judah, Nassi or prince.

(†) De hac, vid. Anc. Hist. vol. iv. p. 229 (E). (15) Vid. Gantz Tzemach David. (16) Alting. in Scilo, lib. vi. c. 28. Vid. Basnag. hist. des Juifs, lib. iii. c. 1. §. 13. & seqq. (17) Recog. Clement. l. i. c. 65.
 (18) See Acts v. 34, & seqq. (†) Ant. lib. xx. c. 8, bell. Judaic. in fin. lib. iii. & alib. (19) De his vid. Worsl. Observ. p. 214. Bartoloc. & Wolf. Bibliot. Rabb. Othon. Hist. Deßer. Mishnia. Basnag. ub. sup. l. iii. c. 1. §. ib. & seq. Calmet. sub. voc. patriarch, &c.

mentioned;

mentioned; nor to be raised to that degree of authority which the Jews give it, till that of his a successor Trajan, or, perhaps more properly, till the reign of Adrian.

Its most likely beginning.

ALLOWING, therefore, the list and succession given in the last note to be right in the main, though false with respect to the great power and dignity attributed to five or six of them, Gamaliel will be probably the first who took the title of Rosh Abboth, or Patriarch, in Nerva's time, and began to get some credit over the western Jews; but if we are to date that dignity from the first cotemporary author who makes mention of it, we shall be forced to bring it down to the reign of Adrian, who is the first that takes notice of it (O), and then Simon III. will be the first who enjoyed it in that high degree; for he flourished in that emperor's time, and was lineally descended from Hillel, in whose line it continued till its abolition, A. C. 429, as we shall see in the sequel.

Our design, however, is not to go through an historical account of those pontifs, especially as we find it fraught, by the Jewish writers, with the most absurd and fabulous legends, and miraculous exploits. What we have already given by way of specimen, of some of the former, will easily incline our readers to excuse us from doing the like by the latter; and to think it sufficient, that we take notice of their most material transactions in every age they have flourished, and stripped of all the rabbinic fables, and of every thing that is dubious, controverted, or impertinent.

Residence at Tiberias.

*An academy
 founded there.*

HAVING thus far settled the most probable æra of their rise, our next business will be to fix the place of their residence; which, though some have supposed it to have been Lydda, or Jamnia, yet is, by the far greater number, allowed to have been the famed city of Tiberias, c situate on the lake of its name; and so called by Herod, who built it, in honour of Tiberius †, and which became afterwards the capital of Galilee, and the residence of Agrippa, on whom Claudius the emperor bestowed it, and from whom it was also called Claudia Tiberias. This city, famed for its advantageous situation, as well as for its medicinal waters, was chosen, as less liable to give umbrage to the jealous Romans, to be not only the patriarchal seat, but likewise that of the Jewish learning, a new academy being soon after founded in it, which became famous for its learned men; particularly the compilers of the Mishnah; of which more in its proper place (P).

The patriarchal authority.

Their apostles or officers.

THE authority of these Patriarchs hath been much exaggerated by the Jews, in order to repel a powerful argument urged by the Christians of those early ages, that the scepter, or d regal authority, mentioned by Jacob <sup>a</sup>, was departed from them. But whatever they may write of it, it was rather a shadow of power, than a real one; and the Romans were too jealous of it to let them enjoy it in any higher degree. It was mostly confined to religious and controverted matters. They had officers of several ranks under them, whose business it was to carry their decisions, and to regulate other matters under their cognizance, in all places where their authority reached: and these were stiled Apostoli, Legati, and the like. They likewise levied the tribute that was paid to the Patriarch (Q), and, at their return, gave him an account of the state of the Jews under his dependance; and were also used as counsellors by him; on

† De his vid. vol. i. p. 557. sub. note (P). Vid. & Jos. Antiq. l. xviii. c. 3. Bell. Jud. l. ii. c. 8.
<sup>a</sup> Gen. xlix. 10. See also Anc. Hist. vol. i. p. 452, & (G).

(O) We are told, that that emperor was informed in Egypt, that a certain patriarch, who came thither sometimes, was much importuned by some to worship Serapis, and by others Jesus Christ (20): from which one may conclude that he was neither Heathen nor Christian, but a Jew, who refused to worship their God. We took notice, that all things considered, that dignity could but begin to spring up; it could make but a slow progress under Trajan, who used the Jews with great severity; but in Adrian's time was got up to such a height, as to make frequent progress even as far as into Egypt; no æra therefore can be more proper to fix the rise and progress of that dignity than this, in which we find the first mention, as well as the first signal exercise, of it.

(P) Buxtorf adds (21), that it did still subsist in Jerom's time; and that it was at this academy that the Mazorites, so famed in the Jewish history, made the noblest appearance; and where they are supposed to have invented the vowel, and other grammatical, &c. points, of which we have spoken in a former part *.

(Q) What this tribute was which he exacted from the Jewish nation, whether the didrachma paid formerly to the temple, and since to Jupiter Capitolinus, but released by Nerva either in part or wholly, or some other imposed by him, is hard to guess. But it is undeniable, from the origin of that tribute to maintain a new dignity and union among the dispersed, from the writings of the rabbies, as well as from some of the imperial laws, that such a tribute was universally paid to the patriarch of the west, and was conveyed to Tiberias from all the countries of the dispersion, and not to the chief of the captivity at Babylon, as Bartolucci hath affirmed. All the synagogues of the west were bound to pay it; and that which was levied in Egypt, where the Jews were richer than in most other places, amounted to a very great sum; and it was perhaps on that account, in part, that he went thither in person. Epiphanius tells us, that it was paid in all the provinces of Sicily; and the imperial laws mention its being paid in all the parts of the Roman empire where any Jews were settled. And we are further told, that it was exacted with such severity, that the people were at length forced to complain of the avarice of those pontifs, in order to obtain relief; till at length we find it quite abolished by Julian the apostate, an. 363, if the letter quoted to prove it be really his (22).

(20) Vid. Flav. Vopisc. p. 245.
 (22) Jul. epist. 201<sup>va</sup> Iudæarum, p. 223.

(21) In Tiberiad.

(*) See Ant. Hist. vol. i. p. 124, 725.

which

a which account they held a rank superior to the rest. The chiefs of the synagogues, schools, and academies, were likewise nominated by, and obliged to receive their directions from him; and the imperial laws gave him the title of Illustris, or Clarissimus; and some of them forbade the Christians to molest or use them disrespectfully, though we find nothing in any of them that shews that they had the power of life and death. Titles.

THEY could inflict severe censures, penances, and even excommunication, as well as some corporal punishments; but in this last they are charged to have abused the indulgence which the laws had given them; and to have suffered, if not ordered, delinquents, especially those that were found inclined to, or had embraced, Christianity, to be whipped to death. As their dignity was hereditary, and exceeding profitable on many accounts (R), it came at last to be so abused, that the emperor Theodosius the younger was obliged to issue out an edict to suppress the exorbitant power they had assumed, and to reduce it to its proper limits. It was customary for them to enrich themselves, not only by the exactions lately mentioned, but by selling of places under them, such as chiefs of the academy, of the schools, of the synagogues, &c. and, by-and-by, deposing them, and putting others in their place<sup>b</sup>, the licensing of new synagogues, setting up tribunals, and trying of causes between Jews and Christians, were some of the abuses suppressed by that edict. Abuse of their power.

THUS much for the origin of the patriarchate in the west, and of its institution in this first century of the church. The Jews, to raise the character of their nation, make this and the next century pregnant of learned men, to whom they attribute a great number of celebrated books, which, upon strict enquiry, are much more recent, since they mention facts and writers which are posterior to them by some centuries. We shall therefore waive the far greater part of them, as not worthy farther mention, and throw the others into the margin (S). Great men of this century.

THE next century produced several remarkable events; the most considerable of which were, 1. The rebellion they raised under the emperor Trajan. 2. The horrid slaughter they committed in Cyrene, a city of Lybia, and in the isle of Cyprus, and other places. 3. The appearance and punishment of the false messiah Barchocheba; the taking of the city of Bitber by the Romans; and the dreadful condition the Jews were reduced to after it. 4. The rebuilding of Jerusalem by Adrian. And, 5. The writing of Mishnah, by Judah Hakkadosh, or the faint. The chief events of the 2d century.

<sup>b</sup> Vid. PALLAD. in vit. Chrysostom.

(R) Some pretend, that it was not so far hereditary, but that the owner might alienate it, and instance in the famed R. Judah Hakkodesh, who preferred Chanina to his own son. But that is falsely urged, since he left the patriarchate to his son Gumaliel, and also made Chanina chief of the academy. And Epiphanius assures us, that it was so far hereditary, that Hillel having left only a son behind him, he succeeded him, though a child; and this he had from R. Joseph, who was left tutor to the boy, and could not but be well informed of the customs of his own nation.

(S) We have already mentioned the famed R. Jochabides, author of the book of Zohar. The next was Elisba Hagaili, or the Galilean, who wrote a very mystical treatise of the thirty-two properties of the law, answerable to the thirty-two roads to wisdom (23). One R. Eleazar wrote another of the measures of the temple (24), and is pretended to have lived whilst it stood; and to have taken them from it, as most of the rabbies since did theirs from him (25). The next worth speaking of was the poet Ezechiel, who wrote a poem on the exod, or the deliverance from the Egyptian bondage, probably to comfort his nation under their present calamities. He is supposed to have lived between the times of Josephus, who makes no mention of him, and of Clement of Alexandria, who hath quoted him; so that he must have flourished about the end of the first, or the beginning of the second, century (26).

The last we shall mention is the testament of the twelve patriarchs, whose author has concealed his religion; but speaks so frequently like a Jew, that the learned Dr. Grabe (27) who first published it in Greek

(for till then it was only known by that poor Latin version which Dr. Greathead, bishop of Lincoln, who had procured a Greek copy in the 13th century, caused to be made of it by one Nicholas a Grecian, and by some few other scattered fragments) believed it to have been wrote originally in Hebrew by some doctor of that nation, whom he supposes to have lived some time before our Saviour, seeing he follows the common notion of the Jews in expecting a temporal and conquering Messiah. The bishop above-named seems also to have been of the same mind, seeing he so bitterly complains of the jealousy of the Jews, who had kept that work so long concealed from the Christians, lest they should urge the prophecies that are in it, concerning the Messiah, against them.

These prophecies are indeed very many and pregnant against them, was the book itself of any authority: but it seems rather to have been wrote by some half-converted Jew, who puts into the mouths of the patriarchs sundry prophecies concerning Christ, but still retains a great number of Jewish prejudices, particularly that of his being a temporal, instead of a spiritual, Redeemer; and so is not fit to be quoted either against Jew or Christian. We shall refer our readers to the authors quoted in the margin for the further character of the book (28), and its pretended version into Greek by St. Chrysostom. And all that we shall add to it is, that it must have been very ancient, since Origen quotes it; and could not be wrote before the destruction of Jerusalem, because it makes particular mention of it, and of the writings of the evangelists. And thus much shall suffice for the writers of this century.

(23) Bartoloc. & Welf. Bibliot. Rabbin.

(24) Middoth. in Taanith, fol. 7. Wagenfeil, p. 311.

(25) Bartol. ub. sup.

(26) Le Moyne var. sacr. tom. ii. p. 356. Basnag. ub. sub. lib. vii. cap. 11. § ib.

(27) Specil. patr. tom. i. § 1.

(28) Grabe ibid. Fabric. Apocr. vet. Test. Nourry. appar. ad Bibl. Basnag. ub. sup. Calmet. sub voc. Testament. Prideaux Connec. &c.

Rebellion under Trajan, the year of Christ 115.

Wars with the Romans; de-populate Lybia.

Massacre of the Cypriots.

The false messiah Barcho-chab.

His origin.

1. THEIR rebellion under so powerful a prince as Trajan, can only be ascribed to their impatience under a foreign yoke, aggravated by the misery and hardships they endured under it, which made their resentment break out with such fury, notwithstanding the low state they were reduced to, as cannot be read without horror. It began at Cyrene, where the Jews had been settled for some centuries, and were become powerful; and had now gained some considerable advantages over the Cyrenians and Egyptians. These fled immediately to Alexandria, and filled that city with such alarms, that they massacred all the Jews they found in it. Those of Cyrene, provoked at such a dreadful reprisal, which yet they had brought upon themselves, chose one Andria, whom Eusebius stiles king Lacuas, for their head<sup>c</sup>; under whom they presently destroyed two hundred and twenty thousand inhabitants, wasted the whole country of Lybia, and fought many desperate battles against Martius Turbo, whom Trajan had sent with a powerful army against them; insomuch that Adrian was forced afterwards to send a fresh colony to re-people that wasted country<sup>d</sup> (T).

IN the next year those of Mesopotamia appeared in arms, and in such a manner as made the whole country tremble, which obliged the emperor to send the famed Lucius Quietus, the greatest general in the whole empire, who slew such vast numbers of them as quelled them for the present; but, for fear they should rise up again after he was gone, Trajan appointed him governor of Palestine, and ordered him to stay there to keep them in awe<sup>e</sup>.

THIS did not hinder those that were settled in Cyprus, an island formerly described †, from making a much more dreadful insurrection, in which their own authors make no scruple to increase the number of the massacred, instead of lessening it; though others, both Pagans and Christians<sup>f</sup>, make it to have amounted to two hundred and forty thousand inhabitants (U).

HOWEVER, this obliged Trajan to send his head general Adrian against them, who, with some difficulty, subdued them; after which an edict was published, expressly forbidding the Jews to set foot in that island, under the severest penalties. Which edict was so severely kept, as we observed in the last note, that it was a very long while before we meet with any settled there.

3<sup>r</sup> THE next insurrection was raised under their false messiah Caziba, or, as he stiled himself, Barchocheba; who, taking the advantage of the heart-burnings which then reigned among the Jews, on account of Adrian's having sent a colony to rebuild Jerusalem, which he designed to adorn after the Roman style, and to call by his name Ælia (to which the Jewish writers add another, and much greater cause of discontent; viz. his having forbid the Jews to circumcise their children), set himself up as head of their nation, and proclaimed himself their long expected Messiah (W). He was one of those banditti that infested Judea, and committed all kinds of violence against the Romans, and was become so powerful by this time, that he was chosen king of the Jews, or, according to their own writers, succeeded his father and grandfather

<sup>c</sup> Eccl. Hist. l. iv. c. 2. <sup>d</sup> GANTZ TZEMACH DAVID, p. 104. SOLOMON. filius virgæ tribus Jud. p. 64.
<sup>e</sup> EUSEB. in Chronic. Jud. Hist. l. 4. c. 2, & seq. XIPHIL. ex Dion. lib. lxxviii. OROSIUS, & alib. † See
Ant. Hist. vol. iii. p. 172, & seq. <sup>f</sup> DIO, EUSEB. ub. sup.

(T) Eusebius, in the last quoted place, mentions this rebellion at the beginning of Trajan's reign, but in his Chronicle one year sooner: but the former, being the more exact, ought to be preferred. The Jews pretend, that this rebellion was caused by some of their refugees from Jerusalem to Alexandria, who had built a temple there, and wanted to domineer over the rest. Upon which, such a fierce contest arose, that the weakest side was forced to call Trajan to their assistance, who killed about 500,000 of them. But what they say of the building of a temple there, is a mere fable; there being no other built in Egypt but that of Onias, of which we have spoken in our Antient History †. Some of the talmudists absurdly place this massacre under Adrian; and add, that he destroyed more Jews by half at this time in Egypt, than ever came out of it under Moses; which, according to the calculation we have formerly made of these (*), must have amounted to several millions; but this is a Jewish exaggeration not worth con-futing.

(U) They tell us, that the report they heard of other insurrections in different parts of the empire, encouraged those of Gophri, so they call that island (29), to fall upon the Cypriots with such fury, that they did not leave one of them alive. Some authors have imagined, that Egypt, and not Cyprus, was the scene of this horrid massacre, by supposing an error in the Hebrew. כְּנִיפָרִי instead of כְּנִיפָרִי occasioned by the likeness of the כ and ך, the כ and ד. But without giving way to such improbable conjectures, we have proofs enough, in the Acts of the apostles, of the Jews being very powerful and rich in that island, which was the native place of St. Barnabas; which is also confirmed by Heathen as well as Christian writers; particularly Dio, who tells us, that having appointed one Artemion their general, they slew 240,000 inhabitants: on which account they were forbid ever to come into that island; and that they even killed all those who were driven thither by bad weather. Eusebius (30) is no less particular about it, and only confines the massacre to the capital of that island; though 'tis hard to guess how Salamis should have been able to contain such a number of people (31); and it is more likely to have extended to all the Cypriots in general (32).

(W) We avoid, for brevity's sake, mentioning several other impostors that had appeared before him; some under the title of Messiah, others only as his forerunners.
Gamaliel mentions two who had come to an untimely

(†) See Ant. Hist. vol. iv. p. 79, & not. (T). (*) Ibid. vol. i. part ii. p. 506, sub not. (P), & seqq & alib.
et ibid. p. 546 (M). (29) Gantz, ub. sup. p. 102. Zaccbut. in Tachasm. &c. (30) Chron. & Hist. lib. iv.
(31) De hac vide Ant. Hist. vol. iii. p. 176, et seq. (32) See Bajnag. kisp. des Juifs. l. vii. c. 11. § 24.

- a father in that dignity (X), and was by them acknowledged their Messiah. However, to facilitate the success of this bold enterprise, he changed his name into that of Barchochab, or Barchocheba; alluding to the star foretold by Balaam<sup>e</sup>. 2. He pretended to be a star sent from heaven, to restore his nation to its antient liberty and glory (Y). And, 3. Chose for his precursor the famed Akiba, of whom we have spoke at the beginning of this chapter†; who, being then in high repute among the Jews, as chief of their Sanhedrim, declared him to be the star that was to arise out of Jacob. The persecution which they had suffered under Adrian had so far paved the way for these two impostors, that they quickly raised an army, out of their own nation, of 200,000 men, of prodigious strength and courage, and made Bither the place of their retreat, and the capital of this new kingdom (Z). Makes Bither his residence.
- b HERE Barchochab was anointed king, and caused some money to be coined with his name, by which he proclaimed himself the Messiah and prince of the Jewish nation; but deferred declaring war against the Romans, till Adrian had quitted Egypt; so that it did not break out till the 17th year of that emperor's reign, as a late author hath plainly shewn<sup>b</sup>. Adrian seems at first to have neglected this new revolt; and as the Jews had been so effectually humbled by his predecessor, he could hardly imagine they could be so soon in a condition to make head against him, but when he found what shoals of banditti, and other straggling Jews, flocked to Barchochab, he thought fit to send Tinnius Rufus, with a strong reinforcement, against them; though they did not prove sufficient to prevent the impostor's gaining great advantages over him, and massacring all the converted Jews, as well as Romans and Christians, that came in his way. Bither besieged and taken.
- c At length Julius Severus, who was then in England, and was one of the greatest generals of his age, was sent against them; who, not thinking it safe to engage so vast and powerful an army, contented himself with defeating them by parties, by which means he did at length so inclose them as to cut off all supply of provisions, and went and laid siege to Bither. The besieged made a stout defence, and Tripbon, a famed rabbi, was put to death for having proposed to surrender the place; but was at length forced to it by the death of Barchochab, who had been killed in it; after which followed a most dreadful slaughter of the Jews, inso- Its dreadful fate. much that their writers affirm, that a far greater number of them perished than at first came out of Egypt; and the scholars, who had defended it so gallantly, though with no other weapons than their writing pencils, were flung by thousands into the flames, with their books tied about them (A). As for Akiba, after a very severe imprisonment, he was condemned to a cruel death; and with him, the Jews tell us, died the glory of the Jewish law (B).

THE

<sup>e</sup> Numb. xxiv. 17.

(†) P. 485, sub. not.

<sup>b</sup> Vid. BASNAG. ubi sup. & auct. ab eo citat.

end a little before his time (33). Origen ranks Simon Magus and Dositheus among that number. They were both Samaritans; and the latter is said to have been master to the former. It doth not indeed appear from St. Luke that Simon took on him the direct character of the Messiah, but only of a man endowed with some supernatural power from God (34). However, these and several others we pass by, were signal impostors, of which these two centuries were very pregnant; most of whom, being disciples of Judah the Gaulonite, spoken of in a former part (†), did still inspire the Jews with hopes that the deliverer would soon appear, and so stirred them up to fresh rebellions.

(X) These pretend, that Coziba I. and grandfather to this we are upon, was raised by the Jews to that title fifty-two years after the ruin of the temple, and died at Bither, a city near Jerusalem, and the then capital of his kingdom. He was succeeded by his son Rob or Row; and afterwards by his son Romulus, surnamed Coziba, who, according to them, was afterwards put to death by his own men, because he was wanting in one main characteristic of the Messiah; viz. the discerning a guilty person by the smell (35). These make the reigns of the three Coziba's to have lasted twenty-one years, or even beyond; whereas the antient chronicle makes no mention of the two former, and allows but two years and a half's reign to the latter; which is, in all probability, the most to be depended upon (36).

(Y) For proof of which, he was wont to vomit fire and smoke out of his mouth when he spoke, to amuse the populace.

(Z) We have already spoken of this city, and its numerous academy. St. Jerom calls it Bethoron; and both he and Eusebius place it in the neighbourhood of Jerusalem. However there were two towns of that name; viz. this about twelve miles, and another about fifty-two, from that metropolis (*).

(A) The Jews add, that when the head of the impostor was brought to Adrian, he expressed a desire of seeing his body; but that, when they came to take it up, they found a serpent twined about the neck; which so scared them, that the emperor, being told of it, declared, that God alone was able to kill such a man. But that did not hinder his cheat from being found out at last; upon which account they changed his name into that of Barchochab, or the son of impostor or lie.

They add, that the massacre was so dreadful and universal, that they found upon one single stone the skulls of above 300 children, which had been dashed against it: the brooks were so swelled with the blood of the slain, that they carried large stones quite into the sea, though at four miles distance from it; and the ground round about was so enriched with the carcases of the slain, that it wanted no manuring for seven years. In memory of this, the Jews appointed a kind of mournful hymn to be used on the 18th day of the month Ab, answering to our July and August, in which they stiled Adrian a second Nebuchadnezzar, and pray to God to remember that tyrant, who destroyed 480 synagogues (37).

(B) He had his flesh torn off with iron combs (38). Lightfoot mentions him as the only considerable person that suffered in this massacre (39), though a good num-slain, &c.

(33) Acts v. 36, & seq. (34) Ibid. viii. 9. (†) Ant. Hist. vol. iv. p. 169. (35) Seder Olam, c. 31, vid. & Gemar. tract. sanhedr. c. 11. R. Abr. Cabbola. hist. Gantz. ubi sup. ad an. 388, p. 102. (36) See Basnage. ubi sup. l. vii. c. 12. §. 11. (*) Euseb. & Jerom. loc. Hebraic. See also Ant. Hist. vol. iv. p. 58. (37) Vid. Lent. de Judcor. Pseudo-Mess. p. 17, & seq. Basnage. ubi sup. (38) Mishn. in Sota. (39) Chronic. temp. v. & vi. tom. xi. p. 144.

Number of

THE Romans, on the other hand, lost a vast number of their own troops; and, if we may believe their own authors, it was one of the bloodiest wars they ever waged. Five hundred and eighty thousand were killed on the Jews side, besides vast multitudes of others which perished by famine, fire, and other calamities<sup>1</sup>; which could not be done without great losses on the enemy's side; the former being ever known to fight most desperately, and selling their lives at a dear rate. Besides, at the taking of the city of Bithur, they had still fifty strong castles well garrisoned. However, upon the death of their chiefs, the rest made but faint efforts; and the war came soon to an end.

Jerusalem rebuilt, A. C.
137.

ADRIAN took the advantage of this peaceful interval for finishing his design of rebuilding Jerusalem. We have formerly taken notice of the difference between this new city and the old one, with respect to its cincture†, though, in the main, the old foundations were still made use of for it. This design was carried on, not in favour of the Jews, who might rather have been induced to new revolts, had they been allowed to settle in it. It was designed, on the contrary, to mortify and humble them, by rearing so many heathenish structures, as should make them abhor coming into it (C); besides a severe edict of that prince, which expressly forbid them all farther access to it. And the more effectually to clear it of its Jewish inhabitants, he caused a prodigious number of them to be sold at two different fairs (D), at the common price of horses; and ordered the remainder to be transported into Egypt. After this the state of the Jews became one of the most melancholy that can be imagined; and being thus doubly excluded the entrance into the holy city, they were forced to content themselves with beholding it, though with floods of tears, from some of the neighbouring hills; neither could they obtain this liberty from the Roman soldiers, but by dint of money. The Mount of Olives, in particular, was often seen covered with men and women, with their clothes rent, bewailing the ruin of that once famed metropolis.

The Jews forbid to come to it.

Fair numbers of them sold.

A hard tax
laid on them.

SOME other imposts we find laid on them for the liberty of their religion; particularly for that of reading the sacred books, circumcising their children, &c. Concerning which, authors, both Jews and Christians, vary; but which are not worth dwelling longer upon. As for the Jews of the east, they seem to have fared much better; for, though Trajan had carried on a war against them as far as Mesopotamia, yet Adrian, upon his coming to the empire, having consented that the Euphrates should be the boundary of the Roman empire on that side; those beyond the river had no other share in the war we have been speaking of, except that many of them came over to assist their brethren, and served only to increase the number of the slain and conquered on this side (E).

THE

<sup>1</sup> DIO in Adrian, p. 263. HEDRON, Chr p. 168.

† See Ant. Hist. vol. vi. p. 41.

ber of others, no less celebrated, were likewise put to cruel deaths; particularly Judah the son of Bava, who, notwithstanding the emperor's orders against filling up the vacant places of the sanhedrin, did appoint five doctors into that body, and, among them, the famed R. Mier; who, tho' all the rest deserted the place, yet stood firm till he had received some hundreds of wounds in his body (40).

(C) Accordingly we find, that he ordered the ancient monuments to be demolished, and a theatre and other public buildings to be built of the materials. Some of the stately stones of the temple were likewise put to the same profane use; and, in their room, statues of the heathen gods and goddesses were set up in that holy place, and in several others which were become venerable to the Christians. But the greatest indignity to the Jews was his ordering a hog to be carved, and set up over the gate that led to Bethlehem; not so much in token of their slavery to the Romans, as an ancient father imagined (41), as because that creature was forbid by the Mosaic law, and abhorred by all the Jews.

(D) One of these fairs was annually kept on the plain of Mamre, sacred for having been the place where Abraham had often pitched his tent, and where he received the three heavenly guests (42). It was called the fair of Therebinthus, from the famous oak which grew there, and which the vulgate translates by that name, though the Hebrew word Elah rather signifies an oak, elm, or large tree. However that be, St. Jerom tells us, that it was standing in his time, and much resorted to and reverenced by Christians and Jews; and Hegeffippus tells us, that it had stood ever since the creation, and been famed for being a place of great resort by merchants of all the neighbouring nations. This oak, or Terebinth, Josephus and Eusebius place about six miles from Hebron (43). St. Jerom only two miles from it; and Sozomen about fifteen stades (44). St. Jerom adds, that this fair was still kept in his time, but that the Jews were ashamed to come to it, on account of so great a number of their nation having been exposed to sale at it (45). Those that could not be sold here were sent to Gaza, where was another celebrated fair; and the rest were sold into Egypt, where they soon grew numerous.

In memory of this signal overthrow of the Jews, the emperor ordered a medal to be struck, with the figure of a woman holding two naked boys, and sacrificing upon an altar, with this legend;

Adventus Aug. Judææ; or,

The arrival of the emperor in Judea.

There is likewise another of the same emperor, on which Judea is represented like a woman kneeling, and holding a hand up to him, with three children, one of them naked, and all in a suppliant posture; and representing thereby the subjection and misery of the Jewish nation (46).

(E) This last supposition is founded on what Dio insinuates, that the Jews did every-where rise up against the Romans, and that the world was in an universal uproar. From which, we may conclude, that many of those on the other side of the Euphrates came over, either

(40) De his vid. Mish. ub. sup. Gamar. tract. senbedr. Bartoloc. tom. ii. Wegens. in Sota. Basnag. & al.
(41) Hieronim. Chronol. in an. 137. (42) Vid. Genesis xviii. 1, & seq. (43) Bell. Jud. l. iv. c. 7. Euf.
loc. Hebr. (44) Histor. l. ii. c. 4. (45) In Scythia. p. 396 (46) De his vid. Tripan. com. hist. Adrian.
Frenher. de numismat. censu. Basnag. ub. sup. c. 12. §. 34.

- <sup>a</sup> THE last remarkable thing in this century is, the compiling of the Mishnah by Judah Hak-kadosh. He was the son of Simeon, surnamed the Just, and the third Patriarch of the Jews. He succeeded him in that dignity, and was born in the city of Tzipori, or Sephoris (F), and flourished during the reigns of three emperors, who were great enemies to the Christians, but very favourable to the Jews; viz. Antoninus Pius, M. Aurelius, and Commodus; the first of whom came to the crown A. C. 138; and the latter died An. 194. So that he quietly enjoyed his patriarchate 45 years<sup>k</sup>. He became very considerable on account of his sanctity, and much more for his great learning, and presided over the great academy of Tiberias, lately mentioned, with an uncontrouled authority. During which time he had had frequent occasion to decide controversies of the highest nature, and gained a very great reputation by it. But he was esteemed above all for his celebrated book called the Mishnah, or repetition of the law, and stiled by the Greeks Deuteronomy, or second law; a short account of which the reader may see in the margin (G). This work was so much the more necessary at that time, because the nation, having been forced to undergo such frequent dispersions and vicissitudes, had, in a great measure, and would have still more, forgot the oral traditions about the rites, laws, and customs, of the ancient Jews, which were become very numerous by this time, unless they were committed to writing, and digested into one body or system. And this he did with such success, that all the Jewish academies have since followed him without any deviation. The time of his writing this book is variously conjectured. The most probable opinion is, that he finished it about the year of Christ 180, or about the 44th year of his life, when he was in the flower of his age; and had, by long experience, been enabled himself to decide the most arduous questions of the law.

An account of that work;

when wrote.

<sup>k</sup> Vid. GANTZ, & al. sup. citat.

to help their brethren on this side, or in hopes of plunder, and hatred to the tyrannous Romans. And indeed, considering how wasted Palestine had been in Trajan's reign, it is scarce credible they could be so numerous and powerful in that of Adrian, under whom the number of those that were destroyed amounted to above six hundred thousand, unless we suppose, that a great part of them were come from the east to them.

(F) A city situate on one of the mountains of Galilee. Its name, which signifies a little bird, implies its being but a little place; yet the Jewish rabbies cry it up as such a considerable one, that it had 180,000 confecturers. They pretend, that he was born on the day on which Akiba died, to fulfil Solomon's prophecy, that one sun sets and another rises (47). We lately took notice of the former being put to death at the taking of Bithur; so that, according to them, the latter must have been born A. C. 135. We omit a great deal of miraculous stuff which they tell of his birth and life, for which he obtained the title of Hakkadosh, or the Saint, or even of the Saint of Saints. Neither do we think worth mentioning some absurd anachronisms relating to him, particularly the prolonging his life down to the reign of Dio-clesian, and mentioning a number of learned men as his cotemporaries, who did not flourish till a long time after. These are usual things among those writers; and we have given already some instances of them at the beginning of this chapter, to serve as a specimen to the rest (48).

(G) We shall need say the less of this famed treatise, because it has been since translated into Latin by Surenhusius, with the notes of the learned Maimon, Barthenera, and Guisius, in six vols. fol. an. 1702. It is divided into six parts; the first is intituled, סדר זרעים, Seder Zera-bim, ordo seminum, and treats about seeds in the field, of trees, fruits, plants, &c. The second, סדר מועדים, Seder Mobadim, ordo festorum, and treats of the right observance of the Jewish feasts. The third, סדר נשים, Seder Nesbim, ordo mulierum, treats of women, and all matrimonial causes. The fourth, סדר נזיקים, Seder Nizikim, ordo damnorum, treats of losses, damages, trade, &c. the law-suits arising from them, and the manner of proceeding in them. The fifth, סדר קדשים, Seder Kedoshim, ordo sanctorum, treats of sacrifices, oblations, and all other holy or sacrificed things. The sixth, סדר טהרות, ordo purificationum, treats of all kinds of expiations, and all things relating to purification. The author hath likewise added to the fourth part, or ordo damnorum, a chapter intituled, עבודת זרה, Abodah Zarah, or cultus extraneus; such they call idolatry, and the penalties annexed to it. Each of these books contained several tracts amounting in the whole to sixty-three.

This code or body of oral traditions is founded upon a fivefold authority; viz. 1st, Upon the writings of Moses, whose expositions are contained in the pentateuch, and are either decisive of themselves, or by consequences fairly drawn from them. 2d, Upon the ordinances of that lawgiver delivered to him on the mount, or as they are commonly stiled the oral law, spoken of in a former part (†); and which are looked upon to be of the same authority with the written; tho', as was there observed, no good proof can be given of any such oral law having been given to that lawgiver. 3d, Upon the different decisions of the ancient doctors, concerning which a man is at liberty to take which side he pleases, whether, for instance, those of Hillel or Shammai. 4th, On the maxims and sayings of the prophets and wise men, which are on that account stiled the hedges or fences of the law; but from which the rabbies do often swerve, though in the main they hold them in great esteem. 5th, On the ancient rites and customs, which have since gained the sanction of a law, and are made by it equally obligatory. This is the sum of that so much boasted treatise, which is therefore stiled a body of civil and ecclesiastical rights of the Jews, and as a collection of their oral laws, rules, &c. However it is likely this book was not published, or, at least, received immediately, since we find mention in Hege-sippus of such oral traditions being still appealed to and canvassed towards the latter end of this second century. Those who want a fuller account of it may consult the Latin version above-mentioned, and the authors quoted in the margin (49). All that we shall say farther about it is, that it must not be confounded with the talmud, which was not compiled till a long time after; and of which we shall speak in its proper place.

(47) Eccles. i. 9. vid. Gantz-Tzemach, p. 107. Hist. vol. i. p. 596, not. (B).

(48) Page 482, & seq. sub not. (C).

(†) See Ant.

Calmet. sub voc. Mishna. Prid. Connect. part i. lib. 5.

(49) Bartoloc. Bibliot. Rab. tem. iii. Basnage's bist. Jud. lib. iii. c. 3.

Judah's character.

THE great reputation and authority which his learning and works had gained, did, however, even according to the Jewish writers, swell him up into such a height of pride, as little answered his title of saint (H). He even indulged it to his dying hour, by the disposal of all the places and titles under him; and among them, that of Kacham, or wise man, to one of his sons named Simeon; that of chief of the synagogue to Chanina; and that of prince, or chief, to his eldest son Gamaliel III. (I). He likewise ordered his own funeral to be performed in the most sumptuous manner, and that his body should be carried about through the most considerable cities, and there bewailed after the Jewish manner. A great concourse, we are told, accompanied the funeral pomp from all the adjacent parts<sup>1</sup>. What they farther relate of it, the reader may see in the margin (K).

Excessive pride.

Gamaliel succeeds him.

Hillel rectifies the calendar;

and others assist him.

HE was succeeded by his son Gamaliel, who is said to have confirmed his father's Mishnah, and to have died an. 229. His son Judab did nothing worth our notice (L), except that he left his dignity to his son the famed Hillel II. a person of great merit and learning; who is the first that began, as we hinted at the beginning of this chapter, to compute the years from the creation; but whether he, or, which is more probable, the gemarists, of whom we shall speak in the sequel, did wilfully curtail that æra, in order to make it appear that Christ did not come into the world at the end of the fourth millenary, and at the time expressly signified by the the prophets, we will not determine. Another improvement he was the author of; viz. the cycle of nineteen years, to conciliate the course of the sun with that of the moon, by the help of seven intercalations. We have taken notice of some such thing having been done before, under Simon the Maccabee, above 170 years before our Saviour*. Some others have since put a helping hand to this emendation, particularly Rabbi Samuel, nicknamed Jarkin, or lunatic, who was chief of an academy at Nabardea, about the year 240, and was esteemed a great astronomer; but as his calculation was found still defective, one of his successors, viz. R. Ada, greatly improved it, as Hipparchus had formerly done that of Calippus; upon which all these Jewish emendations were founded. However, Hillel, as prince of the captivity in the west, introduced it by his authority, and thereby made way for the other two; though it is not improbable that they, as a conquered people, were forced, in this, as in other cases, to submit to the laws of the conquerors, and to adopt the reformation made by Julius Cæsar. Hillel made, however, some farther ones to the Techupath Hashana, or revolution of the year; such as changing the equinoxes and solstices; by bringing them back thirteen days from where he found them; as for instance, the vernal equinox from the 7th of April to the 25th of March<sup>m</sup>.

Hillel's conversion at the point of death.

BUT that which most endeared him to the Christians was his conversion and baptism a little before he died (M), when he sent for the bishop of Tiberias, under pretence of consulting him as a physician about his distemper; but in reality to own himself a Christian, and to be baptized by him. The ceremony was accordingly performed, but in the privatest manner; the servants, who were ordered to bring in the water, being ordered to leave the chamber; and the matter was concealed for some time, lest his friends or domestics should do him any prejudice on that account. Though it is surprising so edifying a conversion should be kept so secret, especially as Constantine the Great being then upon the throne, the Christians did

<sup>1</sup> Vid. Oth. Hist. doctor. Mishnic. & auct. ab. eo citat. p. 161. SCALIG. Canon Isag. l. iii. p. 279.

* See vol. iv. p. 72 (K).

<sup>m</sup> Vid.

(H) He was the first that set up his own authority above that of the sanhedrin, and its decisions, which, till then, those chiefs were subject to; insomuch that one of that council, named the son of Lacbi, having ventured to dispute it, and to affirm, that a chief ought to be whipt if he transgressed, Judab immediately sent officers to apprehend and bring him to a severe punishment, which he found no way to escape but by a speedy flight. How can it therefore be supposed, that a man of such a proud and ungovernable spirit should ever own the authority of the chiefs of Babylon to be superior to his, as the Babylonish rabbies, mentioned in a former note, pretend that he did?

(I) These were the three chief dignities of the Jewish church. The prince, or as we have chose to stile him the patriarch; was the highest. The chief was the next, and presided in his absence in the council; and the kacham held the third rank. This last was to be learned above all the rest, because he was the person consulted in all doubtful cases, and sat on the left, as the chief did on the right, of the prince.

(K) They tell us, that, tho' the people flocked to the solemnity far and near, yet the day was so far prolonged, that they had all time enough to get home, and light a candle against the next day, which was the Sabbath; and the Bath Col was heard to declare them all saved that had assisted at it; one only excepted, who thereupon, falling into despair, put an end to his own life (50).

(L) The Jewish writers pretend that he lived to the end of the third century, in order to make him cotemporary with the two famous rabbies Amaus and Azeus, who flourished, according to them, A. M. 4060, or of Christ 300. But this is but one of those anachronisms that run through all their works.

(M) This fact is not owned by any of the Jewish writers, who were too jealous of his glory, as well as of that of their nation, to take any notice of it. But we have it upon the authority of Epiphanius, who tells us, that, being gone with Eusebius Vercellensis to Scythopolis to see one Joseph, an intimate of the deceased Hillel, and guardian to his son, as well as one of his apostles, they had the whole story from his own mouth.

(50) Vid. Gantz, & al. sup. citat. ap. Othm. & Basnag. ub. sup.

a not want for power to have sheltered him from any insult from the Jews; though the edict of that prince against such outrages did not perhaps come out till some years after (N); that is, in the patriarchate of Hillel's son and successor, on account of whose guardian it seems chiefly to have been made, as we are going to shew.

HILLEL left his only son Judab, a minor, under the guardianship of Joseph, an intimate friend, mentioned in a late note, and one of his apostles. But the Jews, upon some jealousy that Joseph was such another dissembler as Hillel, persecuted him with such bitterness and violence (O), that he was forced to apply to the emperor, by whom he was graciously received; and not only protected from all future insults, but permitted to erect several sumptuous churches for the use of the Christians, in places where they were still wanting, by which he grew exceedingly rich, and built some stately houses in Scythopolis; and here it was that he gave Eusebius and Epiphanius the account of Hillel's conversion above mentioned. As for Judab, his pupil, he succeeded his father in the patriarchal dignity, and enjoyed it still in the year 356; when Joseph, who was then in the 70th year of his age, related the transaction to those two bishops. He seems to have out-lived him but a few years, since Julian, in a letter to the Jews, dated an. 363, mentions another patriarch then in the chair, whom he names Julius; which is only that of his son and successor Hillel III. gracedified, who governed the Jewish church till the year 385.

He was succeeded by his son Gamaliel, IVth of that name, and last of the patriarchal race and dignity. St. Jerom speaks of him as of a learned man who had had several disputes with Hesychius, before A. C. 392; and it was not till an. 415 that we find him stripped of part of his authority by an edict of the emperor Theodosius; but whether that pontif had abused the patriarchal power, or by some other way disoblighd him, or whether the male line was extinct, that dignity was quite abolished about 14 years after; i. e. an. 429, after having continued in the same family through thirteen generations; or about the space of 350 years (P). The next dignity that succeeded the patriarchate, was that of the primates, which being inferior in honour and authority, as well as in point of time, will be spoken of in another place. It is time now that we go back to the remaining part of the 2d century, from which this list of the patriarchs and successors of Judab Hakkadosh had carried us.

WE observed a little higher from the Jewish writers, that they enjoyed great peace and liberty under the reigns of Adrian's three successors, Antoninus Pius, M. Aurelius, and Commodus. The former of these they not only make a great friend and patron of their nation, but also one of their religion, and a disciple of Judab the saint; though outwardly a heathen, and much addicted to superstition (Q). However, as the edict of Adrian against their circumcising their children was still in force against them, they grew now so impatient under it, as to appear in arms, and oblige him thereby to recal it, and restore them to the free use of their religion. Antoninus soon suppressed the revolt, but used such moderation towards them, as to grant them the liberty for which they took up arms; which, though it extended to all the Jews, did yet exclude the Samaritans from it; and, 2dly, forbade the former to make any proselytes to their religion (R).

WE

(N) It is not easy to fix the year in which this conversion happened, seeing the Jews pretend that he lived beyond the year 360; by which they confound him with another of the same name, who lived in Julian the apostate's time. Bartolocci places his death about A. C. 320; but that seems too late by eight or ten years: 1st, Because it gives him too long a reign; and, 2dly, This conversion ought to have preceded Constantine's edict above-mentioned, published ann. 315, to suppress the violent outrages to which the proselytes from Judaism were exposed from the zealots of their own nation. If Scaliger had considered this circumstance, he would not have supposed him to have been reforming the Jewish calendar about the year 344, as he hath done (1). Upon the whole then, it is most probable that Hillel died about the year 308 or 310.

(O) They had only a bare suspicion of his being a Christian in his heart; for he had as yet made no public profession of it; however, that was sufficient to provoke some of them to break abruptly into his house, where they found him reading the gospel. They first snatched the book out of his hands, and fell a beating him most unmercifully; and then dragged him to the synagogue where he was cruelly whipped, and at length threw him headlong into the Cydrus, where he was borne off by the stream, far enough for them to think him drowned. But Providence having preserved his life, he immediately made open profession of Christianity, received baptism and with it the several marks of the emperor's favours above-mentioned. And it is supposed that it was on account of the violent excesses which the Jews committed on these occasions, that the edict lately mentioned was issued out.

(P) We have seen in the late list of these patriarchs, or, as the Jews since called them, Princes, that some of their chronologers, particularly D. Gantz, shorten the duration of that dignity by three generations and end it at Judab II. But it is plain from what we have said above of the Theodosian edict, that it reached down to the time there mentioned.

(Q) Among other fabulous legends of this emperor's affection for that Jewish chief, they tell us that he had caused a subterranean way to be made between his own palace and his house, by which he used to go and converse with him (2).

(R) Some add a prohibition likewise of making eunuchs. It is not easy to say when this revolt happened; and Capitolinus, who hath summed it up, and the defeat of the Jews, in five or six lines, hath inclined some to suppose it to have broke out about the beginning of Anto-

(1) Iidem ibid. vide & Gemar. tit. sanhedr. c. ii.

(2) Iust. Mart. apol. xi.

Justin's dialogue with Tryphon.

The Jews ill treated by M.
Aurelius.

New sects start up among the Jews.

That of the Hellenists.

WE shall pass by two famous disputes which happened under the reign of Antoninus; the former between Jason, a converted Jew, and Papiscus, one of the synagogue; in which the former proves Christ to have been the Messiah, and the latter used very bitter imprecations against him. The few fragments we have left of that conference give us no great cause of regretting the loss of the rest. The other was between Justin Martyr, and the learned Tryphon, at Ephesus, whither the latter had been forced to flee, on account of the war which that prince then waged against the Jews, and where Justin met and had his conference with him, which is supposed upon good grounds to have happened about A. C. 155, or after the emperor had restored the liberty of circumcision to the Jews. For before that time it is not probable Tryphon would so readily have acknowledged his religion from the very beginning of the conference (S).

THE reader may see by what we observed in the last note, that the Jews were so far from enjoying any degree of tranquility even under that prince, that they fared still worse under his successor, M. Aurelius, who had such an ill opinion of them, that, going through Judea into Egypt, he cried out, he had found there a people as wicked as the Sarmatians and Marcomans†. What increased his resentment, was their joining to Vologeses king of the Parthians, against the Romans; and afterwards with Cassius, his general, who had caused himself to be proclaimed emperor at the instigation of Faustina, Aurelius's empress<sup>a</sup>. For though he forgave Cassius's friends, as will be seen in the sequel, yet he renewed Adrian's severe edicts against the Jews, and caused them to be put in execution against them (T).

THE last thing worth taking notice of under this century, is the rise of some new sects among the Jews, besides those which we have taken notice of as predominant in our Saviour's time<sup>b</sup>, and mentioned by Hegesippus as still rise in his, particularly the Pharisees, Sadducees, Essenians, and Gaulonites; which last preserved still their seditious spirit against all foreign government. The new ones, according to him, were the Emerobaptists, famed chiefly for their often washing in a day; and the Masbotbeans, who denied the Divine Providence, and attributed all events to chance (V): and some others, which the reader may see in the last note. But the most considerable of all was that of the Hellenists, which began soon after the version of the Septuagint, of which an account hath been given in a former part*, and who had been so long dispersed among the Greeks, as to have adopted their language, and forgot the Hebrew. We observed there how these rejoiced at the first publication of the sacred books in that language, and from that time made use of no other; and on that account were despised by the rest of

† Pap. stat. Sylvar. l. iii.

<sup>a</sup> VULCATII CASSIUS, p. 40.

<sup>b</sup> Ant. Hist. vol. iv. p. 38, & seq.

* Ancient Hist. vol. iv. p. 37, & seq.

Antoninus's reign (3); others think the Jews could hardly be so soon ready for it, considering how dispersed and how low they had been reduced by Adrian, and that it must have required some years to put themselves in a proper condition to attack so powerful a prince (4). And so it would indeed, had this been such a regular war as some of those they waged before. But by the short account and the few particulars given us of it, it seems rather to have been a tumultuous insurrection at which the Jews were ever quick and ready; and their defeat might be no other than obliging them to lay down their arms, upon promise that they should have the grant they contended for, as they actually had.

(S) The Jewish writers mention a learned rabbi, named Tarphon, who flourished about this time, and whom Lightfoot supposes to be the person (5). If so, he doth not appear to have been a man of extraordinary learning, by his answers to his antagonist. However, we do not pretend to pass a judgment on either, which would be going out of our province. But what is more worth observing to our readers is what that father objects against the Jews, viz. that their cities were burnt and laid waste, and their country inhabited by strangers; that they were forbid still to come to Jerusalem, and could not with any safety abide in Judea. Notwithstanding all which, and the present misery they laboured under, they made no scruple to curse in their synagogues all that believed in Jesus, and, by their imprecations to send them to hell as atheists and apostates (6).

(T) This must be only understood of the nearer provinces; for as for those more remote, especially towards the east, the edict was not so severely executed; for there they displayed a more inveterate hatred against the Christians; particularly at Smyrna, where they had a great hand in the martyrdom of bishop Polycarp, and solicited the heathen judge not to deliver his dead body to the Christians, lest they should worship him; upon which account it was ordered to be burnt to ashes. The learned are divided about the time of this martyrdom; some placing it in an. 147, under Antoninus (7); and others with more probability, under Aurelius, about an. 166, on the 22d of February, which was an high sabbath with them (8); but it is plain the Jews were every-where very inveterate against the Christians; more especially against those who turned from Judaism to them; but we have no room to multiply instances of it (9).

(V) So that they seem rather to be the spawn of the Pharisees and Sadducees, though not known to the evangelists by these names. To these Justin Martyr adds three others, which he calls the Genists, Merists, and Hellenists. The two former are inconsiderable; the former, according to him, laying a great merit in being descended from Abraham, the father of the faithful; and the latter differing from the rest in their canon of scripture, out of which they excluded some of the prophets. The last therefore is the only one worth the reader's notice here.

(3) Baron. & al. sup. citat.

(4) Basnag. lib. viii. c. i. §. v.

(5) Chron. temp. tom. ii. sect. 5.

Vid. & Bartoloc. Bib. Rabb. tom. i. p. 863.

(6) Dialog. p. 234. 257, & seq.

(7) Pearson, vid. &

Dodwel Dissert. ad. Op. posth. Pearson. c. 15.

(8) Norris Dissert. in Epoch. Syro Maced. p. 30.

(9) Vid.

Euseb. Hist. Eccles. l. v. c. 16. Nicephor, &c.

their

- a their brethren, who made use of the original (W). This open rupture is variously convassed by the learned, some of whom pretend, that neither the Septuagint, nor any other version, was read in the synagogues<sup>c</sup>; others join the Hellenists and Jews in one and the same synagogue<sup>d</sup>; a third sort extol that, not only above all other versions, but even above the original<sup>e</sup>; and as such, justly preserved by the Hellenists, for its exactness and perspicuity.
However that be, it were madness to deny that the Greek Jews were not allowed the use of it in their synagogues (X), as it was then the tongue most universally understood, and, perhaps, the only one which those Hellenists knew,
- b But that which caused it to be afterwards so much cried down by the Jews, was the use Septuagint which Justin, and other primitive Christians, made of it against them, in which they ran into why cried the opposite extreme, and condemned it as dangerous and pernicious, and this produced a down.
fourfold effect. 1st, It rendered the Hellenists, who stood up for it, odious to the rest, who were from that time looked upon as sectaries and schismatics. 2dly, It gave rise to the new New ones versions of Aquila, Theodotion, and Symmachus, formerly mentioned<sup>f</sup>; a farther account of made.
which may be seen in the margin (Y). 3dly, The Gemarrists, not being able to abolish the use of the Greek version, confined it to the Pentateuch; because it had fewer of those prophecies which were urged by the Christians against them. And, 4thly, It put the Hellenists upon inventing several miracles to raise the credit of their own (Z), whilst the Jews, to render it the more odious, trumped up a double fast, kept up in memory of it; of which, however, the c Thalmud makes no mention. The sect, therefore, as it is called by the latter, took its rise soon after the time of Justin Martyr, and not before. And thus much for the first and second century.

<sup>c</sup> Vid. SALMAS. & auct. ab eo citat.

<sup>e</sup> MORIN Exercit. Bibl. p. 238. Voss. de LXX Interp.

<sup>d</sup> Oros. Obser. in N. Test. p. 238. ap. Basnage, ub. sup.
<sup>f</sup> See Ancient Hist. vol. iv. p. 38, & seq. & (O).

(W) These upbraided them with reading the sacred scriptures after the Egyptian manner, or backwards; that is, from the left to the right, which they affirmed was contrary to the course of the sun, and as absurd as making that planet rise in the west and set in the east: inso much that they gave them the vilest language, and sometimes came to blows with them (10). However, it doth not appear that this hatred had displayed itself so soon as our Saviour's time; on the contrary, we find by the book of Acts that the Hellenists had a good number of synagogues, where they performed their service in Greek, and made use of the Septuagint version. Neither doth Josephus, or even Philo, who was a Hellenist Jew, mention any thing of their being then looked upon by the rest as a different sect from them, much less abased and persecuted for it; though their high regard for the original Hebrew did really inspire them with a contempt for those who could only read it in a foreign heathenish language.

(X) Even Lightfoot is obliged to acknowledge thus much; he pretends that they were deposited there merely to confute the objections which that heathen raised against the Jewish religion out of those books. But that is said without either proof or probability; and Simon, the son of Gamaliel, who lived in Titus's time, makes no scruple to declare that the law might be wrote and read in Greek; and another rabbi affirms, that he who reads it in any language he understands, is doing his duty.

(Y) The chief design of them was to deprive the Christians of those advantages which the Septuagint afforded them, and became in great vogue among all the dispersed Jews. Aquila's was the first, and was used by the greatest part of the Hellenists; though the Thalmudists failed not to find some great faults in it, in order to bring the people back to the original Hebrew; and some Christians condemned it as done with an ill design; tho' they, and even St. Jerom, did afterwards make use of it, as more exact than the old one.

Theodotion, a heathen converted to Christianity, undertook a second; but, being afterwards brought over to

Judaism, rather chose to copy the Septuagint than to attempt a new one from the Hebrew; and hath followed it so close, that Origen made use of it to fill up the chasms which were found in his copy of the Septuagint; and the Ebionites and Nazarites among the Christians preferred it to the others.

Symmachus made a third, which was esteemed more clear and useful than any other; that author having a greater regard to the sense than to the literal signification.
But, as these three were calculated against the Christians, and had suppressed some pregnant prophecies, particularly that of Isaiah, A virgin shall conceive, &c. (11), the Septuagint, where it is still found, was preferred above them (†).

(Z) Thus we are told by Philo, who was one of them, (in vit Mos.) that the 70 elders, who were employed in this version, had been confined all the time, each in a separate apartment, and that when the work was finished, and brought to the king seated on his throne, and examined before him, there was found such exact conformity between each other, as well as with the original, even to a letter, or point, that both he and the assembly were convinced that the Holy Ghost must have inspired them; and some ancient fathers have been so fully persuaded of it, particularly St. Austin, Hilary, and others, that where it differs, as it doth often, from the Hebrew, they have rather chosen to think both divinely inspired, and both in the right; though there be no visible way of reconciling them (12).

On the other hand, the Hebraizing Jews affirm (13), that the day on which that version was made, proved more fatal to their nation than that on which Jeroboam set up the gold encaves of Dan and Bethel; and that the sky was covered with darkness three whole days; in memory of which they appointed a fast-day on the 8th of the month Thebet, answering to our December, to shew their abhorrence against those who had presumed to translate the sacred oracles into a strange and impure language.

(10) Vid. Scal. not. in Euseb.

(11) Isai. vii. 14.

(†) See Ancient Hist. vol. iv. p. 38. & seq.

(12) De his, vid. Clem. Alexand. Stromat. l. i. Just. Mart. exhort. ad Gent. & Dial. cont. Tryph. Iren. Epiphani.
Chrysost. Homil. iv. August. de Doctr. Christ. l. ii. c. 15. & alib. Hil. in Psal. cxxxi. not. 24. & al. (13) Vid.
Sepher. Taanith in Mens. Thebet & Scalig. not. in Chron. Euseb. sub an. 133. See also vol. iv. p. 37. & seq.
sub not.

Jews faithful to Severus;

and favoured
by him;

raised to high posts

under Caracalla.

Apocryphal books wrote about this time.

Jochanan compiles the Thalmud.

WE read nothing worth notice concerning them till the revolt of Pescennius Niger, who, being proclaimed emperor in Syria, in the beginning of Severus's reign †, and having tried in vain to bring them over to his interest, proved a bitter enemy to them during his short-lived reign. Their firmness to the emperor did not however meet with a suitable return from him; for we are told that he made war against them and the Samaritans, at his return from the Parthian war ‡; and that the senate, confounding what the father had done in Syria, and the son in Judea, ordered him a triumph over the latter <sup>h</sup> (A). He likewise kept up the laws against their making proselytes and going to Jerusalem, though he allowed them the liberty of circumcising their children during the first years of his reign<sup>1</sup>; but at length he grew more mild towards them, when he was apprised of their fidelity to him; or, which perhaps was a more prevailing motive, as he was beyond measure covetous, when he came to know that they had many rich and considerable persons among them, who would be glad to buy his favour and protection upon his own terms. Accordingly we find them not only protected by him, but several of them raised to some high posts; though he did not fail making them pay dear for the preference he shewed to them above the Christians, whom he grievously persecuted, by the heavy imposts he laid on them <sup>k</sup>. There was one clause however very much in their favour, in that emperor's decree, viz. the liberty of refusing such places and offices as were rather burthensome than honourable, though they enjoyed by it all the privileges of Roman citizens; and this so puffed them up with pride and insolence, especially against the persecuted Christians, that Tertullian, who was then writing his Apologetic, loudly complains of it <sup>l</sup> (B).

It is very probable that they enjoyed the same privileges under his son Caracalla; at least we do not find any thing to the contrary; and as that emperor, bad as he proved afterwards, had been brought up with one of them, for whom he expressed an uncommon affection (C), it is reasonable to suppose that he still retained so much kindness for them, as to leave them in possession of those franchises which his father had granted to them; and that they made use of that quiet interval, in making their collection of traditions both Jewish and Hellenish, which were by this time grown very numerous, and the teachers and writers of both not a few. Among the latter were the Pseudo-Esdras, the author of the additions to the book of Daniel; those of the histories of Tobit and Judith, of the book of Enoch, the assumption of Moses, and some others of the same apocryphal kind, concerning which, and the most probable time of their being wrote, the reader may consult the authors mentioned in the margin <sup>m</sup>.

In this century flourished the famed R. Jochanan, the great disciple of Judah Hakkadosh, chief of the Amoraim, or commentators on the Mishnah, and compiler of the Jerusalem Thalmud. The time is variously conjectured by the learned; the most probable supposition is, that he was born about the latter end of the second century, or A. C. 184, or 185. Some writers pretend that he was chosen chief of the academy of Tiberias in the 15th year of his age<sup>n</sup>; which is improbable, and contrary to the practice of the Jews; because his master was still alive, and R. Chanina, whom he appointed his successor, is affirmed by the Jewish chronologists to have enjoyed that dignity about ten years more: so that the soonest that he can be supposed to have mounted the chair, is about an. 225, and about the 40th of his age; by which time he had space and opportunity sufficient to finish his studies under those two masters, in order to fit himself for his great work; in which he was assisted by two other learned rabbies, viz. R. Samuel, and Rab or Rau, who had likewise been disciples of his two masters, Judah the Saint,

† See Ancient Hist. vol. iv. p. 108, & seq.

Sever. <sup>1</sup> Vid. TERTUL. Apologet. cap. 21.

Scapnl.

& al.

<sup>m</sup> FABRIC. Apocr. Test. BARToloc. DODWEL. de Cycl. Differt. ix.

<sup>n</sup> Vid. BARToloc. ub. sup.

<sup>2</sup> EUSEB. Chron. sub an. 198.

<sup>h</sup> SPARTIAN. in

<sup>k</sup> ULPIAN. in Sever.

<sup>l</sup> Apolog. ad

PRID. CALMET. BASNAG.

(A) We are indeed told by Abulpharage, that on the very first year of Severus's reign, the Jews waged a grievous war against the Samaritans, in which great numbers of both were slain (14). But, as no other author hath mentioned it, it is more likely that he only mistook some skirmishes, which Claudius, a captain of Jewish banditti, had had with those Samaritans; for he was grown so bold as to surprise the emperor, and to salute him at the head of his own freebooters, as if he had been one of the tribunes of his army; and then fled away with them so far that he could not be found. And this might be, very likely, what gave occasion to that triumph, seeing they had stood so firm for him against his competitor.

(B) He mentions, among other things, a Jew going along the streets of Carthage, and carrying the picture of a man in a long robe, with ass's ears, and a book in his hand with this inscription, the God of the Christians; which we chiefly mention, because it shews that the Jews had by that time spread themselves from Egypt into those farther parts of Afric, and how insolent they were grown under the favour of that emperor.

(C) This Jewish boy, who had been brought up at court, and was Caracalla's play-fellow, who was then about seven years of age, having been ordered by the emperor to be whipt for some misdemeanor, that young prince, we are told, not only shed tears over him, but was so concerned for him that he could not see his father for several days (15).

(14) Abulpharag. Dynast. p. 79.

(15) Spartian. in Carical.

a and R. Chanina. This famed piece, commonly known by the name of the Hierosolymitan Thalmud, together with the occasion of its being written, and other particulars relating to it, the reader will find an account of in the margin (D).

R. JOCHANAN is said by the Jewish writers to have lived 95 years, and left two famed disciples, viz. R. Ase, mentioned in the last note, and the compiler of the Babylonish Thalmud.

(D) The word Thalmud signifies Doctrine, and is emphatically given to this work, as being a complete system or body of it, or of the religion and morals of the Jews. They have two of that name and import, viz. this of Jerusalem, which is the shortest and more obscure of the two; as likewise the more antient by near one century; and that of Babylon, of which we shall speak in its proper place. It is properly a comment upon the Mishnah of Judah Hakkadosh; and the occasion of its writing was as follows:

Judah had scarce finished his own work, before he had the mortification to see a collection of traditions quite different from his, published under his nose by one Rabbi Chua, with the Chaldee title of Bara-Zijethoth, or Extravagants, which was afterwards inserted in the Mishnah, in order to make that piece more complete. It had, indeed, two considerable defects, viz. 1st, It only collected the various traditions and sentiments of the Jewish doctors, without enquiring which of them was most to be preferred; which confirms the conjecture, that Judah had only collected what he found ready written to his hand. And, 2dly, It was so concise as to be in some measure useless, because it reached but to a few doubtful cases, in comparison of the many questions that began by this time to be in vogue among the Jews. To remedy these defects it was that those three great men wrote this comment upon it, which being compiled in Judea, and for the Jews that lived in those parts, as well as in the Hebrew then in use, was stiled the Gemarrab, or Perfection; and this and the Mishnah together made that which is called the Thalmud of Jerusalem.

Neither Jews nor Christians are agreed about the time of its being finished; some placing it about 150, others about 200, and Buxtorf 230 years after the destruction of Jerusalem (16); that is, about the 300th year of Christ. Its mentioning the emperor Dioclesian, shews that it must have been compiled in or after the reign of that emperor; but Morinus is of opinion, from several barbarous terms he has observed in it, which are of Vandalic or Gothic extract, that it did not appear till the 5th century (17). Thus much for the Jerusalem Thalmud; which being still found not only too succinct, on account of the small number of cases and quotations from the Jewish doctors, as well as too obscure, by reason of the barbarous terms it had borrowed from other nations, gave birth to the Babylonish one, of which we are now going to speak.

This last was compiled by Rabbi Ase, a very learned disciple of the great Jochanan, but who left the academy of Tiberias, and went to preside at that of Sora near Babylon, where he continued in that dignity about 40 years, during which he compiled his Gemarrab, or comment upon the Mishnah of Judah the Saint; and from the place where he wrote it, it came to be stiled the Babylonish Thalmud, or, more probably perhaps, because it was done for the use of the Babylonish, or the Jews on the other side of the Euphrates. Ase did not live to finish it; but this was done by his sons; and some of his disciples gave the concluding hand to it; so that it became a vast body or collection of traditions, concerning the canon laws of the Jews, and of all the questions relating to the Jewish law, wherein the Mishnah is the text, and the Gemarrab the comment upon it.

The Jews in general prefer this Babylonish Thalmud,

on account of its clearness and fullness, much above that of Jerusalem; and though it is stuffed with ridiculous fables and stories, yet they will not suffer any one to call it in question without the censure of heresy. Insomuch that they even give this book the preference to the sacred ones; for these they compare to water, the Mishnah to wine, and the Gemarrab to the choicest wine †. They own all three to be equally of divine authority; but the last to be preferable in point of clearness, and without the help of which the former is but as a dead letter. We shall dispense with giving a farther account of that voluminous work, and only observe that the learned Maimonides hath given us an excellent abridgment of it, in which he hath thrown out all that was puerile and ridiculous, and confined himself to the collection of the most material cases and decisions that are contained in it. This epitome, which he stiles Yad Khazachab, or Strong-hand, is therefore much preferable to the Thalmud itself, as being one of the most complete bodies of the Jewish laws that ever was wrote; not so much on account of the dignity and importance of the subject, as of the clearness of the style, and the beautiful order in which he hath ranged them. As to the Babylonish Thalmud, there is as much difference of opinions about the time in which it was finished, as about that of Jerusalem. The Jews have greatly antedated it, as they do most of their own books; and the Christians were so little acquainted with it before St. Jerom's time, that we can come at no certainty from either. Morinus hath given it the latest date of any writer, and offered several very probable reasons for his opinion, that it was not finished till the year 700 (18). But as it would be doubtless out of our province, as well as swell this note to too great a bulk, were we to enter into a farther detail of this matter, we shall content ourselves with referring such of our readers, as are curious about that point, to the authors quoted in the margin, for a farther account of it (19).

No less is the difference of opinions concerning the book itself. We have seen what esteem the Jews have for it; some Christians come very little short of them, who, not content to look upon it as an inexhaustible mine of divine treasures, (from the search of which, nothing but the most carnal indolence, or too worldly pride and self-sufficiency, deters the learned) go even so far as to insinuate, that there is nothing grand or sublime in the sayings of Christ or his apostles but what they fetched from that divine fountain; insomuch that they will even affirm, that not only the finest parables and allegories of the gospel, but even the Lord's prayer, are taken from the Thalmud. If you ask them how they could have these from a book published so long after their time? they will answer, that they were conveyed by tradition from one doctor to another, and taught in their schools many years before, though not committed to writing till then †.

On the other hand, one meets with a quite different sort of men, who, running into the opposite extreme, condemn the book as detestable and dangerous, fit only to be flung into the flames. But those pass the more equitable judgment, who, without exaggerating its authority, can yet make use of it in order to explain the sacred writings, and the antient rites and religious ceremonies of the Jews: and this is what we have endeavoured to do in several parts of this work, as far as we could find

(16) Recensio Op. Thalmud. p. 200.

vol. i. p. 596. sub not. (B).

ub. sup. tom. i. p. 448. iii. 359.

Trigland. Dissert. de Caraitis. p. 17, & 35.

Calmet sub voc. Prid. Connex. part ii. lib. viii.

Reland. Annales. Rabbin. ultra Traje. an. 1702.

& seq. Morin. Prid. Calmet. & al sup. citat.

(17) Exercit. Bibl. l. iii. Exercit. 6.

(18) Exercit. Bibl. ub. sup. cap. 2, & seq. Serrar. de Rabbin. l. i. c. 9.

(†) See Ancient Hist.

Bartoloc.

Hornbeck cont. Jud. lib. i. Basnag.

(19) Vid. int. al. Lightfoot in Matth. xx.

Vid. eccl. ibid.

R. R. Ase, mud, and R. Anne, who boasted to have written 400 books; by which is not meant that he <sup>a</sup> and Ame, disciples of Joseph, either was the author, or even transcriber, of so many volumes; but only that he copied some sentences out of each: for we are told, that even the transcribing of a sentence out of Deuteronomy, v. 9. doth entitle one to the title of having wrote that book <sup>o</sup>. Both those disciples received the imposition of hands from their master, and both were chiefs of the academy of Tiberias, to the great mortification of one of their school-fellows, named Sceman Bar-Abba, who almost broke his heart for not being raised to that dignity.

Jews in danger under Heliogabalus;

HITHERTO the Jews had lived in peace and happiness, but were like to have suffered a most dreadful persecution in the reign of Heliogabalus. That whimsical prince, it seems, caused himself to be circumcised, and abstained from swines flesh, out of devotion to his gods; and this he had probably learned from some Jews, in whose neighbourhood he had been brought <sup>b</sup> up, and with whom his family, particularly his aunt Mammea, was very intimate. All this, however, could not have saved them from his fury, had he not been assassinated by his soldiers, before he could bring his mad project about, of making his god Heliogabalus, as Lampridius tells us he designed to have done, the only object of men's worship all over his empire; for the Jews would have suffered the severest persecutions rather than have joined in it. But this danger was soon over, and they began again to feel the effects of peace under the empire of successor.

• BARTOLOC. tom. iii. p. 673.

it of any service; and, as we have reason to hope, to very good purpose, and to the satisfaction of such of our readers who have not suffered themselves to be carried away into either extreme †. However, as we have taken upon us to observe, that it is fraught with many absurd and puerile notions, we shall now close this note with a few instances of it, to serve our readers as a specimen of the rest.

Nothing can be more absurd, and even impious, than what they tell us of the Deity's passing his time away before the creation, in making and annihilating of a number of worlds, by way of essay, till he had found out the way of making one to his mind, which is that we live in: his creating of the two monsters of Henoc and Leviathan on the fifth day, the former of whom was sent to range on the earth, and hath the grass of a thousand mountains to supply him with food; and the other confined to the sea till the day of judgment, when it is to be killed, to make a feast for all the elect: his creating the male and female Behemoth, and killing and salting the latter for the same banquet: Adam having been created an hermaphrodite, and trying in vain to assuage his lust with all the other animals, and fixing at length upon Eve. These, and many more of the like nature, which a modest Jew one would think must be ashamed of, are yet swallowed down by the vulgar; whilst some of the more sensible of them pretend that those stories are allegorical; and contain such sublime mysteries as none but their greatest saints can be able or fit to attain.

What can be more childish, as well as prophane, than the story of the sly rabbi, who is there reported to have cheated God and the devil, by praying to the latter to carry him up to the gate of heaven, when, having once beheld the glory of the place; and happiness of the saints, he might die more easy and quiet; and having obtained his request, and found it luckily opened, gave himself a spring, and jumped into it, and swore by its great God, that he would never come out of it; whereby God was obliged to let him stay there rather than make him forswear himself.

Many of the rabbinic decisions are also found there no less ludicrous and absurd; as when it introduces two women disputing in the synagogues, about the use which a husband may lawfully make of them; and the rabbies answer positively that he may safely use them as he pleases; and for this reason, that as a man that buys a fish may eat either the fore or hind part, as he likes best, so, &c. They are sometimes contradictory to each other; as when, instead of endeavouring to reconcile or remove the manifest opposition; they make a voice from heaven do it; by pronouncing both decisions right. We shall pass by some of those which are chiefly levelled against Christians, which not only oblige the Jews to curse them in their prayers, morning and night, but encourage the greatest inhumanities against them. It is indeed to be hoped that those who are living under the protection of our mild government, will look upon themselves as less bound to such uncharitable precepts, and we may say, in some measure, so contrary to the Mosaic law; but how much the authority of the Thalmud is to be preferred to that, may appear from the following story taken out of it, and with which we shall close this note. It is as follows:

A certain heathenish king, named Pergandicus, having invited eleven of the most celebrated Jewish doctors to sup with him, and received them with a suitable magnificence, put it to their choice whether they would feed upon some swines flesh, or have carnal conversation with pagan women, or drink wine that had been offered to idols; after mature deliberation, they chose the last, as being only forbidden by their doctors; whereas the two former were so by the law. Accordingly the king obliged them with some excellent wine, consecrated to the gods, of which they drank very freely. The table, which stood upon a hinge, being turned about, and covered with swines flesh, they fell to it without further enquiry; and, after a full meal, being also well heated with wine, they were conducted to bed, where they found such handsome women as they were not proof against; and it was not till after a sound sleep that they became sensible of their gradual violation of the law, in that threefold manner. As a punishment for it, they died all within the year, and of a sudden death, for having transgressed the precepts of their doctors; thinking that they might more safely do it than break the written law. And accordingly the Mishnah pronounces them more guilty who transgress the words of their wise men, than those who transgress the words of the written law. (20). And R. Eleazer, being questioned by his disciples upon his death-bed about the surest way to life, answered, Turn away your children from the study of the written law, and let them listen to the words of the wise men; that is, to the Thalmud. The reason they give is no less singular; for, say they, the prophets and inspired writers were obliged to prove their doctrine by miracles; whereas the wise men have no need of such proofs, God having enjoined his people (Deut. xvii. v. 10. et seq.) to do according to that which they shall shew them, and to act according to all they shall injoin them, &c. and for this reason it is another maxim of the Thalmud, that there can be no peace of conscience for those who forsake the study of it, for that of the sacred writings. And thus much shall suffice to give our English readers a notion of the nature of the two Thalmuds, and of their authority among the Jews.

† Vid. Ant. Hist. vol. i. p. 588, & 599. sub. not.

(20) Tract. Sanhedr. c. x. n. 3. tom. iv. p. 25.

- a THE mild disposition of Alexander Severus, joined to the prejudices he had imbibed in his youth, in favour of that nation and of their religion (E), made him shew so much favour towards them, that the then wits used to give him the title of Archisynagogue of Syria. He was no less an admirer of the Christians, and imitated the method of both, of proclaiming the names of those officers whom he set over his provinces, as those did by their chiefs and bishops, to the end that those under them might have it in their power to accuse them, when their behaviour deserved it. He was no less fond of the negative maxim common to Christians and Jews, which he often repeated, of not doing that to others which we would not have done to ourselves: but he seems to have been ignorant of that positive and more excellent one, peculiar to Christ and his disciples, Whatsoever ye would that men should do unto you, do ye also unto
- b them, or else it is not to be doubted but he would have given it the preference.

His successors suffered the Jews to live in peace and full liberty, particularly Philip, who, being born in Arabia, had been conversant with, and was a great favourer of them, as well as of the Christians, and in whose time the famed St. Cyprian wrote his treatise of Testimonies, in which he mentions a vast number of prophecies which were fulfilled in Jesus Christ. Among the Jews flourished the famed R. Scesciab, who, though blind, became famed for his learning, and held several disputes against the Christians, and particularly opposed their praying towards the east. They attribute two works to him; one a cabalistical exposition of the Sephiroth, the manuscript of which was kept in the library of Heidelberg; and the other a Targum, or paraphrase on the sacred books<sup>p</sup>. As Decius raised a persecution against the Christians, out of spleen to Philip who had protected them, some have thought that the Jews bore a share in it; but as the difference between the Christians and the Jews was better known by this time than it had been formerly, it is more likely these escaped it. That which raged afterwards in Valerian's reign against the Christians, hath been thought by some to have been in a great measure owing to the Jews; and Dionysius of Alexandria tells us, that that prince was stirred up to it by the archisynagogue of Egypt. But it is probable that our author hath given that title to the chief of the magicians, out of hatred to the Jews; for it was really an Egyptian magician that induced him to it, and it doth not appear that the Jews had any hand in it.

- We have now gone thro' the history of the western Jews during the three first centuries: it is now time to pass over the Euphrates, and give some account of the eastern ones; of their princes or chiefs; of their captivity; their academies, and most celebrated doctors in them; and such other transactions relating to them as we think worth our reader's notice. And this place is so much the more proper to begin their history in, because it is in the third century, and not before, that these chiefs and doctors began to make a figure, and to found their most celebrated academies; we therefore think, for the reasons hinted in the margin (F), that this new dignity did not introduce itself in Babylon till the time of Huna, the son of Nathan, there

<sup>p</sup> SAGHI NAHOR, ap. Bartoloc. Bibl. Rabb.

(E) That prince had received such a strong tincture of Judaism from his mother Mammea, that tho' he never forsook the worship of the heathen gods, yet he had adopted into their number Abraham, the father of the faithful and patriarch of the Jews, and would have done the same by Jesus Christ. This, indeed, was a strange medley of religion, and seems to have been a kind of refinement on Heliogabalus's wild project, only with this difference, that Severus forbore all kind of violence, and strove to promote it by mild and gentle means. As to the title of Syrian Archisynagogue, it was given him as being a native of that province, and on account of his singular favour to the Jews*.

(F) We have already shewn how fond the Jewish writers are of giving the preference to these Babylonish chiefs, above the patriarchs of Tiberias, on account of their being of the royal blood of David, and the persons to whom the title to the Jewish scepter belonged. In consequence of which, their lesser chronicle, or Seder Holam Zeathu, hath given us a list or series of them, from king Jeconiah, who was carried away captive into Babylon by Nebuchadnezzar †, and was afterwards released out of his prison by Evil Merodach his son, in the first year of his reign, and set above the rest of the captive kings (21). To him that chronicle gives nine successors; viz. 1. Salathiel his son, under Bel Shazar. 2. Zorobabel his son, who brought back that captivity under Cyrus ‡. 3. Mesbullam his son, under whom prophecy ceased, and who died in the time of Alexander the Great. 4. Hananiab, under the reign of Salmon, Alafcan, and Maparis, kings of the Greeks (so they call Ptolemy, the son of Lagus, Seleucus, and Cassander). He died, according to them, an. 140 of the æra of the Seleucidae. 5. His son Barachiah, under that Ptolemy who caused the Scriptures to be translated into Greek, who died 170 of the same æra. 6. His son Hafadia an. 175, when Nicanor was defeated by the Jews. 7. Isaiab his son. 8. Abdiab his son, who died in Herod's reign; and Shamaja his son, who makes up the 10th generation of the royal line since David. From this they give us a regular series of 31 more, beginning at Sheebaniab his son, who died an. 160, after the destruction of the temple, or 236 of Christ, down to Azariah, the brother of Jacob Phineas, the 41st and last of those chiefs, who made up according to that chronologist, the 89th generation. We shall not trouble our readers with a list of them, which is palpably faulty in many respects, and hath little else except their bare names, and here and there some synchronism; of which we shall give an account in the sequel; and now and then one of those new chiefs who chose to be buried in Judea.

But were this list ever so authentic, with relation to the regular succession of those families, yet, with respect to their power, dignity, or figure, the Jews don't pre-

* See Ant. Hist. vol. vi. p. 358, 359.

c. ult. v. 27, & seq.

Mod. Hist. Vol. V.

† De hoc, vid. Ant. Hist. vol. i. p. 848, & seq.

‡ See Ant. Hist. vol. iv. p. 3, & seq. & not. (C).

(21) 2 King.

mentioned, who was cotemporary with Judab the saint, and flourished about the year 220, or, at the earliest, under his father, about the beginning of the third century; and then their authority could be but small, considering the slavery under which the Jews groaned from the Parthians, Romans, and other tyrants, whatever titles they might bestow on them to raise the credit of their nation.

When first begun.

Favoured by the Persians.

Learned men there.

We need not repeat what hath been said in other parts of this history concerning these wars, and the triumph of Severus over Artaxerxes, the famed restorer of the Persian monarchy †. This last died about an. 244, and was succeeded by his son Sapor, from whom that new succession took their name *. Both of them became great favourers of the Jews, and shewed an extraordinary esteem for their rabbies; and it is under them that we find the celebrated Samuel Jarchi, or the Lunatic (G), not only honoured with the title of Nassi or Prince, but likewise with the names of those two monarchs, being first surnamed Ariochus, or Artaxerxes, and, after his death, Sapor, the name of his son, to shew the high degree of authority they had gained at that new court. This great man, as we formerly hinted, came from Judea hither; and, among his other dignities, had that of counsellor of Huna, the chief of the captivity ‡. He is said to have died an. 250, and to have been succeeded by R. Ada, who perfected the reformation which he had left defective. The other doctors that flourished in this century, and raised the fame of that university under Huna, the reader may see in the margin (H).

BUT

† See Ant. Hist. vol. vi. p. 141, & seq. * Ibid. p. 162, & seq. vol. iv. p. 326, & seq. ‡ GANTZ TZEMACH, p. 113. BARToloc. ub. sup. tom. iv. p. 388. Vid. BASNAG. ub. sup.

tend to it, knowing well enough that many of those to whom they gave the pompous titles of Nassi, Prince, Rosh, Chief, and others of the like nature, lived in the utmost indigence; especially during their slavish subjection to the Parthians, Romans, &c. and bore those titles, more on account of their merit, either for learning and sanctity, than on that of their figure or authority.

But what farther confirms that this dignity did not begin till the epoch which we mentioned, is, that Josephus, who wrote under the emperor Trajan, hath never once spoken of it; and that Justin Martyr, who is still later, objects against his antagonist Trypho, that his nation had neither king nor chief. Is it probable the latter would have let him triumph over him thus if the case had been otherwise? and would he not have retorted to him this succession of chiefs, if he had known of any such being still preserved? We may add, that those chiefs above-mentioned are only known by their names, except R. Nathan, who is there said to have come from Babylon into Judea in the patriarchate of Simon, the father of Judab the saint, and became celebrated there, not only on account of his being chosen Ab-Beth-Din, at Tiberias (22), but likewise for some works he published there. But is it probable that he would have exchanged his dignity of chief, or prince of the captivity at Babylon, if he had been in possession of any such, for that of second in the Jewish Sanhedrin; and at a time when Palestine was ruin'd by the wars that had raged in it, and by the avarice of Domitian? Had his dignity and authority been so high at Babylon, is it likely he would have come so far to be chosen to one so inferior to it at Tiberias? But, by what appears, his father was chiefly distinguished in the former, for the immense riches and credit which he had acquired at the court of the Parthian kings; on which account the Jews, according to their constant custom, had given him some pompous title. Nathan, therefore, seems rather to have come to Tiberias in search of learning, and some honourable employment, which he had not before, to add new merit to his wealth; and, having stayed there a considerable time, upon his return to Babylon, he resolved to set up some dignity there also, answerable to the patriarchate of Judea. What confirms it is, that he lived very long, seeing he is numbered among the Talmudists, or commentators on the Mishnah; which shews that he cannot be well supposed to have come to Tiberias till after the conclusion of the war, lately mentioned under the emperor Adrian, or about the reign of Antoninus Pius. However, after his return home, the wars between the Romans and the Parthians, under the emperors M. Aurelius and Severus, having reduced that country to the greatest extremity, towards the close of the second century, it is not likely that this new dignity could be introduced there till matters had taken a more favourable turn, that is, under Huna his son, who is therefore supposed the first chief of the captivity (23).

(G) So called from his great skill in astronomy; some tables of which he is said to have calculated, which are still preserved in the Vatican library (†). He was moreover well versed in the Jewish laws, and was president of the famed academy of Nahardea, where he became famous for his astronomical and other lectures; and particularly, as we have lately hinted, for the improvements he made of Hillel's reformation of the calendar.

(H) Rabbi Jehudab, the son of Eliezer, raised himself by his great learning; insomuch that we find several of his decisions in the Babylonish Talmud; tho', in most of them, he betrays his aversion to the heathen and strangers. Some have misplaced him in the university of Pundebita, which was as yet unfounded. He had a successor named Nachman, who filled the chair with no less reputation; and, in general, the professors of Nahardea are said to have excelled those of Sora, its rival; only these latter were more in favour with the prince of the captivity.

Among these we may, however, put in the first rank the famed R. Abba Aricka, who was emphatically stiled רב רב, or Rau, or the Great, and is chiefly known and quoted by that title. Both he and Samuel Jarchi had spent some time in Judea, and studied under Judab the saint; but, after the death of their master, they both returned and settled, the former at Sora, and the latter at Nahardea. Rab was so well beloved by one of the Babylonish princes, named Adarchan, that he used to assist at his lectures, and at length caused himself to be circumcised about A. C. 243. He wrote, they say, a comment on the book of Ruth, and some other pieces, and was of opinion that the Romans would be masters of the whole world nine months before the coming of the Messiah.

He was succeeded in the chair of Sora by Huna, a relation of the prince of that name, and was so proud of his affinity to him, that he is the first who took upon him the title of Prince of the Academy, or ראש ישיבה Rosh Jeshubab. He had 160 volumes of the law; one of which was found פסול passul, or illegal, merely be-

(22) De hoc. vid. Ant. Hist. vol. iv. p. 40. & seqq. & not. (R). Vid. Basnag ub. sup. l. viii. c. 3.
(23) Vid. Bartoloc. Basnag. (†) Idem, ibid. lib. viii. c. 3.

- a BUT their felicity soon proved the prelude of a violent persecution under Sapor, the second Persian monarch of this race. That prince, who loved to converse and often dispute with them, having one day questioned them about their custom of burying the dead, and insisted upon their producing some express and decisive text in their law for it, received such an illusory answer, that, from a favourer, he became a furious persecutor of them (I). But how far the evidence on which this fact is founded is to be relied on, the reader may judge from what we have said in the last note. However, it is plain, from the famed inscription engraved on Gordian's tomb, which Capitolinus tells us was written in the Persic and Hebrew characters, that it might be read by all the world<sup>a</sup>, that there were still great numbers of the Jews in Persia, and considerable enough to be thought worthy of reading that emperor's praises in their own language.
- b Sapor is said to have reigned from A. C. 241 to 272: and how unsuccessful he was in his wars, Ab. A. C. not only against the Romans, but especially against the great Odenatus, and his celebrated queen 260, ad an. Zenobia, hath been seen in a former part<sup>c</sup>; and it was under that glorious princess that the 272. Jews made the most considerable figure all the time of her reign, and in every part of her dominions, which, as we there observed, were of very great extent.

SHE had been brought up in their religion, and was a zealous professor of it. Both she and her husband were become so successful and powerful over those eastern tracts, they carried all before them; so that there is no room to doubt of the Jews making the most of the favour and protection of two such powerful friends. She, in particular, is recorded to have built them a great number of stately synagogues, and to have raised them to the highest dignities. Her sad fate, however, soon put an end to all her glory and their happiness, unless we will suppose, that her son Vaballat, who succeeded her in some part of her old dominions, was of the same religion with her, and shewed the same favour and encouragement to them; tho' even in this case, which is not altogether certain, all he could do for them must come vastly short of what his mother had done. After the fall of that great heroine, the Jews retired from her conquered dominions into several cities of Persia, where they were likely to live more quietly, and where there still flourished several of their learned men, some of them chiefly famed for the most puerile actions; such as that of the celebrated Chija, who flung himself into a smoking oven or furnace to subdue his lust, after he had tried in vain variety of other means. The noble academy of Nabardea having undergone the same fate with that city, that of Sora became the most populous and famed for its great men (K).

IT was during the time of prosperity and glory abovementioned, that we find that the Jewish doctors began to take variety of pompous titles; such as those of Abba Father, Baal Lord, Rom High, Rab Master, Mor Teacher, Rosh Chief or Head, and the like. Among them was a famed doctor named Jeremiah, who stiled himself the Master of Questions; and, to mortify the Babylonish doctors, made his wife hold frequent disputes against them<sup>d</sup>. They cause it was as broad as long; which we chiefly mention to give our readers a taste of the doctors, and learning of those times.

<sup>a</sup> IN GORDIAN, p. 165, & seq.    <sup>c</sup> See Ant. Hist. vol. iv. p. 327, & seq. Vol. vi. p. 183, & seq.    <sup>d</sup> BAR-TOLOC. ub. sup. tom. iii.

We shall only add one more learned, viz. R. Cohanab, of the priestly order, as his name imports, and of the family of Eli, the high-priest; tho' that is by some called in question. He had likewise studied at Tiberias under R. Joebanan and the patriarch Samuel; and indeed it was then a common custom so to do; insomuch that a man was not esteemed learned, unless he had studied some time in that academy. All this is a proof that the Jews not only lived peaceably, but were in high favour with the then Persian monarch.

(I) They tell us, that one of the doctors not being able to produce a command for it, another more subtle than he pleaded custom and example; to which Sapor retorted that of Moses, who was not buried: to this they replied, that the Israelites mourned for him (24), which did not satisfy him. But if we may believe a certain chronicle, said to have been transmitted from Persia into Spain (25), he was forced to this violence by his subjects, who could not brook the esteem he shewed to the Jews, and were ready to mutiny against him. So that he was obliged to imprison three of their principals, whom he tried in vain, by dint of scourging, to force into an abjuration of their religion. Provoked at their constancy, he caused all the princes of that nation to be imprisoned, and so ill treated and macerated, that they had nothing left but skin and bones. From that time the Persians became so unfortunate in all their wars, especially with the Arabs, who subdued and led them away captive, that they acknowledged at length that their cruelty to the Jews brought all these evils upon them as a just punishment; on which account they granted them full liberty of conscience, whilst the Arabian princes, who looked upon that persecution as cruel and unjust, had courted great numbers of them into their dominions, where they were protected and caressed.

The chronicle above-named, which alone mentions all these particulars, is much called in question by the learned; tho' if by the Arabians there mentioned, we understand their neighbours the Palmyrenians and the Saracens, under the famed Odenatus, it is plain that they reduced the Persians to great extremities, at the same time that they highly favoured the Jews.

(K) Among them was the learned R. Zira, surnamed Katana (both which signify little), who had gone to study at that of Tiberias, but had been invited to Sora by Huna, the then chief of the captivity, who raised him to the professorship, which he enjoyed till an. 300; when, having conceived a desire of being interred in Judea, he chose to go thither in his life-time, rather than have his body transported thither after his death (26).

(24) Deut. c. ult. v. 8.

ub. sup. Ben. virg. & al. ub. sup. (25) Ex Gemar. tract. Sanhedr. Solam. Ben. virg. & seq.

(26) Gantz,

flourished

flourished about the year 290; but the most famed among them was Manes, a person of great a learning, but who could by no means be reconciled to the religion, or even God, of the Jews; nor to what the sacred historians record, of his ordering that nation to destroy and extirminate such great number of kingdoms and people; and preferred that of the Christians, who commended nothing so much as universal love and benignity. He is said to have held frequent conferences with the Jewish doctors of Persia, in order to inspire them, as he pretended, with more worthy ideas of the Godhead. Our modern rabbies do not acknowledge any such conferences between their ancestors and him, whom they have noted in their calendar as the head of that new sect which still bears his name, and which they absurdly place towards the close of Constantine's reign, tho' he lived about the end of this third century. The persecution which was raised against the Christians about the same time, under Dioclesian, did not much b affect the Jewish nation either in the east or west; at least, neither Jewish or any other authors mention any thing of it: only the former pretend, that he designed to have made them feel the severest marks of his resentment for some scandalous reflections which the disciples of Judah the saint had cast on him; but that they found means to appease him and prevent it (L). But it is now time to pass on to the 4th century, and see how they fared under the Christian emperors.

Jews in the 4th century,

whether persecuted by Constantine.

Laws against them.

Decree of the Elviran council.

WE have had occasion already to mention some severe laws which Constantine was forced to enact, to suppress the insolence of the Jews against the Christians; and to forbid them making of proselytes, and abusing those who embraced Christianity. But some historians have gone farther, and made that prince a very severe persecutor of them; insomuch that one of the Greek c fathers tells us, that, being shocked at their assembling themselves in order to rebuild the city of Jerusalem, he condemned them to have their ears cut off, and to be dispersed like vile slaves through all the parts of the empire<sup>1</sup>. And another writer adds, that he obliged them to be baptized, and to eat swine's flesh on Easter-day<sup>2</sup>. All this however is wholly rejected by the generality of the moderns, and not without good reasons; which the reader may see in the margin (M). His design was neither to persecute them, nor to force them to turn Christians, but to prevent that liberty which was granted to them from being abused, to the detriment or disgrace of Christianity. In consequence of which, he enacted a law, six months before his death, declaring all those slaves free which had by any means been circumcised by their Jewish masters (N). He farther ordered, that they should be obliged to serve all public offices, d like all the other subjects of the empire; which was but right they should; but yet exempted their patriarchs, priests, and others, that officiated at their synagogues, schools, &c. from them, that they might not be thereby diverted from those necessary employments<sup>3</sup>. But the council of Elvira in Spain, which is commonly placed under this reign, made two decrees which were more severe against them; by the first of which they were excluded from eating with Christians, as they had commonly done till then; and, though the penalty fell only on the Christians, who were excommunicated by it for eating with a Jew, yet it put the latter to very great inconveniences, and made them liable to insults and contempt. By the other, all possessors of lands were forbidden, under the same penalty, to suffer the fruits of the earth to be blessed by the Jews, because their blessing rendered that of the Christians abortive. This e custom of blessing the fruits of the earth at certain seasons was common to Pagans and Jews, as well as Christians: but who would have imagined, that the latter should have made use of

<sup>1</sup> CHRYSOST. Orat. in Jud. iii. xvi. tom. viii. cap. 2.

<sup>2</sup> EUTYCH. An. tom. i. p. 466.

<sup>3</sup> Cod. THEODOS. lib.

(L) They upbraided him, it seems, with having been a swineherd; but appeased his resentment with telling him, that tho' they despised the swineherd, they revered the emperor. This story seems founded on the prediction which had been made to that prince, that he should ascend the throne when he had killed Aper (the boar); meaning Aper the Præfatus Prætorii, whose death opened to him the way to the empire, as hath been shewn in that part of the Roman history (†).

(M) The Jews themselves all own, that it was Adrian, and not Constantine, who ordered their ears to be cut off; and this is also confirmed by the Arabic historian (27). Besides, we have elsewhere seen, that Jerusalem was already rebuilt in Constantine's time; insomuch, that the bishop of it had assisted at the Nicene councils; and Constantine had adorned that city with such magnificent edifices, that Eusebius compliments him on it as the builder of the New Jerusalem foretold by the prophets (28).

How then could the Jews assemble themselves in a riotous manner to rebuild that city, which was already done in so stately a manner? We may add further, that, among all the edicts of that prince against the Jews, which are preserved in the Theodosian code, there is not a word about their being condemned to have their ears cut off, to eat swine's flesh, &c. Though some of them accuse the Jews of stoning and burning those of their nation, whom they found inclined to embrace Christianity, and of having forced their Christian and heathen slaves to be circumcised, which was the reason of his resentment against them.

(N) Eusebius, who could not but be well acquainted with that law, says, it extended even to a prohibition of their having any Christian slaves, and gives this reason for it, that it was unjust that those, who were redeemed by the blood of Christ, should be in subjection to his murderers (29).

(†) See Ant. Hist. vol. vi. p. 205, & seq. iii. c. 33.

(27) Ibid. lib. iv. c. 27.

(28) Abulphed, dynast. vii. p. 77. (28) In vit. Const. lib.

either

a either of the former, if this decree had not informed us of it. However, both this and the other decree plainly shew, that the Jews had lived very peaceably in Spain, and in good harmony with the Christians, till then, whatever they may have done since.

THEY enjoyed no less a benign sunshine in the east; and their academies went on in a flourishing manner, if we except the persecution which was raised against one of their greatest doctors, the famed Ravenna or Rabba Nachmanides, chief of the academy of Sora, and a person in such esteem, that he had no less than twelve thousand disciples under him * (O). This person, after having taught a considerable time at that city, was at length accused of some very high crime to the king of Persia; for which he thought fit, to avoid farther prosecution, to abscond; and either died in his retreat, as some affirm, or was banished by that monarch, according to others, and died in exile (P). What this crime was we are not told; but it was not attended with any ill consequence towards the nation, nor even to his family, since we find him succeeded in the same academy by his own nephew of the same name, whom he adopted into it (Q). This last had made such progress under him, that he was chosen chief of the academy of Pundebita, so early as an. 324; and had continued in it till an. 329, when he married, and had a son known by the name of Rab-bibi. The university of Sora had another famed professor, namely, Joseph, surnamed the Blind, for so he was; yet he had so great a share of inward light, that he was styled, Sagbi Nabor, or Great Light. They gave him likewise that of Sinai, because he was a perfect master of all the traditions given to Moses on that holy mountain. He is commonly supposed to be the author of the Chaldee paraphrases upon some of the Hagiographa, such as the Psalms, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, Ruth, and Esther, which are held in great esteem among the Jews and Christians; at least one would think so by the number of editions which that book has had, though too much fraught with fables and subtleties.

THE last thing worth mentioning, relating to the Jews, under the reign of Constantine (R), is the bloody persecution they raised in Persia, where their interest was very great at that court against the eastern Christians, to be revenged, as was pretended, for those which they had suffered in the Roman empire. Christianity had passed from Armenia into Persia, and other parts of the east, where a great number of churches and bishopricks had been erected without any molestation. But when the Jews found, that Ustazades, one of Sapor's chief eunuchs, was going to be converted to it, they lost all patience; and, by the help of the Magi, persuaded that prince to persecute them with the utmost severity. Simeon, the worthy bishop of Cteziphon, whom they had accused of holding a treasonable correspondence with Constantine, was one of their first martyrs, and Ustazades another. The persecution was long and bloody; all the churches were demolished, and the traces of Christianity almost obliterated.

* GANTZ TZEMACH, et al. ub. sup. Lib. Cabal. p. 61. b.

(O) There were two famed rabbies of that name; the one distinguished by the title of Hakadmon, or the elder, who flourished about A. C. 322, and the Acharon, or younger, who lived about an. 474. We are now speaking of the elder, who was a man of such profound learning, and so dextrous at removing the greatest difficulties, that they gave him the title of עוקר הרים,

Hoker Harim, the remover of mountains. His chief work is the Bereshith Rabbah, which is a learned comment on Genesis, giving an account of the creation, and a description of the Holy Land, together with the literal and mystical sense of that sacred book (30) and hath been often quoted in this work, especially in the Jewish history. There is another treatise of the same name, which must not therefore be confounded with it, and which is a comment on the Mishna, written by R. Hoshianghia, a disciple of Judab Hakkodish, but less esteemed than the former.

(P) Some tell us, that Sapor had actually condemned him to death, but that his mother got him reprieved, by sending him the same message which Pilate's wife had formerly done to that judge; viz. Have nothing to do with that righteous man, for I have suffered many things in a dream by reason of him (31). Whether the Thalmudists have stolen this story from the gospel, or have invented it out of their own heads, we will not determine (32). But if there be any truth in it, the message of the empress dowager had a different effect on the Persian king, who contented himself with banishing him for life.

(Q) And therefore tells us, that he gave him the name of אבי, Abji; First, Because he had taken him as an orphan out of charity into his house. And, 2dly, Because he should not be confounded hereafter with him; that is, the disciple with his master.

(R) It may not be perhaps altogether impertinent to this history of the Jews under this reign, to mention the discovery of the holy cross, which is, by one of the oldest writers on that subject, attributed to a Jew named Judas, who became soon after a convert to Christianity, and took the name of Cyriacus (33). The generality of writers of the church of Rome give the honour of it to the empress Helena, the mother of Constantine, on the authority of Sulpitius Severus, who hath added a great number of miracles to this transaction (34); and a letter of Cyril, bishop of Jerusalem, the authenticity of which is justly called in question. It is out of our province to enter into that controversy (*); we shall only observe, that Eusebius's silence on so remarkable a discovery, seems quite to discountenance the pretences of the latter; for who can imagine, that such a man as he should have omitted it, if the discovery had been really made by that empress, and been confirmed by so many miracles, at a place so near his bishoprick, and usual residence. But the wonder will cease if it was made by an obscure Jew, and without any miracle or extraordinary thing attending it.

(30) Vid. Bartoloc. ub. sup. Wolf. Bibl. Hebr. sub Rab. Ben. Nachman. & Rabolb. vid. & Lib. Cabal. p. 61. b. (31) Matt. xxvii. 19. (32) Vid. Lightfoot, Hor. thalmud. in Matt. xxvii. (33) Greg. Turon. lib. i. c. 36. (34) Lib. ii. c. 48. (*) See Ant. Hist. vol. vi. p. 262.

Circa A. C. 341. THEY went not long unpunished for it; and Constans, who succeeded Constantine, observing to what height of insolence they were grown in divers parts of the empire, especially in Egypt, where they committed the vilest insults against the Christians (S), found himself obliged to use them with greater severity than his father. But what incensed him most against them was the treachery of the Jews of Diocæsarea in Palestine (T), who took the advantage of Magnentius's revolt in Hungary, and of that prince's absence whilst he was gone to quell that rebel, to raise an insurrection in Judea, whilst the Persians were attacking the empire on their side, and were laying siege to Nisibis. He was therefore obliged to send Gallus against them, whom he had created Cæsar; and who took Judea in his way to Persia, defeated the rebellious Jews, and razed Diocæsarea. After this, Constans, who, besides his just resentment against them, was a very zealous Christian, not only revived all the old laws of Adrian and Constantine, but made some more severe ones against them; among which, one condemned any Jew to death that married a Christian, circumcised a slave, or kept any that were Christians. They were moreover forbid to enter into Jerusalem; and those who were desirous to see it at a distance, must buy that liberty at a vast price. He likewise loaded them with very heavy taxes; and was projecting some fresh ones against them to keep them still more under, but was prevented by death<sup>y</sup>. It was under his reign, that young Epiphanius was converted from Judaism to Christianity, not without some miracles attending it, with which we shall not trouble our readers with, since they were hardly powerful enough to keep him from running into the wild notions of the Gnosticks, whom he met with in Egypt<sup>z</sup>.

St. Epiphanius converted.

Julian's great favours to the Jews.

WE come now to the reign of Julian the apostate, to whom the Jews made some of their first addressees, with a complaint, that they were unjustly debarred from entering into Jerusalem, which had been the glorious residence of their ancestors for so long a series of ages. They not only met with a kind reception, and the most sensible marks of his favour, such as the exemptions from those heavy taxes with which his predecessors had loaded them, and the free exercise of their religion, but he likewise permitted them to rebuild their temple, and to revive their ancient worship in it; and even furnished them with money and materials for the work. He condescended so far as to write a letter to them, in which, the more to mortify the Christians, he gives their patriarch the title of brother (U). All these signal favours could not fail of raising that nation to the highest pitch of insolence against the Christians, which they could not but see was the most effectual means of ingratiating themselves with him. Accordingly they assembled themselves in several cities of Judea and Syria, where they began to demolish the churches, and committed other outrages, especially at Gaza, Ascalon, Berythus, and Damascus, whilst those of Egypt did the same at Alexandria, and other places; and a third sort set themselves about rebuilding the temple at Jerusalem. In the carrying on of which work, we are told, men, women, and children, were zealous to put an helping hand; and some of them were so sanguine in it, that they made themselves tools of gold and silver to rear up

<sup>y</sup> SOZOMEN, lib. ii. cap. 9. HILAR. in Ps. lviii. p. 731—734. Ps. cxxxi, & cxlvi. SOZOM. lib. iii. c. 17.
<sup>z</sup> JOAN. in vit. Epiph. num. i. & seq. p. 33, & seq.

(S) They not only plundered their churches, burnt their sacred books, and other church utensils, but defiled their fountains, or baptisteries, in such a filthy manner, as St. Athanasius was ashamed to mention (35); they carried their insolence so far, as to force young virgins to abjure Christianity, after having stripped and abused them (36); in all which indignities, they were countenanced, if not privately set on work, by Gregory, the Adrian bishop, who was then in high favour at court; so that they went on in them with the utmost boldness and impunity.

(T) This city was the ancient Sephoris, and was situated in Palestina Secunda. The Jews, who were retired thither, and at Tiberias, after the destruction of Jerusalem, had suffered much from the heathens, who had revolted against Adrian; but being at length freed from their insults by that emperor, both places expressed their gratitude to him; the latter, by erecting a temple to him, which they called Adrianon; and the former, by changing its name of Sephoris into that of Diocæsarea Adriana, to distinguish it from three others of that name; one in Phrygia, the second in Cappadocia, and the third in Isauria, whose bishop assisted at the council of Chalcedon (37). St. Jerom places that of Palestine within a mile and a half of Gath; and, though it underwent so severe a fate as being the seat of the Jewish revolt, it was not long before it raised itself out of its ruins, and became again an habitation of the Jews.

(U) It were absurd, considering the character of that emperor, to suppose, that he heaped all these favours on the Jews with any other view than to spite and weaken the Christians, by encouraging and increasing the number of their enemies, that his favourite Paganism might the more easily triumph over them. In other respects, the Jews must have been equally hateful to him with the Christians, since both equally condemned and abhorred the superstitions of the heathen. But what might still render the former more obnoxious to him, was the notion, which, St. Jerom tells us, was then rise among them, that about 430 years after their dispersion, they were in their turn to become lords over the Romans, and sell them to the Sabeans; after which, not only Jerusalem, and all the cities of Judea, but even those of Sodom and Gomorrab, were to be rebuilt. So that, when Julian gave them an invitation to rebuild the temple, they all looked upon it as the forerunner of the completion of that pretended prophecy, or rather interpretation of the words of the Psalmist and other prophets, that the Lord would revenge his people, and rebuild the cities of Judah.

(35) Epist. ad orthodox.
Chalced. iii.

(36) Idem ibid. vide & Sozom. lib. ii. c. 9, & alib.

(37) Act. concil.

a new edifice with; till the Divine Providence was pleased to put an effectual stop to it, by such a series of prodigies as quite deterred them from pursuing it, and made them sensible of the infallibility of Christ's predictions against that place (W). Soon after which, Julian himself, mortally wounded in a surprising manner at the Persian war, was forced, by his dying words, to acknowledge his superior power, as we have already shewn in the Roman history †.

Jovian, who succeeded him, would not have failed to have suppressed the insolence of the Jews, had not death prevented him before he had reigned full eight months: so that they quickly began to breathe again under his two next successors, Valentinian and Valens, who not only gave them full liberty of conscience, but restored their patriarchs to the enjoyment of their privileges. Only the latter deprived them of one of the most valuable ones, by annulling the b edicts which exempted them from publick offices. The tenor of this last decree being somewhat remarkable, we shall give it to our reader in the margin (X). It continued in force against them under the reign of Gratian, Theodosius, and Arcadius. Though, in other respects, they lived peaceably under them: only we hear of one of their synagogues being burnt at Rome, which the rebel Maximus, who was desirous to have them in his interest, ordered to be rebuilt. He was soon after defeated, and beheaded at Aquilia; and St. Ambrose, bishop of Milan, who was highly offended at him, looked upon his unfortunate end as a just judgment for his favouring the Jews <sup>a</sup>; and prevailed upon Theodosius and Valentinian, who came soon after to that city, to revoke all the privileges which he had granted to them. <sup>A. C. 387.</sup> <sup>Valens's edict against them.</sup> <sup>St. Ambrose's untimely zeal against them.</sup>

THAT father was indeed very inveterate against them, as one may see by some of his expressions in his letter to Theodosius; and strenuously opposed the rebuilding another synagogue, which the Christians had set on fire at Calinichus, and which that emperor had ordered to be rebuilt at their charge. But as to what Zonaras, a Greek monk, and some other writers of later date, say of his preaching before him, and taking him to task in an unhandsome manner for suffering the Jews to enjoy the privilege of their synagogues in his capital, whose prayers were so many curses and execrations before God, it is all false and absurd. He did not preach but write to him; and, as his letter is still preserved, it is a more faithful witness than the writings of the Greek monk; and the most that can be said is, that he carried his censures too far against them, in telling that emperor, that they were so far from thinking themselves obliged to observe the Roman laws, that they thought it a crime to submit to them <sup>b</sup>. The contrary to d this appears by all that we have said hitherto of the edicts made for and against them, and much more by the new one, which that prince published in the last year of his life, against the untimely zeal of some Christians, who, under pretence of religion, plundered and demolished their synagogues contrary to the laws, which allowed them liberty of conscience, and for punishing such offenders for the future <sup>c</sup>. He even granted them a particular jurisdiction on account of the frequent law-suits which they had either among themselves, or with Christians (Y); by which they were not only free from the trouble and charge of seeking for justice from strange tribunals, but were likely to obtain it more easily from judges that were maintained by themselves. All which privileges would have hardly been granted to them, if, as St. Ambrose pretends, they had looked upon it as a crime to submit to the laws of the empire.

HOWEVER

† See Ant. Hist. vol. vi. p. 334, & seq.
THEODOS. tom. viii. lib. 16.

<sup>a</sup> AMBR. Epist. xxix.

<sup>b</sup> Ibid. lib. v. c. 29.

<sup>c</sup> Cod.

(W) This wonderful event, which consisted in dreadful earthquakes, balls of fire breaking forth from the places where they were digging up the foundations, and other such prodigious phenomena, is variously related by the ecclesiastical writers (38); and by some adorned with many other circumstances equally miraculous, which however we shall not trouble our readers with, since they all agree in the main thing, that it caused a total suppression of the work, and the fact is acknowledged by unquestionable testimony; such as is that well-known one of Ammianus Marcellinus, a heathen writer, who relates it much after the same manner we have done (†). But more especially, that of two famous Jewish chronologists, the first of whom (39) attributes the cessation of the work to the death of that emperor; and the other, who says, that the temple being actually built at a vast charge, fell down; and that, on the following day, a great fire which fell from heaven melted all the iron work of it, and killed a vast multitude of the Jews (40). Which last testimony is so much the more considerable, as those writers are the least liable to copy the books of the Christians, and much less so to confirm what they write against their own nation.

(X) "The edict by which the Jews flatter themselves of an exemption from publick offices, &c. is by these presents revoked, and disannulled. For the clergy are not permitted to consecrate themselves to the service of God, till they have previously paid that which they owe to their country; and whosoever designs to give himself wholly to God, ought to furnish a proper person to supply his place in all public offices (41)." This plainly shews, that the privileges of the clergy in those days were not quite so large as some are apt to imagine.

(Y) Whether it was Theodosius that obliged them to live out of his capital, and assigned them a quarter in the Stanor, or space between that and the sea, we cannot be sure; but there they built themselves a kind of city, which still subsisted in the time of the Crusade, and was both rich and populous; and is so even to this day. That emperor further ordered, that they should not be

(38) Confer. Socrat. lib. iii. c. 20. Sozom. lib. v. c. 22. Theodore. lib. iii. c. 20 (†) Lib. xxiv. c. 4.
(39) Gantz Tz'mach Dawid. (40) Gedaliab Skalg'sheleth Hakabala. (41) Valens, ad Hyppat.

summoned

S
St. Jerom's stream for hem.
A. C. 390, &
seq.

Assisted by them.

A. C. 401, &
seq.

His credit in the church.

Theodosius suppresses their insolence.

A. C. 408.
A new edict.

HOWEVER that be, St. Jerom was so far from imitating his zeal against them, that he associated himself to some of their most learned rabbies, and, with extraordinary pains and application, learned the Hebrew tongue from them; made use of their assistance in his versions of the Old Testament; and doth not scruple giving those doctors the greatest encomiums, whom he had procured from some of their most celebrated academies, such as Tiberias, Lydda, &c.; among them was the famed Rabbi Barabanius, who, to avoid giving offence to his brethren, was wont to come to him in the night (Z). The credit which that father gained by his learning and useful works caused him to be looked upon as a prodigy. And indeed, if we consider with what difficulty the knowledge of those eastern tongues was acquired, at a time when there were neither grammars, lexicons, concordances, nor any of those helps we have since enjoyed, we shall not need to wonder at the great esteem which he gained in the Church, nor indeed at that high opinion he seems to have of himself on that account; especially considering that he was the first that had attempted it, and the only one at that time who had made any progress in it, whilst most of the bishops and clergy hardly knew more than their own mother tongue; since even the great St. Austin, who was no lover of him, could not forbear looking upon him as a prodigy of learning.

WE are now insensibly got into the fifth century, in which we shall find the Jews grown to such a height of insolence by the long series of peace and liberty allowed them, and particularly under Theodosius II. as to oblige that mild, generous, and equitable prince to suppress it by the punishment of the guilty, but without using any severity to those who behaved peaceably and submissively to the laws. The first just occasion of complaint which they gave, was on one of their festivals, in which they celebrated what they call the feast of Haman (A); and on which, instead of hanging that enemy of theirs on a high gibbet, as had been their constant custom on that solemnity, they presumed on this year to fasten him to a cross, which failed not to be interpreted by the Christians, and not without reason, as an indignity offered to Christ. This did not hinder them from taking both down, and burning them with the usual execrations; which however was attended with no other consequence (except some blows exchanged on both sides) than with an edict, forbidding for the future the erecting and burning such gibbets, under the penalty of forfeiting all their privileges. The Jews obeyed in most parts of the empire; nevertheless those of Macedon, Dacia, and some other parts, still continued affronting the Christians with such kinds of insults; and were as often retaliated by having their synagogues and houses burned, and some of their leaders even put to death by the magistrates. This produced a new edict from that good prince, expressly forbidding the Christians to prosecute them on account of their religion, and these to offer any contemptuous insults to the established Church. This suspended their insolence for two or three years; but, at length, those of Innessar, a city in Chalcis, being heated with the wine and zeal usual at summoned before any judge but the pretor of the Stanor; which privilege they enjoyed till the reign of Emanuel Comnenus (42).

There is another law made by Arcadius, an. 393, which confirms their obedience to the Roman laws; it is to the following effect; that the Jews, who lived according to the Roman and common right, should be obliged to bring their law-suits before the common judges, in all cases that did not regard their superstition, and to such proper courts as are appointed for them. This degree is intitled De foro Judæorum, and concludes with a remarkable clause; viz. that, if the contending parties shall compromise the matter before the patriarch, such compromise shall be valid, and deemed of as full force as a sentence from a judge (43). And as religious affairs are there excepted, they had (besides the pretor of their quarter, mentioned above, who was appointed by the emperor), their own magistrates and officers, chosen from among themselves; who, St. Chrysostom tells us, were chosen in September, and presided over ecclesiastical matters, and religious disputes; and could inflict punishments, or even excommunicate, according to the nature of the offence. It is therefore likely, that St. Ambrose's zeal might transport him too far; soured perhaps by the too great liberty they enjoyed, and the ill use they made of it, they being at all times very apt to grow bold and insolent against the Christians upon the least encouragement, though, in other respects, they might conform to the laws, and pay all due obedience to civil authority.

(Z) The great encomiums which that father took pleasure to bestow on his masters, and more particularly on this, made Rufinus, who thought that the septuagint version ought to be preferred to that of an unknown rabbi, expose them both, by punning upon his name, and calling him Barabbas. I see, said he, on one side, Jesus Christ, and on the other, Barabbas. You may cry as loud as you will for the latter, whilst I do the same for the former. Eusebius made much the same complaint at one time, that they still preferred Barabbas to Christ, because they joined with the Infidels against the Christians, and yet he was glad to make use of their help in compiling his comment on Isaiab (44).

(A) This festival, which was kept in memory of the victory which the Jewish nation got over Haman (45), was usually kept with great alacrity and good cheer; and even, during the reading of the book of Esther in their synagogues or houses, men, women, and children, made a most horrid noise with their feet, hands, and even with stones and mallets against the walls and benches, as often as the name of Haman was repeated. Their devotions were no sooner ended than they gave themselves up to feasting; which they indulged to such a height, that it frequently hurried them into a kind of zealous frenzy, in which they were very liberal of their insults against the Christians, and as often occasioned blows on both sides.

(42) Balsam. in Nem. canon. tit. de fid. c. 11. nag., ubi sup. l. viii. c. 5. §. 22, & seq.

(43) Cod. Theod. lib. xvi. tom. viii. p. 227. Vid Balsam. in Isaiab v.

(45) Vid. Esther. p. 217 & c. ult.

- <sup>a</sup> that feast, took it into their heads to tie a young Christian to one of those gibbets, and to whip him so severely that he lost his life by it; which so exasperated the Christians that they took up arms against them. The Jews being very numerous there, a bloody fight ensued, in which many were killed on both sides. At length, the governor of the province having informed the emperor of it, was ordered to punish the guilty; by which means an effectual end was put to the tumult <sup>d</sup> (B). A. C. 412, Insults to the Christians punished.
- THIS did not prevent the one from frequently renewing of their hostilities, nor the other from burning and plundering their synagogues, particularly at Antioch, where the Jews were very numerous and rich, the plunder being commonly given to the church. These skirmishes became so common and scandalous, that complaints of them were made to the emperor, and <sup>b</sup> backed by the præfectus prætorio; so that the clergy were condemned by a new edict, which obliged them to restore the plunder, and to assign the Jews a place where they might erect a new synagogue. He was however obliged not only to repeal it, at the instigation of the famed saint (and martyr in the air, as he is stiled) Simon, surnamed Stylites (C), who had taken upon him to condemn it, and even to turn the præfect out of his office for having obtained it in favour of the Jews. It was not long however before he was forced to publish a fresh explication of his former edicts, in order to suppress the excesses which the revocation of his late one had encouraged the hot-head zealots to commit against the Jews, not only at Antioch, but in many provinces of the empire; and to forbid the burning of their synagogues, or persecuting them on account of their religion. Christian reprisals against them.
- <sup>c</sup> A STRANGE accident which happened in the isle of Candia, where the Jews were very rich and numerous, occasioned great numbers of them to embrace Christianity, not only there, but in other provinces of the empire; and the shame of having been seduced by a false messiah (D), and having placed such strong and surprising confidence in him, opened their eyes to find out the real and only one in the church. Another event, related by the same ecclesiastical historian<sup>e</sup>, brought a fresh number of proselytes into it, to the no small mortification of the rest, on whom the miraculous cure, performed on an old paralytic, could not make the same salutary impression (E). As we are writing the history of the Jews, and not that of the church, we shall pass over a number of those miraculous conversions with which this century abounded, and only observe, that the Christians having then accustomed themselves to make some considerable presents to those new converts, induced many cheats, not only to become Christians with that view alone, but even to run privately from one sect into another of them, and be baptized in them all, for the sake of gaining fresh tokens of their liberality. A. C. 423, both forbidden. A. C. 425. A. C. 432, converted in Candia, &c.
- <sup>d</sup> Several cheats among them.

<sup>a</sup> Cod. THEODOS. lib. xvi. xviii. & xxi.

<sup>e</sup> See the following note.

(B) The celebrated lawyer Godfroy pretends, that it was on account of the murder of that young Christian that the emperor published those two edicts (46); whereas there is a manifest difference of time, place, and occasion: the first of them being published, an. 408, and extended over the whole eastern empire; and as such was directed to Anthemius, the then præfect over it; and the other not till four years after, and extending only to Eastern Illyricum, Dacia, and Macedon, and was therefore directed to Philip, the then governor of those provinces.

(C) So called from living on the top of a pillar. This fanatic devotee was then in such esteem with all the clergy, that the emperor was obliged, to avoid his and their censure, to recall his orders about making restitution to the Jews. Mr. Valois even pretends that he wrote a civil letter to him, wherein he stiles him, The most holy martyr in the air. But whether those were the words of the emperor, or of Evagrius, who was a great admirer of that airy monk, is hardly worth enquiring; that title carrying, to all appearance, more pleasantry than veneration.

(D) This impostor, who had taken upon him the name and office of their great lawgiver and deliverer, had so far infatuated them, as to make them expect as great a deliverance under him, as they had under the former, viz. of opening to them a miraculous way through the sea into their own land. We are even told, that he himself was so persuaded of it, that he had in one year run thro' every town and village of that island, and persuaded the

Jews in it to follow him (47), and to be ready for him on the day and place appointed by him.

Their delusion proved so strong and universal, that they neglected their lands, houses, and all other concerns, and took only so much with them as they could conveniently carry; and, on the day appointed, the Pseudo Moses, having led them to the top of a rock, men, women, and children, threw themselves headlong down into the sea, without the least hesitation or reluctance; till so great a number of them were drowned, and some others saved by fishermen, as opened the eyes of the rest, and made them sensible of the cheat. They then began to look out for their pretended leader, but found he had disappeared; infomuch that they began to think themselves misled by a devil instead of a man; upon which the far greater part renounced Judaism, and were baptized.

(E) This was an old Constantinopolitan Jew, who had been afflicted with the dead palsy, and had in vain exhausted the physicians art, and, in a great measure, his own substance. He was at length prepossessed with the hopes that baptism would obtain him a cure; and, having received it of Atticus, the then patriarch of that metropolis, recovered the use of his limbs immediately upon his having received that sacrament. This miraculous cure made so great an impression upon the Jews and heathens, that great numbers became converts, though the far greater part of the former still continued in their unbelief (48).

(46) In Cod. Theodos. lib. xvi. xviii. an. 408, & xxi. an. 412. Vid. & Socr. lib. vii. Hist. Ecclesiast. lib. vii. c. 38.

(48) Id. ibid. lib. iv p. 341, c. 17. p. 354.

(47) Socrat.

A REMARKABLE instance of this our author gives us of a Jew, who went through all the sects then at Constantinople, but was at length discovered in a miraculous manner by the Novatian bishop there, and owned, that he had been baptized by every one but that<sup>f</sup>. These cheats could not but render the Jews obnoxious to the Christians; but there was still another thing that made them more so, viz. the several arch-heretics, such as the Novatians, Nestorians, &c. who, by borrowing some of the Jewish tenets, were stiled Judaizers and Jews. But it is time to see how they behaved and fared in other countries.

Jews raise a tumult at Alexandria.

A. C. 415.

Bishop Cyril arms against them.

Those of Alexandria, who are computed to have amounted to about 100,000 at the time that they raised a bloody uproar against the Christians, had had many skirmishes against them before, which seldom ended without bloodshed (F). Cyril, then bishop of it, and since fainter, was thought as much too zealous against them, as Orestes, the then prefect, was partial to them; and at length carried it so far as to infringe upon his office, and to threaten them with ecclesiastical execution. This however they despised, knowing the governor to be on their side; and grew to such an height of insolence, as to resolve to fall foul upon them in the middle of the night. To this end, they hired some of their own people to run about the streets of the city, crying out, that the great church was all in flames; which immediately brought all the Christians out unarmed, to go and save that noble building; whilst the Jews, who had taken care to distinguish themselves by some peculiar mark, fell upon, and killed great numbers of them. Cyril, as soon as he was apprised of it, staid not to be righted by the civil power, but, putting himself at the head of a sufficient number of Christians, entered their synagogues, and seized on them to the use of the church. He then abandoned their houses to be plundered, and obliged them to march out of the city almost naked. This failed not to exasperate the prefect, who could not brook such an infringement on his authority, and the city to be stripped of so vast a number of its inhabitants, without making the severest complaints against the bishop, who, on his part, sent several bitter accusations to court against him. Here the people, having declared for the prefect against the patriarch, would have obliged the latter to submit to the former, but he absolutely refused to do it.

Odd behaviour to the prefect.

Affaults & wounds him.

Hypatia murdered at a tumult.

INSTEAD of that, he went to him with the Gospel in his hand, and threatening in his words and looks, tried to frighten him into a reconciliation. But, finding him inflexible, he ordered a regiment of his monks, to the number of fifteen hundred, to come down from the mountains, and to assault him in his chariot with volleys of stones, which wounded him in the head, and covered him with blood; so that he must have been killed inevitably (his guards having been forced to abandon him) had not the people come to his assistance, and rescued him out of their hands. The tumult being appeased, Orestes caused one of the ringleaders of those monks, named Ammonius, to be executed, and sent an account of the whole affair to court. The patriarch did the same; and not only justified the proceedings of his monks, but, in his next sermon, declared Ammonius a martyr. This behaviour produced a new tumult soon after; in which, among many others that lost their lives, was the deservedly celebrated Hypatia, a young heathen lady, of great sense, learning, and virtue, who was hurried by the bishop's mob before one of their churches, and there cruelly butchered. The untimely zeal and presumption of the Alexandrian patriarch, which is so visible in all these transactions, hath been justly blamed by all impartial persons; even Socrates himself observes<sup>g</sup>, that the death of the amiable Hypatia reflected no small dishonour on him and his clergy. And it is plain, that the Alexandrians were highly offended at his proceedings, since they all along sided with the prefect against him. Though it must be owned that he betrayed such a spirit of opposition against him, and such a partiality for the Jews, as was inconsistent with the character of a Christian prefect, as his was with that of a Christian bishop.

<sup>f</sup> Cod. THEODOS. l. xxi. c. v. p. 342.

<sup>g</sup> SOCRATES, ubi sup. lib. vii. c. 13, & seq.

(F) The Jews, it seems, were by this time grown not only so bold, but dissolute, that, instead of assisting at the duties of their synagogues on the sabbath, they chose rather to be present at the public diversions and shews, which were commonly exhibited on that day; which seldom failed of producing those bloody skirmishes we mentioned above, and which the magistrates were seldom able to suppress. This put the prefect upon making some wholesome regulations against those disorders. But, whilst he was one day at one of them, and was giving some orders for the more peaceably exhibiting those shews, he found himself surrounded with a croud of the patriarch's creatures, who are supposed to have been sent for no other end, but to exasperate him against the Jews; one in particular, named Hierax, an admirer and great favourite of Cyril, behaved on that occasion in such a manner against them, that they loudly complained of him to the prefect; who thereupon, without any other ceremony, ordered him to be publicly whipt upon the stage. This was a sensible affront to the patriarch, who failed not to resent it as such: so that, instead of uniting their authority in promoting the public tranquility of the city, they only strove to thwart each other's measures to the manifest disturbance of it (49).

(49) Socrat. Hist. Ecclesiast. lib. vii. ch. 13, & seq.

a THE Jewish nation received a more universal blow in this century, in the total suppression of their patriarchs. We have formerly shewn, that they lived upon certain levies, which they made on those of their nation, and which used to be collected by their officers, or, as they affected to call them, apostles. These became at length to grow so exorbitant, that the people, weary of them, applied to the civil power, from which however they received no other redress than the mortification of seeing that tribute converted to the emperor's use, and their patriarch deprived of it. Theodosius and Valentinian were the two monarchs who appropriated that income to their own treasury, by which means the patriarchal dignity was more effectually suppressed, than any edict could have done it; and, for want of a proper income to support it, was forced to dwindle away. Photius pretends, that the primates which succeeded the patriarchs were charged with it, and answerable for it, and obliged to see it conveyed into the emperor's coffers (G).

LET us now pass over to those of the west, where we shall find them enjoying indeed the full exercise of their religion, under Honorius, who had enacted a law, much to his honour, importing, that the glory of a prince consists in allowing all his subjects the full and peaceable enjoyment of all their privileges, even when their religion is not such as he can approve<sup>h</sup>. Pursuant to which, he expressly forbade the pulling down, or appropriation of their synagogues, or even to oblige them to violate their Sabbath, on account of the public service, for which, he said, the other six days are sufficient. On the other hand, to prevent their abusing their liberty, he forbade them to build new synagogues, and making proselytes, and stripped them of some posts and offices which they had enjoyed before (H); particularly that of furnishing the army with provisions. He caused also a severe edict to be published against an upstart sect in Africa, called Cælicolæ, or worshippers of Heaven; at the end of which is a clause forbidding the Jews to make proselytes; upon which account the Cælicolæ have been thought by many to have been a Jewish sect, tho' without any foundation, as the reader may see by what we have subjoined in the margin (I).

In this century happened likewise the much celebrated, tho' no less questioned, miraculous conversion of the Minorcan Jews. That island had then two considerable towns, the one the episcopal residence, and interdicted to the Jews, who were commonly punished with some sudden and miraculous death, if they ventured to set foot in it. The other, called Porto Mahone, was chiefly inhabited by Jews, who there enjoyed very considerable titles and posts, tho' subject to Honorius; inasmuch that Theodosius, the chief of their synagogue, and a doctor of the law, was the chief man in the whole island. Severus being become bishop of it, was easily persuaded by Orosius (lately returned from Jerusalem, loaded with miraculous relics, which he was carrying into Spain), to undertake the conversion of the Jews. They began with private conferences, and proceeded to public ones; the last of which was held in their synagogue, where finding that some Jewish women had armed themselves with stones to pelt them, they provided for their own defence. The consequence was, that the synagogue was pulled down, and nothing saved out of it but the books and plate: but the bishop plied them with such numbers of miracles, that their greatest men began to relent, and in about eight days time, the greater part of them were converted, and the synagogue turned into a church. Many, however, who remained obdurate, went and hid themselves in caverns, till hunger forced them out; and others, leaving all they had behind them, went and sought an asylum in foreign

<sup>h</sup> Cod. THEODOS. tom. xvi. lib. xx.

(G) Some will have it, indeed, that Theodosius did expressly abolish it; and others think, that the people, weary of paying it, and maintaining so high an office at so vast an expence, let it drop of their own accord. The last however is not quite so credible, seeing that high dignity, expensive as it was, did not a little contribute to the ease and credit of the Jewish nation, as it kept up, as it were, a center of unity among them through the whole Roman empire.

(H) These chiefly related to the militia and agency. These agents had a threefold employment; viz. 1st. levying of imposts in the provinces; 2dly, the providing and transporting of corn and other provisions for the use of the army; and 3dly, the serving as couriers and spies in all the provinces of the empire, and to send a faithful account of all that passed. And on this last account they had the care of the public carriages (50).

(I) The famed lawyer Godfredius, had long ago distinguished between that part of the edict which related to the Cælicolæ, and that which related to the Jews, notwithstanding they have been absurdly confounded, and the former supposed to have taken that specious name, to conceal that of Jews, which was more odious (1): some have taken it to have meant the Samaritans, who had a temple at Naplouse, opened on the top like an amphitheatre; others the Essenians, a very strict and contemplative sect among the Jews, spoken of in a former volume †, and long since abolished: both which suppositions are absurd, seeing those two sects were of very old date, and sufficiently known, and could not therefore be called, as in the edict above-mentioned, a new and upstart sect. And the clause which obliges them to return into the bosom of the church, plainly shews that they must have been a sect of Christians, or, as is commonly believed, a spawn of the Donatists, whose tenets tallied with theirs (2).

(50) De his vid. Salmas. in Spartian. p. 21, & seq.

(†) Ant. Hist. vol. iv. p. 169. & seq.

(1) Juvenal satyr xiv. vers. 97. Petron. in Catulect.

(2) Vid. int. al. Petit var. lect. lib. ii. c. 12. Cumeus Rep. Hebr. l. i. c. 6. Busman Helmsiad. hist. Cælicol. Basnag. lib. viii. ch. 7. § 4, & seq.

countries; all which shews that there was some violence used against them by the bishop and his clergy; and Baronius seems to own as much, and adds, that his example would have been followed in many other places, had not the crowned heads put a stop to it.

under the Vandals.

UPON the irruption of the Vandals into the empire, one would have thought that the Jews would have met with the worst of treatment from that fierce nation; but yet we do not read that they fared worse than the rest, or were deprived of any of their privileges under them. They only shared in the common misfortunes, which are the usual concomitants of such great revolutions; but, in other respects, were still allowed the free exercise both of religion and commerce, only they were obliged to pay a tribute for it, and were moreover denied the enjoyment of titular dignities and high posts, either civil or military<sup>1</sup>; which is no more than what they were under the Roman emperors. Theodoric in particular protected them against the zealots among the Christians, and would not suffer any violent means to be used for converting them; and sharply reprov'd the senate, for having suffered one of their synagogues to be burnt at Rome; and the clergy at Milan, for going to seize upon another. The same he did at Genoa, where the citizens were going to deprive them of their privileges, which they had a long time enjoyed among them. They had recourse to that prince, who permitted them to rebuild their synagogues, and restored them to the free use of their religion and rights, upon condition they should not build them larger than they had been, and avoided adorning of them. Thus ended the 5th century with them in the Roman empire*.

A. C. 500.

Jews in Persia
under R. Asce.

LET us now take a view of those in Persia, during that interval, where we find their academies in a flourishing condition, under their famed chief R. Asce, the compiler of the Babylonish thalmud, lately mentioned. Sora was the place of his birth, and the most celebrated academy of all the east, of which he was chosen chief in the 14th year of his age, and continued in that dignity sixty years, that is, till the year 427, in which he died (K). It was during that time that he published a collection of his decisions, which he divided into four parts; the first of which contained the rules and maxims of the Mishnah, with the doubts and solutions relating to them. The second was chiefly about various questions of their doctors, with the sentiments of the Tbanaim and Gemarrists. The third contained the decisions and maxims published since Judah the saint; and the last contained the texts of scripture relating to law-suits, together with the comments of their learned upon them. This was the first division of the Babylonish thalmud; but as Asce did not live to complete it, his disciples, who put the finishing hand to it afterwards, altered his method, and made several additions, which have rendered the work rather more obscure<sup>k</sup>.

R. Thobiomi.

A. C. 455.

HE was succeeded, according to some, by R. Marimor, or Amimor; but soon after, according to others, by his own son Huna, whose feet hastened to the chair, and he by his son Thobiomi, an. 455, who reigned, according to the pompous Jewish stile, thirteen years, and in whose reign the Jewish nation enjoyed such profound tranquility, that they gave him the title of The doctor of daily prosperity. We have had occasion to take notice of the small extent of their power and income, notwithstanding their using the words reign, throne, &c. as if they had been in full possession of the regal authority. And so obscure were they, during this 5th century, that tho' we find a succession of the presidents of Sora and Pundebita, or at least their names, and here and there a remarkable action of some of them, yet we have hardly any thing said of those chiefs or princes, except of R. Asce above-mentioned; tho' one would have imagined their dignity to have received some additional splendor by the suppression of the patriarchate in the west.

<sup>1</sup> Vid. Altercat. Eccles. & Synagog. ap. AUGUST. in Append. ad tom. viii. * De hoc vid. TESOR del Regn. d'Ital. sub THEODORIC. <sup>k</sup> Vid. GANTZ TZEMACH DAVID, sub A. M. 4113. SEPHER JUCHASIN, p. 124. A. BENDDIOR Cabbala, p. 68. BARToloc. tom. i. p. 486. WOLF Bibl. Hebr. p. 224.

(K) The Jews tell us, that it was on account of his extraordinary merit and learning that he was raised so early to that dignity; and add, that in him met the law, devotion, humility, and magnificence; four things which no man but he was ever master of.

His method of teaching was entirely new and peculiar: for instead of keeping his disciples, which amounted to two thousand four hundred, continually with him, he only taught them two months in the year; viz. in February and August; during which he gave them proper subjects to study and exercise themselves in, during the other five months; after which they were sent to their own homes. At their return they were examined by,

and held disputations before him, and he explained their difficulties and doubts, by the decisions of those doctors which had preceded him. Whilst these exercises were performing, twelve persons sat over against him, seven of which were stiled the princes of the crowns, whose chief business was to recapitulate and explain what he had said to them, and to give proper encomiums, rewards, &c. to those that had deserved them. The president was obliged to collect all the matters that had been debated and decided; and it was from this collection that the Babylonish thalmud was compiled; and when the month was near expired, he dictated to them the subjects which they were to study during the next five months (3).

(3) Sepher Juchasin, p. 124. Vid. Gantz Tzemach David, sub A. M. 4113. c. 353. R. Abr. Benddior in lib. Cabbal. 9. 68. Bartoloc. ubi sup. tom. i. p. 486. Wolf Bib. Hebr. sub רבנן, in thalmudo.

a ASCE had left, besides his son Huna above-mentioned, two famed disciples, viz. Animbr A violent per- and Mor, who were to have put the finishing hand to the Babylonish thalmud; but they were secution.
diverted from it by a violent persecution, which was raised against the Jewish nation, which, they tell us, lasted 73 years; during which the synagogues were shut up, the observation of the Sabbath suppressed, and their schools and chapels given to the Magi. Huna, the then chief, and his two disciples above-named, were imprisoned, and soon after suffered death, with surprising constancy: but the Jewish youth, more addicted to the pleasures of life, were A. C. 474.
soon determined to forsake their religion, which was followed by a general defection in Israel towards the end of this century<sup>1</sup>. Notwithstanding which, some of their learned resumed the work of the thalmud soon after; or, if you will believe the Jewish writers, even before the b persecution ceased, (which it did not but with the Persian monarchy, which the Saracens made themselves masters of) and finished it, according to them, about the close of this century, or the beginning of the next, after which it was dispersed throughout all the east, and it was universally agreed, that nothing should be added to or taken from it (L).

THE only thing more, worth taking notice of, under this epocha, was the rise of the sect The sect of called Sebureans, or Scepticks, at the head of which was R. Josi. These doctors pretended to Sebureans, doubt of every thing, and seem to have started up to oppose the infallibility which the thalmu- A. C. 476.
dists attributed to their thalmud; but whether by openly questioning its authority, or the sense of its decisions, we cannot affirm. However, their pyrrhonism became so odious to the rest of the Jews, that it proved but of short duration, it having begun to appear only about the c close of this 5th century, and being driven out of the world before the middle of the next, by the Gaonim, or Gaons, a new set of doctors, who took that pompous title upon them, which succeeded by signifies sublime or excellent, and became the idols of the academies and of the people, as we the Gaons.
shall see under the next century, unto which it is now time to hasten (M).

THE 6th century began with a persecution of the Jews of the dispersion, as well as of the Jews persecut- ten tribes in the east, under Cavadas, a prince of a fierce and proud disposition, who wanted to ed in Persia, force all his subjects, Christians as well as Jews and others, to embrace the Persian religion. under Ca-
A strange cause of this persecution is, by some authors, assigned, which the reader may see in vades.
the margin (N), and which proved so violent, that we read of no less than four of their princes
of

<sup>1</sup> R. GANTZ TZEMACH, p. 121.

(L) We have formerly taken notice of the impossibility of reconciling the anachronisms and contradictions of the Jewish chronologers; and in the part we are now upon, the author, tho' one of the best of them, not only contradicts other historians, but himself also. For if rabbi Asce, the first compiler of the work, died, as he affirms, A. C. 427, and his son Huna was chosen president of the academy of Sora, an. 455, and reigned 13 years, during which the Jews lived in great tranquility, and highly favoured by the king, till the time of the persecution above-mentioned, and if that could not begin till the year 474, lasted 73 years, and the thalmud was not finished till some time after that had ceased; then it is plain it could not be so till the year 547, even by his own account; and yet he affirms that work to have been completed by the close of the 5th century (4).

It would still be more difficult to reconcile him to other historians, even to those of his nation. The latter all agree that the persecution which was raised by Isdegerd, the last king of Persia, lasted seventy-three years, that is, till the Saracens put an end to it by the conquest of that monarchy; they must therefore be mistaken, either in the time of Asce's death, or else in the time of the completing the thalmud, and have antedated this last by near 50 years. But these are small oversights among them, and such as every one must overlook, that is conversant with their historians.

(M) Some critics (5) have looked upon the Nephthalites, by whom, Agathias tells us (6), Perozes was defeated in the war which he waged against them, to have been the descendants of the tribe of Naphthali, carried away captive by Tiglath Pileser (7), to the frontiers of Persia, where they are affirmed to have been settled many ages before the war (8). But as Procopius, in the place above quoted, calls them Ephalites, and says nothing of their being descended from that tribe, but from that of the White Huns, who lived on the frontiers of Persia, near the river Oxus, and Agathias himself, who hath miscalled them Naphthalites, acknowledges them to be of that, and not of Jewish extract, we shall say no more of them. As for the farther account of that war, and of Perozes's treachery and punishment, the reader may see an account in a former volume.

(N) We are told by two Christian writers (9), that Cavadas, having besieged a castle, in which was a vast treasure deposited, and kept by demons, he had found all his military efforts against it abortive; and being very eager to make himself master of it, sent for his magi, for the Manichees, Jews, and Christians, to drive away those demons, and that those last were the only ones that could do it; upon which he stript the former of their privileges, and gave them to the Christians. But this account is contradicted by other historians, who affirm that he persecuted the Christians as well as the Jews.

The Jews tell us of a fatal quarrel which happened between the prince of the captivity and the chief of the academy, under the reign of Cavadas, in which the former used the latter with so much insolence and barbarity, that his tears and prayers brought such a pestilence upon the prince's family, that they all died of it, except a child then in his mother's womb. Ghanina (that was the academic chief) being reproved in a dream, for having destroyed the princely race, began to repent of it; and upon consulting with some of the other Jewish doctors, whether there might not be some sprout left of that family, was told that the prince's daughter was pregnant, and not far from her time; upon which he went immediately to her house, and never left her day nor night, hail or shine, hot or cold, till she was delivered; and then took upon him to bring up the child, which proved a son, and was called Zcutra. In the mean time, the princely dignity being vacant, Paphra, who was allied

(4) Gantz Tzemach, ub. sup.

(7) 2 Kings, xv. 29. xvi. p. 11.

Israel. Esporanza de Israel, c. 25

Mod. Hist. Vol. V.

(5) Vid. Skicard Taaric, p. 130. & aut. ab eo citat.

(8) Vid. Procop. bell. Pers. l. i. c. 4, & seq.

(9) Theodor. lect. l. ii. p. 564. Cedren. annal. p. 297.

(6) Lib. iv.

Minaj. Ben

of the captivity, who succeeded each other within the space of nine years; but whether they were deposed or put to death by that monarch, doth not appear. These were Huna, to whom they give but two years reign; Acha, who reigned three; Tettana, who reigned four; and Zeutra, who having been miraculously preserved, as we observed in the last note, reigned twenty years. In his time arose the famed Meir, a learned rabbi, and great miracle-monger, who having declared war against the Persian king, with only 400 men, was very successful against him, during seven years; after which his men having polluted themselves with strange flesh (O), he was defeated, taken and put to death by the Persians. These went thence into the city, where Zeutra resided, and plundered it, after which they took that prince, and the president of the council, and hanged them on a bridge. His family were forced to betake themselves to flight, and his son and heir, Zeutra II. retired into Judea, where he became prince of the senate or sanhedrin. This, the Jewish historians tell us, was the source of that series of misfortunes which attended them in Persia; insomuch that their great master Habonai never dared shew his face, during the space of thirty years, that is, during the whole time of Cavadas's reign<sup>m</sup>.

The chief of the captivity hanged,
A. C. 522.

Jews persecuted under Chof-roes;

A. C. 529.

THEY fared still worse under his successor Chosroes the great; whose favour they had endeavoured to gain, by persuading him to break off his negotiation about a peace with the emperor Justinian, which was then in great forwardness; by promising to him, that if he would go on with the war, they would furnish him with fifty thousand men, by whose help he might make himself master of Jerusalem, one of the richest cities in the world. The king had so far given into that treacherous project, that he had broke off all the negotiations with the emperor, and made several preparations towards putting it in execution, when word was brought to him, that those persons who had been employed in it had been seized and put to death, after having made a full discovery of the design. He pursued his war however, and with success his frequent inroads into Syria and Palestine†: but that did not hinder him from making the Jews share in the common calamities of the war with the rest; nor from shutting up all their academies in the east, which quite extinguished their love of learning, whilst their present prince, being forced to go into Judea, and to exercise a function vastly beneath him, the eastern Jews were quite destitute of chiefs<sup>n</sup>.

restored by Hormisdas,
A. C. 589.

THEY did, however, recover their liberty before the year was at an end, under Hormisdas III. (and the academy of Pundebita was again opened under the famed R. Chanan Mehischa, who became chief both of that and of the new set of doctors called Gaons, or excellent), and enjoyed it during the twelve years of his reign; when that prince was murdered by his son Chosroes II. as we have seen elsewhere*. This last did not, however, quietly enjoy the fruits of his parricide; his son Varamus declared himself against him, as he had before done against his father, and soon after defeated, drove him out of Persia, and obliged him to seek for succours from the emperor Mauricius, who lent him some forces and generals. These had many a bloody contest with Varamus, who had got a strong party in the kingdom, and the Jews likewise in his interest. These last, whom the Greek historian styles<sup>o</sup>, a faithless, unquiet, impetuous, turbulent, and implacable nation, being then powerful enough in Persia to stir up the subjects against their princes, and virulent enough to strengthen the rebels against them. At length Chosroes having the upper hand over Varamus, made them pay dear for their perfidy. Those of Antioch were the first that felt the dire effects of his resentment, when that city (P) was taken by Mebodes the Roman general, who immediately put vast numbers of them to the sword, and many more to the most cruel deaths, reducing the rest to the most deplorable slavery<sup>p</sup>.

Persecuted by Chosroes II.
A. C. 615.

Butchered at Antioch.

Reconciled to Chosroes.

CHOSROES, however, was no sooner seated on the Persian throne, but he was reconciled to them, and received some signal services from them; especially in the war which he waged against Phocas, the murderer of Mauricius, wherein he made a most dreadful havock of them both in Syria and Palestine, and took the city of Jerusalem‡. They seem even to have acted to that house, bought it of the king, and enjoyed it, till Zeutra, the right heir, was fifteen years old, at which time he obtained it of that monarch, and Papbra was not only stripped of it, but punished with sudden death, for having obtained that dignity by money.

<sup>m</sup> Seder Olam Zuta cum. not. Meieri, vid. & IMBON. Bibliot. Rabin. tom. v. p. 46. BASNAG. ub. sup. l. viii. c. 9. † See Ant. Hist. vol. iv. p. 357. <sup>n</sup> THEOPHAN. Chronogr. p. 152. * See Ant. Hist. vol. iv. p. 361, & seq. <sup>o</sup> THEOPHIL. SIMOCAT. in Maur. lib. v. c. 7. Vid. BASNAG. ub. sup. § 7. <sup>p</sup> Idem, ibid. ‡ See Ant. Hist. vol. iv. p. 366, & seq.

(O) The Jews do not tell us the occasion of this war; nor is it easy to guess whether it gave rise to the persecution we are now speaking of, or whether it was undertaken to suppress it. And as they are persons that prefer dealing in miracles and prodigies, rather than in exact or regular history, they tell us that this Meir had obtained the same miraculous fiery pillar that had formerly guided the Israelites in the wilderness, gained frequent victories over the Persians, and raised vast contributions, till his men suffered themselves to be debauched by the Persian women to commit several sins against their law, after which they came to the untimely end we have mentioned above.

(P) Not the metropolis of Syria, but a new city of that name; and so exactly built after its model, by Chosroes I. that the inhabitants brought away from the old one could hardly believe but it was the same.

in

a in concert with him, seeing he was no sooner master of that metropolis, than he delivered up all the Christian prisoners into their hands, tho' he could not but know that they only bought them with a design of satiating their implacable hatred against them, as they accordingly did, <sup>90,000 Christians butchered by them.</sup> infomuch, that no leis than ninety thousand of them were unmercifully butchered by them<sup>a</sup>.

THIS is farther confirmed by what Elmakin, and other Arabian authors, add of the Jews <sup>Attempt on the city of Tyre frustrated.</sup> attempt upon Tyre, at the time when Chosroes was besieging Constantinople, and all the forces of Syria and Judea were drawn out to succour that capital. They, taking the advantage of that juncture, had combined to murder all the Tyrians, on Easter-day, and to seize upon that important place, and were actually come to the walls of it, but were stoutly repulsed by the inhabitants, who had timely notice of their design. Upon this disappointment, the Jews b dispersed themselves about the country, fell foul on the churches of the Christians, and burnt a vast number of them; but were at length cut off by the Tyrians, who sallied out against, and made a terrible slaughter of them<sup>c</sup>. This shews that they were doing the Persian king's work, if they were not really hired by him to it. We have seen his sad catastrophe in a former chapter<sup>d</sup>.

WE are now come to the 7th century, the beginning of which was signalized not only by the transactions above-named, but much more by the appearance of Mohammed on the stage of the world. We have given the life and actions of that grand impostor in a preceding volume*, <sup>Jews under Mohammed in the 7th century.</sup> and shall only examine here, what share the Jews are said to have had in it; who, Theophanes tells us, seeing him appear in so splendid a manner, began to look upon him as the Messiah; infomuch, that many of them exchanged their religion for his; tho' they were soon after much c offended at his eating of camels flesh, which is forbid by the Mosaic law<sup>e</sup> (Q). However, the fear of appearing inconstant, or rather their hopes of receiving some considerable advantages from him, and of having it more in their power to injure the Christians, made them over-look that nicety, and continue in his interest, as we observed in the last note. What assistance they gave him in the forming of his new religion, we have already shewn in the volume above quoted: and shall only observe here, that it appears from his Koran, that he had read their books, and was not unversed in their religion and customs; and as they were then very numerous and powerful in several parts of Arabia (R), and had there many castles and fortresses, and maintained armies under their princes, when he began to lay the foundation d of his new religion, it is more than probable that he took all proper means to engage them in his interest, whilst they, always intent on their worldly advantage, were as easily induced by his caresses and promises to assist him in all his views. But whatever cause they might afterwards give him to dislike them, it is plain, from the tenor of his writings, that he hated and despised them; he calls them betrayers and murderers of the prophets, and a people justly cursed of God, for their violation of his sabbaths and laws, and for their obstinate unbelief both of the ancient prophets, and of himself; for which he hath cursed them in many places of his Koran, and did at length declare open war against them. <sup>Turn to and assist him.</sup> <sup>Hatred by him.</sup>

THIS war was at first began by one of the principal Jews, named Cajab, who opposed all his measures, for which reason Mohammed had given orders to some of his men to lay wait for, and kill him; upon which he appeared at the head of his nation. Mohammed began with <sup>Makes war against them.</sup>

<sup>a</sup> THEOPHAN. ub. sup. p. 252. <sup>e</sup> ELMAK. p. 271. PATRICEDES, p. 236. HOTTING. Hist. Orient. lib. i. c. 3. <sup>c</sup> See Ant. Hist. vol. iv. p. 369, & seq. * Vol. i. pass. p. 14, & seq. <sup>d</sup> Vid. Levitic. xi. 4. Deut. xiv. 7.

(Q) It seems somewhat surprising, that they, who scrupled not to abandon their old law for this new one, should be so squeamish at Mohammed's transgressing in so inconsiderable a point; tho' it is no strange thing to meet such contrasts in mankind, especially among the Jews. But, as the same author tells us, that they dared not renounce this new religion, it is likely that their conversion to it was rather political than real; for in sticking still close to him, they not only sided with the strongest and most prosperous, but had thereby an opportunity to foment and exasperate that impostor against the Christians, and bring fresh persecutions against them: accordingly our author adds, that they kept close to him till he was murdered (10).

This last expression hath indeed shocked most readers; since it is well known that Mohammed did not die a violent death. Some have therefore suspected it to be some error crept into the text of the historian; and if so, it must be of old date, since Cedrenus hath said the very same thing after him. But whatever the mistake is, most people think it to be meant of his flight, and not of his death. For it is not improbable, that they who had promised themselves such great advantages under him, might, when they saw him so reduced by the opposite faction, as to be forced to fly, be induced to abandon him. And accordingly, the Arabian authors boast that they did, on his first appearing, send him twelve of their doctors, to assist him in the compiling his Alcoran (11); which, if true, doth plainly shew that they were far enough from believing him to be the Messiah, whatever they might outwardly pretend, and whatever helps they might afford him in the carrying on his design.

(R) Particularly in that which was known by the name of Hegiasa; which word signifies separation, because it was situated between Arabia Deserta and Arabia Felix, without belonging to either. The Greek geographers, who have joined it to the latter, had neither rightly considered its situation nor barrenness; and it is to that canton the city of Mecca belongs.

(10) Theophyl. sub An. Ch. 622.

(11) Vid. Imbonat. Bibl. Rab. ub. sup.

besieging them in the fortresses they held in Hegiasa; and having obliged them to surrender at a discretion, banished them, and gave their wealth to his Moslems. After this Cajab attacked him near Kaibar, a place about four days journey from Medina, in the third year after the Hejra, and was totally routed by him, and with great difficulty saved his life by flight, whilst his troops were unmercifully butchered by the Moslems. This did not hinder them from trying their fortune more than once against him; but they still met with the same ill success: so that they were forced at length to submit to his superior force, and to become tributary to him, in order to enjoy what they had. This yoke, however, proved so grating to the Jewish nation, that one of their women resolved to rid them of it, by poisoning him with a joint of mutton; but the prophet smelt the poison out, and escaped the snare. Many other hostilities the Arabian authors mention, between the Jews and Moslems<sup>u</sup>, not worth mentioning; and the former, being convinced to their cost of the great success of that false prophet, as well as of the severity of his yoke, they have applied to him the vision of Daniel's statue<sup>w</sup>, whose feet were partly iron, and partly clay; whence they inferred that the Messiah was not to appear till after the foundation of that empire, since he is there prefigured by the stone cut out without hands, which was to destroy and put an end to it<sup>x</sup>. All which shews that there could be no such combination between the Jews and Mohammed and his disciples, as they have been charged with. Let us now see how they fared under his successors, during the rest of this 7th century.

Jews under the Khalifs,

enjoy their old freedom of religion, &c.

AFTER the conquest of Persia by Omar II. Khalif after Mohammed, the Jews under that monarchy not only became subject to the Saracens, but very often changed their masters, both by the swift succession of those monarchs, and the rapidity of their conquests in the east, and yet we do not find that their condition was at all altered for the worse, except that they shared in the common misfortunes which those conquerors brought into every province they subdued. We even find them making great rejoicings upon Omar's having overthrown Isdegeret, and seized upon his dominions (S), as well as at every success which either he or his successors had against the Christians; especially as they found these new conquerors more mild and friendly towards their nation, so that they soon began to enjoy the full liberty not only of their religion, but of opening their academies, and restoring them to their flourishing condition. They mention indeed some sharp disputes which they had with the Khalif Ali, about the many factions into which his sect, tho' of so short standing, was already divided, which that Khalif retorted, by reminding them of their several idolatries, immediately after their miraculous passing of the Red Sea. However, this did not hinder that prince from protecting them, as they had taken care to secure his favour by the homage they paid to him (T). We are indeed told that the Jews, who pretended then to deal in astrology and magic, had promised Yezid, the son of Hasan, then on the throne, and a wicked prince, a forty years reign, if he would destroy all the images within his dominions; but that his accepting the condition raised such a powerful party of saints in heaven, that they obtained a sentence of death against him. Upon which his son was going to revenge the cheat, and his father's death, upon them, but that they retired betimes into the Roman territories, and so escaped his resentment<sup>y</sup>. But there is a manifest anachronism in that story, to say nothing worse of it, since Yezid died A. C. 683; whereas, according to the author last-named, the edict against images did not come out till three years after, that is, an. 686. Besides, it is so far from probable that the Jewish nation suffered under Yezid, or any of his immediate successors, that, on the contrary, they lived in such liberty and quiet under them, that their prince, or chief of the captivity, enjoyed as

<sup>u</sup> Set VATTIER. Hist. Mahometan. lib. i. p. 6, & seq. De Generat. Machumet Lat. edit. ab HERMAN DALMATA. Suffrata. 49. p. 265. HOTTING. Hist. Orient. lib. ii. c. 2. <sup>w</sup> Daniel ii. 31, & seq. <sup>x</sup> Ibid. vers. 34. <sup>y</sup> BARTOLOC. ub. sup. tom. iv. p. 464. MAIMBOURG. Hist. Iconoclast. lib. i.

(S) And well they might, if that prince, the last of the Persian kings, had, as they pretend (12), either began or carried on such a bloody persecution against them, and had caused all their academies to be shut up, as we have lately hinted. But this was not the only occasion of their joy; the vast success of those princes, great enemies of the Christians, and the demolishing of their churches, could not but flatter their hopes of seeing them in time reduced. They have been moreover accused of having instigated the Moslems against them (13), by which they so far ingratiated themselves to those new conquerors, as to recover all the privileges they had lost under the Persians.

(T) They tell us that R. Isaac, one of their most famed Gaons, who went to pay his homage to him on his defeat of the Persian king, was not only well received, but raised by him to some high dignity (14), and that the Khalif bestowed one of the princesses of Persia, his captive, on Bustenar, the then chief of the captivity. But there seems to be a gross mistake in this; viz. that that it was Omar, and not his successor Ali, that defeated the Persian; unless we will suppose that our author hath named the one for the other; for Omar was no less a favourer of the Jews than Ali, even by their own account, tho' he afterwards obliged those that remained in Arabia to pay him a tribute (15), and upon their refusal expelled them out of it.

(12) Vid. Solomon Ben. Virg. p. 5.

(13) Paul Diacon. Hist. lib. xxii. p. 312. Beda in Luc. 23.

(14) Gantz Tzetzmach, p. 123.

(15) Vattier Hist. Mahom. lib. i.

great

a great an authority as if he had been their real king (U): and the same may be said of those that dwelt in Egypt and Syria<sup>a</sup>, which was then under the Ommiades, whose family was no less friendly to the Jewish nation.

But it is now time to turn our eyes to those in the west, under the Roman emperors, at Constantinople, Africa, Italy, Spain, France, &c. during the 6th and 7th centuries, which we chuse to join together, to avoid breaking off the thread of their history. The first cause of complaint which the emperor Justinian, who affected to judge of most affairs relating to religion, gave them, was his edict which forbade them to celebrate their passover according to their own calculation, and enjoined them to keep it at the same time with the Christians<sup>a</sup>. This was no more than we are told he did to the latter, whom he obliged to follow his new calculation, which caused no less confusion amongst them<sup>b</sup>; but only the Jews, always tenacious of their old way, resented it at a higher rate (W). They had soon after a more severe edict against them, by which that emperor deprived them of several privileges; as first, of being admitted by the magistrates as evidence against the Christians. Secondly, of making wills, and bequeathing legacies: to which some add, that of bringing up their children in their religion, who were, instead of that, to be catechised, and brought up Christians; tho' this last is much to be questioned. He likewise deprived those of Africa of the exercise of their religion, at the request of the council of Carthage; and sent orders to his prefectus pretoris there to turn all their synagogues into churches, and to restrain them from performing any religious duties in caverns<sup>c</sup> (X).

c THESE edicts, which were by the Jews looked upon as a kind of persecution, failed not, as usual, to produce a more than ordinary discontent; which by degrees ripened into revolts,

<sup>a</sup> Vid. BASNAG. ub. sup. lib. viii. c. 10. § 13. Just. an. 19.

<sup>b</sup> PROCOPIUS. Hist. Arc. c. 28.

<sup>c</sup> THEOPHAN. ad

Procop. de Ædific. lib. v. c. 2. p. 110, & seq.

(U) We took notice lately of their academies being again opened and flourishing; and we are farther told, that the concourse to them was such, that for want of masters, they had been obliged to raise a weaver, who had applied himself to the study of the law, to the dignity of professor at Sora; soon after which the Gaons began to restore learning to its ancient lustre. Several of them became famed for their skill in physic, as well as divinity; and R. Aaron, a priest of Alexandria, did then publish his Pandects, or Treasure of Remedies, which was soon after translated into Arabic by Massergiuiffe, another Jewish physician, in great repute at the Khalif's court.

Some make this last to have flourished in the reign of Heraclius, and the khalifate of Merwan I. but absurdly; seeing those two princes were not cotemporary, and the latter reigned not till the 68th year of the Hejra, or flight of Mohammed, which answers to the year of Christ 684. However, what hath been said is sufficient to shew that the Jews were in a flourishing condition under the first Khalifs.

(W) A late critic, often quoted in this work, rightly observes some great mistake in the year and occasion of this edict, as mentioned by Theophanes and Nicephoras; and thinks that the emperor lengthened the Lent fast by one week, because Easter that year fell on the same day with the Christians and Jews: so that according to him, he made that change in the former only, to prevent its coinciding with that of the latter; but as his conjecture not only contradicts the two authors above-mentioned, but likewise by Procopius's account, we shall leave them as we find them.

There is still another difficulty in the account of that edict, the last-named author, and his annotator, viz. that it forbade the Jews eating of the paschal lamb on that solemnity, under great penalties; for the Jews did never eat it out of Jerusalem*. So that it seems to relate only to those who lived in the neighbourhood of that city, or perhaps rather to the Samaritans, seated about Mount Garizim, either of which might think they might privately eat it.

(X) This was more particularly put in execution in the city of Borium, seated at the foot of a ridge of mountains, which make the boundary of Pentapolis on the west. Its situation was strong by nature, because the access to it was inclosed by the mountains above-mentioned which had only a narrow passage to it. It was filled with Jews, who had now made it their retreat, and lived in it unmolested and tax-free. They had there a stately structure which they stiled a temple, and pretended to be as old as Solomon, which shews that they must have been settled there a considerable time, and were very populous and wealthy, notwithstanding their vicinity to the Moors. However, Justinian's orders were so punctually executed, that the Jews were mostly converted, and their synagogue turned into a church; after which the emperor caused the city to be fortified with stout walls (16).

This century is very fertile in miracles, which were wrought for the conversion of Jews and Heathens; some of which are too puerile a nature to deserve a place in a work like this, such as those wrought by one Simon, an idiot of the city of Emessa; which yet failed not to work their effect on those unbelievers, if we may credit the authors that have recorded them (17). But we shall mention a very remarkable one which happened at Constantinople, because it will give a light to some part of the history of those times.

It was, it seems, the custom then, after the communion was over at church, to call in the children to eat what remained of the consecrated bread. A Jewish boy being one day among them, went in and took part with them; and being questioned by his father, about his not coming so soon as usual, and having owned the true cause of it, that unnatural parent threw him into a burning oven, where he kept him three days shut up. At length the mournful mother, who had sought for him far and near, happening to name his name, in a kind of lamenting tone, near the oven's mouth, the boy answered to it; and being taken out, told her that a fine lady, clothed in purple, had saved him both from being burned and starved. The emperor being informed of it, sent for the mother and child, who were both baptized. The boy was brought up and became a clergyman, and the mother a deaconess; whilst the obstinate father, refusing to follow their example, was crucified in one of the suburbs of that metropolis. Thus far our author (18); after whom Beda tells us much the same story, only he removes the scene from Constantinople to Rome, as well as the time from Justinian to that of Theodosius the younger (19).

(*) De hoc vid. vol. i. p. 500, & seq. 603, & seq. & notes. lib. iv. c. 36, ad an. Chr. 552.

(18) Idem ibid. p. 412, & seq.

(16) Procop. ub. sup.

(19) Collect. ad Fin.

(17) Evagr.

A false Mes- siah in Pale- stine,
A. C. 530.

as soon as a proper opportunity offered. The first of them was raised accordingly by one Julian, who set up for the Messiah, and drew after him many of the Jews of Palestine, who were in great hopes of him, from the title of conqueror which he took, and the great appearance he made; and who having armed all his followers, led them against the Christians. These, being fearless of any hostilities from the oppressed Jews at that time, were slaughtered by them in great numbers; till at length the emperor sent his forces against, and suppressed them; they fighting rather like wild desperadoes than like regular troops. Their leader being taken, was immediately put to death, which soon ended the revolt <sup>a</sup> (Y).

Jews revolt at Cæsarea,
A. C. 555.

Much such another happened at Cæsarea, about twenty-five years after; in which the Samaritans and Jews, though mortal enemies to each other, as we have had frequent occasions to shew, did yet join forces against the Christians, demolished their churches, massacred great numbers of them, and particularly the governor in his own palace. His lady, having happily escaped their fury, sent word to Justinian of all that happened; who immediately sent Adamantius thither to take full information of the facts; which being conveyed to court, with all their aggravations, the richer Jews had their goods confiscated, great numbers of those who had had a hand in the revolt were beheaded or banished, and their execution performed with such severity as made the rest of the Jewish nation tremble, and prevented for a time their taking up arms against the Christians (Z).

Il. to defend
Naples.

THEY did however join with the Goths in Italy against Justinian, and his general Belisarius; especially at the city of Naples, which the latter was then besieging (A), and in which they fought most desperately against him, as being fully convinced that they must expect no mercy from him; for whilst the citizens were deliberating about a surrender, and had dressed up the articles of capitulation, the friends of the Goths came to dissuade them from it; and, to do it the more effectually, had brought with them a number of Jewish merchants, to assure them, that if they held out, they should want neither provisions nor ammunition of any kind: by which means the siege being prolonged, and that general being forced to lose a great number of his men, was the more exasperated against them. Other particulars of this siege being foreign to our present point, have been seen in a former part*. What farther relates to the Jews, is, that they defended that part of the town which is towards the sea, even after the other part was surrendered to the besiegers. They were however forced to do the same; and tho' we are told that Belisarius tried all proper means to inspire his soldiers with sentiments of clemency, yet whether they did not believe him in earnest, or were too much exasperated to listen to him, a horrid slaughter was made of the besieged, in which the Jews were treated with greater cruelty than any of the rest <sup>f</sup>, and were horribly butchered, without distinction of age, sex, or quality. This dreadful severity quelled them for a time, and we hear of neither revolt nor persecution during the two subsequent reigns. Perhaps also they bought cruelly but-

<sup>a</sup> PAUL DIACON. PROCOP. MALALA, &c. ub. sup. Max. patr. tom. xiii. p. 376. CEDREN. Annal. p. 316.
<sup>f</sup> PROCOP. Bell. Goth. lib. i. c. 8, & seq. p. 329, & seq.

<sup>c</sup> Idem ibid. P. VANFRED. Hist. in Bil. i. t.
* See Ant. Hist. vol. vii. p. 652, & (Q).

(Y) This story is differently related by another chronologer (20), who tells us that the Samaritans having had some skirmishes with the Christians at Naplouse their capital, in which they had burnt some of their houses, and Justinian having caused their governor to be put to death, for not having timely suppressed them, they grew so desperate, as to chuse one Julian, a captain of banditti, to be their king, and fell foul upon the Christians, overthrew their churches in several parts of the province, massacred Amonas, bishop of Naplouse, cut his clergy into mince-meat, and fried it with their relics, and committed many other disorders of the like kind, where-ever they came; insomuch that people were afraid to travel, till the revolt was quelled by the emperor's troops.

Among the other exploits which Julian did at that capital, having entered it when they were performing their races and games, he set himself up as judge of the prizes; and Nicias having gained one, and applying to him for it, he asked him what his religion was, and finding he was a Christian, immediately cut off his head, as unworthy of the crown; but being soon after defeated and taken, his head was likewise struck off, and sent to the emperor, together with the crown he had on. Twenty thousand of his troops were slain upon the spot; the rest retired to Mounts Garizim, Arparizim, and other mountainous parts of Trachonitis; and about 20,000 of the young prisoners were sold for slaves, and sent into Persia and India.

(Z) Some modern historians make this second revolt against Justinian to have been soon after followed by a third; but as neither the Greek authors, who would hardly have omitted it, nor Paul the deacon, from whom they pretend to quote it, mention any thing of it; it is more likely that they had smarted too much in the second, to have been so quickly drawn into a third.

(A) That general having quitted the Vandals in Africa, and recovered the sacred Jewish vessels, which Titus had carried from Jerusalem to Rome, and Genzeric had seized on at the sacking of that metropolis, Justinian had ordered them to be conveyed to Constantinople, to adorn his general's triumph. The sight of them, which could not but remind the Jews of that capital of the sad catastrophe of their city and temple, made so lively an impression on one of them, that he could not forbear crying out, as if he had been seized with a sudden enthusiasm, that those vessels ought not to be laid up in any other place, but that for the use of which Solomon had consecrated them; and added, that it was on their account that Rome had been taken by Genzeric, and Genzeric had been vanquished by the Romans. This speech was soon brought to the emperor, who looking on the Jew as divinely inspired, immediately ordered them to be conveyed to Jerusalem (21).

(20) Malala Chron. Hist. Chronol. tom. xi. p. 181. apud Basnag. Hist. des Juifs, l. ii. c. 8. § 1. l. viii. c. 12 § 9 & 10. (21) Procop. Bel. Vandal. lib. ii. c. 9, p. 255.

a their peace by dint of money, especially from Mauritius, who was then engaged in a troublesome war against the Avari. But under the traitor Phocas they made a most bloody insurrection at Antioch, where they were very populous and wealthy; in which the Christians, who proved too weak to withstand them, suffered the most horrid cruelties; great numbers were burnt in their own houses; others, where-ever they met them, were thrown into the flames; and the bishop Anastasius, not the first, as Nicephoras hath mistakem him<sup>s</sup>, but the second of that name, and his immediate successor, treated with the most barbarous indignities; for, not content to have him dragged along the streets, they cut off his privities, and clapped them in his mouth; and, after having made a dismal spectacle of him through the streets of the place, flung him into the fire. They were however, with great difficulty, suppressed by count Bonofus, whom Phocas sent with a sufficient force against them, and made to undergo a condign punishment<sup>h</sup>. And those that came off the easiest were banished, and sent away mangled and maimed. By this time they were again grown very numerous in the island of Cyprus, notwithstanding Adrian's severe edict against their setting foot in it, even as travellers. And it was about four years after the massacre at Antioch that the good Cyprian bishop Leontius, fearing perhaps the same fate from them, resolved, if possible, to convert them to Christianity; and succeeded so well in it, if we may depend upon his apology to be genuine, that the far greater part of them were baptized by him<sup>i</sup>. Cruelties at Antioch, A. C. 602. Converted in Cyprus, A. C. 605.

WE find them very numerous and quiet in Italy, where pope Gregory the Great, who reigned about this time, exhorted his clergy and flock to use them with candour and tenderness, seeing, as he himself believed and alleged, they were all to be recalled, and become a considerable part of Christ's fold<sup>k</sup>; for which reason, said he, they must be brought into the unity of the faith by gentle means, fair persuasions, and charitable advice, and not by force, which is rather apt to disgust them. Accordingly, we read of several remarkable conversions wrought among them, and some of them attended with circumstances not much short of being miraculous, though we forbear repeating them here<sup>l</sup>. That pontif not only blamed the untimely zeal of some bishops against them, but even of some of their new converts, particularly that of one of the latter, who went and planted a cross and the virgin's image in their synagogue; and which he ordered to be taken away; alleging, that, since the laws do not permit them to build new synagogues, they ought to be allowed the free use of their old ones (B). He not only revived the old edicts against their having Christian slaves, which had been long since shamefully neglected, but ordained, that all the Jewish domestics, who should take refuge in the churches, and be baptized, should, ipso facto, become free (C). Their state under Gregory the Great. Laws against them.

THEIR condition altered much for the worse soon after, that is, as soon as the emperor Heraclius had concluded a peace with Persia, by which the cross of Christ, formerly taken by them, had been restored to him, and sent to Jerusalem; of which we have spoken more fully in a former part*. It plainly appears, from his own words, that he hated the Jewish nation, because they were enemies of Christ and his religion. But what gave him the first handle against them, was, his meeting with one at Tiberias, named Benjamin, so wealthy, as to have alone furnished his army and court with provisions; and so elated on that account, that he had plagued the Christians with troublesome law-suits and malicious prosecutions. Benjamin, fearing his resentment, found no better expedient to avoid it, than turning Christian; but this did not lessen his aversion to the nation, whom he soon after caused to be banished out of Jerusalem, with a severe prohibition against any of them coming thenceforth within three miles of that city. Change under Heraclius, A. D. 628.

BUT what more effectually exasperated him against them, was an answer given him by some of his soothsayers, whom he had consulted about the fate of the empire, that he would be undone by a circumcised nation; for, when he came to consider how numerous and Reasons of his persecuting them.

<sup>s</sup> Hist. lib. xviii. c. 44. <sup>h</sup> See Anc. Hist. vol. vi. p. 538, & seq. ZONAR. Annal. tom. iii. PAUL. DIACON. hist. lib. xvii. <sup>i</sup> LEONT. Episc. Neapol. Cypr. apol. cont. Jud. act. concil. Nic. ii. can. 4. <sup>k</sup> GREG. lib. iv. ind. 13. epist. 50. lib. vii. epist. 24. <sup>l</sup> Id. ibid. lib. i. epist. 34. dialog. lib. iii. c. 7. * Anc. Hist. vol. iv. p. 369. vol. vi. p. 542, & seq.

(B) It appears by this, that the former edicts of the emperor Theodosius were still kept in force against them, notwithstanding that pontif's clemency to them. He likewise enforced another, viz. against their having Christian slaves; alleging, that it would be a dishonour to Christianity to be subject to Judaism; and ordered, that those who had been sold for such should be released without any farther ransom, such a traffick having been long since forbidden by the imperial laws.

(C) Some of the prelates, particularly Januarius, then bishop of Cagliari, had, it seems, till then, followed a more laudable method and example, viz. either of sending such runaway slaves back to their masters, as St. Paul had Onesimus to Philemon, or of buying their liberty with the church's money. But Gregory would not suffer the church's wealth to be employed to any such purpose, seeing their conversion made them free without any further consideration (22).

powerful they were in most parts of the empire, what frequent efforts they had made to recover their liberty, and what bloody revolts they had raised against the Christians at divers times and places; he no longer doubted but they were the circumcised meant by the soothsayers; and, consequently, that the most effectual means of preventing its accomplishment, were, to persecute and oblige them to abjure Judaism; little dreaming, that the Saracens, who are also circumcised, and not the Jews, were the people who were to overthrow the empire.

Their sad case in Spain and Gaul.

A. C. 533.
Council of Toledo's decree.

A. C. 639.

A new council,
A. C. 653.

HE did not think it sufficient to persecute them in his dominions, but endeavoured to have the same done in Gaul, Spain, and other kingdoms; and made it one of the principal conditions of the peace he concluded with Sizibut, king of Spain, that he should oblige them either to abjure Judaism and be baptized, or to abandon the kingdom; and that monarch made no difficulty to consent to it; and, without consulting any of his bishops, as Marianna words it, engaged in an action which was contrary to the Christian religion; and, in spite of all their remonstrances, caused the principal among them to be flung into prison, where having languished a considerable time, one part of them turned Christians, to avoid the grievous punishments to which they had been condemned; and the rest retired into Gaul, where Heraclius made them undergo the same fate (D). His zeal, however, was highly discommended, not only by Isidor, bishop of Sevil, who was, in other respects, a great admirer of that prince<sup>m</sup>, but likewise by the fourth council of Toledo, in which he presided; which declared it unlawful and unchristian to force people to believe, seeing, it is God alone who hardens and shows mercy to whom he will. However, there was one clause or regulation in it very derogatory to so pious a declaration, seeing it obliged these forced converts to continue in the faith and communion of the church, in which they had been partakers of the sacraments; and which they could not swerve from without manifest scandal to it<sup>n</sup>. There might indeed be but too much reason for such a clause, seeing it was now common with the Jews to play fast and loose, to become converts, and judaize again as soon as they had an opportunity. However, the next Toledan council, which sat about five years after, was so far from condemning the violence used against them, that they highly commended their monarch's (Sciuntila) zeal, and blessed God for inspiring him with it, ratified the laws he had made against the Jews, decreed, that from thenceforth no king should mount the throne till he had taken a solemn oath to observe them, and concluded with an anathema against those who should violate them. This decree was so punctually executed by the succeeding princes, and such severe laws made against the recusant Jews, that they chose to conform rather than incur the penalties. But as those forced conversions were nothing less than sincere, and great numbers were observed to judaize again, and a new council was convened by king Receswinthus to put a stop to that abuse, the Jews, on their part, resolved to avoid the ill consequences of it, by sending a letter to that monarch, in the name of all their brethren then in Spain, protesting, that tho' they had till then dissembled, being neither altogether Jews, nor thoroughly converted, yet they were now fully resolved to become sincere professors, and wholly to conform to the laws of the Gospel (E). This solemn protest became the more suspected as it promised so fair, and was looked upon, both by the king and council, as designed only to prevent the penalties being inflicted against those that had relapsed; for their behaviour was quite opposite to it, they still making open profession of Judaism, and publicly attacking Christianity (F); inso-

<sup>m</sup> ISIDOR. Hispal. Chron. Gothor. p. 402. Vide & SOLOM. BEN. virg. SHEVETH JEHUDAH, p. 93, & seq.
<sup>n</sup> Act. concil. Tolet. iv. sub an. 633. c. lvii. & seq. tom. v. p. 1719.

(D) The Jews, who call that prince Sisebut, tell us, that they urged against him the example of Joshua, who did not constrain the Canaanites to be circumcised, but only to observe the precepts of Noah (23), of which we have formerly spoken*. But were answered, that Joshua did as he then thought best, but that now the case was different; and, though men ought to be left at their liberty, whether or no they will accept of a temporal advantage, yet, with respect to those which are of a spiritual nature, they ought to be forced to embrace them, as a child is to learn his duty, &c. He accordingly used such violent methods as obliged them, if not to be sincere converts, at least to pretend to be such. His successors followed his example, and a new law was made, that those, who did not turn Christians immediately after the publication of it, should be publicly whipped, and receive a hundred lashes, suffer confiscation of all their goods, and be banished the kingdom (24).

(E) Among other plausible promises, they engaged to avoid all commerce and intermarriages with those who were not baptized; to observe no longer the sabbath, and the circumcision of their children; and, if they could not be brought to eat swine's flesh, as having contracted a natural reluctance to it, through custom and education, they would not scruple to eat any meat that was dressed with it. Lastly, they engaged to stone or burn all those who acted contrary to this promise; or, if his majesty thought fit to grant them their lives, they consented that they should be doomed to perpetual slavery, with the confiscation of all their effects.

(F) They objected, among other things, that Christ was not come in the sixth millenary, which had been pointed out for his appearance. To which the archbi-

(23) Solom. Ben. virg. Sheveth Jehudah, ubi sup.
(24) Leges Fijg. xli. ubi. xii. tit. 3. l. 3.

* See Anc. Hist. vol. i. p. 664, & seq. and note (K).

a much that Ervigius was obliged to order Julian, then archbishop of Toledo, to write against them; which he did accordingly, and with great strength and success<sup>o</sup>, in a learned treatise which he published a little before the close of the seventh century. Julian's book against them, A. C. 686.

EGICA soon after preferred a complaint to the same Toletan council against the Jews, who, he says, had combined with those of Afric against him. That prince added, that the infection had spread itself through all the provinces of the Spanish monarchy; and that, tho' it had not yet reached France and Italy, it was not therefore the less deserving of their serious attention. Whereupon it was there decreed, that all the Jews should be deprived of their privileges, and declared perpetual slaves; that their effects should be confiscated, and their children taken from them, and brought up by the Christians (G). This severe edict, however, they eluded, in all probability, as usual, by a timely baptism; for we do not read of any who suffered on its account. Jews in Gaul, A. C. 503.

Those of Gaul, if any were so early settled there, made so obscure a figure, that we should not have known of any there, but for some edicts of Constantine the Great, which mention them in Belgic Gaul<sup>p</sup>; and it is not till the sixth century that historians begin to speak of them; about which time mention is made of their having intended a false accusation against Cæsarius, bishop of Arles, for being in the interest of the Franks, then laying siege to it, and having engaged to deliver up that city to them; upon which the bishop was fetched from his palace, in order to have been thrown into the Rhosne; but was miraculously preserved, and brought back privately to his palace. The Jews, believing him dead, applauded their perfidy against him; and one of them, under pretence of throwing a stone into the besiegers trenches, sent them an invitation to scale the walls on that side which was guarded by the Jews; and promising to deliver up the city to them, on condition they should be exempted from being plundered. The letter being found out by the next morning, discovered the treasonable design of the Jews, as well as the innocence of the bishop<sup>q</sup>. This circumstance shews, that they were by this time in no small credit, seeing they were allowed, even during a siege, to take upon them the guard of one part of the city (H). Conspire against the Goths.

As soon as the Romans had been driven out of Gaul, and the Visigoths been suppressed in it, we find divers regulations made by the councils there, relating to the Jews, ever since the reign of Clovis, the first king of the Franks; one in particular under Childebert, to whom that crown was fallen by lot, which forbade them to appear in the streets of Paris, from Thursday in the holy week to Easter Sunday; which shows, that they were by that time settled either in that city, or in some of its suburbs (I). The same was likewise done by the council of Orleans in the very same year; from which one may conclude, they were dispersed in several other parts of France. They were still more numerous in Languedoc, whence Berreol, bishop of Uzez, was banished upon their account. His extreme desire of converting them had betrayed him into such a familiarity with them, as had rendered him suspected at court, where Edicts against them. A. C. 540.

<sup>o</sup> JUL. Tolet. cont. Jud. l. i. Bibl. Rabbin. p. 122, & seq. lib. iii. p. 139, & seq. <sup>p</sup> De his, vide GREG. Turonens. tom. ii. <sup>q</sup> Vide Fragment. de morib. & gest. Francor. tom. i. p. 232. CYPRIAN. ap. Mabill. §. i. p. 662. BASNAG. ubi sup. c. xiii. A. C. 556. Persecuted at Uzez;

shop gave a most learned answer out of the writings of the prophets, and proved to them, that Christ was born at the time prefixed by them; and, upon his reminding them, that they were now expelled out of the promised land, without kings, priest, sacrifice, or altar, all which, he urged, were abolished according to their express prediction; they replied, as they had long before done, that they had still a king of the race of David, who reigned in some corner of the east; but which they not being able to make out, was justly rejected as a forgery.

(G) This plainly confutes what Luke de Tudela affirms, that the Jews did not get footing into Spain till the reign of Vitiza, who invited them thither, since this prince was the son of Egica above-mentioned, who obtained that decree against them. It shews besides, that they had been settled there some ages before this time.

It proves likewise a more material error in another author (25), who makes Vitiza to have reigned about the year 520, and Sisibut about five years sooner, seeing the latter reigned at the beginning, and the other about the end, of the seventh century. How could he then place them so near one another in the beginning of the sixth?

(H) We shall not trouble our readers with an inquiry how far the perfidy of the Jews will clear the bishop from it; for though he was, in other respects, a man of great merit, yet, being a zealous orthodox, he might be more inclined to Clovis, king of the Franks, than to the Gothish king, who was as strenuous for Arianism. And a late historian and critic hath been highly censured by the Roman Catholics for having questioned his innocence (26). All that we need say about it is, that if the Jews and the good bishop had been in the same interest, it is altogether improbable that they would have turned his accusers, that they would have been so zealous to have taken him off, or so full of joy when they thought him drowned in the Rhosne. And this alone will go farther to clear that excellent prelate, than all that that author hath surmised against him; unless we could suppose, that their hatred to him, on account of his extraordinary virtue, learning, and piety, made them guilty of that complicated perfidy.

(I) The reason of these edicts seems to have been designed to prevent their causing some disturbances at that solemn season, when the streets and houses were empty, and the people at their devotions at church.

(25) Jac. Schudt. compend. hist. Jud. lib. iii. c. 8. & seq.

(26) Basnag. hist. ubi sup. lib. viii. cap. 13. seq. 14, he was forced to go and justify himself to king Childebert; but being again restored, after a some years exile, he fell into the other extreme, and drove them all out of his bishoprick <sup>a</sup>.

<sup>a</sup>and Clermont. THEY brought a much greater mischief upon themselves by their untimely zeal at Clermont, in the province of Auvergne, where Avitus, the bishop of it, was making some conversions among them. One of the new converts being entered the city in his white garment, the sight of it did so far provoke one of the same nation as to presume to fling a pot of stinking oil upon him; for which he would have been torn in pieces by the Christians, had not the bishop prevented it. However, his charity did but delay their resentment till the next festival, which proved Ascension-day; on which the people, leaving the procession, went and pulled down the Jewish synagogue <sup>b</sup>. The consequence was, that they must either turn Christians, or be banished. Many of them chose the former, and those that remained obstinate returned to Mar-
<sup>A. C. 569.</sup>
<sup>under king</sup>
<sup>Chilperic,</sup> seilles, whence they were originally come. St. German was no less zealous for their conversion; and the historians of those times relate some instances which were accompanied with miracles, for which we shall refer our readers to them <sup>c</sup>. King Chilperic, who observed those of his kingdoms of Soissons and Paris to be rich and numerous, did likewise oblige them to be baptized, and punished those that refused it. But neither his converts nor martyrs did him much honour; tho', being a wicked prince <sup>d</sup>, he doubted not but his zeal might make some atonement <sup>a</sup>and Dagobert, for his vices. The same befel them under king Dagobert, who, being then sole monarch in <sup>A. C. 629.</sup> France, and no less wicked than Chilperic, endeavoured to ingratiate himself with his clergy and people by his hatred against the Jewish nation <sup>e</sup>; and obliging them either to be baptized or banished; by which those, who had fled hither from Spain, found themselves in as bad a <sup>c</sup>plight here as they had been there (K). Many of them left that country, and took refuge where they could; but the greater part chose to dissemble rather than follow them; and, by degrees, returned to their old way.

<sup>Under Ba-</sup>
<sup>thilda, A. C.</sup>
<sup>655.</sup> THIS became more visible during the latter end of Clovis's reign, and the regency of his widow Bathilda. For this last, during the minority of her sons, among many other regulations, had abolished the capitation which had been in vogue time out of mind, and a great nuisance to the nation, because it restrained people from marrying, and obliged many to sell their children, to avoid paying of the tax. The Jews were become odious by the infamous traffick of those children, which they sold to barbarous nations; upon which account, that princess not only removed the cause of it, by taking off the capitation, but obliged all those captives to <sup>d</sup>
<sup>Banished by</sup>
<sup>Wamba,</sup>
<sup>A. C. 675.</sup> be restored which they had in their hands, and forbade them carrying on of that cruel commerce for the future; though we do not find that she used any other severity against them. Wamba, king of the Goths in Languedoc, designed to have done the same by them in his dominions, but met with a surprising opposition from the abbot Raymirus and the count of Thoulouse, who combined to protect them, and oppose his edict against them. Count Paul, a favourite of Wamba's, was sent against them; but, instead of suppressing, joined himself to them, and had got himself crowned king at Narbonne; but, being afterwards defeated and condemned by Wamba, both he and his accomplices, but especially the Jews, felt the dire effects of his resentment. His edict was put in full force, and they banished out of his dominions <sup>e</sup>.

<sup>A. C. 740.</sup>
<sup>Chozar's con-</sup>
<sup>version to Ju-</sup>
<sup>daism;</sup> THE eighth century, to which we are now come, is chiefly celebrated for the conversion of <sup>c</sup>
Chozar, a heathen, to the Jewish religion; for it is about this time that this wonderful transaction is pretended to have happened. Chozar, though a heathen, was a serious thoughtful prince; and a dream, or, as the fabulous account of it says, an angel, had made him so dis-

<sup>a</sup> LE COINTE annat. sub A. C. 556.
 Bibliot. max. patr. tom. x. lib. 4. epist. 5.
 chron. hist. Francor. tom. i.

<sup>b</sup> GREGOR. Turon. hist. Franc. l. v. c. 11. VENAUT poeta apud
<sup>c</sup> FORTUNAT. vit. St. Germ. c. 64. p. 580. Vide & FREDEGAR.
<sup>d</sup> GREG. Turon. & MAROLLE's not. in eund. tom. i. p. 386. <sup>e</sup> Gesta
 DAGOBERT. <sup>f</sup> CATEL's memoirs for the history of Languedoc, lib. iii. p. 308.

(K) About this seventh century began to flourish the famed academy of Lunel, one of the most celebrated in all the west, not only for its great doctors, and the great number of learned men, who had their education there, but much more for their extraordinary charity in maintaining their scholars at their own charges. This city is situate in Languedoc, between Montpelier and Nismes; and was still subsisting, in great splendor, in the twelfth century, when Benjamin de Tudela went through it. The famed Solomon Jarchi, one of the most learned Jews that France ever bred, had either his birth, or, at least, his education, in it; from which he took his surname of Jarchi, in allusion to the word Jareach, which signifies the moon; for Bartolucci, on the testimony of some Jewish rabbies, affirms, that he was born at Troyes, another city of Gallia Narbonensis, or Languedoc. He was a very expert man; and, though his decisions are too much in the talmudic strain, and so not much admired by Christians, yet they are held in great esteem among those of the Jews; especially as he had travelled thro' most parts of the world, where there were any learned men of his nation, and had greatly improved himself by their conversation.

Lunel produced another great man; viz. Zachariah Levita, who was indisputably a native of it, though he be commonly stiled a Spaniard, because that city, as well as the rest of Languedoc, did then belong to Spain. He is said to have wrote a treatise, intituled, The two great Lights. Some other we might still name, who have been ornaments to this academy, but who all flourished in or since the twelfth century: even Solomon Jarchi was not born till 1105, though we have mentioned him on account of his denominating himself the Lunatic, from this city of Lunel.

<sup>a</sup> satisfied with his religion, that he resolved to seek after a better. He conversed with the philosophers, with Christians, Mohammedans, and Jews; and was at length, notwithstanding his innate contempt of that nation, convinced by a famed rabbi, named Sangari, that the Jewish was the only true religion; to which all others were at best but as a shadow to the substance, or the picture to the living original <sup>2</sup>. Several other learned matters he explained to him, so much to his satisfaction (L), that the king, afraid of alarming his idolatrous subjects, communicated his design of turning Jew to none but his general, with whom he went, with the utmost privacy, to some mountainous desert towards the sea, where, night having overtaken them, they retired into a cavern. Here they found, to their great joy, some Jews celebrating their sabbath; and, having there abjured his old religion, and received the seal of circumcision, returned with the same privacy to his capital. He then prepared by degrees, and with great address, the minds of his subjects to receive the news of his conversion; which spread afterwards so far, that those Jews among them, who had till then dissembled their religion, not only made now open profession of it, but assisted him in converting the rest of his kingdom. He sent soon after for the most learned Jews from other countries, to instruct those new converts, which amounted to above 100,000, and vouchsafed himself to take one of the most famous among them to be his instructor. He betrayed at first a kind of inclination for the Karaites, a sect of which we have formerly spoken †, as being more scrupulously attached to the law; but Sangari, who was a thalmudist, brought him over to his side. From that time the original Jews grew in great esteem; and a tabernacle was erected exactly like that of Moses in the wilderness; to which both they and all the Chozrean converts repaired to the Jewish worship. The king became rich, happy, and successful, triumphed over his enemies, discovered new treasures hidden in the earth, and enlarged his dominions with new and considerable conquests <sup>3</sup>. Thus far the book, the credit of which we have given an account of in the last note.

<sup>2</sup> Vide lib. Cozri, part ii. p. 83, & seq. p. 75, & seq.

† Anc. Hist. vol. iv. p. 174.

<sup>3</sup> Vide lib. Cozri, part ii.

(L) For fear our readers should think them of so high a nature, as to regret the loss of them, we shall give them a specimen whereby to judge of the rest. He tells the king, that Judea was above all the other countries of the world; and that Adam had been there created, and was buried in the sepulchre which Abraham afterwards bought for himself; that the dispute between Cain and Abel was about the inheritance of that holy land, to which each laid a strenuous claim; and that the former, being driven from the presence of God, meant no more than his being banished out of Judea (27); all which sufficiently shew how unskilled he was in the situation of paradise *. The rest being much of the same nature, we shall go no farther with it.

The misfortune is, that this kingdom of Chozar is nowhere to be found, notwithstanding all the pains which some of the most zealous Jews have taken to be informed about it; and even the famed Jewish traveller of the twelfth century, Benjamin de Tudela, who is not sparing of every thing, though ever so improbable, that makes for the credit of his nation, owns that he could not find it out. Neither have any since, either of that or any other nation, been more successful in its discovery. What authority this pretended conversion comes backed with, will be seen in the sequel. In the mean time we shall only observe, that, though this kingdom hath been commonly hitherto thought to be only a fictitious one (inasmuch that the learned John Buxtorf, and others, rather believed Chozar to be the name of the king now in question, though quite contrary to the rules of the Jewish grammar, which shews it to be that of a country or a kingdom), yet we read of a city of that name in the province of Transoxiana, south-east of the Caspian sea, and south of Samarcande, the ancient capital of Bactria, which was still flourishing in the time of Timur Beg, vulgarly called Tamerlane, and is mentioned in the history of that great conqueror, written by his physician Shereff-eddin Hali, and translated into French by M. Petit la Croix, anno 1723, and published at Delph in four volumes duodecimo. To this we may add farther, that the geographical tables of Nasir Eddin, the Persian, and of Ulug Beigh, the Tartar, published by Grawius, speak of the city of Balanjar as the chief residence of the king of Chozar.

But, though what we have quoted above doth prove, in some measure, against Mr. Basnage, Calmet, and others, that there was once such a city or kingdom near the Caspian Sea, yet the main of the story about that monarch's conversion is still questioned by all the learned, and even by some of the Jews; and the book itself called Haccorzi, and, by the Arabs, El Chozri, supposed only a fable, or at best a fictitious dialogue, written by Jehudah Halevi, the pretended translator of it, in imitation of those of Cicero, Plato, Gellius, &c. in the twelfth century, that is above 300 years after its supposed epoch of 740; though the several editors of it, particularly R. Jehudah, Ben. Tibon, and R. Muscato, who both printed it at Venice, and, since then, John Buxtorf and R. Aben Dona, have strenuously defended both the book and the truth of the fact above related. But, upon the whole, whoever reads it with an impartial eye, will be apt to conclude it a mere romance, in which Deus and Machina are introduced to give a sanction to facts, which have not even the appearance of probability; such are, for instance, the apparition of the angel to make the king dissatisfied with his religion, without telling him where to look out for a better; the puerile arguments upon which he rejects that of the Christians; his extraordinary skill in philosophy, philology, and his surprising knowledge of the nicest subtleties of the cabbalah; his building a Mosaic tabernacle instead of a temple, with the ark; tho', as we have formerly observed, the Jews had none since the Babylonish captivity; the altar for sacrifices, tho' these were allowed to be offered no-where but at Jerusalem; and, in a word, his modelling his worship, government, &c. according to that established by Moses: all these are justly reckoned sufficient obstacles to the credibility of the book, was it better attested than it really is.

(27) Haccorzi, part ii. p. 83, and 96.

* De hac vide Anc. hist. vol. i. p. 53, & seq.

King Joseph's account of
that kingdom.

BUT as its authority had not weight enough to procure a general reception of its legend, a fresh one hath been trumped up by the Jews about 250 years after, which is no less liable to suspicion; viz. a letter procured with no small difficulty by rabbi Chasdai, a man in high esteem at the court of Abdal-Rahman in Spain, from Joseph, king of Chozar, in which that prince, at his request, gives him an account of his religion, government, country, &c.; and which, if genuine, would prove, at least, that the Jewish religion was not only established in that kingdom under one of his predecessors, whom he names Bula; and in the manner related in the book Haccorzi; and with the addition of several other particulars, which the reader may see under the next note (M); but likewise prove that it still continued to flourish in his dominions; though there be nothing in the description he gives of them, of their situation, limits, climate, cities, rivers, product, &c. that can direct a reader where to find them; b so that it were in vain to dwell longer on that legend.

Jews under the khalifs,
A. C. 705, &
seq.

WE shall therefore now turn our eyes to the Jewish tribes dispersed in the east during this eighth and the following century; where, if we except the common calamities that must attend the civil wars between the khalifs Abbassides, Ommiades, &c. of which a fuller account hath been given in their history †; and in which Jews and Christians must be supposed to have shared; in other respects, we do not find that any of those monarchs disturbed their quietness. The Jews, in particular, enjoyed full liberty of conscience, during the khalifat of Abdelmelech, about the beginning of the eighth century, and those of his successors Al Walid, and Soliman, his brother *. Their academies flourished, and their doctors enjoyed all their antient privileges (N); only the Christians were obliged to fortify Ramah in Palestine, to suppress the inroads which the wild Arabs made into that province, and obstructed the concourse of Jews, of pilgrims, and other nations, into the Holy Land. They are supposed to have suffered some oppressions under the reign of his brother and successor Zeyd, though more from the rapaciousness of his ministers, than the cruelty of that monarch. But their greatest change for the better was under the reigns of the Abbassides, upon the dissolution of that of the Ommiades under Merwan. c

AB, or Abbas Saffa, whom Elmakin calls Abulkabas ‡, having gained the khalifat, removed the royal residence from Damascus to Cusab, situate on the Euphrates, about four days journey from Baghdad, or Babylon; and became thereby nearer neighbours to the Jews, and better † See before, vol. i. p. 338, & alibi pass.

p. 382, & seq.

* Ibid. p. 343, & seq.

‡ De hoc vide supra, vol. i.

(M) Chasdai was, we are told (28), treasurer-general of Abdal-Rahman, and in high favour with him; and having often heard of this Jewish kingdom, particularly from some ambassadors sent from Constantinople to his master, who acquainted him, that they had often seen merchants from thence, who chiefly trafficked in furs, and from whom they had been informed, that the then reigning monarch was called Joseph, resolved at any price to send a letter to him; and dispatched accordingly an express with the ambassadors, who conducted him to Constantinople, whence he was forced to come back, being there informed, that the roads to Chozar were then impassable. He tried afterwards several other means not worth mentioning; the last of which brought him at length an answer from that prince, with a full account of all that he had desired him to inform him of.

This answer, among other trifling particulars we chuse to pass by, confirmed the account of king Bula's conversion by Sangari, in the manner above related; and added, that his son Obadiab had built sundry synagogues, and maintained a number of learned rabbies to expound the sacred books and the thalmud, &c. The account he gave of his dominions was, that they were about thirty days journey in compass, and were situate near the Gargan sea; and that several neighbouring nations were tributary to him. They had several cities and towns, one of the three principal of which was about fifty parangs, or leagues, in circuit, and was the residence of his queen, and other wives, servants, and eunuchs, in which both Christians and Turks had liberty of their religion. The third in rank for bigness was that of his own residence; and in which he only spent the winter with his council; after which they all removed into the country, where the inhabitants busied themselves with the care of their grounds, whilst he and his court took a progress round the country, to keep all things under due regulation; insomuch that they had neither quarrels, law-suits, nor tax-gatherers. He added, that it seldom rained there, but that they abounded with large rivers full of fish, with excellent vines, and all kinds of fruit-trees. He concluded with some account of the Messiah's coming, which he said was very uncertain, because God had delayed it on account of their sins; and with a kind invitation to rabbi Chasdai to come and visit his dominions, and the promise of an honourable welcome. This is the substance of the letter and answer that passed between king Joseph and him. But whether the rabbi was imposed upon in the last, or was the forger of both, was hard to say; but, upon the whole, the account out of the Chozri, and this letter, are looked upon as a mere fiction.

(N) We are even told, that one of them asked this last his daughter in marriage; and being answered, that the difference of their religion did not permit it, replied, that tho' the different sects of Mohammedans did curse one another in their mosks, since Mohammed had given his daughter to Ali, who was the chief of a different sect, it shewed, that the diversity of opinions ought not to hinder such intermarriages, much less countenance those curses which each publicly vented against the other.

This conference, which appears to have been concerted between that prince and the Jews, to put a stop, as it actually did, at least during his and some following reigns, to that abominable trade of cursing (29); both, however, show, that the Jewish nation must have been in high credit at that time with the khalifs, to be permitted to act such a part before a court, and the chief of the Mohammedan doctors.

(28) A. Ben. Dior, Shalsheleth, Hakkabalab, sub A. M. 4921.

(29) Abulfarag. p. 131.

- a acquainted with their academies. Almanzor, who succeeded his brother, and was a learned prince, and fond of all that were so, without inquiring what nation or religion they were of, had invited a great variety of them to his court; and, among the rest, a good number of Jews, who took that opportunity to put their academies in a more flourishing condition than ever. R. R. Joseph and Samuel surnamed the Gaon, or Excellent, presided at that of Pundebita, and were succeeded by Doreus, another Gaon, Ananias, and Malcha; that of Sora was governed by two learned professors, both named Judab; the one the son of Nachman, and the other of Otrinæus (O). R. Acha was no less famed for his high learning, and his large treatise on the precepts of the law, under the title of Shealtoth, or Questions: but having unfortunately quarrelled with Samuel, the then chief or prince of the captivity, he had the double mortification to see himself excluded from the title of Gaon; and soon after, upon the death of that chief, to see his own servant Nitbronius raised to that dignity. Acha, unable to brook the affront, went and died in Judea, and left Nitbronius to enjoy his principality; which he did during the space of thirteen years <sup>b</sup> (P). About this time, the Jews of Persia and *Ara-*bia had also the mortification to see an edict published against them by the Imam Jaaffar, surnamed Zadic, or the Just; by which those, who turned Moslems, became sole heirs of their whole family: and this induced great numbers of Jewish and other children to apostatize, in order to get possession of such estates, as they could otherwise have no title to <sup>c</sup>.
- ALMANZOR was succeeded by Al Mobdi †, in whose reign appeared the infamous Hakem, or, as the Arabian historian calls him <sup>d</sup>, Almakaneus, an impious impostor, whom some have supposed to have been a Jew, but without any foundation; for which reason we should hardly have mentioned him, but that he had, in spite of his impious tenets, some of them which seemed to be of Jewish extract, and found means to draw a great number of disciples after him, by some seeming prodigies with which he amused them. But Mobdi sent some forces against him, which so closely besieged him in one of his fortresses, that he first poisoned all his disciples, and then flung himself into the fire, according to the last-mentioned author; or, according to others, into a vessel of aqua fortis, which consumed all but his hair. Al Mobdi was succeeded by his brother Aaron, surnamed the Just, and a great lover of learned men; and so considerable a prince, that Charlemagne sent him an embassy, consisting of the two counts Sigismond and Laufred, and Isaac, a Jew, who was to be the chief manager of that commission. Authors vary about the purport and success of it <sup>e</sup>; which being foreign to our present purpose, we shall refer to the history of those two monarchs; and only observe, that Isaac was made choice of by that emperor, on account of the credit which the Jews were in at the khalif's court. However, as he loved to encourage learned men, without any partial regard to their religion <sup>f</sup>, and seldom travelled without having an hundred of them in his retinue, the Jews endeavoured to ingratiate themselves with him chiefly by that means; that is, by filling their academies with the most celebrated professors.
- He was succeeded by his son Amin Al Musa Al Hadi, or, as Elmakin calls him, Abumusa, about the beginning of the 9th century ‡; but this proved so weak a prince, and so addicted to his pleasures, that his brother Mamun soon found an opportunity to dethrone him; and, being a great encourager of learning, caused all the best Jewish books to be translated into Arabic. This step was not at all relished by his subjects, who were ready to revolt upon it; but that never hindered him from distinguishing learned men of all nations; among whom was a celebrated Jewish astronomer, who had been in high repute ever since the khalifat of Almanzor, but was now esteemed at this court as a phoenix of learning, and, as such, highly beloved by

A. C. 760.
Jaaffar's edict
against the Jews.

A. C. 770.
Mohdi khalif.

Aaron khalif;
A. C. 786.

Amin khalif,
A. C. 808.

<sup>b</sup> GANTZ TZEMACH, p. 124, & seq.

p. 407.

Bojor. l. iv.

vol. i. p. 438.

<sup>d</sup> ABULFARAG. p. 146.

<sup>e</sup> ABULFARAG. ubi sup. D'HERBEL. Bibl. Orient.

<sup>f</sup> De hac vide DU HAILLAU hist. de France, lib. iv. AVENTIN. annal.

‡ SANGAENS. de gest. Carol. Magn. lib. ii. EIGINARD vit. Car. Magn. p. 7, & al.

† See vol. i.

‡ See

(O) Some pretend, that the former of these two published a set of learned lectures; others, with more probability, attribute them to R. Simon Keiara, another famed doctor, who then flourished in these eastern parts, tho' not a Gaon. This book, which was stiled Helcuth Gedoloth, or Great Lectures, was so highly admired, that R. Judab, the Soran professor, epitomized it, and gave it the title of Helcuth Pessuchoth, or Decided Lectures (30). However, Keiara had the surname of Great Light, as well as R. Mari, his cotemporary, that of Meor Henaim, the Light of the Eyes, on account of their having lost their sight.

(P) About this time flourished the famed R. Ananus, who was likewise excluded the title of Gaon, though a man of great learning, on account of some material error they suspected in his doctrine, and not without good grounds; since he became the reviver and chief of the Sadducean sect, which was thought to have been long since buried in the ruins of Jerusalem. But it took, it seems, not only new life, but new vigour, under that chief, and became formidable to that of the Pharisees (31). Those critics, who have stiled Ananus the founder of the Caraitic sect, are certainly mistaken; since, as we have seen in both parts of the Jewish history, they were of much older date.

(30) De his vide Bartoloc. Biblioth. Rabbin. & Wolf. Biblioth. Hebr. David, p. 125, & seq.

(31) Idem ibid. Gantz Tzemach

Mamun; during whose reign the Jewish academies of Sora and Pundebita swarmed with men of letters (Q). It was about this time also, that the famed impostor Mooffa, or Moses, the son of Amran, as he called himself, began to appear, and pretended to be that great lawgiver of the Jews newly risen from the dead.

Persecuted
under Wa-theck,
A. C. 841.

Under Mota-
vel,
A. C. 841.

Ahmet's revolt,
A. C. 869.

Accused of promoting the edict against the images.

MAMUN was succeeded by his brother Al Motasem, who, among other of his victories, defeated a famed impostor named Babeck, who cried down all other religions but his own, which chiefly consisted in pleasure and jollity; and was become so powerful, that he waged war against Jews, Christians, and Moslems; and was with difficulty overcome by the united forces of that khalif. His successor, named Al Watbek, and, by some, Watbek-Billab*, became a bitter enemy to the Jews on two accounts: 1st, Because they had been guilty of some great frauds in the management of the finances, which had been committed to their care in his predecessor's reign. And, 2d, Because they would not receive the Koran; for which they were heavily taxed, and forced to pay very large fines into his treasury. Motavel, or Motawakel, who succeeded him, proved still more severe against them; and not only obliged them to wear a leathern girdle by way of distinction, and, on the same account, forbade them to ride on any but asses or mules, and the use of iron stirrups, but he also stripped them of all their honours, titles, and places; which shews that they enjoyed some considerable ones in former reigns. And what was still worse, his edict spread itself not only through his empire, but into the neighbouring states; and this mark of infamy hath, more or less, subsisted ever since in those countries that are under the Turks (R); and we may add, in several parts of Europe, and under Christian princes to this day. Motawakel's successors, whose reigns were short and violent, followed the same severe methods against the Jews; so that they bought those little remains of liberty at the expence of very heavy taxes; and it was in the reign of Al-tamed, the last of them, who was a weak and effeminate prince, that Abmet, then governor of Egypt, revolted, and founded a new dynasty there; by which that province was dismembered from the empire of the khalifs about the end of the ninth century † (S).

WE come now to the Jews in the west, that is, in the empire, in Spain, Italy, France, and other parts of Europe, during the eighth and ninth centuries. We begin with the empire, which was at this time miserably torn by the civil dissensions between the Iconoclasts and the image-worshippers, and in which the Jews were said to have had a considerable hand, if they were not the first movers of it. We have given an account of that, and of its bloody effects, in a former part of this history ‡, and shall examine here only what is laid to the charge of the Jews, with relation to their being the first promoters of it; and which, appearing to us very doubtful and apocryphal, we shall remit to the margin, with some short but necessary before, vol. i. p. 492, & 494.

* De hoc, vide vol. i. p. 459, & seq. & p. 465.

‡ D'HERBELOT, Bibl. Orient. p. 640.

† See

† Anc. Hist. vol. vi. p. 552, & seq.

(Q) Rabbi Gantz hath given us a long catalogue of the Gaons, and other learned Jews, that then flourished at those two academies (32); but as it consists chiefly of their names, it were of little use to insert them. He tells us, however, of a disaster which happened at that of Sora, about the beginning of the ninth century; viz. its being two whole years without a professor; which was not so much owing to the want of encouragement, as to the divisions and feuds that then reigned among those doctors, and thwarted their elections of proper persons to fill the chair. For that of Pundebita was filled by the famed R. Abumer. This last, at length, sent his son Cohen-Zedek thither, who carried the election; so that this family filled both chairs for a considerable time, and with great credit. The father and the son, the uncle and the nephew, were chiefs of both academies. But, upon their demise, the great prosperity they enjoyed soon made them fall into their old dissensions, as we shall see in the next note.

(R) They brought, at the same time, another misfortune upon themselves, by the revival of their old academic jars. R. Menachem, the son of Joseph, who presided alone in that of Pundebita, and saw himself threatened with the concurrence of a colleague, which the Jews were going to force upon him, so strenuously opposed it, that the dispute ran to a great height. However, after much wrangling and ill blood on both sides, he gained his point; and his rival, named Mattathias, was set aside. Menachem did not survive his disgrace above two years; and left the chair to him, who enjoyed it a much longer time. These feuds were the more unreasonable at these times, because the khalifs were now no longer such encouragers of learning as their predecessors had been; so that both, joined together, occasioned a general decay of it in those two places, which was not soon nor easily recovered.

(S) A little while before that khalif's death, which happened A. C. 891, was discovered on a down in Syria, called the Down of the man run mad for love, a tomb, in which were seven bodies; among which was that of a youth, whose face and lips were still as lively as if he had been in health; and near it a stone, on which was an inscription engraved, which no-body could read. Motamed, desirous to know the contents of it, tried in vain the skill of the most learned Jews and Christians; they all found it impossible to be decyphered (33).

In his reign arose likewise a famous Jewish astronomer in Arabia, named Abulmanassar, who pretended to foretel strange events by the course of the planets, not excepting those which chiefly related to religion (34). He pretended, that the Jewish law had its birth under the conjunction of Jupiter and Saturn; and that the same configuration would usher in anti-christianism. He foretold likewise, that it would be fatal to Christianity; an. 1460; but the event hath proved him a false prophet, and his science an idle dream. He died in the year 886.

(32) Gantz Tzemach Dawid, p. 125, & seq.
A. C. 879. Vide D'Herbelot. Bibliot. Orient. p. 638.

(33) Chronic. Abbassid. ad an. Hegiræ 275, hoc est,
(34) Vide Basnage, ubi sup. lib. ix. c. 2. § ult.

remarks

a remarks on the whole story (T). However that be, it is plain that the new emperor declared himself no less zealous against the Jews than against images; for both they and the Manichees were ordered by him to turn Christians, under the severest penalties; only the latter, being more tenacious of their heresy, suffered themselves to be burnt for it; whilst the Jews took their old method of saving their lives by dissembling; which they found, however, proper means to disallow in private. But as the patrons for images gained their point, notwithstanding the strenuous opposition of the emperor and his followers, they obliged the Jews, whose sincerity they had no great reason to rely on, to subscribe to a formulary, by which they acknowledged themselves worshippers of the cross and holy images, and prayed to God to strike them with Gebe's leprosy, and Cain's tremor, if they did not do it from their hearts <sup>h</sup>.

THEY found themselves still more involved in those devastations which Abdallah, the son of Ali, was making at Jerusalem and Syria, and, among other hardships, were forced, as well as the Christians, to be branded in the hand, to distinguish them from Moslems. The latter, indeed, retired upon it to the Roman territories; but the Jews not only submitted to it, but chose to follow Abdallah's army, in order to enrich themselves with the plunder of the Christians. For that prince, we are told, had always a considerable number of them in his army, to whom he sold all the church plunder he took <sup>i</sup>.

THEY fared much better under Nicephorus, who succeeded Leo about the beginning of the ninth century, and who likewise declared himself for the Iconoclasts; for which it probably came that the other side branded him with having forsaken God, to put himself under the care of the Manichees and Attingans, who were a kind of diviners or soothsayers; but, according to the language of the Anti-Iconoclasts, were persons that dealt with the devil, and could by their art make kingdoms flourish, princes victorious, &c. (U). However, the latter of them were, against all probability, pretended to be of Jewish extract; and it was thought sufficient proof of their being so, that Nicephorus protected their nation, and suffered them to live quietly under him. They were still more in favour under his successor Michael, surnamed the Stammerer, who is by some represented as half Jew, and by others branded with the odious appellation of the Sink of all religions, because he had imbibed something from each, during his younger days. However, though he tolerated them all, and seems to have shewn a particular regard to the Jews, yet, as he was professedly a Christian, and an orthodox, and never swerved from them, it is not unlikely that his being an Iconoclast hath been the main cause of all that slander (W). We are told by Photius, that about this time there

<sup>h</sup> THEOPHAN. ubi sup. sub A. C. 759, & seq.

<sup>i</sup> Apud Goar. Euchol. in THEOPH. p. 149.

(T) The Jews, we are told (35), having cheated Jez-yid in the east, with the promise of a long reign, and being obliged to leave those parts, came from thence thro' Cilicia into Isauria, a province of Asia Minor, over-against the island of Cyprus, where they set themselves down by a fountain, to refresh themselves from the fatigue and heat of the day. A youth of that country came soon after and sat among them, who used to travel about and sell trinkets to the towns and villages adjacent. The Jews, having viewed him more intently, foretold to him that he should become emperor; and only begged, as a reward for their prediction, that when he was come to the crown, he would take from the Christians all their images, as contrary to the second commandment. And hence it came to pass, that when he ascended the throne, under the title of Leo Isaurus, he waged such a violent war against the image worshippers.

We might here, with Mr. Basnage, make several remarks on the improbability of this whole story; but as they are obvious to every thinking reader, it will be sufficient to remind him, that Leo could not be in Isauria, though that was his native place, at the time of the Jews coming thither, seeing Justinian had conveyed him and his family into Thrace before that time, and before he was of age sufficient to carry on the pretended pedling trade about his country. Neither was it the prediction of the Jews, but the orders of that emperor, which got him into his service, seeing he had been enlisted amongst his guards, an. 705: and, lastly, what seems most effectually to destroy the probability of this story, especially of the Jews prediction to him, is the persecution he raised against them, upon his coming to the throne, as will be seen presently; for had there been any such thing, would they not have complained of his ingratitude and injustice? But all this story seems contrived to make one imagine that Leo could not conceive such a violent dislike to images, unless some such enemies to Christianity had inspired him with it; whereas the Jews were so far from wishing them abolished, that the more they were multiplied in the churches, the greater occasion of triumph it gave them over the Christians.

(U) It is not easy to say who either these Manichees or Attingans were. Some make them to be the same, under two different names, and to belong to the heretical sect of the Manichees (36), and to have used some kind of sacraments, &c. Zonaras (37) represents them as a kind of soothsayers, one of whom foretold Michael's succession to the throne, after Nicephorus. But that prince having declared against images, the Jews were again accused as the authors of it, and the Attingans affirmed to be a set of conjurers belonging to that nation, merely to brand the Iconoclasts.

(W) As a proof of this, we may remember, that upon his mounting the throne, tho' by murder and treason, yet so long as there were any hopes of his declaring for the use of images, he was extolled to the skies as a David or Josiah, by no less a man than Theodore Studites, one of their miraculous saints; but as soon as they found themselves disappointed of their hopes, he hath been represented as a monster, and had, among other opprobrious names, that of Sink of all religions, given him.

(35) Theophan. Ann. sub A. C. 615. p. 336. Sigebert sub an. 724. p. 545. Zonar. Ann. tom. iii. Cedren. Ann. in Leon. Isaur. Maimbourg Hist. Iconoclast. l. i. (36) Paul. Diacon. lib. xxiv. p. 552. (37) Ann. tom. iii. p. 100.

A law against them. was a law in force against the Jews, which made it capital for any of them to appropriate any <sup>a</sup> of the church's goods <sup>k</sup>; which is however denied by his commentator Balsamon, because no such one is to be found in the Theodosian code. But might not such a one have been made since, on account of their buying so much of the church's plunder from the Moslems, as was hinted above? And might not the empress Theodora, who persecuted all the Iconoclasts with so much severity, have made such a law against them, for being such professed enemies to the worship of images?

Deceived by a false Messiah. WE know but little of their condition either in Italy or Spain, during these two centuries; except that in the latter, a Jew, named Serenus, taking advantage of the feuds which reigned between that and France, proclaimed himself the Messiah, and drew great numbers of his nation to follow him into Judea, where he was to fix his kingdom. How far that deceiver <sup>b</sup> led them, we cannot find; except that Ambisa, the then governor in those parts, took the opportunity to seize on all the estates and effects which those infatuated people left behind them; those that did not perish by the way, returned to their habitations, where they were at leisure to bewail their folly and loss <sup>l</sup>. Here also, in the reign of Abd-al-Rahman or Abderrama, who had been acknowledged khalif in the west, and built a famed mosque at Cordoua, flourished the famed R. Judah, a man of great learning, who published a philosophical treatise, to shew why the sea did not overflow the land, which was highly applauded by the learned. <sup>c</sup> He likewise translated several books out of Arabic into Hebrew, and compiled a dictionary in the former: all which shews not only that the sciences flourished there among the Jews, but likewise that the first khalifs favoured them more than they did the Christians, whom they obliged to build the stately mosque above-mentioned, with the materials they had taken from them <sup>m</sup>.

Invite the Arabs into Languedoc. LANGUEDOC being at this time (as well as great part of Spain) in the hands of the Visigoths, was much infested with the incursions of the Arabs, who are said to have been in league with, if not invited thither by, the Jews, and to have engaged themselves, by their help, to massacre all the Christians. They are likewise accused to have invited the Saracens out of Spain, to free them from the tyranny which they suffered under the bishop of Tholosa, who, coming accordingly, took Narbonne and Tholosa in their way, and penetrated as far as Lyons, putting all to fire and sword as they went, except the Jews who had assisted them in it. Charlemagne, having afterwards defeated the Saracens, and retaken Tholosa, resolved to punish the treacherous Jews with the utmost severity, who had been the authors of so much bloodshed; but being at length softened by their groans and cries, commuted their punishment, and only executed the heads of them, and condemned the rest of those that dwelt in the city, to receive a box on the ear, three times a year, at the gates of one of the churches, which should be named by the bishop, and to pay a perpetual fine of thirteen pounds weight of wax. The greatest part of this accusation, and of the facts alleged to support it, have been refuted by a late historian <sup>n</sup>; and, indeed, the mild behaviour of the emperor towards the Jews shews nothing less than his supposing them the betrayers of that city, or the authors of the Saracens incursion (X): but as the farther discussion of these points would not only carry us too far, but be a mere repetition of the history of those monarchs, we shall refer our readers for a further account of it to the history of those times, in the second and third volumes, as well as to the authors there quoted. <sup>d</sup>

Their credit under Lewis the Debonair. THEY were still more favoured under Lewis, surnamed the Debonair, whose chief physician was a Jew, named Sedecias, whom some historians have represented as one of the greatest magicians in the world <sup>o</sup>; but who was in such high credit with that prince, that all the courtiers were glad to gain his and his countrymen's friendship with the noblest presents. They had the liberty of building new synagogues; and obtained such singular privileges, as could not fail of inspiring them with uncommon insolence, as well as of raising jealousy in the Christians, as it accordingly happened, more particularly in the diocese of Lyons <sup>p</sup>; where Agobard, bishop of it, did not content himself with forbidding them to buy any Christian slaves, and the keeping of their Sabbath, but forbade likewise, under some frivolous pretences, the Christians to buy any wine, or to deal with them during the time of Lent. The Jews made no difficulty to complain of the bishop's edicts to the emperor, who sent three commissaries to Lyons to inquire into the truth of it; upon which they were immediately <sup>f</sup>

<sup>k</sup> PHOT. NOMOCAN. tit. 9. p. 123, & seq. p. 138, & seq.

<sup>n</sup> BASNAC. ubi sup. l. ix. c. 3. §. 8, & seq.

<sup>l</sup> TRITHEM. Chron. Hirsaugienf.

<sup>i</sup> MARCA Hist. de Bearn. lib. ii. c. 2.

<sup>m</sup> Id. ibid.

<sup>o</sup> DANDEN de suspect. de Hæresi.

<sup>p</sup> Vide AGOBARD. de Insolent. Judæor.

(X) The Jews in his reign boasted that they had been suffered to buy some of the richest vessels of the church, and other costly utensils belonging to the churches, abbeys, &c. which the luxury and avarice of the bishops and abbots had induced them to sell. Charlemagne, being informed of it, forbade, indeed, by a severe law, all such abuses for the future; but neither condemned the Jews to restore those they had, nor restrained them from that shameful commerce, but levelled the penalty wholly against such of his clergy as should be guilty of it.

restored

a restored to their ancient privileges, to the no small mortification of the bishop, who, though otherwise a moderate man, and averse to persecution, could hardly be persuaded of the reality of the emperor's orders, though signed with his own seal. This made him invent some new accusations against them, and to send him fresh remonstrances against them, signed by two other bishops. Everard, the chief commissary, remained firm to the Jewish interest, and all the allegations against them were rejected at court, as false and groundless, as indeed they deserved, being mostly such; and some of them so ridiculous, as to cast no small reflection on the blind zeal of those prelates. The reader may see them in the authors quoted in the margin<sup>1</sup>.

b A G O B A R D, seeing all his endeavours thus frustrated, resolved to take a journey to court, in order to solicit that prince more effectually against the Jews; but he failed of success, being only admitted to an audience of leave, wherein he was permitted to go back as he came, without any farther satisfaction, as he himself complains; so that he was even afraid of baptizing the heathen slaves that belonged to the Jews, for fear of exasperating the court against him, though he offered to pay them the full price for them<sup>2</sup>. But as he did not dare to venture upon this last, without the emperor's leave, he sent to beg his consent to it. What answer he had, we cannot learn; but if one may guess by the dreadful curses he pronounces against the Jewish nation, in his letter to the great and learned Nebudius, bishop of Narbonne, one may conclude that it was not such as he liked; and the spleen which he vents in that uncharitable epistle was the less excuseable, because it not only made the Jews the more flourishing and insolent, but had like to have caused a general defection; insomuch that people not only professed openly that they were to be respected as the posterity of Abraham and the prophets, but began to conform to the Jewish rites in many instances (Y) that were quite scandalous, and a reproach to Christianity.

c THEIR case was not quite so agreeable to them under Charles surnamed the Bald, when Remisius, the bishop of that diocese, caused some of his clergy to preach every Saturday in their synagogues; by which so great a number of their children had like to have been converted, that they were forced to send them away to Vienne in Dauphiné, to Macon and Arles in Provence, and other places, where they were more numerous. Of this the bishop sent a complaint to court, and begged of that prince to send orders to the bishop of Arles, &c. to follow his method; and represented to him, that the conversion of those children was a greater act of charity than the saving them out of the lion's mouth. It is likely he consented to his request; for numbers of Jewish children were baptized, all by their own free choice; and the emperor was soon after poisoned by Sedecias, his Jewish physician, lately mentioned, who is supposed to have been hired to that vile deed by some of his own nation<sup>3</sup>. These are likewise accused to have had a great hand in the troubles which happened under this reign, by the incursion of the Normans into several provinces, particularly that of Aquitain, where they were very numerous; and tho' it is likely the French authors have charged them with more crimes than they were guilty of, such as the betraying the city of Bordeaux, Perigues, &c. which those barbarians plundered and burnt<sup>4</sup>, whilst the Jews are said to be exempted from the common calamity; yet there is no doubt to be made that they resented the loss of so many of their children, tho' no violence was used in converting them (Z); and that they would willingly have joined with any other nation, by whom they might hope to be freed from such a sensible hardship: especially if we add to it, that they were still liable to the ignominious sentence passed against them by Charlemagne, of being buffeted three times a year at the church door, which was not indeed executed on all the Tholosan Jews, but was zeal suppress'd.*

*His untimely

Under Charles the Bald.

Accused of assisting the Normans,

and of other treasons.

<sup>1</sup> A G O B A R D, ubi sup. & Epist. BERNARD. & EVERARD de Judaic. superstition. ad proceres de Baptism. Judaic. vid. & BASNAG. ubi sup. §. 14, & seq.

<sup>2</sup> A G O B A R D, Consult.

<sup>3</sup> Flor. Collect. de Baptism. Hæbr.

<sup>4</sup> DU MOULIN Hist. Normand. p. 38. incert. auct. de

(Y) Thus we are told that some of them began to celebrate the sabbath, instead of the Lord's Day; that many of them chose to go and hear the Jewish rabbies declaim in their synagogues, rather than to hear the sermons preached in their own churches; and that a deacon named Putho, or Paudo, belonging to the court, had renounced the church, and gone over to the synagogue.

(Z) Florus, a deacon of the church of Lions in this reign, tells us, that the bishop above-named contented himself with sending for those young Jews, and asking whether any of them were willing to become Christians; upon which six of them begged on their knees to be baptized, whose example was followed by seven-and-forty more. And that prelate protests to the emperor, that he dismissed the rest of them intactos, untouched (38). But though there might be no violence used in their conversion, yet there might be other indirect means practised to induce them, such as caresses, promises, gifts, &c. equally capable of working upon them, and disagreeable to their parents.

(38) Flor. Collect. de Baptism. Hæbr. ap. Dacher. select. tom. xii.

in time confined to their syndic or head magistrate, who received that punishment in the name of the rest. To this we may add, that though their credit was ever so high at court during the life of the treacherous Sedecias, yet they were liable to many insults and affronts from the populace in cities at a distance from it. Thus, for instance, those of Beziers in Languedoc were yearly wont to be driven about with volleys of stones, from Palm Sunday to the Tuesday in Easter week*, which indignity they at length redeemed by a tribute which they paid to the bishop of the place.

State of the Jews during the 10th and 11th centuries.

Learning begins to flourish.

It is now time to close the ninth century, and to pass on to the tenth and eleventh, which we shall be forced to join, to avoid breaking off the thread of the facts which happened in the intermediate interval. We begin, as usual, with those of the east, who were, during that time, if we may believe their historians, in a most flourishing condition; especially with respect to learning, which began now to revive among them, and the vast number of their doctors that then flourished; whilst almost the rest of the world, especially the Christian countries, were buried in darkness and ignorance; insomuch that the Jewish academies, not being capable of containing the overgrown multitude of their scholars, they were obliged to build a new one (A). They even add, that they never had, in any age, before or since, so many and such excellent doctors as now. It proved, however, but a short-lived glory, partly thro' the broils that were bred between the chiefs of the captivity and their professors and doctors, but more especially by the zeal of the crusaders, who made it an uncommon piece of merit to massacre all the Jews, before they went upon the conquest of the Holy Land; all which, joined together, caused the total downfall of their academies, and the utter expulsion of the nation from those eastern countries, and obliged them to take refuge in Spain and France, and other parts of Europe, of all which we shall now give an account in as few words as the subject will admit of.

Their academies ruined by their dissensions.

R. Saadiab opposed by the chief.

DAVID, the then chief of the captivity, and a man of a haughty ambitious spirit, had raised the prerogative of that dignity beyond all his predecessors (B), and reigned as absolute as any eastern monarch; which raised such dissensions between him and the chiefs of the academies, as quickly hastened their downfall*. That of Pundebita had chosen R. Misbisher for their chief, and David immediately appointed another; and the jealousy which reigned between those two arose to such a height, during the space of five years, that the only expedient they could think of to put an end to it, was to erect two schools in that place, though it had a contrary effect. That of Sora had scarcely raised itself up from the low degree it had formerly sunk into, when David sent likewise thither one R. John Tob, a man so ignorant and unfit, that the academy must have been soon abandoned, had not they sent for a proper person from Egypt, to preside over, and raise the character of it. This was R. Saadiab, a man of great learning and abilities, and who made it his first care to explode the doctrine of the transmigration of souls, which had gone current for many ages, not only among the Persians and Arabs, but even among the Jews. He had already made some progress in it, when the prince of the captivity sent for him to subscribe to a new regulation, which he thought was repugnant to the Jewish laws, and which he therefore stiffly refused to sign, and thereby made him so far his utter enemy, that he was forced to retire, and seek for shelter in some place out of his reach, where he continued till the breach between them was happily made up (C).

THE

* CATEL Hist. Languedoc, lib. iii.

* GANTZ TZEMACH, p. 130.

(A) The reader may recollect that we closed the ninth century with an account of the feuds which reigned between the heads of those academies, and which had quite stopped the progress of learning amongst them. What caused the revival of it at the beginning of this, was the example of the Arabs, among whom it began to flourish about this time. And though it chiefly consisted in the study of physic, dialectics, astronomy, and astrology, yet it so far inspired the Jews with a fresh relish to them, that they immediately applied themselves to the same study, and set their academies again in a flourishing condition.

(B) The Jews complain that their chiefs till then used to pay tribute to the khalifs, but that he found means to shake off that ignominious yoke; to which two things chiefly contributed, viz. his long reign of thirty years and upwards, and the weakness of the then khalif, Mochader, who had been deposed twice by his officers, and was wholly governed by them †.

(C) This refusal, we are told, so exasperated the Jewish chief, that he sent at first his son to him, with a threatening to have his head broke, if he did not obey, and other opprobrious language, with which Saadiab having acquainted his scholars, they raised an uproar about him, in which they gave him some severe blows. The academy was soon divided into two parties, in which that of Saadiab so far prevailed, that David was deposed from his dignity, and his brother Joseph appointed in his room. It was not long, however, before David got himself restored, and Saadiab was obliged to flee, and seek out for a safe retreat, where he continued seven whole years.

It was during this recess that he composed the greatest part of those books which were since published after his death, and go under his name. He found means, nevertheless, to be reconciled to his haughty prince, and was again restored to the chair; and having outlived him by several years, enjoyed it quietly, and with great suc-

† De hoc, vid. sup. vol. i. p. 511, & seq.

a THE Jewish nation was at this time so numerous and powerful, that they reckoned no less Jews very nu- than nine hundred thousand of them in the city of Pherutz-Shiboor (D). This number may merous. probably have been greatly exaggerated by the Jewish writers. However, here it was that Found a new they had founded a new academy, at the head of which was the famed R. Sherira, under academy. whom it flourished about thirty years. He was a man of great learning, but a mortal enemy A. C. 1037. to the Christians, especially to the monks, and was on that account highly respected by his scholars and the whole nation; and, being at length worn out with age, left the chair to his son Hay, whom the Jews styled the most excellent of all the excellent. The rest of his character and writings the reader may see in the margin (E). He is said to have been the last, as well as the greatest, of all the Gaons, or sublimes, and to have presided at that academy about 40 years. He died in the year 1037, and in the 69th of his age*.

b His successor Hezechias, chief of the captivity, was more unfortunate under that khalif, Jews perse- as well as the Jews under him; he being put to death with all his family, except two of his cuted. sons, who fled into Spain, by the time he had enjoyed that dignity about two years: after which the academies were ordered to be shut up, and the learned doctors obliged to retire into the west, whither they were followed by the rest of that nation, to avoid further persecution. A year or two before, that is, about the beginning of Hezechias's reign, happened that famed schism between the sons of Asher and Naphtali, which is looked upon to have given birth to Rise of a new the first Massorites. They are at least the first grammarians that took upon them to revise and schism. correct the sacred books (F). However that be, the persecution, which was partly owing to

* GANTZ ibid. sub A. M. 4797. Juchas. p. 125. Shalshel. Hakkabal. p. 37. BARTOLOC. WOLF, HOT-TINGER Hist. Eccl. N. T. §. xi. p. 495.

cess. However, the deposition of the chief shews that that dignity was neither absolute nor unalienable: besides, we find some of the chiefs of the academies chosen to be princes of the captivity, though this did not often happen. As for the choice of the academic chiefs, it was done by the plurality of votes; tho' the prince's authority did not a little influence it. Sometimes not only the doctors, but the people, joined in the election; and we have an instance of it during this tenth century, when the academy of Pundebita wanting a professor, and two candidates having offered themselves, viz. one Aaron, a rich merchant, and Nehemiah, a learned rabbi, the former was chosen by the interest of the people, and the latter succeeded him about seventeen years after, that is, in the year of Christ 959.

(D) This city, whose name signifies the breach of Sapor, stood about five miles distant from Babylon, and is by some supposed to have been built by Sapor III. king of Persia, a great conqueror, who built many cities in that kingdom. Others ascribe the honour of it to rabbi Shiabour or Sapor XV. though he only founded the academy of it (39).

(E) He is pretended to be lineally descended from king David, and, as such, bore the lion in his arms, as did all the kings of Judah, pursuant to Jacob's prophecy concerning that tribe (40). But what hath rendered him still more famous, was, the number and variety of his writings, such as his treatise on buying or selling, pledges, wages, and on the interpretation of dreams, which last was printed at Venice, among some other pieces of R. Solomon Jarchi, on the same subject (41), anno 1623; at Amsterdam, an. 1636, and 1642; and at Wettersdorff, with the Shakare Zion, or Gates of Zion, an. 1690 (42). His book intitled Misephate Shébugboth, or judgments on oaths, in 20 sections, printed at Venice, an. 1602, in which those on buying and selling, above-mentioned, were likewise printed there. His poetic treatise, intitled, Mussar Hasbekel, or on the forming of the understanding, printed at Paris, anno 1562, and at Venice, anno 1579. His Pirush Shemot 42 and 72, or an exposition of the names of God, written with 42 and with 72 letters (43). And, lastly, his questions on the book called Jetzirah, or a treatise of the formation, is remarkable for shewing the manner in which the great name of God was antiently written at Jerusalem; which being somewhat curious and uncommon, we have here subjoined (44).

We shall forbear inserting the conjectures which some learned Christians have drawn from the triplicate number of o's or circles, which they think to have been meant to signify so many lights, implying thereby the mystery of the three persons in the Godhead. R. Hay was a great cabbalist, and hath not only explained the terms of that art, but his treatise of the voice of God, with power, is full of cabbalistical principles. His reputation was so great among those of his nation, that they flocked to him from all parts, to consult and hear him; and he was chosen chief of the academy of Pundebita, as well as of that of Pherutz Shiboor, in which last he had succeeded his father, from the 29th year of his age. There is even some probability that he was chosen chief of the captivity, during his father's lifetime; but they both did, by some means, so exasperate those of their nation, that they fell into disgrace some time after, under the khalifat of Al Kader, who, being come to the crown, † raised a kind of persecution against the Jews, for having taken too great advantage of the civil discords which then reigned, and had assumed greater privileges than they had a right to claim. Among them Sherira, and his son Hay, were accused of having raised their authority beyond its due bounds, and condemned to be stripped of all their wealth, dignities, and privileges. The former, who was then near 100 years of age, was apprehended and imprisoned; but the latter had the good luck to escape, and soon after to be restored to his academy, over which he presided till the year 1037 (45).

(F) They were called Moses and Aaron; and as to their styling themselves the sons of Asher and Naphtali, (39) Vide D'Herb. Bibl. Orient. sub voc. (40) Vide Gen. xlix. 9. See also Anc. Hist. vol. i. p. 548, & seq.

(41) Bartoloc. Bibl. Rabbin. vol. ii. p. 387. (42) Vide Wolf Bibl. Hebr. p. 345. (43) Vide Noflos Cbochmah, p. 195. & Wolf, ubi sup. (44) De hoc aut. vid. plur. in Gantz Tzemach David ad An. M. 4757, seu Chr. 997. Sepher Juchasin, p. 125. Shalshel Hakkabalab, p. 37. † De hoc, vide vol. i. p. 595, & seq.
(45) Gantz, ubi sup. & al. sup. citat.

Expelled from the east.End of their princes.Persecuted in Egypt.Restored,
A. C. 1026.

to the civil discords then reigning among the khalifs (of which we have spoken more fully a in their history †), and partly to the jealousy which they conceived of the chief of the captivity †, and of their raising some revolt, proved so severe and violent, as to bring on not only the destruction of their family, the shutting up of all the academies, as we lately hinted, but likewise to oblige the rest of the Jewish nation to seek for refuge, some in the deserts of Arabia, and others in the provinces of the west. And here it is that most authors place the total extinction of the dignity of the princes of the captivity; though, if we may believe the Jewish travellers Benjamin de Tudela and rabbi Petachiah, who visited those parts in the 12th century; they still found one of those chiefs among the dispersed Jews in Persia, who was called Samuel, and boasted himself lineally descended from the great prophet of that name; and, for proof of it, produced a regular genealogy from the one quite down to the other; b which, if true, proves, 1st, that those princes were not all of the lineage of David, as the Jews pretend: secondly, that they were not wholly abolished in the 11th century, tho' they must be supposed to have sunk much from their former splendor and authority, if they really enjoyed more than the bare name. And as for the academies, especially those of Sora, Pundebita, and Pherutz Siboor, it plainly appears that they were quite abolished from the year 1039; and if any schools were left in those parts, that assumed the name of academies, they were too poor and obscure to deserve it (G). We have now nothing more to mention of them in the east, except that short-lived persecution which they suffered in Egypt, under the reign of Hakem, who pretended to set up a new religion, opposite to all others, and which was that of the Drusi, little known to us, if it was not the same with that of the c antient Druids, but which he had blended with a vast number of the most extravagant and impious notions not worth repeating; which he affirmed to have had from the Deity. The vast number of disciples which he gained among the heathens, made him resolve to persecute the Christians and Jews, as the only ones that opposed his doctrine; the latter of whom he obliged to wear a mark of distinction, and ordered all their synagogues to be shut up, and them to be cudgelled into compliance; but as he was of an inconstant temper, he soon changed his mind, and restored them to their ancient liberty † before he died (H). But it is now high time to pass into the west.

† Vol. i. p. 600, &amp; seq.

† SOLOMON BEN VIRG. Sheveth Jehudah, p. 307.

‡ See the Kitab

Almakid, translated by M. DE LA CROIX, and D'HERBELOT, Bibl. Orient. sub voc.

that was the name of their tribe, and not of their parents. Aaron hath been supposed by some critics (46) to have been a native of Tiberias, because that academy, over which he presided, took his part against Moses; and his eastern followers, who preferred the corrections of his antagonists. It were lost labour to inquire after his native country; but it is plain, from the Jewish historians, that he taught in the east under Hezekias, from which he might afterwards retire to Tiberias, to avoid persecution. And here it was that the doctors gave him the preference to Moses, as he had preferred that city and academy to all others, to take refuge in. However, the dispute between him and his competitor was not about the points, as Capellus imagined, but about the terms of Scripture.

A learned critic in those matters, who had examined the corrections of Aaron, both printed and in manuscript, makes very light of them (47), and thinks them posterior to the Masorah, and though quite new, yet too trifling, notwithstanding the noise which that division hath made, which is no more than common, most of the school disputes being of that nature. However, if he is right, it still shews the authority of the Hebrew to be the greater, and that the original text had till then been so far preserved in its purity, as to stand in no great need of their correction.

That these two competitors flourished in the eleventh century, seems indisputable; not only because they taught in the Babylonish academies, which were shut up soon after, but because the learned Maimonides, who flourished in Egypt in the ensuing century, formed his own copies from that of Ben Asher, so that this last must have lived some years before him, seeing his corrections had been already approved in Egypt. And if those revisers are still more ancient, as is generally pretended, then are they the less to be charged with novelty (48).

(G) The Christians have taken occasion from thence to triumph over the Jews, and to prove to them, from the prophecy of Jacob (49), that it is vain and absurd in them to expect the Messiah to come, seeing, by their own confession, the sceptre hath been so long departed from Judab, &c. And it is true, indeed, that they have now no longer that pretence to invalidate the force of that noble prediction against them. But whoever considers it in its full extent and purport, as we have endeavoured to state it in several parts of this work (50), will easily see that the good old patriarch could not mean, by the words sceptre and lawgiver, such princes as those chiefs of the captivity were, who, even in their most prosperous state, were at best mere tributary slaves to the princes under whom they lived, subject to their laws and capricious will, and liable to be deposed, imprisoned, or even put to death, by them. And can we think that such an imaginary dignity, which was neither hereditary nor confined to the tribe of Judab, could be the sceptre and lawgiver there meant? But we have sufficiently proved, in the places last quoted out of this work, that they were long departed, from them, and shall dwell no longer upon it.

(H) Hakim was murdered by order of his sister, A. C. 1026, in the mountain of Moccatam, to which he was wont to repair every morning, under pretence of holding an intercourse with the Deity. Hamzah, who had been his master, took the advantage of the privacy of the fact, to persuade his disciples, that he had only disappeared for a time, and would return again after a while; and the Drusi, his disciples, who are now masters of Mount Libanus, of Berythus, and some other cities in Syria, expect him as much as the Jews do their Messiah (1).

(46) Copel. Arcan. Punctat.

c. 4. §. 11.

&amp; seq.

(49) Genes. xlix. 10.(1) D'Herbelot Bibl. Orient. p. 418.(47) Simon. Hist. Crit. V. T.(50) See Anc. Hist. vol. i. p. 462, & seq. (G). vol. iv. p. 256,Kitab Almikaid, translated by Peter de la Croix.

a WE begin with Spain, where the wars between the Saracens and the Christians, which continued during the 10th century, gave them such time to breathe, that their schools were in a flourishing condition under the khalifats of Abd-Allah and Abd-Al Ramab, the latter of which reigned above 50 years with great success, whilst the Jews grew numerous and wealthy, and abounded with learned doctors, both Spaniards and of other nations. Among the latter was the celebrated Moses, surnamed Cloathed with sackcloth, because, in his coming from the eastern countries, he had been taken by some corsairs, and sold to the Jews of Cordowa, who paid his ransom out of charity. Moses being still destitute of every thing, and even of clothes to cover his nakedness, wrapped himself about with a sack, and in that despicable guise used daily to go and hide himself in some corner of the school, to hear their lectures. It was not long, however, before he gave them such pregnant proofs of his learning and merit, by his questions and answers, that the then professor yielded the chair to him of his own accord. He was soon after chosen chief of the nation, with a considerable income: but his desire of returning to his native country had like to have deprived them of him, had not Hakem, the khalif then reigning*, put a stop to his going, for some reasons of state, and retained him to explain the thalmud to the Spanish Jews (I), and to determine all their controversies. Moses, according to the Jewish style, reigned with great credit and applause till the year 997, and left the throne, or chair, to his son Enoch. Jews in Spain in the 10th and 11th centuries. Moses Sack-cloth chosen chief A. C. 968.

HASHEYM, who succeeded his father Hakem at Cordowa, went still farther, and caused the thalmud to be translated into Arabic, whether out of curiosity to know what that so much boasted book contained, or perhaps rather to render it more common there, and so prevent the Jews frequently going to Bagdad or Jerusalem. R. Joseph, one of Moses's disciples, was appointed to preside over the version, and succeeded so well in it, that it made him quite proud and arrogant, so that he strenuously opposed the election of Enoch to the chair. Nevertheless, Enoch's party not only carried it against him, but caused him to be excommunicated; upon which he first applied to Hasheym; but he refusing to meddle in the dispute, Joseph was forced to leave Spain, and took the road to Bagdad, in hopes to have been protected by the famed R. Hay, who was then chief there: but he also sent him word, that he could not receive a man who had been excommunicated by the Spanish synagogue; so that he was obliged to retire to Damascus, where he died some years after, without being able to obtain a reversion of his sentence<sup>a</sup>. Thalmud translated into Arabic. R. Joseph excommunicated.

THE wars in Spain being still as violent during the 11th century as they had been during the 10th, the Jews reaped no small benefit from it during the first four years of it; in which R. Samuel Levi, being secretary and prime minister to the king of Granada, was by him created chief of the Jewish nation; and used all his credit to promote the interest and honour of it, and even to the sending for some of the most learned doctors from Babylon, Afric, and Egypt, to whom he was a very liberal benefactor. He had even the good fortune to see himself succeeded by his own son in all his dignities, though his being a haughty and arrogant youth was no small grief to his father, who was particularly famed for his humility and sweetness of temper, even in his most prosperous state. But their tranquillity was soon disturbed by an unlucky accident; for one rabbi Halevi, a learned and zealous Jew, having undertaken to convert the Moslems to the Jewish religion, to which the version of the thalmud into Arabic, lately mentioned, was a great help, soon awoke the jealousy of the Granadan king, who could not but resent so bold an attempt against the then established religion, by one that was barely tolerated. He therefore caused the Jewish rabbi to be apprehended and hanged; after which he began such a fierce persecution of that nation, that about 1500 families of them that lived within his dominions felt the dreadful effects of it; which proved the more severe, as they were, by a long series of prosperity, become very wealthy and powerful<sup>b</sup>; and because there was reason to fear that the other princes of Spain would have followed his example; nevertheless, they had the good luck to see it quickly stopt there, and without spreading itself out of that kingdom (K). R. Sam. Levi chief of the Jews. A. C. 1027. A. C. 1055. Persecuted in Granada, A. C. 1046.

* De hoc & præced. vid. sup. vol. i. p. 423, & seq. & p. 495, & seq.

<sup>b</sup> SOLOM. BEN VIRG. p. 8.

<sup>a</sup> GANTZ TZEMACH, p. 130.

(I) That book was so little known at this time in Spain, it seems, that, when any disputes arose among them, they used to send deputies to the Babylonish academies, to have them decided by their doctors. The very prayers which they used on the grand expiation-day, and other national fasts, had been composed by R. Miffim, one of the Babylonish chiefs. The khalif, who was an Ommiade, and was apprehensive lest this frequent intercourse in the east, where the Abassides, his mortal enemies, reigned, should give rise to some dangerous change, put at once an end to it, by setting up this Moses for their oracle; by whom all disputes and controversies were decided without going farther.

(K) However, as it was so violent while it lasted, the Jews took it into their head that God had caused that disaster to be bewailed a long time beforehand, because they had then kept a solemn fast all over Spain, on the 9th of December, the day on which this persecution afterwards began.

Ferdinand opposed by the bishops.

A. C. 1080.

K Peter refuses to persecute them.

A. C. 1096.

Men of learning.

Feuds and broils among them.

THEY would have undergone a more severe and destructive one under king Ferdinand (who, at the instigation of his bigotted wife, was going to sanctify his war against the Saracens by the extirpation of the Jews) had not the bishops, and even the pope, Alexander II. put a stop to his furious zeal, by publicly opposing and condemning it (L). But what most probably put them out of all danger from that monarch and his successor, was the revolution which the Moors caused in Afric, by which Alphonso, distressed on every side, found himself obliged to befriend and care for, instead of oppressing them, in order to make them serviceable to him with their purses and assistance. Accordingly they were promoted by him to considerable posts, and obtained such other privileges, that pope Gregory quite disapproved of them (M), though his censures could not prevail upon him to retract them. His grandson Peter was no less deaf to the remonstrances of Nicholas de Valentia, who endeavoured to divert him from joining in the crusade or holy war, lately published, by representing to him, that he had too many dangerous enemies in his bosom, meaning the Jews, to need to go so far to seek new ones. He insisted, in particular, that they hated the Christians to such a degree, that they never gave them any other than a middling greeting (the reader may see the meaning of that obscure expression in the margin (N);) to which he added many other incentives, equally ridiculous, to which the king, who was averse to persecution, only lent a deaf ear. However, this did not save the Jews from being massacred by the crusaders in many parts of Spain, by way of begging a blessing on their holy expedition.

NOTWITHSTANDING all these persecutions, Spain produced a great number of learned rabbies during this 11th century, particularly the celebrated Samuel Cophsis, a native of Cordowa, who published a commentary on the Pentateuch, the manuscript of which is still extant in the Vatican library. Those who have examined it, commend it as an excellent work, only too full of allegories. He died A. C. 1034. Soon after him flourished no less than five Isaacs at once, all of them famed for their writings, whose farther character and works the reader will find in the margin (O). But this increase of learned men did not fail of increasing their old feuds and quarrels, and still more between their disciples and them. For these, having gained a taste of polite learning, wanted to dive still deeper into the arts and sciences, which their masters were no less careful and desirous to prevent. We have had frequent occasion, through the course of their history, to observe, that they bred them up in a singular contempt for

(L) That pontiff having been acknowledged in Spain for the lawful pope, against his competitor Honorius, he wrote them a letter, in which he highly commends their laudable opposition to Ferdinand's bloody design against the Jews, by which he was going to take away the lives of those to whom probably God might grant light and immortality. He condemns his zeal as furious and unchristian, and reminds him of the example of pope Gregory the great, who had strenuously opposed the like persecutions, and the pulling down of the Jewish synagogues. He concludes with shewing them the difference between the Saracens, against whom the prince was going to wage war, and who were persecutors, and the mortal enemies of the Christians, and the Jews, who were only a kind of slaves under them (2). It hath been questioned whether this letter was directed to the bishops of France, or those of Spain; but the continual wars which the Spanish monarchs were waging against the Saracens mentioned in it, sufficiently shews that it was directed by that pontiff to the bishops of Spain.

(M) One of them, especially, that pope highly resented, viz. his setting up the Jews to be judges over Christians, for which he upbraids him with having set up the synagogue of Satan above the church of Christ (3). Alphonso, however, was too much intangled with his war to listen to his remonstrances; so that he let the Jews enjoy all their privileges and liberties, in spite of all the pontiff's orders to the contrary.

(N) He intimated by it, that when the Jews saw a Christian afar off coming towards them, they prayed to the gods and goddesses to destroy him; when he was come nigh enough to hear him, they wished him health and a long life; and when he was gone far enough out of hearing, they prayed to God that the earth might open and swallow him up, as it did Corah and his rebellious crew; or that the sea might overwhelm him, as it had done Pharaoh (4).

(O) One of them was called Isaac Alphesi, because he was come over from Africa, and out of the kingdom of Fez, into Spain, probably with the Morabethons, or, as Marianna calls them, Almoravides, who were descended from the Arabian Homerites, who became Christians in the reign of Justinian. The Morabethons having conquered Mauritania, under their general Abubekker, his nephew Joseph extended his conquests as far as Spain, where his family reigned till the 12th century. And this Isaac Alphesi may be supposed to have come thither about the same time, where he was looked upon as the most learned man of his age, and became chief of the captivity there. His epitaph, which was wrote in hexameters, was to this purport: "Let it be engraven on this stone, that the light of this world is gone out, and that the fountain of wisdom is deposited within this tomb. Daughters of Sion, come and weep; the world is buried and stricken with blindness; weep and sigh, for the ark and the tables of the law are broken in pieces with this doctor (5)."

Another was the son of Baruch, who deduced his genealogy from Baruch, Jeremiah's secretary, and pretended that his family had passed into Spain at the destruction of Jerusalem by Titus. He was such a lover and master of the mathematics, that the king of Granada called him the Mathematician, and heard him read several lectures on that science at court. He continued in that country, greatly esteemed, till his death, which happened anno 1007, when he gave an ample proof of his repentance for having fallen out with the former Isaac, and having rejected all means of being reconciled to him: for, finding his death approaching, he sent his son to him to obtain his pardon; which the other, who was as near his latter end, readily granted, and, as a token of his sincerity, took care of that youth's education whilst he lived. The other three were likewise men of learning, but of the same proud leaven, and so not worth dwelling longer upon.

(2) Alexand. II. Epist. xxxiv. p. 1183. ubi sup. lib. ix. c. 5.

(4) Solom. Ben Virg. p. 73.

(3) Greg. VII. Epist. i. lib. ix. Epist. ii. p. 277. Vide Basnag.

(5) Ap. Dav. Gantz, ubi sup. p. 134.

a all kind of foreign learning; and we find, in the apostil to the text of the Mishna, a severe curse intailed upon him that breeds up a boy, and him that suffers his son to learn the Greek tongue; as if the one was equally impure as the other. But by this time we are now upon, they found it next to impossible to suppress either the knowledge of foreign tongues, or many of their studious disciples consequently from diving into their books, and conceiving a singular liking for polite literature: so that the professors now began to divide themselves on that account, some by endeavouring to suppress and condemn that profane curiosity, others by restraining it within some limits, and a third sort by giving it its full scope and liberty (P); and these last so far prevailed, that the young students began to apply themselves so closely to the study of the mathematics, and other sciences, that Spain, in a little time, produced a great number of learned men among them<sup>c</sup>.

It proved far otherwise in France, where the scarcity of rabbies of any note was such, during these two centuries, that we do not read of above five or six that distinguished themselves for their learning. The most celebrated of them was R. Gershom, or Gersion, who, whether a native of France, or of Mentz in Germany, as most people pretend, published there his book of constitutions, which, though it was a long time before it could meet with the approbation of the rest of the Jewish doctors, yet it was at length received as a body of excellent laws, about the year 1204, and its author dignified with the title of Light of the French captivity<sup>d</sup>. He is affirmed by some to have died an. 1028, and by others 40 years later. So that those who pretend that he flourished in the ninth century are egregiously mistaken. He had some eminent disciples, whose characters and writings the reader will find in the margin (Q).

But among the rest of the French rabbies of this century, we must not omit the author of the pretended history of Josipp Ben Gorion, whom, as we have elsewhere shewn, the Jews have substituted for the Greek historian of that name*. This Jewish impostor, to gain the greater credit with his readers, begins with giving himself out for a royal prince and priest of the Jewish nation, in whose person Providence had united those two dignities, to war against their enemies. He calls himself the Joseph full of the spirit of wisdom and understanding, of counsel, fortitude, knowledge, and of the fear of the Lord; and who sacrificed his life to the defence of the sanctuary and people of God<sup>e</sup>. He adds, that one of his soldiers one day cried aloud to him, Thou art the man of God; blessed be the God of Israel, who hath created the soul that animates thee, and hath endowed thee with such extraordinary wisdom! And when taken by the Romans, their army asked each other with tears, Is that the person so admired among the Jews, and so dreaded by the Romans? How is he caught, who was alone once able to inject terror into our army, and hath filled the universe with the fame of his valiant deeds? Titus himself was no less taken with his person and courage, and raised him above all the priests and Levites of his nation (R).

<sup>c</sup> GANTZ & al. ubi sup. <sup>d</sup> Id. ibid. BARToloc. ubi sup. tom. iv. p. 69, & seq. WOLF Bibl. Hæbr. sub voc. * See Anc. Hist. vol. iv. p. [292]. <sup>e</sup> Vide LADISL. Decret. lib. i. c. 10. ap. Verbocz. Corp. jur. Hungar.

(P) It was indeed in a manner impossible for them to prevent the learning of foreign tongues; for how could they that lived in Egypt avoid speaking Greek, those in the Roman empire Latin, those in Spain the Saracen or Arabic? Notwithstanding which, R. Solomon, who was professor at Barcelona, in this eleventh century, took upon him to excommunicate every Jew that should begin to learn Greek before he was 20 years of age; which, tho' a wide step from the rigidity of the ancient law, proved so little satisfactory, that R. Mar, without minding his anathema, gave these young students a full liberty to learn both the languages and sciences.

(Q) The most celebrated of them was R. Jaacob, the son of Jekar, a great musician and casuist, whose decisions are received with the greatest esteem, and cannot be rejected without incurring a crime. He is said to have flourished about the same time with his master; and to have died in the same year. The next was R. Judah, surnamed Abercellonita, who was a professor of laws at Barcelona, and wrote a treatise on the rights of women, and another on the various Jewish calculations of time; such as from the exod, from the first Jewish monarch, from the entry of Alexander into Jerusalem, &c. which last was followed down to the 10th century, when rabbi

Sherirah, formerly mentioned, obliged the Jews to reckon from the creation of the world. Judah likewise published some sermons. The last worth mentioning was R. Moses Hadarshian, or The Preacher. These two last introduced preaching in their synagogues, which had been till then much neglected; but the latter seems by his title of Preacher to have been the most admired, and was likewise the author of the Beresith Rabbah, or large comment on Genesis, often quoted by Christians (6) against the Jews, and by us frequently in their preceding history. He died in the year 1070, and left behind him a no less celebrated disciple, viz. Solomon Far-chi, or the Lunatic, whom we have had frequent occasion to mention in this chapter.

(R) Thus much we thought necessary to mention, to give a sketch of the modesty and eloquence of this Jewish braggadocio; in which we need not wonder that a man who designed to impose such a forgery on the world, should be so lavish of his breath in blowing his own trumpet; though we may justly say, that so many of his own nation should be infatuated enough to join in the chorus, and raise his character and panegyric even beyond what he himself had done, as we have had occasion to shew at the beginning of this chapter.

(6) Vid. int. al. Pet. Galatin. v. c. l. viii. c. 11. & alib. pass. Raym. Pugio Fidei Mic. Neander & al. mult.

His history fabulous, and wrote in opposition to the true Josephus.

WE have already taken occasion to speak of his fabulous history, and the occasion of his imposing it on the world in an age so far remote from that in which he pretends to have wrote it, as well as of the time in which it began to be made known to the world, viz. A. C. 1140. His imposture hath however succeeded so well, by his pirating from the Greek and original Josephus such facts as were to his purpose, misrepresenting and adding such others as he pleased, and couching his history in the Hebrew tongue, that the Greek one became not only neglected, but suspicious, and at length rejected as a forgery by those of his own nation. So that we need not wonder if the generality of them have since extolled it to the skies, and so many learned men among the Christians have been deceived by it. As to the fuller confutation of the author and his history, and the many falsehoods, contradictions, absurdities, &c. which plainly prove its forgery, we shall, for brevity's sake, refer our readers to the authors quoted in the margin<sup>f</sup>, and proceed with our Jewish history in other nations in Europe.

Jews in Hungary, A. C. 1092.

WE begin to find them flourishing in Hungary towards the latter end of the 11th century, when St. Ladislaus, who then reigned, convened a synod, in which were made several regulations, such as if a Jew should marry, or, as the act words it, sibi associaverit, a Christian woman, or buy a Christian slave, they should be set at liberty, and the price given for them confiscated to the bishop<sup>g</sup>. His son Coloman being come to the throne, forbade them, by a new law, the using of Christian slaves; but permitted them to buy and cultivate lands, on condition they used no other but Pagan slaves, and settled only in such places as were under the jurisdiction of a bishop<sup>h</sup>. These two laws shew the Jews to have been numerous and powerful in that kingdom.

Success in Hungary and Bohemia.

THEY were no less so in Germany and Bohemia, where they had built many stately synagogues in most of their noted cities, particularly in the former, at Treves, Cologne, Mentz, and Frankfurt. They had likewise settled themselves in the latter ever since the 10th century, when they assisted the Christians against the irruptions of the barbarians, and for which they were allowed to have a synagogue there also (S). They underwent indeed, in several parts, some grievous persecutions from the zealots, such as those we have hinted at under the last note; but the emperor Henry (not the Vth, as the Jews have mistaken it<sup>i</sup>, but his father, who was then at variance with pope Gregory about some investitures) having declared himself for them, they were not only resettled in their antient abodes, but had, by his orders, all the goods refunded which they had been plundered of. This occasioned fresh complaints and accusations, they being charged with having magnified their losses, in order to enrich themselves by a more plentiful restitution, which, if true, they easily bore the scandal of, for the sake of the advantage they gained by it.

Protected by the emperor, A. C. 1096.

Massacred by the crusaders, A. C. 1094.

BUT what most contributed to kindle the heat and fury of the zealots against them, was the march of the crusaders through Cologne, Mentz, Worms, Spire, and other cities of Germany, where they committed fresh massacres in every one from April to July, on those that refused to be converted. The Jewish historians reckon but 5000 that were either butchered or drowned; and as to the number of those that saved themselves by dissembling, it was beyond compute<sup>k</sup>; and they are so far from having exaggerated the particulars of that persecution,

<sup>f</sup> COLODAN. Reg. decr. lib. i. ad an. 1100, apud Verbocz. ubi sup. p. 65. BEN GORION. Hist. Jud. libri sex, p. 309, & 346. <sup>g</sup> JOSIPPON seu JOSEPH

pass. <sup>h</sup> De hoc, vid. BASNAG. Hist. des Juifs, lib. ix. an. 6.

<sup>i</sup> Shalsheleth Hakkabalah, sub A. M. 4856, p. 110. <sup>k</sup> Id. ibid.

(<sup>c</sup>) We are told, however, that they were so much terrified by a variety of prodigies which seemed to threaten the destruction of the world, that having lost all hopes of the coming of the Messiah, they for the most part embraced Christianity. And indeed, if we may believe those historians, this eleventh century was remarkably pregnant with such wonders, and nothing so common as the then intercourse between this and the other world; there being scarce a night in which there were not some travellers from the one to the other. Pope Benedict XII. was seen to come from thence, mounted on a black horse, to give notice of a bishop being cruelly tormented there, because all his alms had been the fruit of his extortions; and to advise his surviving brother to open the chests of his ill-gotten wealth, and distribute it to the poor. Others came to inform against whole monasteries of nuns, who were employed in making drawers for men, which made them burn with lust towards them. All which, and many more, passed for current in those times.

However, those prodigies had not converted such numbers of the Jews, but that there was still left a quantity sufficient to stir up the zeal of a priest named Gotschal against them, who, at the head of 15000 banditti, committed the most horrid outrages against them, and was supported and encouraged in it by some of the crowned heads. He had already gone through Franconia, and was entered Hungary, when they were caught plundering the Christians as well as the Jews, ravishing their wives, and giving themselves up to all kind of debaucheries: and he was surprised in the midst of them, and slain with the greatest part of his troops (7). The landgrave of Lininghen having taken it in his head to follow his steps, and declare himself a persecutor of the Jews, had likewise made some havock among them, and penetrated as far as the Hungarian borders, when he was likewise surprised and defeated by the brave Hungarians, who were come to put a stop to his farther progress (8).

(7) Moulin's Chron. German. l. xv & xvi. p. 123—126. A. C. 1089.

(8) Id. ibid. & Pistor. Hist. Germ. tom. iii. sub that

a that the Christians make the number of the former much greater, and the manner of it even more dreadful<sup>1</sup> (T): and as for the latter, they only made a shew of Christianity till the storm was over, and relapsed all into Judaism by the next year. The bishop of Spires, more humane than the rest, not only protected those that took refuge under him, but caused some of their persecutors to be hanged. The Bavarian annalists give us a still more dreadful account of those in their country<sup>m</sup>, of whom they tell us above 12,000 were slain; and all agree that the number of those who perished in other parts of Germany was almost infinite.

THIS was the first crusade; the next, which was published 50 years after, might have proved no less violent against them (it being promoted with great zeal and success along the Rhine by the hermit Rodolphus, who was charged with the care of it; the common cry of the preachers being then, that they must exterminate all the enemies of Christ within their own territories, before they went to seek new ones in foreign parts) had not this pulpit eloquence alarmed them time enough to give them an opportunity of retiring to Nuremberg, and other principal cities, where they met with a kind reception and a protection from the emperor. It must be owned, however, that that hermit's persecuting doctrine was displeasing to many Christian bishops and others, and that St. Bernard in particular wrote a letter to the archbishop of Mentz, in which he highly condemned it, and was for having that fiery zealot sent back to his solitude<sup>n</sup>. Nevertheless, the flame was spread far and near by his trumpeters, not only in Germany, but in most other parts of Europe, and vast multitudes were massacred by the Christians; besides a much greater number, if we may believe the Jewish chronologers, who, being driven to despair by the cruelties they were made to undergo, made away with themselves<sup>o</sup>. We are now come to the end of the eleventh century, which was closed with those butcheries in most parts of Europe, and with a fuller account of which our readers will easily dispense, whilst we now take a view of their more peaceable and flourishing state in the east, during the 12th century.

THE author whom we have followed, and whose character the reader will see in the mar-Benjamin of gin (V), tells us, that he found several considerable synagogues, and a great number of Jews, who lived there at their ease, and enjoyed the liberty of their religion unmolested<sup>p</sup>. That of Bassorah, mentioned in the last note, and situated in an island of the Tigris, had

<sup>1</sup> Vide Addit. ad LAMBERT SCHAFFNABURG. PISTOR. Hist. Germ. tom. iii. ad A. C. 1089. BERTHOLD. CONSTANT. Append. ad Herm. ap. WURSTIS, tom. i. p. 375. Hist. Trevor. ap. DACHER. specil. tom. xii. p. 236. <sup>m</sup> AVENTIN. Annal. Bosor. lib. v. p. 361. <sup>n</sup> BERN. Epist. 133. tom. i. <sup>o</sup> GANTZ TZEMACH, p. 133, & seq. <sup>p</sup> Itinerar. p. 59, & seq.

(T) These inform us, that there were no less than 1400 burnt at Mentz; and that the disorder which happened on that occasion, was the cause of one half of that city being reduced to ashes. Those of Worms went to beg the bishop's protection; who refused to grant it, unless they turned Christians; and as the people were very eager, they gave them so little time to deliberate, that the most intimidated of them immediately accepted of baptism; whilst others, more desperate, put an end to their own lives. Much the same was done at Triers, or Treves, where the very women, at the sight of the coming crusaders, murdered their own children; telling them, that it was much better thus to dispatch and send them into Abraham's bosom, than to leave them to the mercy of the Christians. Others, loading themselves with stones, flung themselves and their children into the Rhine (9).

(V) We shall, for want of a better guide, be chiefly obliged, for the account of the Jews during this 12th century, both in the east and west, to the noted traveller of their nation, Benjamin, surnamed of Tudela, a city in Navarre, his native place, and often quoted in this chapter; who tells us, that he had visited most of these parts. But we have had occasion before now to observe that he is, in the main, a very fabulous writer, and hath not scrupled to interlard his account with many absurd and incredible stories, to raise the credit of his nation. He hath even invented new countries, and mentioned kingdoms, cities, and places, not then in being; and to others he ascribes many ridiculous particulars, scarce worth mentioning after him. We shall, however, give our readers an instance or two by way of sample to the rest, which we design to pass by.

Of this nature is what he tells us of the city of Pethora, the residence of Balaam, said by Moses to have been near the river Euphrates (10), and where our traveller tells us was still standing the tower in which he lived, and which had been built by his magic art; and the synagogue pretended to have been built by Ezra, upon his leaving Babylon to return into Judea with the rest of the captivity; as if that great Jewish leader would spend his time in building such places in Babylon for his brethren, when he was going to lead them thence back into their own land. Another of his synagogues he mentions in a city built by Omar, one of the first and most successful khalifs, at the foot of Mount Ararat (11), where the ark rested, and with the remains of which he built a stately mosque; as if those materials, supposing them to have lasted ever since the flood, could be fit for such an edifice. Besides, that city did not stand at the foot of Ararat, but on the mouth of the Tigris, and seems designed to prevent the Persians from sailing into India through the Persian gulph, and was called Balsora, or Bassorah. These are some of the absurdities with which he hath blended the relation we are speaking of, but which hinder not its giving us the best general idea of the state of the Jewish nation that can be had during this century. However, as the route which he took from Europe thither is contrary to the method we have followed in this chapter, we shall stick to this last, and begin, as we have hitherto done, with the eastern parts, and those in particular there which lie along the Euphrates.

(9) Vide Hist. Germ. & al. sup. citat. & seq. & notes.

(10) See Numb. xxii. & seq. See also Anc. Hist. vol. i. p. 287,

(11) Itinerar. p. 59, & seq.

Jews in the east.

Prince of the captivity's tomb, and other antiquities.

Jews at Bagdad favoured.

Not independent of the monarchs.

4000 Jews; that of Almozal, answering to the ancient Nineveh, and built of its old materials, had 7000 more. In this last he found Zacheus, a prince descended from the house of David, and Beren al Pheres, a famed astronomer, who associated himself as a kind of chaplain to king Zin-Aldin (W). Passing through Rehobotb, in his way to Bagdad, he found 2000 settled there, and 500 at Karchemish, famed for the defeat of Pharoah Necho, and situate on the banks of the Euphrates. Pundebita, or, as he writes it, Pum-beditba, once so famed, as we have seen, though much sunk from its pristine grandeur, and then named Aliobari, or Eluebar, had still a few doctors, though almost forsaken, and about 2000 Jews, some of whom applied themselves to the study of the law. It shewed still the tomb of Bostenai, a prince of the captivity, who had married a daughter of the king of Persia, and those of two celebrated doctors, and the two synagogues they had built before their death<sup>a</sup>. The academy of Sora, once so famed for being the residence of several Jewish chiefs of the lineage of David, as well as for the number of its scholars and learned professors, had likewise lost most of its ancient glory; and the same he says also of that of Nabardea, whose schools were all demolished, and the doctors retired into the west (X). We have given an account of this desertion in speaking of the foregoing century; nevertheless, though those parts had now neither academies nor learned rabbies, the Jews were still very numerous there; and our author tells us he found no less than 10,000 of them at Obkeray; which city he pretends had been built by king Jechoniah, during the Babylonish captivity.

From thence he came to Bagdad, where Mostanged who then reigned, tho' but two years, was a great lover and favourer of the Jews, and had a great number of them in his service. He was perfectly well acquainted with the Hebrew, could readily write it, and had gained some knowledge of their law. There were, however, not above 1000 Jews in that city, tho' some have enlarged them to many thousands, a thing very common among Jewish writers; but whatever their number might be, they had, he says, 28 synagogues, and ten tribunals or courts, at the head of which were ten of the most considerable of their nation, who applied themselves to the affairs of it, and were stiled the ten Idle men, over whom was the prince or chief of the captivity. The person who then enjoyed that dignity was stiled by them lord, and by the Moslems the son of David, he being, according to our author, lineally descended from that holy monarch<sup>r</sup>. His authority extended itself over all the Jews under the dominion of the khalif, prince of the faithful, and from the province of Syria quite eastward to the Iron d Gates, and as far as India (Y).

The Jewish rabbies who pretend that those eastern chiefs were independent of any other monarchs, and retained still the power of life and death, have left no stone unturned to prove that favourite point; insomuch that Origen himself believed that those Affyrian monarchs under whom they lived, being contented with their subjection and dependence, allowed them to govern their own people according to their own laws, and to inflict even death on the guilty; and proved it not only from the apocryphal book of Susanna against Africanus, but from more recent instances under the Roman emperors, after the destruction of the temple by

<sup>a</sup> Itinerar. p. 62, & seq.

<sup>r</sup> Ibid. p. 72, & seq.

(W) It may seem strange that a Jewish astronomer should be chaplain to a Mohammedan prince, for such was Zin-Aldin above-mentioned, who was brother to Nor-Aldin king of Syria, whom the Moslems revered not only as a grand conqueror, but as one of their greatest saints. But if we consider how apt the generality of the Jews were to temporize, either thro' fear, or for their own interest, we shall not be surprised to find that great astronomer so compliable to the religion of his prince (12).

(X) This last was then only famed for a synagogue, which its superstitious inhabitants had built of stones, earth, and other materials, brought from Jerusalem (13).

(Y) He farther tells us, that this chief was looked upon as a kind of sovereign, to whom even the Mohammedans were obliged to rise and bow as he passed, under the penalty of receiving 100 lashes. He had 100 guards that escorted him when he went to visit the khalif, and a herald cried before him, Prepare the ways of the Lord, the son of David. The most remote places of the Jewish nation were obliged to receive their teachers from him, by the imposition of his hands. The Jewish merchants likewise levied a kind of toll in their fairs, and paid a sort of tribute to him; the remotest provinces were went to send him some sorts of refreshments, and other presents; besides all which, he had his own patrimony, and some lands allotted to him, to help him to keep up his grandeur, to supply his table, maintain the poor, and support some hospitals for his nation.

He was however obliged to buy this grandeur and his privileges by a tribute paid to the khalif, and by large presents which he made to his officers; which plainly shews, that if there was really a chief of the captivity still in being in this 12th century, and who still lived in such splendor (though what we have said of the persecutions they underwent in the preceding century, would induce one to believe our Jew hath greatly exaggerated the matter, and hath rather described his state according to what he formerly was, when they enjoyed more peace and favour), yet was theirs but a borrowed, or rather bought dignity, depending on the pleasure of the monarchs under whom they lived, and subject to such a tribute as they thought fit to impose upon them: so that the Jews have no great reason to boast of having still their princes of the house of David, and who still enjoy the regal dignity. But it is still more likely that this dignity, small and dependent as it was, had been abolished in the preceding century, as we have already shewn.

(12) Vide Basnag. ubi sup. l. ix. c. 8. §. 4.

(13) Itiner. p. 81.

a Titus *. He hath been followed by others both ancient and modern, who pretended they had a power to raise a tribute on the nation, and to punish the recusants as well as other criminals with death †. We shall not repeat here what we have formerly said on the subject of the sceptre departing from Judah ‡ long before this time, nor on the unlikelihood that conquerors should grant such an extensive power to the conquered, notwithstanding the apocryphal story of Susanna, and what he quotes from other authors. What we said under the last note is sufficient to confute all the rabbinic pretences, since that power, let it extend as far as it would, Their power small and limited. was still subject to a superior one, and liable to be taken away or continued according to the will of the princes from whom they received it, by special commission under the royal signet; and so was but a precarious shadow of royal authority, which was either to be renewed by every successor upon his accession to the crown, or to become void of course. And therefore the more fair and impartial doctors of their nation have made no difficulty to give up that point (Z). Thus much we thought necessary to say concerning this pretended power of the Babylonish chief; we shall now follow our author thro' the other eastern provinces.

ON his leaving that of Bagdad, he passed through Resen, where he tells us † he found Jews in other eastern parts. near 5000 Jews, who were performing their devotions in a large synagogue; and some leagues farther about 1000 more, praying in an oratory said to have been built by the prophet Daniel. Hela, another town about five miles from that, had four synagogues, and about 10,000 Jews. Proceeding still eastward, he arrived at the banks of the river Chebar, on which is the tomb of the prophet Ezekiel, where he found 60 towers, every one of which was a syna- Tomb of Ezekiel revered. gogue, and not far from it the palace of Jechoniah, built by that Jewish monarch upon his being restored by Evil-Merodach ‡. The reader may see the account he gives of it in the margin (A). From thence he passed to Cusa, once the famed residence of the khalifs †, but since abandoned, wherein, however, he found 7000 of his own nation, who had but one synagogue. Thema was, according to him, the chief place where the Rechabites ‡ were still seated, and who were, as he informs us, masters of a vast territory about it: but this, as well as several other particulars, which he there affirms, concerning the ten tribes transported thither by the kings of Assyria, and their different settlements, &c. hath been sufficiently con- Account of the Rechabites confuted. futed by Mr. Basnage, to which we refer our readers †, and follow our author into Egypt.

HERE he found the Jews still more numerous, as it was a country in which they had from Jews in Egypt, the earliest times, before as well as after their total dispersion, been settled in great numbers. He reckoned no less than 30,000 in the city of Chouts, on the frontiers of Ethiopia; 2000 he saw at Mizraim, now Grand Cairo, who had two synagogues, and were divided about some trivial points relating to the division and reading of the sacred books, one sort going through the whole lecture of them in one year, as they do in Spain and elsewhere; and the other only once in three years. In this city it was that the chief of all the Egyptian synagogues resided, appointed their doctors, and took care of the affairs of the nation. Our author likewise visited the once famed land of Goshen, where, among other things, he found the Jews very numerous, in one place 200, in another 500, 300 in the city of Goshen, as many at in Goshen.

* Epist. ad African. p. 144.

* Anc. Hist. vol. iv. p. 256.

fore, vol. i. p. 588, &amp; seq.

&amp; seq.

† Vide int. al. SULPIT. SEVER. Hist. lib. xi. c. 2. Drus. not. p. 279.

‡ Itiner. p. 78, &amp; seq.

* 2 Kings xxv. 27, &amp; seq.

* See be-

† Ant. Hist. vol. i. p. 820. (T).

* Hist. des Juifs, lib. vii. c. 3. §. 10.

(Z) This is evident not only from two of their greatest rabbies, viz. D. Kimchi and Abraham, who acknowledge the regal authority and judicial power had been abolished, but much more from the learned Maimonides, who hath fully proved the unlawfulness of inflicting any capital punishment in any other country but in Judea; so that these chiefs of the captivity must have looked upon it as a violence, should the khalifs, or any other monarchs to whom they were subject, have obliged them to exert any such power, seeing there can be no sovereign tribunal, nor power of inflicting death, out of the land of Judea, as was hinted in a former note.

(A) This edifice, which he tells us is so situate as to have a full view of the Chebar on one side, and of the Euphrates on the other, retains still the figures of that Jewish monarch, and of his retinue, at the end of which is the prophet Ezekiel, carved on the roof. But the tomb of that prophet was still more resorted to as a place of devotion, to which even the princes of the captivity repaired every year, attended with a numerous retinue. It was likewise frequented and highly revered by the Persians and Mohammedans; so that during all their wars, no conqueror ever dared lay hands on it. Here hung over that prophet's tomb a lamp, which burned night and day, and was maintained by the chief, and his head counsellors. There is likewise a rich library in it, to which all the Jews who died without children used to bequeath and send all their books; and, among the rest, they shewed the prototype of Ezekiel's prophecies, written, as they pretend, with his own hands (14).

We omit several other antiquities and ruins which that author describes, and saw in these parts; such as the palace of the great Nebuchadnezzar, turned into a den of wild beasts; the furnace into which the three companions of Daniel were thrown, &c. which he says were there still to be seen; though those who have been there since give us a quite different notion of the place, as the reader may see by what we have said of it in a former part †. He tells us likewise of the magnificent tomb of Jechoniah at Cusa, which is more likely to have been that of some of the khalifs or Moslem princes.

(14) Itinerar. ubi sup. &amp; seq.

† Vide Anc. Hist. vol. i. p. 597, &amp; seq.

Two learned rabbies omitted.

Maimonides's
character,

and works.

Alexandria, and but a few at Damiata<sup>v</sup>. The rest he represents as dispersed in all the other provinces and towns of Egypt, in great numbers, though vastly short of what they once were, when the single city of Alexandria was reckoned to have 100,000 of them<sup>(B)</sup>. But what is most surprising is, that he makes no mention of any of their learned doctors, tho' there were then two celebrated ones that flourished there at the very time that he pretends to have travelled through it; viz. Abi, a learned rabbi of Alexandria, who wrote a treatise on the intelligences which move the heavens, and on the influence of the planets, and flourished about the year 1150; and the great Maimonides, who lived about the same time at Cairo, and was in such repute there, that he was, and still is, reckoned the greatest man of that age and nation. We have had occasion to make frequent mention of him both in this chapter, and formerly in the Jewish history. The reader may see an account of his learned works in the next note (C). It must be owned, however, that, except these two, Egypt hath not produced during these

<sup>v</sup> Itinerar. p. 83, & seq.

(B) Our author hath not only mentioned here a city (that of Chouts) which is not to be found in any other, and placed that of Goshen, capital of the canton, near that of Alexandria, contrary to the situation which the sacred writings give it, but speaks of Joseph's granaries as still to be seen at Cairo, and of Aristotle's celebrated academy, that was resorted to by the learned from all parts of the world (15); though the former have long ago been destroyed, and the latter was built not at Alexandria, nor in Egypt, but at Athens.

He hath likewise made a sad blunder in the account he gives of the then reigning khalif in Egypt when he came thither; and hath added some other circumstances which cannot be reconciled either with each other, or with the history of that time: but as that is foreign to our present design, and would carry us beyond our bounds, we shall refer the curious to the author often quoted for the farther confutation of it (16).

(C) 1. Pirush Hamishnah, or a comment on that book, begun in Spain in the 23d year of his age, and finished in the 30th in Egypt, and written originally in Arabic, in which language several copies are still found in the Vatican and other public libraries; and since translated at different times, and by several hands, into Hebrew (17). 2dly, Jud Chazakah, il Mishnah Hathora, or the repetition of the law, and divided into four parts, and these into 14 books, which are still subdivided into various other titles.

The 1st part, Book I. contains the five following books, under the title of Sepher Hamadah, or book of knowledge. 1. Jessode Hathorah, or fundamentals of the law. 2. Hadekoth, or moral rules. 3. Thalmud Hathorah, or the study of the law. 4. Havodab Zarab, or of idolatry. 5. Hatheshubab, or of repentance.

Book II. intituled, Sepher Ahavah, book of love, contains the six following; viz. 1. Of the reading of the sacred text of Moses. 2. Of prayers and the sacerdotal blessing. 3. Of phylacteries on the hands, forehead, &c. 4. Of the sacred peniculaments. 5. Of blessing and consecration of all things by prayer. 6. Of circumcision.

Book III. intituled, Zemanim, of times, contains the 10 following; 1. Of the Sabbath. 2. Of mixtures on the Sabbath. 3. Of expiation-day. 4. Of common feasts, or intermediate days between the first and the last of the festivals. 5. Of laying aside all ferment. 6. Of the blowing of the horn or trumpet on stated days. 7. Of the annual payment of the tithes. 8. The consecration of the new moons. 9. Of fasts. 10. Of the feast of Purim or Lots, prescribed in the book of Esther.

Part II. Book IV. intituled, Of women, treats, 1. Of marriages. 2. Of divorce. 3. Of the Jibum Achim, or brethren marrying the deceased brother's widow. 4. Of virgins deflowered by fraud or force. 5. Of adulteresses.

Book V. intituled, Of Holiness, treats, 1. Of unlawful coition, incest, &c. 2. Of forbidden meats. 3. Of the due method of killing of beasts, &c.

Part III. Book VI. intituled, Of separation, treats, 1. Of oaths. 2. Of vows. 3. Of that of Nazareal. 4. Of the devoting of things and persons to sacred uses, and the estimate of their redemption.

Book VII. 1. Against mixtures of heterogeneous things. 2. Of the poor's gifts, or portion to be set aside for them. 3. Of oblations. 4. Of first tythes. 5. Of second tythes. 6. Of first fruits and other offerings for the priests. 7. Of the 7th or jubilee year.

Book VIII. intituled, Of the sacred ministry, treats, 1. Of the temple or sanctuary. 2. Of the vessels used in it for the divine worship. 3. Of the going of the priests into the sanctuary. 4. Of things that were not to be offered. 5. Of the offering of sacrifices. 6. Of the daily and other sacrifices. 7. Of defective sacrifices. 8. Of those to be offered on the expiation-day. 9. Of transgressions in the eating of the sacrifices.

Book IX. intituled, Of sacrifices, or things offered, treats, 1. Of that of the Passover. 2. Of the appearing before the Lord three times in the year. 3. Of the first-born. 4. Of transgression thro' ignorance. 5. Of those that needed not be expiated by sacrifice. 6. Of the expiation sacrifice.

Book X. intituled, Of purifications, treats, 1. Of defilement received from dead bodies. 2. Of the red heifer. 3. Of the leprosy. 4. Of those defilements that pollute the beds, houses, &c. 5. Of the fathers or general heads of defilements. 6. Of defilement in eating. 7. Of the pollution or cleansing of vessels. 8. Of baths and washings.

Part IV. Book XI. intituled, Of damages, treats, 1. Of sundry kinds of damages to another's property. 2. Of theft. 3. Of restoring that which is stolen or lost. 4. Of pledges. 5. Of manslaughter, and the preserving of the innocent manslayer.

Book XII. intituled, Of possessions and acquisitions, treats, 1. Of buying and selling. 2. Of public acquisitions by hunting, fishing, &c. 3. Of neighbours, and the rights of neighbourhood. 4. Of the duty of messengers sent, and of their punishment for neglect, fraud, &c. and of the rights of society and commerce. 5. Of servants.

Book XIII. intituled, Of judgments, or sentences to be passed by the judges, treats, 1. Of hiring and hire. 2. Of lending, pledging, and restoring. 3. Of mutual lending and borrowing. 4. Of the doer or guilty person. 5. Of inheritance.

Book XIV. intituled, Of the judges, treats, 1. Of the Sanhedrin, or grand council. 2. Of witnesses and their depositions. 3. Of recusants or rebellions. 4. Of mourning and mourners. 5. Of kings and war. These are the chief heads of that celebrated treatise Jad Chazakah, or Strong Hand, of which we thought proper to give this short scantling, that our English readers might frame an idea of his clear and exact method of treating a these latter ages many men of note, we shall therefore leave it, and pass thence into Palestine, where we shall hardly find them in greater plenty.

(15) Itinerar. ubi sup. p. 115, & seq.

(16) Ibid. p. 124, & seq. Vide Bafnag. ubi sup. l. ix. c. 8. §. 16, & seq.

(17) Vide Pocock, post. Mos. Bartoloc. ubi sup. Wolf. Biblioth. Hebræa. p. 837, & seq.

Our author tells us, that he found at Tyre, in his way thither, about 500 of his nation, some few of whom were well versed in the thalmud. Most of the rest were employed in the glass manufacture, the Tyrian glass being then in great esteem. The Samaritans, having abandoned their ancient capital, were retired some to Cæsarea, where he found about 200, and about 100 more at Sichem, which last was become the seat of their religion. The priests there boasted themselves lineally descended from Aaron, and never married out of their own family, that their succession might be preserved unmixed and untainted. They are very strict in solemnizing their festivals, and offer up their sacrifices on Mount Garizzim, where they pretend the altar was made of those very 12 stones which Joshua caused to be reared into a heap in the midst of Jordan, upon his miraculously passing that river†. They are scrupulously strict in their washings, and the choice of their cloaths, and never wear those anywhere else, in which they go to the synagogue.

JERUSALEM, though once the seat of the Jewish religion, and so much sighed after by the Jews, had scarcely 200 of that nation in it, who were all woollen-dyers, and paid a certain tribute for being the only ones employed in that business. They were settled in one of the quarters of the city, under David's Tower, and made but a mean figure in it; and, from a false notion which prevails among them, that there is still one of the walls of the sanctuary left standing, they commonly chose to go and offer up their prayers before it (D). Other cities of Judea were still more destitute of them, of whom he tells us he found two in one, twenty in another, most of them dyers. That of Shunam had the most, that is, about 300. Ascalon, once one of the capitals of the Philistines, had 553, the greater part of whom were of the Samaritan sect, a few of them Caraites, and the rest thalmudists.

UPPER Galilee, or, as it was commonly called, Galilee of the Gentiles, had a much greater number of them, and it was into that province most of them retired after the destruction of Jerusalem, and where they afterwards founded the famed academy of Tiberias, often mentioned in this chapter; and yet our author found but 50 of them who had a synagogue, and and ranging each subject; all which he treats with such perspicuity and strong reasoning, as is far above all that have gone before him, or indeed since. The reader may see a further account of this author and his books in Wolf's and Bartolucci's Bibliotheca's, whilst we content ourselves with just mentioning the titles of the rest of his works.

† De hoc vid. Anc. Hist. vol. i. p. 553, 554.

3. His third treatise is intituled, Moreh Newokim, or the director or expounder of perplexed texts or places of Scripture.

4. His fourth is the Sepher Hamitzvot, the book of commandments, or an exposition of the precepts of the Mosaic law, both positive and negative.

5. His epistle or discourse on the resurrection of the dead.

6. His southern epistle or letter to the Jews inhabiting the southern parts of the world, exhorting them to continue stedfast in the Jewish faith.

7. His letter to the doctors of Marseilles in Provence, which is a kind of answer or confutation of the common Jewish notion about the infallible influence of the stars, and of a Jewish impostor who called himself the Messiah.

8. The epistles to the great light, that is, to Maimonides himself, and written to him by the learned Jewish doctors of France and Spain, with his answers to them.

9. A set of sermons written by him, and mentioned in his treatise on the sanhedrin, and by the author of the Shalsheleth Hakkabalab, p. 43.

10. His logic, divided into 14 chapters, the MS. of which is in the Vatican library.

11. His treatise on the preservation of health, dedicated to the king of Egypt, the MS. in the Bodleian library.

12. His physical aphorisms, and other small treatises on diseases and their cures.

13. His garden of health, treating of animals, plants, stones, and other products of the earth.

14. Some other physical treatises in Arabic, and mentioned by Dr. Pocock, senior.

15. His book of the knowledge of God, by the help of his creatures.

16. His treatise on the soul.

17. Comment on Hippocrates.

18. — on the law.

19. — on Avicen.

20. — on the Gemarrab.

21. Pirke Moshe, or physical extracts out of Galen.

22. Questions and answers concerning various customs.

23. Questions and answers on other subjects.

24. On the thirteen articles of faith.

25. His manuscript copy of the pentateuch, written with his own hand.

These are the most noted of his works. We omit some others of less moment, besides those which himself mentions in some of his treatises, but which are not now to be found. Those who desire to know more of him and his works, may consult, among others, the authors quoted in the margin (18).

(D) Our author hath embellished his relation of this ruined metropolis with a description of several noble antiquities still to be seen there, though with as little truth as what is pretended of the wall; it being plain, that the Romans demolished all before them, and, according to Christ's prediction, left not one stone upon another of that sacred building. However, he tells of the stables of king Solomon, the tomb of David, and other antiquities of the same nature, not worth repeating after him; the reader may see all that is remaining of that ancient city and sepulchral monuments, in the description we have given of its ruined state in a former part †.

(18) Bartoloc. & Wolf Biblioth. Rabb. vid. & Sepher Shalsheleth Hakkabalab, p. 44. Juchasin, p. 131. J. Buxtorf prefat. in Maim. Moreh Newocim. R. Claverius Dissert. de Maimon. & ejus operibus. Hotting. Thesaur. Morin. Exercit. Bibl. Bagnage Hist. ubi sup. † See Anc. Hist. vol. i. p. 582, & seq.

the rest of the town hath nothing left worth notice, but its salubrious, or, as the Jews always styled them, miraculous waters, of which we have formerly spoken<sup>1</sup>. However, another Jewish traveller<sup>2</sup>, who was there about 25 or 30 years after, gives a quite different account of that academy and its doctors, whom he went thither to consult; and as it is hardly to be imagined either that it could have recovered itself in so short a time from the abject condition in which our author represents it; or that this latter, who strives every-where else to raise the glory of his nation, should have any private motive to eclipse that of this city; so there can be no other way to reconcile those two travellers, but by supposing that it had undergone some severe change just before our Benjamin came to it, occasioned by the incursions of the Arabs, who actually plundered and ravaged it several times, till Soliman caused its walls, which had been formerly demolished, to be built up again; upon which it began to be better inhabited both by Jews and Turks (E). However, as there was a synagogue then extant, and must be supposed to have had some doctors even in Benjamin's time, there may have been some more come thither since, enough to verify what Aben Ezra says of them.

Jews in Greece.

Some Samaritans.

Jews at Constantinople.

Stripped of their privileges.

Hardly used.

FROM Palestine our author passed into Greece, where he found about 200 Jews, who dwelt on and about Mount Parnassus, and lived on the product of it, which was chiefly pulse. They had some rabbies over them; but, whatever be the reason, they have been since forbidden to settle within some leagues of it. He found 300 of them at Corinth, and 2000 at Thebes, who were either dyers or silk-weavers. The rabbies in this last were so learned, that those only of Constantinople could equal them, though we can hear nothing of their productions in that kind. The two most learned of them were of the Samaritan sect. There were some more scattered here and there, some at Lepanto, others at Patras, and other parts of the Turkish empire, but were neither numerous nor wealthy, and, as for learning, not to be compared to those that flourished in the west, of whom we shall speak by-and-by. From Greece he took in his way to Constantinople the famed city of Agripou, where he found 200 Jews (F), and near the same number in two other cities mentioned in the last note, and still more unknown to us.

WHEN he came to Constantinople, he found about 2000 Jews settled in the quarter or suburb called Galata, or Pera, where we formerly took notice they had been settled by the emperor Theodosius, and where they lived still, and carried on the silk manufacture, and several of them were merchants. Besides these, there were about 500 Caraites, who nevertheless lived peaceably enough with the rest, though their quarter was divided from that of the others by a wall, to prevent any communication between them. Theodosius had granted them the privilege of having a peculiar magistrate over them, viz. the governor of the suburb; but they were afterwards stripped of it by Manuel Comnenus, and made subject to the common magistrates. It is likely that he had already done so when our traveller came thither, since he tells us, that they were hated and insulted both by Turks and Greeks, though that emperor had a physician of their nation, who made use of all his interest with him in their favour. He adds, that they were forbidden to ride on horses through the streets of the city, and were commonly insulted and pelted by the populace, who came also and broke forcibly into their houses, and committed such outrages among them, that they might be said to live under the hardest and most shameful slavery; notwithstanding which, they have still kept their settlement there, and the quarter in which they live is by the Franks called from them the Jewry.

FROM Constantinople our author passed into Italy, where the first thing he takes notice of is the feuds and hostilities which reigned between the inhabitants of Genoa, Pisa, and other cities of that republic, on which account the Jews were but few in these parts; for whenever

<sup>1</sup> Anc. Hist. vol. iv. p. 194 (A).

<sup>2</sup> ABEN EZRA, ap. Basnag. ubi sup. lib. ix. c. 8. §. 25.

(E) Accordingly the author of a book, intituled, The genealogies of the just in the land of Israel (19), who is much more modern than either of the former, assures us, that in his time this city had two kinds of academies situate without its gates, the one small and the other larger. And R. Judah Jonah, who embraced Christianity, and died at Rome about the middle of the 16th century, tells us, that he had studied in one of them. We read of another at Saphelab, much more famous than either of the others, but which in all likelihood was not yet in being when Benjamin was there, since he takes no notice of it (20).

(F) This city, which he says is situate on the sea, and frequented by merchants from all parts of the world, is supposed to be the ancient Chalcis, near the Negropont; but he mentions some others which he pretends to be of equal splendor and greatness, such as those which he calls Jabasteriza and Rabenica, in which he says he found a good number of his own nation, but which are not to be found in any maps, or in any other author. He likewise mentions that of Seleucia, where the Jews lived very quietly under the emperor Manuel Comnenus, who permitted them to have a chief of their own, who should immediately depend on him; which invited great numbers of that nation to come and settle there, and carry on several trades and manufactures. This is somewhat different from the account he gives of that prince's treating those of Constantinople, as we shall see under the next paragraph: so that it is likely they must have been guilty of some misdemeanour in that metropolis, which occasioned their being more hardly used there.

(19) Vide Basnag. ubi sup. l. ix. c. 8. §. 25.

(20) Id. ibid. & seq.

a any such quarrels happened, let which ever side get the uppermost, they were sure to be oppressed. He went thence to Rome, where he found them in greater numbers, and several learned rabbies among them, particularly R. Jeckiel, who was superintendant of the pope's finances. Capua was no less famed for the number and learning of her doctors, tho' it had but 300 Jews in it; the chief of whom they styled the prince of the nation, though his authority did not extend even over all the Jews in Italy, if it did over any, except the Capuans. He found 500 at Naples, 200 at Salerno, and particularly in this last the learned Solomon, a priest, the Grecian Eliab, and R. Abraham, a native of Narbonne, who held the first rank. There were some others settled at Maïsi, Benevento, Ascoli, and Trani, which last was the rendezvous for those who embarked for the pilgrimage of the Holy Land. The islands of Sicily and Corfica had likewise a good number of them, especially the former, where he found about 200 at Messina, and 500 at Palermo.

He passed thence into Germany, where he found them not only more numerous, quiet, and peaceable, but likewise more zealous, devout, and hospitable to strangers, bewailing the desolation of their city and temple, and in longing expectation of hearing the Voice of the turtle-dove, as they term it, by which they mean their glorious recall into that once happy land (G). He penetrated as far as Bohemia, which he tells us was then called the New Canaan, because the Bohemians sold their children to all the neighbouring nations. Thence passing over into France, by the way of Barcelona and Girona, where he says the Jews were but thin, he came to Narbonne, where he found 300, and at their head the famed R. Calonymo, said to be lineally descended from David, who was very powerful and wealthy, especially in lands, which had been bestowed on him and his ancestors on account of the signal services they had done to the lords of that country; that city was looked upon as the centre of the Jewish religion and nation. Montpelier was then full of Turks, Greeks, Christians, and Jews, who resorted thither from foreign parts. In the neighbourhood of it was Lunel, where was kept the Holy Assembly, which applied itself to the study of the divine law night and day. Mesbullam, who then presided over it, had five sons equally learned, one especially, in the thalmud, and who fasted often; and here the strangers, who came to learn, were maintained and supplied with every thing at the public charge, that nothing might divert their attention from their studies. Our author found likewise Jewish synagogues at Marseilles, Arles, and other places, and not only in great cities, but in borough towns; and concludes his account with that of the city of Paris, where he found an assembly much given to the study of the law, and to hospitality, and received all the Jews who came thither as so many brethren (H). Before we conclude this 12th century, it will be necessary to give our readers a short account of some other Jews dispersed into other parts, according to the relation which another rabbi of theirs, named Petachiah, hath left us of them (I).

(G) That exposition is taken from the book of the Canticles (21), and the Jews, especially in the northern parts, expect their recall to be sudden, and as it were in the twinkling of an eye, and therefore endeavoured to keep themselves in a proper mood for it: for they think that those who are either too impatient for, or mistrustful or careless about it, shall have no share either in that great blessing, or in the more glorious one of the resurrection.

(H) By this account of our author, it is plain the Jews were very much dwindled in the east and west, both in number and wealth; especially along the Euphrates, where they had been formerly so populous as to have been reckoned to amount to 900,000. They were still fewer and worse treated in Judea by the crusaders; and though we have observed that they then refuged and spread themselves all over the west, yet by the small numbers which our author found in every place he came to, it is plain they could not amount to a very great bulk; and yet one may safely say, that, by the tenor of his whole relation, he has spared no pains to make them appear as considerable as he could in number, wealth, learning, and figure. And it is no less a wonder that so many learned men as they had then amongst them, who applied themselves so closely to the study of the Scriptures, and prophecies, should reap so little fruit from all their pains and study, and confirm themselves and their disciples in their unbelief, instead of finding out their fatal mistake, and acknowledging the Messiah to have been come, according to the time prefixed by Providence.

(I) This rabbi was born at Ratisbon, and travelled not only through most parts where Benjamin had been; but doth so exactly agree with him, as if they had copied each other; so that we shall forbear repeating from this what hath been said by the other, but take notice only of such facts or curious particulars as are not mentioned by him.

He tells us he was at Jerusalem when the crusaders were masters of it. It was in the year 1181 that Godfrey of Bouillon took it; so that he seems to have been on his travels much about the same time with the other. He did not however write the relation we are speaking of (which is intitled, Peregrinatio Rabbi Petachia, R. Isaaci Albi, & R. Nachmanis, Ratisbona ortorum, fratres; circuevit vero Rabbi Petachia universas regiones ad fluvium usque Sambation, atque res omnes novas mirasque a Deo editas, quas intuitus est audiuitque, memoria causâ consignavit literis, ut populo suo Israelitico notæ fierent & in lucem protraherentur occulta); but the two brothers there mentioned are supposed to have compiled it from his memoirs, and what he told them by word of mouth. Some name likewise a third author, of whom we shall speak in the sequel, who had also a hand in it; whereas Benjamin died an. 1173.

R. Petachiah's
account of them in Tar-
tary,

THE account he gives of those which he saw in Tartary, is, that they were heretics, that is, -a that they did not observe the traditions of the fathers, and upon his asking them the reason why they did not, they answered, that they had never heard of any : they were, however, such strict observers of the Sabbath, that they cut the bread on Friday evening which they were to eat on that day : they hardly stirred from their seats all that day, eat their victuals in the dark, and knew of no other prayers but those which were contained in the book of Psalms.

Nineveh.

WHEN he arrived at the New Nineveh, he found about 6000 Jews there, whose chiefs were called David and Samuel, two near relations, descended from David. All the Jews of that country were obliged to pay them a certain capitation, one half of which was to be conveyed to the lieutenant of the king of Babylon, the other belonged to them. They had lands of their own, fields, gardens, and vineyards, well cultivated. It was, it seems, here, as well as in Persia, b Damascus, &c. the custom among them not to maintain any fingers, but the chiefs, who kept at their table a number of doctors, obliged them, sometimes one, sometimes another, to perform that office. Their authority was so great, that they could punish strangers, as well as those of their nation, when, upon their pleading before them, they were found in the wrong; and kept a prison for all such delinquents (K).

In Bagdad.

UPON his coming to Bagdad he found about 1000 Jews settled there; but speaks of 2000 disciples under the chief of the synagogue, and all learned men. These sit on the ground whilst he teaches them from a high desk covered with a gold tissue; and every one hath a copy containing the twenty-four books of the sacred writ. The Jewish women go out veiled, and avoid speaking to strangers, either in the streets, or even at their homes. We shall c

His account of the chiefs.

only add, with respect to the chief here, to what we mentioned out of Benjamin, that, upon the death of Daniel, who left no male successor, the Jews, who had preserved the right of choosing their chief, divided themselves, one party nominating David, and the other Samuel, to that dignity, both lineally descended from David; which division still subsisted when our author left Bagdad; where, he adds, the Jews were treated with great mildness, and were exempt from any tribute to the king, and only paid a piece of gold to the chief of the synagogue (L). But they were used with greater severity in Persia (where nevertheless they were computed to amount to 600,000); for which reason he only ventured through one of the Persian cities. He went thence into Judea, of which he gives much the same account as his brother Benjamin; but adds, that he sought in vain for Lot's wife turned into a statue of salt, d and believed that it was no longer in being. It is however affirmed, that they had since found out a stump of it, which, if it hath not already, may in time grow up to its pristine shape and bulk. What he tells us about the sepulchre of Abraham, and of their having substituted another with three bodies in it, to deceive passengers, is rather too fabulous to deserve a place here; so that having now gone through the most material account of our two Jewish travellers, we shall supply the rest from other authors, with respect to some other countries and facts which they have passed by.

Number of
Jews in Persia.

(K) Our rabbi tells us, that he fell sick during his stay at Nineveh, and was given over; and, to his greater grief, was informed, that the custom was, to confiscate one half of the effects of those strangers that died there to the use of the governor. To avoid which, as he had very rich cloaths, and other wares, he caused himself to be carried over the Tigris in the night, on a hurdle made of reeds; and not only baulked the governor, but recovered his health, by breathing a purer air. As he sailed down that river, he saw synagogues in every city and town; and entered into the garden of one of the chiefs of one of them, which he found stored with all manner of fruits, not excepting the mandrake mentioned by Moses (22), and of which we have given an account in a former volume †.

(L) To shew that our author is not behind-hand with Benjamin, or any of his brethren, in relating of miracles, we shall mention a remarkable one that happened here. The king, who had a great kindness for the Jewish chief, took it into his head to see the body of the prophet Ezekiel, which lies there buried in the stately tomb lately mentioned. Samuel as stiffly refused it, thinking it impious to expose sacred things to the view of the profane. The king still insisting upon it, he told him, that it would be better to begin with the tomb of Baruch, the son of Neriah, who was the prophet's secretary, and lay buried near his master; whereupon the Ishmaelites, who were employed in opening his tomb, were all struck dead; for which reason that task was turned over to the Jews. These, being obliged to obey, kept a three days fast before they ventured to open his tomb; and, upon having done so, discovered his coffin and some of the cloaths; whereupon the king, thinking it wrong that two such saints should enrich one and the same place, ordered his corpse to be transplanted elsewhere; but upon having carried his coffin, which was of marble, about a mile from thence, it fixed itself in such a miraculous manner, that it could never be moved farther; and, the saint having moreover declared that to be the place where he designed to lie, they were obliged to let his bones rest there, since their miraculous heaviness would not permit them to move them farther. He is no less eloquent in describing the marvels of the tomb of Ezekiel; but, instead of following him, we shall close this note with the order which is there observed in their synagogues.

It is not, it seems, allowed there to any-body to tune or sing the psalms and prayers, but to the persons appointed by the chief; to which the people only answer Amen. And of these, one of them begins the prayer, another the praises, &c.; and if any of them sings out of tune, the chief beckons to him with his hand, and makes him get into the right note. They are all obliged to pull off their shoes at their going into the synagogue, and to continue there barefoot during all the service.

(22) Genesis xxx. 14. † See Ant. Hist. vol. i. p. 441 (Y).

- a We have already taken notice, that St. Bernard, who was a great enemy to the Albigenses, Jews protected by the popes, A. C. 1145, & seq. was as great a favourer of the Jews, and inclined the then pope Innocent II. on their side. What still more contributed to it was their approaching him with uncommon respect as he was making his grand entrance into Paris, and presenting him with the roll or volume of their law (a ceremony which was used long before at Rome on the pope's installation), who, upon receiving it at their hands, returned them this answer, I reverence the law given by God to Moses, but condemn your exposition of it, because you still expect the Messiah, whom the catholic church believes to be Christ, who liveth and reigneth with the Father and the Holy Ghost. His successor Alexander III. became likewise a great protector of them, and forbade the people to affront them on their Sabbath and other festivals, or on any other occasions, as they had been wont to do; and under his protection they flourished to such a degree, that the little town of Cozzi in the Milanese, the cities of Monza, Ricca Nova, and others in the march of Ancona, produced great numbers of learned rabbies<sup>a</sup>.

- THEY were no less powerful in Spain, where one of them, named Joseph, was prime minister to Alphonso VIII. and had a coach of state and guards attending him. He was however undermined by one of his own creatures, named Gonzales, who, under pretence of filling that monarch's coffers, prevailed upon him to grant him eight of the principal Jews, such as he should pitch upon, whom he accordingly caused to be beheaded, and confiscated their estates, part of which he gave to the king, and the rest he kept. He afterwards offered a much larger sum for the grant of twenty more; but Alphonso rather chose to confiscate their estates, in order to defray the charges of the war, without shedding their blood; and they were so glad to save their lives and liberty at any rate, that they poured immense sums into his treasury<sup>b</sup>. But what farther ingratiated them to him, was, his falling deeply in love with a beautiful young Jewess, to whom he sacrificed his honour and interest, and, for her sake, to her nation<sup>c</sup>; for the Jews, taking that advantage, were become so powerful and insolent, that the court and clergy became quite scandalized at it; and at length dissolved the charm by the death of the beloved object (M). The Jews, however, went on thrivingly till the dissension between their doctors, mentioned in the last note, disturbed the union which had till then reigned among them. It was during this quiet interval, or perhaps a little before this time, that, according to the Jewish chronologers<sup>d</sup>, copies came to be dispersed of the sacred Hebrew according to the manuscript of the celebrated Hillel, which had appeared some time before, at what year cannot be guessed, nor what became of it; but in which two verses were found wanting in the xxist chapter of the book of Joshua (N). A. C. 1140.

THE Jews did not fare so well in France, where they were accused of the murder of St. William, and were condemned to the flames for it<sup>e</sup>, as they justly deserved, provided those only had suffered punishment who shared in the guilt. But that was seldom the case; at least the odium it brought upon the rest exposed them to the insults of the populace (O). At In France, by Philip.

<sup>a</sup> BARTOLOC. ubi sup. & 19.

<sup>b</sup> SOLOM. BEN VIRG. p. 98.

<sup>c</sup> MARIANA de reb. Hisp. lib. xi. c. 18,

<sup>d</sup> GANTZ TZEMACH, sub an.

<sup>e</sup> ROB. DE MONTE, append. ad chron. Sigeb. an. 1177.

(M) They not only made away with the young charmer, but caused some spectre to appear to the king, and to preach chastity and repentance to him; and the defeat which the Moors gave him at that time was cried up as a just punishment for his crime. However, the Jews flourished so well under him, that R. Eliakim, who was then in great esteem there, and composed his ritual of all the ceremonies used in every synagogue, commonly stiled the ritual of the universe, reckons no less than twelve thousand Jews in the city of Toledo.

They were no less considerable in Andalusia, where great numbers applied themselves closely to the study of divinity and other sciences, till they came at length to divide themselves into three different sects, which Maimon, who then flourished, hath given an account of, and looked upon this rupture as one of the sad consequences of the abolition of their sanhedrin (23). We refer our curious readers to the book, for the farther particulars of it, and the sad effects which he ascribes to it.

(N) These were the 36th and 37th verses, which mention the four cities of refuge appointed in the tribe of Reuben: but which, being found in the book, made Grotius imagine they had been since transplanted from thence into the text of Joshua above-mentioned, tho' without any foundation, seeing they are not only found there in the Septuagint, or Greek version, which is allowed to be more ancient than Hillel's manuscript; but likewise explain that text, by telling us, that those towns were on this side Jordan, and on one side of Jericho. Is it not therefore more likely that they were either overlooked by Hillel, or by his transcribers, than that they were brought thither from the book of Chronicles? And if the tribe of Reuben was, like the rest, to have its cities of refuge, is it not more probable that Joshua should mention them, as he hath done the others, than that he should have omitted them? Since therefore all the Hebrew copies, Septuagint, and other versions, have those two verses, why should the single manuscript of Hillel's, or rather the copies of it, which are not of above 500 years standing, be deemed of more authority than them all?

(O) Those of Languedoc, in particular, were obliged to redeem themselves from the most barbarous insults, which they were commonly exposed to, but more particularly on the Easter festival, by obtaining a treaty with the bishop of Beziers, by which he engaged to protect them night and day, from Palm Sunday to Easter Day, and to shut the church gate to any Christian that should break into their houses; and they to pay him a certain tribute yearly. This treaty, which was dated A. C. 1160, procured them some respite, till Philip Augustus banished them out of his dominions, as we are going to relate.

(23) More Nuch. par. i. c. 71. p. 133, & seq.

Recalled by him.

Crucify a Christian youth,
A. C. 1193.

Jews in England obtain new burying-grounds,
A. C. 1179.

Persecuted all over England.

length king Philip, surnamed the August, under pretence of devotion, not only banished them a out of the kingdom, but confiscated all their wealth, and only permitted them to sell their household goods, which yet they could get none to buy, insomuch that they were thereby reduced to the lowest misery, and great numbers forced to sink under it<sup>f</sup>. This happened, according to some, A. C. 1170, according to others, 1182 or 1186 (P). His zeal, however, soon gave way to policy; and, whatever his private motive might be, he ordered them to be recalled; for which he was as highly blamed by the zealots as they had before applauded him, and for which he found no better excuse to silence their outcries, than by pretending he did it to extort more money from them to carry on the crusade.

THEY returned accordingly in great numbers, though their stay proved but short; for, being become numerous and insolent, as well as incorrigible, to use our author's words, in the matter of crucifying Christian children, they assembled themselves, by the queen mother's permission, in a castle on the river Seine, where they crucified a youth, after having cruelly scourged, and crowned him with thorns; which obliged the king to come thither in person, and to cause eighty of them to be burnt alive<sup>g</sup>. But this did not save him from being blamed for recalling them, or the success which our king Richard had afterwards over him, from being considered as a just punishment upon him.

THOSE in England, who had been banished out of it ever since the year 1020, and had made loud complaints against the hardships they suffered by it, had since found means to settle themselves again in it; and were become so numerous in the reign of Henry II. that, having then but one burying-ground in London, they petitioned that monarch to have some new ones, which were readily granted to them<sup>h</sup> (Q). But they underwent a most terrible punishment under his successor Richard I. when having ventured, contrary to the express prohibitions against it, to assist at his coronation, they were discovered, and overwhelmed with blows, and dragged out of the church half-dead; which so exasperated the populace, that they forced themselves into their houses, and killed all they met. From that metropolis the flame spread into the country; and, though the government published a proclamation by the very next day after the coronation to suppress the fury of the people, yet the persecution lasted near that whole year (R), which was, according to most chronologists, the year 1189 or 1190<sup>i</sup>, and with it we shall close this twelfth century.

BUT,

<sup>f</sup> GANTZ, ubi sup.      <sup>g</sup> ALBERIC. Trium Font. chronic. sub A. C. 1182. F. DANIEL. Hist. de Franc. tom. i. p. 1269, & seq. BASNAG. ubi sup. c. 12. §. 23, & seq.      <sup>h</sup> POLYD. VIRG. l. xiii. p. 239.      <sup>i</sup> MAT. PARIS, p. 108. TRIVEL. Chronic. gener. sub an. 1190.

(P) This persecution did not go without an excuse; for the author of that prince's life tells us (24), it was occasioned by their crucifying a youth at Paris, named Richard, which, he adds, was commonly done by that hated nation once a year. This is no new thing alleged against them; and most of the persecutions they have undergone in this and the subsequent centuries, have been ascribed either to some crucifixion, to their stealing some consecrated wafer, and offering the vilest indignities to it, or to some such abominable crime, out of hatred to Christianity; which seldom failed of being discovered in such a miraculous manner, as seemed to authorize the most cruel punishments they inflicted on them.

Thus the Richard above-mentioned, being buried in a common church-yard, became so famed for his miracles, that they have made a martyr of him, and removed his body into the church of the Innocents, whence, we are told, the English, in the reign of Charles V. stole it away, and left nothing behind but his head. However, it was on account of this pretended crucifixion that they were condemned to that cruel banishment (25), from which, those only saved themselves who embraced Christianity; after which their synagogues were turned into churches. French authors, however, differ much about the true motives of this banishment and recall, which we have no room to enter into a detail of; the reader therefore may consult the authors quoted in the margin (26).

(Q) They represented to him, that they were forced to bring their dead from distant places, stinking and nauseous, to London, or leave them exposed without burial; which allegations were found so just, that they were allowed burying grounds in most towns where they were settled.

(R) The occasion of this prohibition was a superstitious notion then reigning, that the Jews, being most of them conjurers, might by some means bewitch the new king; to prevent which, they were forbidden, under the severest penalties, to assist either at his entry or coronation. But as several of them were come from far, and had put themselves to great charge, they were unwilling to lose their trouble and cost; and, being unknown at court, thought they might easily disguise themselves so as to escape being discovered. It proving otherwise, not only the court and city, but most towns where any Jews were found, took fire against, and massacred, great numbers of them.

They underwent a more severe persecution when the king lifted himself among the crusaders. They had indeed made sure of his favour by the vast sums they furnished him towards that expedition; but the people, not satisfied with it, resolved to make a clearer riddance of them. They began their bloody work at Norwich, Stamford, Edgemont, and other places, where they made a horrid slaughter among them. But the most dreadful was at York, where about 1500 of them had seized on the city, and, being overpowered, offered to capitulate, and to buy their lives by dint of money. Their proposal being rejected, one of the most desperate among them cried out, that it was better to die bravely for a BUT, before we pass into the next, we shall, according to our promise a little higher, give a short account of the most celebrated rabbies who flourished during that interval, it having, as we there hinted, produced a greater number of them than any before or since, especially as most of them have been often quoted through the course of the Jewish history. We begin with the learned rabbi Nathan Ben Jechiel, chief of the Jewish academy at Rome about the beginning of this century, and author of the book called ערוך, Haruk, wherein he explains all the terms of the thalmud in so copious a manner, that he hath in some measure exhausted that matter; inasmuch that those who have come after have rather plundered than improved him, particularly the great Buxtorf, who made frequent use of his remarks without quoting him (S). Learned men in the 12th century. R. Nachman.

(24) Rigord. de gest. Phil. August. hist. Franc. tom. iv. p. 61. (25) Rob. de Monte appen. ad chron. Sigeb. A. 1180. Pistor. hist. German. tom. xi. Fascicul. tempor. ibid. tom. iii. p. 78. Basnag. ubi sup. l. ix. c. 12. §. 16. (26) Conf. auct. sup. citat. & Naucler. chron. gener. 40. tom. ii. sub A. C. 1182. Spond. sub A. C. 1198. N. 9. Alberic. Trium Font. chronic. sub A. C. 1179 & 1182.

b THE next in time, though superior in learning and merit, was the great Aben Ezra, or, as his name written at length imports, Abraham Ben Meir Aben Ezra, and surnamed, by way of excellence, the Wise, as he really was one of the most learned men of his age and nation. He had been a great traveller, and a diligent searcher after learning, was a good astronomer, philosopher, physician, poet, and critic, in which last he hath excelled all that went before him<sup>k</sup>; and is chiefly admired by the Christians for his judicious explications of the sacred books (T). He died, as he himself insinuated a little before his death, in the 75th year of his age, A. C. 1174 (V). The reader will find a list of his works under the last note.

WE have in this century three famed rabbies of the name of Levi, or Hallevi. One born at Cologne, who, after many conferences with the Christians, was baptized, and taught Three learned Levi's. Latin under the name of Herman. 2. Judah Hallevi, a good poet, and author of the dialogue intitled Chozar, which we have had occasion to mention before. And, 3. Abraham Hallevi, a learned rabbinist and cabbalist, whom some make father-in-law, and others first cousin, to Aben Ezra, and who was a most zealous antagonist against the Caraites, tho' far inferior to them in point of reasoning and judgment; so that, not being able to cope with their law, than to fall into the hands of the Christians; upon which every one of them drew out his knife, and fell to butchering their wives and children. They then retired into the palace, which they set on fire, and were consumed in the flames; whilst the people entered the city, and enriched themselves with the remainder of the plunder; the king beholding the bloody effects of their fury, without being able to put a stop to it (27).

<sup>k</sup> F. SIMON, Hist. crit. V. Test. lib. iii. c. 5. WOLF, Bibl. Hebr. N. 110. BASNAG. ubi sup. c. x. §. 3, & seq. SCHIKARD. Bechinath Happerushim, p. 172, & al. mult.

(S) It is not agreed what family he was descended from, nor at what time he flourished, tho' it is commonly allowed as certain that he died at Rome about the year 1106 (28).

(T) He took a contrary way to the other rabbies, and, instead of hunting after traditional expositions and mystic interpretations, gave himself wholly to the grammatical and literal sense; which he hath investigated with such success and penetration, that the Christians justly prefer him to all the other Jewish expositors; though he hath in some instances given himself a liberty which hath been justly blamed by both. It was he that first shewed the way to such of our critics who maintain the notion, that the Israelites did not cross the Red Sea; but made a turn round part of it at low water, that Pharaoh following them might be caught and drowned by the succeeding tide. He had some smart disputes with the Caraites, whom he treats as Sadducees for not receiving the traditions of the fathers; though he himself, by his method of expounding the Scriptures, shews he was no scrupulous follower of the cabbala, and perhaps had not a much better opinion of it than they, though he dared not own so much, for fear of bringing upon him the partisans for it, who were then very numerous and hot in its behalf: so that it is not unlikely that he fell foul on the Caraites, merely to wipe off the imputation of being an anticabbalist.

(V) Upon finding his death approaching, he wrote, that as Abraham was come out of Ur, or fire of Haran, in the 75th year of his age, so he at that age came out of the העולם הזה, from the fire, or the anger of the world, changing only, by the addition of a vowel, the word Charan into Charon, (29). This shews, however, that he was not born before the year 1099, tho' several chronologers have placed his birth ten or more years sooner.

His works are, 1. A learned comment on all the books of the Old Testament, a work very much esteemed by all the learned for its usefulness, clearness, succinctness, and elegance, and for being free from the puerile dreams and fables of the Jewish writers. 2. Sepher Sodoth Hathorah, a treatise of the hidden secrets of the law. 3. Jessed Thora, the foundation of the law. 4. A comment on the decalogue, since translated into Latin by S. Munster, with notes. 5. A new comment on Isaiah and the minor prophets, revised and corrected by him. 6. Ditto, on Proverbs, the Canticles, Ester, and the Lamentations. 7. His epistle on the Sabbath, in rhiming verse. 8. Another poem, intitled, חי בן מן, Let the wakeful son live; and treats of rewards and punishments. To which Bartolucci joins another, Of the kingdom of heaven. 9. יסוד מורא, The foundation of fear. 10. סוד השם, Sepher Hashem, On the Tetragrammaton, or name Jehovah. 11. Eight treatises on the Hebrew grammar. 12. One on ethics. 13. One on logic. 14. A poem on the soul. 15. His Beginning of wisdom; an astrological tract, divided into eight parts, and treating on the influence of the stars and planets, their motions, aspects, lucky and unlucky days; of algebra and geometry, arithmetic and astronomy, of the world, of embolimal years, of chances, and judicial astrology. 16. His excellent poem on the game of chess, translated by Dr. Hyde; and some others of lesser note. Those who want to know more of this excellent rabbi, may consult the authors quoted in the margin (30).

(27) Polyd. Virg. l. xiv. p. 248. Matth. Paris, p. 111, & al. mach. in A. M. 4866. Wolf, Bibl. Hebr. N. 1727. Basnag. &c. (28) Juchasin, p. 131. Gantz Tzemach. & al. (29) Shalsheleth Hakkabalah, p. 41, & seq. Gantz Tzemach. & al. (30) Id. ibid. Juchasin, p. 130, & 163. Schikard, Simon Bartoloc. & al. &c. citat.

them,

them, he had recourse to king Alphonso VII. to whom he had done some signal services, and easily obtained an order from him to have all his adversaries silenced (W).

Maimonides's
defenders and opposers.

Synagogues
excommunicate each other about him.

WE have already given an account of the great Maimonides, who flourished in this century, in speaking of the Jews in Egypt. His works, of which we have there given a short account, particularly his Moreh Nevochim, soon raised him many admirers, but a much greater number of opponents; insomuch that the synagogues, who took part for and against him, made no scruple to excommunicate each other. Judah Alcharisi, who then flourished, and was a great poet, undertook to translate his comments on the Mishnah, at the request of the Marfilian doctors, who did not understand Arabic, and gave that work the noblest encomiums. He likewise translated his Moreh Nevochim, or resolution of doubtful questions; but though he likewise cried it up to the skies, Maimonides was not satisfied with it, but disapproved of the version. On the other hand, R. Solomon, then chief of the synagogue of Montpelier, finding that he spoke still plainer against the thalmudic decisions in his Moreh Nevochim, than he had done in the comment, lost all patience, and engaged all the doctors there, particularly R. R. Jonah and David who studied under him, to stand up in the defence of the thalmud against him, even to the burning of his books, and excommunicating all that should read them, or apply themselves to the study of philosophy.

THE war, thus declared against him and his followers, was however so far from deterring others from entering the lists in his behalf, that the doctors of Narbonne, with the great Joseph Kimchi at their head, not only stood up in his defence, but engaged all their brethren in Spain to do the same (X). This war between the doctors of both nations lasted about forty years, and employed the most learned heads and pens on both sides; neither can it be said to have been effectually ended, seeing his works have been attacked and censured, from time to time, in the subsequent centuries, by fresh doctors of all nations. However, the schism which they had caused was abolished an. 1232. But it is time to speak of the other learned Jews that flourished in this 12th century<sup>1</sup>.

The three Kimchi's.

R. KIMCHI was the son of Joseph Kimchi, and, though a hot zealot for Maimonides, was inferior to his father in point of learning and reputation. This last was a bitter enemy to the Christians; and suffered his zeal to transport him beyond all bounds, as one may see by his book of the wars of the Lord, and his treatise on faith and alliance with heretics, meaning the Christians (Y). His son David, or, as his name is commonly abridged, Radak, for Rabbi David Kimchi, was more learned than either of them (Z), and much more moderate towards

<sup>1</sup> CATEL. hist. de Languedoc, lib. iv. BARTOL. WOLF, & BASNAG. ubi sup.

(W) This rabbi was born An. 1140. An author of his nation (31) tells us, that he some way or other so exasperated that monarch against him, that he threatened to hang him if he did not turn Christian; and that he, still persisting in his religion, was really hanged. Barzoloci hath endeavoured to confute that story, by pretending, that the Spanish monarchs never carried their persecution so far against recusants, but only against such as relapsed (32). But without examining how far that is true, Hallewi might have committed some other crime, which Alphonso might refuse to forgive him unless he turned Christian, and caused him to be hanged upon his stiff refusal.

(X) Narbonne was then in the hands of the Spaniards, which therefore engaged all the rest of the Spanish Jews to take part with it, and to excommunicate the synagogues of Languedoc, as those had done to theirs. They could not however bring them all over to their side; for that of Pescairo, a little town in Old Castile, had two learned doctors, both of the name of Abraham, who wrote strenuously against him; the one, in contempt, treating him as a young fellow; and the other so effectually confuting him, that Maimonides was forced to own that he was the only man that had defeated him; though at the same time he forewarned him, in a kind of prophetic triumph, that he would not live to finish his work: which came to pass accordingly, for Maimon died in that very year.

Another learned antagonist was R. Judah, a physician and chief of the synagogue of Toledo, whose zeal for the thalmud engaged him to join with the French against him, and against R. Kimchi, his most strenuous champion. He wrote accordingly with such force and fury against them, that Kimchi had no other way to silence him than by prevailing, by dint of caballing and interest, on the synagogues of Catalonia to excommunicate those of France and their partisans; which obliged them at last to submit, to revoke all their decrees against those of Spain; and even to consent to erase what they had written upon Maimonides's monument of his being an excommunicate*.

(Y) There is some dispute whether he was of French or Spanish origin, which is occasioned by his son R. David being styled provençal, dwelling at Narbonne; which city belongs now to the French, but did then to the Spaniards, as we observed in the last note. And this at once decides the controversy.

(Z) The Jews, alluding to his surname, affirm, that there can be no Kemach, meal, without a Kimchi, or miller; meaning, that there can be no true learning without him; and indeed there is hardly a better help to the Hebrew tongue than his grammar; which, though he took the greater part of it from an Arabic one printed by Abul Valid Marom, yet he so much improved and enlarged it, that it appears quite a new work. It is intituled, Miklol, perfection (differing from Miklol Jophi, or perfection of beauty, of R. Solomon Ben Melek), and consists of two parts, one of which is the grammar, and the second a lexicon of all the Hebrew roots. His עת סופר, or pen of a writer, is of the Mafforetic kind, and commended by the learned Elias Levita. Some other treatises are likewise ascribed to him in the same way; but what he has been most famed for, is, his comments upon most books of the Old Testament. He is likewise said to have written a version of them all in Spanish (33).

(31) Solom. Ben. Virg. p. 7.
(33) Vide Wolf, & al. sup. citat.

(32) Bibl. Rab. tom. i. p. 21.

* Vide Bartol. Wolf, & al. ubi sup.

a the Christians. His works, which the reader may see an account of in the last note, are still very useful and esteemed, particularly his grammar and comment upon the Psalms, which have been translated into Latin, as well as some others of his commentaries, and inserted into the Latin bibles of Venice and Basil. He had a brother named Moses, who was likewise a man of learning, and the author of a treatise, intituled, The Garden of Delight, which treated of the state of the soul, but hath never been printed. The manuscript of it is in the Vatican library <sup>m</sup>.

ANOTHER famed rabbi of this century was the learned Solomon Jarchi, styled by some <sup>Solomon Jar-</sup> the son of Isaac, and by others Rashi, which is only an abbreviation of his name, a native of <sup>chi.</sup> Troyes in Champagne, who left it to travel into Judea and Persia, and, upon his return, applied himself wholly to the study and teaching of the thalmud (A). His comment on the Gemarrab hath been so highly esteemed, that it hath gained him the title of Prince of Commentators; tho' his notes on the sacred books are so fraught with fables and thalmudic visions, that he is as much despised for it, as he is admired for the other. He died at Treves, in the 75th <sup>His death,</sup> year of his age (B), and his corpse was carried to Prague, where his tomb is still to be seen <sup>A. C. 1180.</sup>. The Jews in general had many famed men in most sciences; such as Kimchi for grammar; Judah Alcharisi, R. Hallevi, Joseph Hadajian, of Cordona, and Aben Ezra for poetry; the last named, and Abraham Nassi, for astronomy. It were endless to go through the names of their celebrated professors; we shall only mention one, viz. Isaac Hazaken, or the elder, who <sup>Jews famed</sup> had sixty disciples, so skilled in the Gemarrab, that they could extempore dispute on any point <sup>on other ac-</sup> that was proposed to them out of it, and deduce arguments pro and con from it. One of <sup>counts.</sup> these disciples was the famed Judah of Paris, who became very famous in the following century <sup>o</sup>.

THOSE of Germany made themselves remarkable rather for their piety, miracles, and prophecies, than for their learning; and, if we may believe their authors, R. Samuel, who lived <sup>In Germany</sup> at Vienna, gained the title of prophet, on account of the many oracles which he there deli- <sup>great prophets</sup> vered. His son Judah, surnamed the Pious, was no less famous for the miracles attributed to <sup>and miracle-</sup> him, and fit only for a Jewish creed (C). This century likewise produced some learned wo- <sup>Judah the</sup> men: and one of the Jewish travellers, mentioned a little higher, extols a daughter of the <sup>Pious, his mi-</sup> chief of the captivity in the east, who was so learned both in the law and in the thalmud, that <sup>raculous deli-</sup> she read lectures through the lattice of her window to a great number of disciples, so that <sup>verance.</sup> they only heard without seeing her, being free from danger of becoming enamoured with her, or she with them <sup>p</sup>. We have likewise seen in this chapter some Jews in the highest posts in the courts of several princes; others at the head of armies; and exercising their several functions with great applause. Portugal, amongst others, produced a most celebrated one, who not only raised himself, by dint of merit, to the command of the army, but, by his singular modesty, as well as his valour and success, eluded all the cabals and intrigues of

<sup>m</sup> BARTOL. ubi sup. tom. iv. WOLF, ubi sup. N. 495, & ali. sub nom. GANTZ, ubi sup. sub an. 4950. Shalsheth, sub A. C. 1192. <sup>n</sup> Id. ibid. <sup>o</sup> GANTZ, & al. ubi sup. <sup>p</sup> Itinerar. R. PETACH. ap. WAGENSEIL, in Sottah, p. 220.

(A) His surname, Jarchi, which we have elsewhere observed, signifies Lunatic, hath been variously canvassed, some deriving it from the city of Lunel in Languedoc, where was an academy, which hath been rendered famous by his professorship; others from that of Luna in Italy. We have likewise seen that name given to the celebrated R. Samuel, on account of his great skill in astronomy †. It were therefore vain to hunt after uncertain etymologies, even tho' the subject were of greater moment than this. To come therefore to something better worth knowing:

His method of teaching and disputing was somewhat singular. He had made, during his travels, a collection of the most difficult points he had met with, together with their decisions by the learned. Upon his return, he went and visited all the academies and schools, and disputed about them; and, upon his going away, threw down a quire, in which those decisions were written, without the name of any author; and those quires were carefully collected every-where, and amounted to a prodigious number; and it was by the help of those that the gloss on the thalmud is said to have been compiled.

(B) He left three daughters, whom he married to as many learned doctors; the most famed of whom was R. Meir, who helped to collect the scattered quires of his father-in-law, and to compile the gloss above-mentioned from them. Jarchi had some grandsons likewise, who assisted him in it; viz. Jaacob of Orleans, commonly called Rath, and R. Thom, likewise surnamed Rath. The former died in Champagne, and the other was murdered anno 1190, and his writings were destroyed with him (34).

(C) To give a sketch of it, R. Gedaliab, in his Shalsheth (35), tells us, that being taken in a narrow lane, at Worms, by a waggon, which must unavoidably have crushed him to death against the wall, the brutish waggoner driving on with all speed, in spite of his cries to stop; the wall gave way just in the place where he stood, and left room for the carriage to go on without hurting him. Others say it was Judah's mother who was thus miraculously preserved, being then big with him. And the learned Wagenseil prefers this last relation, which he had from the mouths of some credible Jews, who shewed him the very spot; which hollow they pretend is still to be seen in the wall. Worms was then full of them, and no less pregnant with their miracles.

† See before, p. 494.

(34) Gantz, Shalsheth, &c.

(35) Shalsheth, p. 55.

Converts and apostates.

the Portuguese ministry against him (D). We might here mention likewise some of their learned, who forsook the synagogue in this century, to turn either Mohammedans or Christians; but as that would carry us too far, we shall only give an instance of each in the following note (E), and proceed to some more momentous transactions in it, viz. the several false Messiahs that appeared both in the east and west during this interval.

False Messiahs.
First in France.

OF these, authors reckon no less than nine or ten; so that the great number of their learned could neither hinder their impostures, nor the people's credulity. The first of these appeared in France, an. 1137. The place of his birth or manifestation is not mentioned by any author; only they tell us, that Lewis, who was then on the throne, caused their synagogues to be pulled down, and the Jewish nation to be severely treated: from which we may conclude that he had imposed on a great part of his nation (F). In the following year another appeared in Persia, and drew such multitudes after him, that the king thought fit to oblige the rest of the Jews to summon him, and order him to lay down his arms; which they tried at first in vain, till he seemed moved at the sight of the multitudes of children, which the sorrowful mothers brought before him to excite his pity. He then proposed to that monarch, that he should pay him the charges of the war, and let him lead his troops away unmolested; which, to the wonder of the Jews, was agreed to, and the sum stipulated by the Messiah paid down, and the troops disbanded. But the king, finding himself out of danger, obliged the disarmed Jews to reimburse him the money; and, as some add, caused the impostor's head to be struck off<sup>1</sup>.

A second in Persia.
A. C. 1138.

A third in France,
A. C. 1157.

MAIMONIDES mentions a third, which appeared in Spain about 10 years before he wrote, who brought a severe persecution on their nation. He was a native of Cordoua, and was supported in his imposture by one of the greatest rabbies in that city, who wrote a book beforehand to prove the nearness of his appearing by the stars. Our author adds, that the better and wiser sort looked upon the fellow as a madman; but as those were few, in comparison of the rest, they could not hinder his gaining credit among them, till his disappointment undeceived them<sup>2</sup>. Ten years after that, another cheat proclaimed the coming of the Messiah within a year; and his prediction proving false, occasioned new troubles and persecutions against that credulous people. This was in the kingdom of Fez, where we are told<sup>3</sup> there was another person who proclaimed himself the Messiah, lately foretold (G). In the same year an Arabian set up there for the Messiah, and pretended to work miracles; though our author rather looked upon him as an enthusiast, who had more sincerity than judgment<sup>4</sup>; and, being consulted about him by the rest of the Jews, foretold to them the fatal consequence which his and their delusion would bring upon them. His advice, however, did not hinder

At Fez,
A. C. 1167.
A new one
there.

<sup>1</sup> SOLOM. BEN VIRG. ubi sup. p. 169. LENT de Pseudo Mess. Judæor. p. 36. <sup>2</sup> MAIMON. Epist. de Reg. Aust. ap. Wurft. p. 293. <sup>3</sup> SOLOM. BEN VIRG. ubi sup. p. 169. <sup>4</sup> MAIMON. Epist. ad Jud. in Massilia, ap. Wurft. ubi sup. p. 292.

(D) This was the great Dom. Solomon, the son of Jechaiab, who was as great a philosopher as general. His merit raised him to the dignity of field-master general, A. C. 1190, which was then the highest post in the militia; in which he behaved so well, that he obtained the command of the whole army. His valour and success raised him very powerful enemies among the grandees, whom he overcame by his singular modesty; and, not content with practising it himself, he inspired his nation with it; and having observed that their riding on horseback along the streets was displeasing to the Portuguese, he prevailed upon them to leave it off, as well as the wearing of silk garments.

(E) Of the first sort was the famous apostate Samuel Ben Jehudah, or, as he is commonly called, Asmouil, a Spaniard by birth, and by profession a physician, who, to convince the Moslems of the sincerity of his conversion, wrote a book against the Jews, an. 1174, in which he charges them with having altered the law of Moses. This accusation was greedily swallowed by them, and is still to this day; inasmuch that they forbid the quoting or translating any part of the Pentateuch according to the Jewish or Christian copies. They allege against them, that there is not a word in them about the resurrection of the dead, the life to come, prayers, alms, &c. But whether he furnished them with those objections out of hatred to them, or whether he did not rather mean, by those alterations he charges the Jews with, the false interpretations of the thalmudists, we cannot affirm (36).

Of the latter or Christian converts, we shall only mention Peter Alphonso; which names were given him, the former, because he was baptized on St. Peter's festival, and the other by the king of that name, who was his godfather (37). He was a native of Osea, and professed Judaism till the 40th year of his age; and, after his conversion, was made physician to Alphonso VII. who was king of Castile and Leon, and died an. 1108. Pedro wrote some dialogues against the Jews, which are still preserved (38), and from which one may conclude he had more zeal than skill in that controversy, if he was not rather more influenced by worldly views than solid arguments; for from this instance one may see that there were no encouragements wanting to bring them over.

(F) Maimonides, who lived 30 years after, tells us, that the French, into whose hands he fell, put him to death, and with him the holy assembly (39). And another Jewish writer (40) complains, that on account of that impostor they had pulled down a great number of synagogues in France.

(G) According to this last author, one would be apt to think that those two cheats acted in concert. However, as Maimonides, who flourished at that time, mentions but one impostor, it is likely Solomon was either misinformed, or hath ill expressed his meaning.

(36) D'Herbelot, Bibl. Orient. sub voc. Alphonse. Dialog. titul. 2 & 3. ap. Biblioth. Patr. tom. xxi. p. 184, & seq. Wurft. not. in Gantz Tzemach, p. 293.

(37) D'Aguirra, Bibliot. Hisp. tom. iii. l. i. c. 3.

(38) Al-

(39) Epist. de Austrat. Reg. ap.

(40) Solom. Ben Virg. ubi sup. p. 169.

a vast multitudes from following that impostor, who was apprehended at the end of a year, and brought before the king; where being asked what had induced him to that imposture, he boldly replied, that he was sent by God; and as a proof of it, told that monarch, that if he would order his head to be cut off, he should see him rise immediately after. The king took him at his word, and ordered him to be beheaded (H); upon which the cheat was sufficiently discovered, and those who had been deluded by him were grievously punished, and the nation condemned to very heavy fines<sup>u</sup>. Beheaded by his own desire.

SOME time after a leper, who found himself cured in one night of his stubborn disease, took it into his head, from that supposed miracle, that he was the Messiah; upon which he went and proclaimed himself such beyond the Euphrates, and drew vast multitudes after him. A leper sets up for one.

b The Jewish doctors, however, soon persuaded him and his followers, that this cure, miraculous as it seemed to be, was not a sufficient proof of his being the Messiah, and made them and him ashamed of their folly. But their appearing in arms on his account had so exasperated the people, that they raised a fresh persecution against them; and one of their writers assures us<sup>x</sup>, ten thousand of them, being quite tired with their sufferings on that account, forsook the Jewish religion, which hath rendered the memory of that impostor odious to the whole nation. A new and severe persecution was raised in Persia, an. 1174, on account of a seventh false Messiah, who had seduced some of the common people by such strange tricks, that they looked upon him afterwards as a conjurer or a devil<sup>y</sup>. Jews persecuted on his account. A seventh in Persia.

AN eighth impostor set up for the Messiah in Moravia, viz. David Almusser, who boasted that he had the power of rendering himself invisible whenever he pleased; and drew vast multitudes after him. To prevent the ill consequences of such concourses, the king sent to promise him his life, on condition that he surrendered himself into his hands. He did so; but that prince, instead of keeping his word with him, caused him to be flung into prison; from which, however, he soon escaped by the help of his art. They tried in vain to pursue him: he disappeared when he pleased; and the king, who went after him in person, had the mortification to see him one while, without being able to reach him. Tired at length with following him, he summoned the Jews, who were then very numerous, to seize and deliver him up; which they at length, out of fear of a new persecution, performed, and he was again imprisoned. But, whether his art was now exhausted, or some counter-charm was used against it, he could neither escape out of prison, nor out of the hands of the hang- An eighth in Moravia. Caught and executed.

d man<sup>z</sup> (I). BUT the most famous of all, during this century, was David Alroi, or Eldavid, whom others commonly place in the year 1199 or 1200; but Benjamin de Tudela, who travelled an. 1173, speaks of him as having appeared 10 years before. He was a native of Amaria, which city contained about 1000 Jews, who paid tribute to the king of Persia; and was well versed not only in the thalmudic learning, but likewise in the Chaldean magic, where he had picked out some strange secrets to delude the people by. He applied himself at first to the chief of the captivity, and to that of the synagogue of Bagdad, but chiefly prevailed on the Jews settled on the mountain called Haphtan to take up arms, after he had deluded them with some pretended miracles. The Persian king, alarmed at this armament, and the progress it had made, sent him express orders to come immediately to court; promising him at the same time, that if he proved himself the Messiah, he would acknowledge him as a king sent from heaven. Eldavid, contrary to expectation, obeyed the summons, and assured the king, that he was really the Messiah: upon which he was immediately clapt into prison, and was not to be acknowledged till he had by some miracle extricated himself out of it. But whilst the king was deliberating what death to put him to, word was brought to him that the prisoner was fled. He dispatched several couriers after him; who, upon their return, assured him that they had heard his voice, but had neither been able to see him or to lay hold on him. The king, suspecting them to have been corrupted, marched in person after him as far as the banks of the river Gozan, where he heard him call them fools, without seeing him. Soon after that, they perceived him dividing the waters of that river with his mantle, and crossing it. The king began to think indeed that he might be the Messiah; but was dissuaded from it by his A ninth, named Eldavid. His character, and success. Answer to the king of Persia. Disappears, and pursued in vain.

<sup>u</sup> MAIMON. Epist. ad Jud. in Massilia, ap. Wurft. ubi supra, p. 292.
Wurft. p. 293. SOLOM. ubi sup. p. 169.

<sup>y</sup> Id. ibid.

<sup>x</sup> Id. Epist. de Austr. Region. ap.

<sup>z</sup> Id. ibid.

(H) It is very probable that he made use of that stratagem only to free himself from a more cruel death: but that did not hinder a great number of his infatuated followers from hoping, that though he did not immediately rise from the dead, yet he would in some time after, when, to their no small disappointment, they found themselves deceived, and punished for their credulity.

(I) Maimonides and Solomon above quoted tell us of a ninth impostor, who, they say, lived in this 12th century, and in the time of Solomon the son of Addreti; but take no notice either of his name, country, or good or ill success.

officers, who assured him, that it was mere illusion ; and so the army passed the river without a seeing him.

Betrayed by his father-in-law. THE king wrote immediately upon it to the chiefs of the Jewish nation, to deliver up Eldavid to him, under the penalty of being all massacred without mercy. This obliged the chief of the captivity to send a submissive letter to him, desiring him to deliver himself up, and save his nation from destruction : but the impostor only made a jest of it, and absolutely refused it. He continued his hostilities, till his father-in-law, being tempted with a promise of 10,000 crowns, invited him to a supper ; and, having plied him with wine, cut off his head, and sent it to the king (K). But Zaid Aladin, instead of keeping his word, insisted upon having all those Jews delivered up who had served with him : which they endeavouring to excuse themselves from, he caused a vast number of their nation to be butchered in his dominions<sup>a</sup>. And thus much may serve for the false Messiahs of this century : from which the reader may see the great propensity of the Jews to run after every impostor that sets up for a deliverer, and to join with him in taking up arms, and committing all kinds of outrages and disorders against those whom they called their enemies, because held in subjection to them, whether Christians, Turks, or heathens ; and the necessity there was for every government under which they lived to keep a watchful eye over them, and to enact wholesome laws to keep them within due bounds ; especially as they betrayed no less surprising readiness, for the most part, when under persecution or disgrace, to abandon their religion for any other offered to them, in order to save themselves from a present danger ; but which forced conversions made them only more inveterate and revengeful against those who imposed them upon them, whenever any opportunity offered itself to throw off the disguise. So that nothing could be more impolitic and unnatural than to oblige such men to redeem their lives and liberties at the expence of their religion. But it is time to pass on to the next century.

Decay of the Jews during the 13th and 14th centuries. WE shall here again be obliged to join the 13th and 14th together, to avoid being frequently forced to break off the thread of their history ; and begin, as we have hitherto done, with those of the east, where we shall find them strangely dwindled, both in number and figure, especially with respect either to their chiefs, their academies, or learned men, of whom we hardly find any mention. With respect to the former, R. Petachiah, who travelled thither about the latter end of the last century, tells us, that they were still in being and authority<sup>b</sup> ; but it is most likely that the persecution lately mentioned, and which was not ended at the beginning of this, had put an effectual end to them ; since which time their affairs have still gone from bad to worse. For soon after that Nesser Ledinillah, khalif of Bagdad, and a very zealous Mohammedan, as well as a person of consummate avarice, grew jealous of the too great wealth of the Jews, as well as of their too eager zeal after every impostor that set up for a Messiah, raised an open persecution against them, and obliged all that would not turn Mohammedans to leave the Babylonish dominions<sup>c</sup> ; upon which one part marched away, and the rest chose to stay upon his terms (L). The wars that happened there since, under Melek

<sup>a</sup> BEN VIRG. Hist. Jud. p. 162. sub voc. ABULPHARAG. Dynast. ix. p. 532.

<sup>b</sup> Itinerar. MS. ap. Wagenf. in Sotah.

<sup>c</sup> D'HERBEL. Bibl. Orient.

(K) It is not unlikely that this Eldavid was the same with a David Ben David mentioned by an ancient chronicle (41), who was likewise a Persian, and appeared about the beginning of the 13th century. He is said to have been looked upon by the Jews as their king, and to have gathered a vast army of them under him. The chronicle adds, that he had formed a design of coming from Persia to Cologne, to meet three magicians who were to be there ; and had already gone through some provinces, when he was forced to lead his army homewards again. What is there added about these three magicians, that they were to be of a gigantic stature, gives, indeed, the story the air of a rabbinic fable ; but if we consider how credulous the Germans were of such prodigies, and how eager and desirous they were to embrace every rumour of a Messiah, it is not improbable, that, having heard of the conquest and progress of Eldavid in Persia, they might give it out that he was coming full speed to their deliverance, in order to inspire their brethren with hopes of seeing an end of their slavery, if not with some design to do the same in Germany which the other had done in Persia (42). So that Eldavid and David the son of David may be probably enough the same person.

(L) Among those that staid was Joseph the son of Jahiah, a famed physician and mathematician, who chose to dissemble for a time, rather than expose himself to unavoidable misery. However, he took the first opportunity he could to turn his effects into money, and retired into Egypt, where Maimonides was still alive, and, by his assistance, corrected a system of astronomy which he had brought with him ; and, after his death, retired to Aleppo, where he bought an estate, and married.

He died soon after there ; and having, as we are told, made an engagement with an intimate friend, that he would come back from the other world to inform him of the state of it, made him wait two years, and at length appeared to him. His friend, finding him very backward to disclose the secret to him, took him by the hand, and challenged his promise ; but could get nothing more from him than this dark answer, " The universal hath reunited itself to the universal, and the particular to the particular (43)." This was in all likelihood only a dream of his friend, after having thought long and intensely upon their previous engagement ; otherwise one would think it hardly worth the other's while to take so long a journey to make so inconsiderable a discovery.

(41) Fragm. Hist. an. Chr. 1222, ap. Wurst. Hist. Germ. tom. ii. p. 89.
(43) Abulphar. Dynast. ix. p. 303, ap. Basnag. lib. ix. c. 16. §. 4.

(42) Basnag. lib. ix. c. 11. §. 14.

a Al Nassar and his brother, against Holagu, alias Hulaku, emperor of the Tartars, his killing those two princes, after the taking of Bagdad, helped to complete their ruin there†.

JUDEA was no less infested with the wars which raged between the Christians and Saracens; but that did not hinder the Jews from having some synagogues and learned rabbies in Judea. it. Here it was that the famed R. Moses Nachmanides, or, as his name is commonly abbreviated, Ramban, retired, and built a synagogue (M), and became one of the most celebrated cabbalists that age produced. What made him leave his native country, where he was so esteemed and beloved, for Judea, then so torn with wars, is not easy to guess; unless he perhaps had made himself obnoxious to the Spanish clergy by the conferences he had had with some friars, particularly that which was held before the king of Arragon and his court, anno 1263. The time of his death is likewise variously placed; by some, anno 1300, at which rate he must have lived 106 years; and by others 40 years sooner, though that is eight years before the author of Juchasin makes him to have finished his exposition of the cabbalistical law. His other most considerable works may be seen in the next note (N). However, the Jews made no great figure in Palestine during this interval; and contented themselves with having the free use of their schools and synagogues; and Nachmanides was the only considerable doctor they had among them<sup>d</sup>.

THEY did not fare much better in Egypt, where the invasion which St. Lewis made upon that kingdom, and the revolution that happened soon after under the Mamlukes, did not permit them to thrive either in wealth or learning; they being on the one hand excluded from having any share in public affairs, and, on the other, had been obliged to set aside all thoughts of learning of any kind, insomuch that we read not of one rabbi of any note among them. There was indeed one Simeon Duran, in some city of Afric, who published some works, which the reader may see in the margin (O); but he was neither Egyptian nor African, but a native of Spain, whence he had brought with him the comment of rabbi Alphez, which he translated there; and he did not flourish till the latter end of the 14th century<sup>e</sup>.

THE Jews about Babylon, as well as the dispersed of the ten tribes eastward, had suffered much, as we hinted a little higher, from the invasion of the Tartars; but at length gained a considerable respite under khan Argun*, by means of a Jewish physician named Saaddodowlah, a learned man, and agreeable companion, whom that prince made his prime minister. The Christian historians do him that justice to own, that he left them in quiet possession of what they had in that empire; but he made use of all the interest he had with his prince to promote the welfare of his own nation, and procured them some considerable privileges. They did not enjoy them long before Argun was taken dangerously ill, and died soon after; and Saaddodowlah, who was hated by the Moslems and Arabs for his kindness to the Jews, was accused by them of having poisoned him, and massacred for it; and, after him, a vast number of his

† De his, vide sup. vol. ii. p. 471, & seq. N. 1612. p. 876, & seq. p. 483.

<sup>d</sup> De hoc, vide BARToloc. ubi sup. WOLF, Bibl. Hæbr. D'HERBELOT, Bibl. Orient. sub voc. <sup>e</sup> De hoc, vid. sup. vol. ii.

(M) He was born at Girona, an. 1194, and at first studied chiefly physic, but made afterwards such progress in the study of the law, that he was styled the father of wisdom, the luminary and glory of the crown of holiness; and a sermon which he preached before the king of Castile, made him be looked upon as the father of eloquence. He at first seemed to have no opinion of the cabbalah; but after he came to take a relish to it, he became so expert in it, that he could find every thing he wanted in the sacred books, particularly in the Song of Moses, and passed from the speculative to the Hammahafith, or active or operative part of it (44).

(N) 1. A prayer on the ruin of the temple. 2. An epistle on the holiness of marriage, giving some rules how parents may beget honest children. 3. His garden of desire, another epistle, in the cabbalistical strain. 4. A third to his son, on moral subjects. 5. A fourth in defence of Maimonides. 6. The treasure of life, a cabbalistical treatise. 7. On faith and trust, likewise cabbalistical. 8. His exposition of the law, in the same strain, and more subtil than the rest. 9. On redemption or deliverance from banishment. 10. His sermon before the king of Castile, on the excellence of the divine law.

11. A treatise on purity. 12. New exposition on the treatise of Bava Batra. 13. On that of Jatzirah, or the creation. 14. On that of the wars of the Lord. 15. On that of Maimonides, called Jad Chazakah. 16. Orders of salvation, cabbalistical. 17. Eden the garden of the Lord, ditto. 18. Jaaleb's spring, ditto. 19. A comment on Job. 20. On some treatises of the thalmud. 21. A treatise on the end or coming of the Messiah. 22. On the pomgranate, cabbalistical. 23. Questions and answers. 24. The lily of secrets, a cabbalistical exposition by numbers. 25. The square table. 26. The law of man, or directions how he ought to behave in sickness, death, mourning, and expectation of a future life. 27. His conference with a Dominican friar, mentioned above (45).

(O) Besides the version mentioned above, he compiled a chronological catalogue of all the antient rabbies, intitled, Maghen Aboth, the Shield of the fathers, another called Ohef Mishpath, the Lover of judgment, and a third called Mishpath Tzedek, the Judgment of righteousness, or just judgment (46); which two last Buxtorf has blended into one, because they are commonly found bound together.

(44) Bartoloc. ubi sup. tom. iv. Wolf, Bibl. Hæbr. N. 1612. p. 876, & seq. Gantz Tzemach, Shalshleth, Juchasin, &c. (45) Id. ibid. (46) Bartoloc. ubi sup. tom. iv. p. 411.

nation<sup>f</sup>. Notwithstanding which, they found means to settle themselves in the territories, and even in the court, of the Moguls, after Argun's death (P), by the next century. But as we read of neither academies nor learned men amongst them, we may conclude that they were more intent on their worldly interest.

Jews peaceable
under the Greeks.

It is probable likewise that they enjoyed the same tranquillity in the Grecian empire, during these two centuries; at least we meet with nothing to the contrary. And what confirms us, that they enjoyed there a full liberty of their religion, is, that the Greek writers of those times condemned the violence which the Latins exercised against them, in forcing them to be baptized, though themselves were the most forward to judaize<sup>g</sup>. These reproaches were but too well founded, considering the cruel usage which the Jews met with from the crusaders, both in the west before they set out, and through every place in the east where they came to; and that the pope and his clergy had revived several Jewish customs in the church; such as the eating of the paschal lamb, unleavened bread, and some others, which the reader may see in the author quoted in the margin<sup>h</sup>.

Sad state in the west.

It is now time to take a view of the Jewish state in the western parts, where we shall find them no less oppressed than they were numerous and wealthy; for the latter seldom failed of exciting the jealousy of the clergy, and of producing the former. We begin with Spain, where they began to be persecuted from the very entrance of the 13th century, by the bishop of Toledo<sup>i</sup>, who beheld their increase in number and wealth with a jealous eye, and stirred up the populace against them; and, putting himself at their head, went and broke into their houses and synagogues, and plundered them (Q). The crusaders, who were then preparing for their expedition into the Holy Land<sup>k</sup>, and were soon after to have their rendezvous near that city, completed what the prelate had begun, from a notion they took, that the destruction of those enemies of Christ would undoubtedly obtain a blessing on their enterprise; and accordingly made such havock amongst them, that Abravenel looks upon this persecution as one of the four severest ones that nation had ever suffered<sup>l</sup>; insomuch that he reckons that a greater number of them went out of Spain than that which Moses brought out of Egypt. The Spanish nobility, indeed, interposed their authority to suppress the cruelties exercised against them; but king Ferdinand, who was then endeavouring to ingratiate himself with the zealots by the persecution of the Albigenses, and other heretics, encouraged the same against the Jews, as the worst of them all. It is, however, certain, that if the Jews will deal sincerely, they must attribute all these disasters to their shameful remissness, and open transgression of their law in several instances, which they acknowledge to be of the highest moment, and which the reader may see in the margin (R).

A. C. 1209.

1212.

The main cause of it.

THEY

<sup>f</sup> D'HERBELOT, Bibl. Orient. sub voc.

<sup>g</sup> Græci in Latinos, ap. COTELER. Mon. Eccles. Græc. tom. iii.

p. 99—501—504—506—515.

<sup>h</sup> BASNAG. ubi sup. lib. ix. c. 17. §. 15.

<sup>i</sup> MARIANA, ubi

sup. tom. v. p. 487. CARDOSO las excellentias, p. 373.

<sup>k</sup> MARIANA, tom. xi. c. 22. p. 490.

<sup>l</sup> In

Isaiam, cap. xlv.

(P) At least we read in the life of Abu Zaid, who reigned at the beginning of that century, of a Jew who appeared at his court in great state and grandeur, and attended by a number of young pages, upon one of whom he leaned. A merry poet came and kneeled before him, and told him, that he saw the remains of the house of Moses carried by angels, and he was come to pay homage to it (47). But how they fared when the mogul's monarchy came to be divided into so many principalities, and torn with cruel wars, can only be guessed; they never being wanting to promote their own interest by money, and other kind offices, among the contenders; and we do not hear of any persecutions raised against them.

(Q) His pretence for this persecution, which reached, however, no farther than their goods and liberty of conscience, was raised by that prelate on account of their having formerly betrayed the city of Toledo to the *Moor*s. But that this was a false accusation, appears both from the silence of all historians of that time, and much more so from the capitulation of its inhabitants, by which they were permitted either to leave the country, and take all their effects with them, or to stay and have the free use of their religion, on paying the same taxes they had paid to the Goths.

(R) It is plain, that, in order to render themselves less odious to the Christians, on account of their scrupulous observance of their Mishnah (which, as we formerly have had occasion to shew, is with them of more than equal authority with the sacred books*) they had dispensed with many things which are strictly commanded; particularly with respect to the tephilim, or phylacteries, which they are bound to wear on their heads and hands; and concerning the wearing, shape, and materials, of them, there were no less than eight decisions given to them, as they word it, from Mount Sinai, among which that of their being of a square form, and sown with dried nerves, was esteemed very considerable. And yet they had been so remiss in this and other particulars, both in Spain and Portugal, that their German brethren, always more scrupulous about these matters, were highly offended at it; insomuch that R. Baruc came on purpose from Germany, about the beginning of the 13th century, to upbraid them with their shameful remissness and novelties. The small success he met with there made him soon leave them, and pass from Spain into Candia, and from thence into Judea (48).

But another and more scandalous abuse had by that time been introduced among them, viz. their intermarriage with strangers; and as those with Christians were so severely forbidden, many of them made no scruple to marry Moorish and Saracen women; insomuch that the (47) D'Herbelot, Bibl. Orient.

1236. Bartoloc. ubi sup. tom. i. p. 695. V. p. 75. N. 1210.

* See before, p. 483, sub not.

(48) R. Isaac de Garmisa, an.

- a THEY were since accused of an enormous crime, viz. of having stolen a young chorister of the cathedral of Saragossa, named Dominick, and having crucified him. The discovery is, by the legendaries of those times, ascribed to a miraculous light observed on the grave in which they had laid him, by the sea side; upon which he was taken up and fainted, and placed in that cathedral church<sup>m</sup>. The fact is backed with several other circumstances almost as surprising<sup>n</sup>; but yet justly rejected as fabulous, by all but credulous bigots. However, we do not find that it produced any persecution; which is strange, if they really had been guilty of it; though it served to render them odious, and exposed them to the insults of the populace; which so intimidated them, that it helped to forward their conversion, which was then carrying on with great zeal and success, if those authors may be credited. Among
- b those that were zealous for this blessed work, was the learned Raymond Pennaforte, general of the Dominicans, who was then in high esteem with James I. king of Arragon, and his confessor, as well as minister with the pope. He had already, by his credit and address, suppressed the violence of the populace against them; and persuaded that prince, that the most gentle were the most effectual means of converting them<sup>o</sup>. Upon which several persons were pitched upon to learn the Hebrew and Arabic tongues, in order to fit themselves to dispute with and convince them of their errors by solid arguments (S). These accordingly pursued their study of those tongues, and of the sacred books, so closely, that they easily discovered the errors and fables of the rabbies, and were able to beat them at their own weapons. Among other productions brought forth against them, one was the Pugio Fidei, attributed by some to our Dominican above-mentioned, though it did not appear till three years after his death, and was written by another monk of that order, named Raymond Martini, and only encouraged and promoted by Pennaforte (T).

Accused of crucifying a youth,
A. D. 1250.

Pennaforte
strives to convert them,

A. C. 1255.

R. Martino's
Pugio Fidei.

<sup>m</sup> BEZOVIVS annal. ad an. 1250. <sup>n</sup> VINCENT BLASCO peristephan. Arragon. lib. iv. fol. 72. TAMAIO Salazar Martyr Hisp. p. 625, & seq. Fascicul. temp. in Hist. Germ. tom. iii. fol. 18. WILLELM. MONACH. veter. ævi Analect. & al. <sup>o</sup> Anonym. in vit. R. Pennaforte.

famed Moses Cozzi, so named from the town of Cozzo in the Milanese, tho' a native of Spain, and one of the most learned and zealous rabbies of that age, thundered out his anathema's against that practice with so much vehemence, that he persuaded many of them to put away their strange wives. At that time the city of Toledo had no less than 12,000 Jews settled in it.

(S) We are told, however, that he succeeded better against the Moors, of whom he is said to have converted above 10,000; whilst the Jews contented themselves with expressing a great regard for him, on account of his singular moderation, without betraying any inclination to turn Christians, though the king had published some edicts against them, which, if not quite so bloody and severe as others have been, yet deprived the recusants of their ancient liberty.

Pennaforte hath not only been highly cried up for his zeal, but hath been likewise canonized for his miracles, one of which their legend tells us was, that not being longer able to bear the corruption of the Spanish court, he crossed the sea upon his clock, whilst his staff served him for a rudder†.

(T) Some have affirmed that he was originally a Jew, and, after his conversion, entered into that order, wherein he made so great a figure for his learning, that he was chosen to hold that famed conference with R. Nachmanides, before king Ferdinand, which we mentioned under his name, and wherein they add he had so much the superiority, that he not only silenced that learned Jew, but obliged him, through shame of his defeat, to retire into Judea, as we there hinted. But in this they have done Martini more honour than he deserved, seeing he was not the person who held the dispute, in which he said but little, but another of his order named Paul; and this is the only person mentioned in that king's edict, and was accordingly cited as such at another dispute held before pope Benedict III.

However, with respect to the conference above-mentioned, each side sung victoria. Paul obtained an edict from that monarch, enjoining the Jews to open the gates of their houses and synagogues to him, and to furnish him with all their Hebrew books whenever he came to dispute with them (49). On the other hand, our Jewish doctor (50), who published an account of that conference, pretends that the king was so well satisfied with their rabbi's conduct, that he gave him 300 crowns to defray his charges. He hath been since cried up and quoted, by those of his nation, as a learned defender of the Jewish religion, and affirmed to have lived in great esteem at Jerusalem, and to have retired thither merely on a religious account; though it appears plainly enough, even from their very account, that he made but a poor answer to his antagonist, about the time of the Messiah's coming, and that the only advantage he had against him was owing to the absurd manner which that monk took to prove the Trinity of persons against him.

There is indeed some reason to suspect this relation, from several circumstances, to have been written, not by that rabbi, but by some German Jew some time after, there being several German idioms in it, which shew it could not be written by a native of Gironna. And even this conference made so little noise, that the pope above-mentioned, who was a native of Arragon, had heard nothing of it, tho' the Jews represented it as so much in their favour, that he blamed the king for having permitted, and friar Paul for having held it. As to the Pugio Fidei, it hath been much cried up since it first appeared, as the best thing written against the Jews; but that was not till the last century, it having lain dormant till then (1). We shall not take upon us to pass a judgment upon that work, from which Porcheto, Galatino, N. de Lyra, Finus Ricci, Jerom de St. Fido, and others among the Roman Catholics, and Du Pleffis de Mornay among the Protestants, have drawn most of their Jewish learning, but in which there are several arguments against the Jews very jejune and inconclusive. As for the author, he was so well versed in the Hebrew and the Jewish books, that it hath given occasion to several learned men to think that he was a convert from the synagogue; tho' if he had been so, it is not likely that his Jewish antagonist Nachmanides, above-mentioned, would have forbore upbraiding him with it, in the relation he gave of their conference.

† Anonym. in Pennafort. apud Basn. l. ix. c. 17. §. 7.

(50) Disp. Nachm. ap. Wagenf. tela ignea Satanæ, tom. ii. p. 24. & seq.

(49) Codex leg. antiq. ap. Lindembrok, fol. 235.

(1) Basnag. ubi sup. c. 17. §. 9. & seq.

Alphonso X. encourages the Jews.
A. C. 1255.

Some of them great astronomers.

Massacred at Orsana.

At Palma.

Acquitted by the king.

Loved by king

ABOUT the same time Alphonso X. king of Castile, and a celebrated astronomer, being then a about compiling those tables which have since gone by his name, gave no small encouragement to the Jewish rabbies ; many of whom he found well versed in that science, and who by that means easily insinuated themselves into his favour. Among them, Judab de Toledo translated by his order the astronomical works of Avicenna, and improved them by a new division of the stars, which he divided into forty-eight constellations<sup>p</sup>. The most considerable of the Jews, who assisted that prince in the compiling of his tables, were Abel Ragbel, and Alquibitz de Toledo, whom he styled his masters, Aben Musio, and Mahomad de Sevilla, Joseph Ben Hali, and Jacob Abvena of Cordoua (U). He likewise made use of them in some other cases, which the reader will see in the last note ; and proved so generous a patron to them, that it excited the jealousy of the zealots, and put them upon hatching new plots and accusations against them. For it was probably about this time that three villains, of the city of Orsana in Andalusia, threw a dead corpse into the house of a Jew, and accused him of having murdered him : upon which the populace rose up and massacred a great number of them, whilst others went and took sanctuary in the houses of some Christians of their acquaintance. It was then the Passover, and they finding nothing there but leavened bread, which is forbidden them during that whole solemnity†, many of them were like to have been starved, they chusing rather to fast than to break the law<sup>q</sup>. The inhabitants of Palma likewise fell upon and killed many of them ; upon which they sent to desire their brethren to send a deputation to court, to obtain the suppression of a massacre which was like to prove a general one. But the deputies were so closely pursued by their enemies, that they were forced to quit the highway, and shelter themselves in a wood, to avoid being murdered by the way ; by which means these last were got to the court, and had laid their accusation, before they could reach it. Joseph, who was at the head of the deputation, and chief of the Jewish council, however, pleaded his cause so well, that he was admired by all the court, and the Jewish nation absolved from the pretended murder. But the king took occasion from thence to charge them with several other abuses, by which they made themselves justly odious to the Christians (W). Their accusers still insisted that the Jew should be put to the torture, to know whether he had committed the murder ; but he escaped that punishment, by causing the tomb to be opened, out of which the body had been taken, and flung into that house.

AMONG those learned Jews that flourished in the reign of king Alphonso, was the famed Mithridos, as he is called by Gantz, though he was the son of Theodore, prince of the Levites at Burgos. There was at the same time another Meir at Narbonna, with whom he is often confounded, who was likewise a great doctor, and had, like him, a great number of disciples (X). The king of Arragon, James I. though a devout man, was so far from following

<sup>p</sup> HIGUERA, Histor. Toletan. lib. xxi. c. 8. MS. & lib. xxii. c. 12. p. 605.

<sup>q</sup> SOLOM. BEN VIRG. p. 78 ad 92.

<sup>r</sup> Idem ibid.

† De hoc, vid. Anc. Hist. vol. i.

(U) Besides those above-mentioned, Alphonso sent for about 50 more learned men from Gascony, Paris, and other places, to translate the tables of Ptolemy, and to compile a more correct set of them. All these great men were lodged in a palace near Toledo, which they made their observatory. The king himself presided over them ; and, in his absence, Aben Ragbel and Alquibitz. They continued making their observations from an. 1258 to 1262 (2), and when their work was finished they were dismissed with the greatest tokens of his royal munificence.

He caused likewise a treatise to be published by them, intituled, Libro de las armillas, or a treatise on circles, the manuscript of which is still preserved at Seville. He made use likewise of some of the most famed astronomers, among which were some Jewish rabbies of the first class. It was finished in the 25th year of his reign, an. 1276.

About the same time flourished, in the kingdom of Granada, Moses Ben Tibbon, who translated Euclid's Elements. A Jewish writer (3) makes him to have been a professor at Montpelier when he wrote it ; that is, according to him, an. 1330 ; though it is plain he lived in Spain in the reign of king Alphonso, that great encourager of learned men of all religions, about A. C. 1270 (4).

(W) These were their grievous extortions, and excessive usury, the richness and finery of their dress, the state and grandeur with which they appeared in the streets. He asked them likewise, why they learned to sing, when they should rather mourn ? why they taught their children to fence and fight, since they did not go to the wars ? “ If you will needs follow some of the ill customs of my subjects, said he to them, why do ye not also imitate their good ones, their peaceableness, modesty, &c. I do not speak these things out of any hatred to you : for why should I hate a people whom God loves ? Neither do I pretend to dispute with you, I know that you have always some vain excuses and pretences ready at hand ; only make a right use of what I have said to you.”

(X) This of Toledo was a great cabbalist, and wrote a treatise which he intituled, לפני ולפני, Liphne ulphanim, which may be properly rendered within and without, on this and that side, or before and behind, to shew that he was master of every branch of the most subtle cabbalah, and had studied and turned it over on every side. He likewise wrote a volume of letters against R. R. Nachmanides and Maimonides ; and had a number of disciples who became the glory of the Jewish nation (5).

(2) Basnag. ubi sup. c. 17. §. 9, & seq. mach, An. sext. milliar. 30. seu Christi 1270. p. 748.

(3) R. Gedal. Shalshel. Hakkabal.

(5) Bartoloc. tom. iv. p. 18. Wolf, Bibl. Habr. N. 1380.

(4) Gantz Tzic-

a the reigning zeal against the Jews, that he is affirmed to have called them to his assistance, to have learned moral lessons from them, and even to have borrowed some of their prayer-books, and used them in his private devotions (Y). So that though they were hated by the populace, and the ignorant among the clergy, the great and the learned not only protected, but admired and encouraged them. However, this happiness was clouded again by several accidents and misfortunes which befel them some time before the close of the 13th, and the beginning of the 14th century.

James of Aragon,
A. C. 1264.

THE first was occasioned by two impostors, who went hand in hand in a design to impose upon all the synagogues of Spain. The principal of them, named Zacharia, did not indeed set up for the Messiah, but pretended he had found out, by his skill in the prophets (Z), the time of his appearing, which he told them was just at hand. He named the very day; and the Jews, who had prepared themselves by fasting and alms, went on that day to the synagogues cloathed in white, and in high expectation of him. A Jew, who since turned monk, and wrote against his nation, an. 1458, adds, that they were greatly surprised to find not only their garments all covered with red crosses, but likewise the linen they had in their houses*. It is indeed more likely, that the only cross was the shame of being deceived, and exposed to the laughter and insults of the Christians. They were deceived in a different way, about thirty years after, by a poor rabbi, named Moses de Leon; who, not being able to maintain his numerous family by the small income of his synagogue, took it into his head to sell complete copies of the book Zohar, which till then could only be had by piece-meal; and which he supplied out of his own head. At length the learned found a sufficient difference between the old and the new, to convince them of the cheat; and this was a new subject of shame and insult, not only on the rabbi, but on the nation.

Jews in Spain deceived by an impostor.
A. C. 1258.

By a rabbi,
A. C. 1290.

BUT the most dreadful of all their disasters was that which happened to them about the beginning of the fourteenth century, and was occasioned by the irruption of a band of enthusiastic shepherds, who pretended to work miracles; and, being swelled into a numerous army, carried fire and sword into many provinces, and were not suppressed till after a dreadful effusion of blood (A). The Jews in particular bore their share of the cruelties which those enthusiasts

Irruption of the shepherds,
A. C. 1320.

* ALPHONSO DE SPIÑA, Fortalit. Fidei, titul. iii.

† BARTOLOC. ubi sup. tom. iv. p. 82.

(Y) Rabbi Jonah, who flourished under that prince, wrote a letter to another of the same name, at Gironna, to desire his advice in what manner he should best comply with his majesty's desire, who had enjoined him to compile a treatise on piety, and the duties of religion: and it is to him, and not to his correspondent, that the treatise on the fear of God, which hath been translated into several languages, ought in all likelihood to be ascribed.

It must be owned, that some of the Jewish offices are inimitably fine and seraphic, and the prayers conceived in the most elevated and ecstatic strains. That in particular which they use on expiation day, is a master-piece of the most affecting devotion, and such as the most pious Christians might use to advantage. No wonder, then, if, in an age in which the clergy rather applied themselves to controversy than devotion, such a pious monarch should express a desire after the Jewish prayer-books.

(Z) We have formerly taken notice of a superstitious belief of the Jews, that if any man could attain to the true pronunciation of the Hebrew name of God, he would be able to work the greatest miracles, and dive into the deepest counsels of God†. This fellow not only pretended to have found it out, but, instead of concealing it, as had been done till then, published and dispersed it among all the Jewish synagogues of Spain; and it was by that means that he so easily gained credit with them.

(A) The origin of these shepherds is variously related (6). The French historians affirm, that it began in France under the reign of Philip the Long; and that the pretence for their rising was the conquest of the Holy Land. They had a degraded priest, and a runaway monk at their head, who, by their pretended sanctity and miracles, so imposed on the credulity of the common people, that they left their flocks, farms, &c. to follow them; whilst the noblemen, being hurried away by the stream, protected them, till they found themselves obliged to destroy them, to avoid being plundered by them. They ravaged several of the southern provinces, broke open the prison doors, and listed all the malefactors they found into their society; by which means they made themselves masters of several cities, and committed the vilest outrages and cruelties, but more particularly against the Jews. To avoid which, a considerable number of them retired into a castle, under the protection of the French king; in which they were soon after closely besieged by the shepherds, with a design to destroy them all. After a stout and desperate defence, the besieged, finding their arms to fail, began to fling their children over the walls, in hopes to move their compassion, but in vain; for the besiegers set fire to the gates, and entered the place, where, to their great disappointment, they found nothing but the carcases of the besieged, and some children that had been left alive: for they had butchered one another, to prevent falling into the hands of those merciless barbarians.

The Jews indeed give us a different account of them, which they pretend to have taken out of some Spanish chronicle which they translated into Hebrew, and is as follows: A young Spanish shepherd, named Roar, was often visited by a dove, which, as soon as he went to catch it, turned itself into a young man; and at length ordered him to put himself at the head of the populace, and raise an army of them to drive the Saracens out of Spain; and, to gain him the greater credit, had imprinted the figure of the cross on one of his arms; on which some of the most expert or credulous could read a promise of success. Roar soon saw himself at the head of an army of 300,000 men, which was designed against the Saracens; but the fear he conceived of being defeated by a nation so well inured in war, made him alter his resolution, and turn his whole force against the Jews.

† See Anc. Hist. vol. i. p. 484, sub not. (T).

(6) Vide Basnag. lib. ix. c. 18. Et auctor. ab eo citat.

Jews doubly persecuted,
A. C. 1321.

enthusiasts committed where-ever they came; which laid the foundation for a long train of a misfortunes which attended them during the remainder of this century. Happy were they that could save their lives at the expence of their religion and wealth; but those that refused to do so were inhumanly butchered every-where, as we have seen in the last note. The pestilence, which spread itself from the shepherds army to the neighbouring countries, proved also the source of new disasters to the Jews, who were accused of having bribed the peasants of Mesura to poison the waters of the river, and having furnished them with the poison; upon which vast numbers were clapt in prison, and informations were lodged against them. They did indeed clear themselves of that imputation after a long imprisonment; but the king, who had no mind to condemn the injustice which he had done to them in detaining such great numbers so long a time in gaol, pretended that he had only done it with a b view of converting them; and, upon their refusal of baptism, caused 15,000 to be burnt alive<sup>a</sup>.

Alphonso's
edict against them,
A. C. 1333.

ALPHONSO XI. their friend and protector, who was wholly guided by one Joseph, a Jew of Astigi, then intendant of his finances, was nevertheless prevailed upon by his mutinous subjects to issue out an edict against them, on account of an indignity pretended to have been committed by a Jewish boy to the sacrament, as it was carried through the streets. And the complaints of the zealots against them were grown to such a height, that a council was called on that very night, to deliberate whether they should be massacred or banished; and, the latter being preferred, they were ordered to depart the kingdom in three months. Happily for them, the prince royal obtained a revising of the process; by which it was found that it c was a young Christian, whose curiosity had brought him to the window to see the procession, and had by chance overturned a pot of water upon the chalice; upon which the king recalled his edict (B), to the great mortification of the zealots, who gave out that the young Christian had been bribed to make that friendly deposition in favour of the Jews<sup>w</sup>. This did not hinder them, however, from carrying on their resentment against them in another town, where they massacred some of them under the same pretence; and might, in all likelihood, have gone a much greater length, had not the king caused ten of the mutinous ringleaders to be hanged.

Recalled.

Jews massacred at Toledo,
A. C. 1349.

THEY had scarcely escaped this danger before they found themselves involved in a more dreadful one, from a fresh insurrection made against them at Toledo; in which they be- d haved in such a desperate manner, as can hardly be read without horror. R. Asber had some time before fled thither from his own native place of Nottingham, with eight sons, one of

<sup>a</sup> SOLOM. BEN VIRG. p. 181, & seq. Vid. & BASNAG. l. ix. c. 13. §. 8. sup. MARIANA, Hist. Hisp. tom. ii. lib. xv. p. 38.

<sup>w</sup> SOLOM. BEN VIRG. ubi

A fierce quarrel which happened soon after, between a Jew and one of his shepherds, determined him wholly to it; and his whole army having taken fire at the pretended insult, fell a plundering of their synagogues. The Jew was not only killed upon the spot, but his death was followed by the massacre of all of that nation who were found in that neighbourhood. They passed thence into Navarre, where they found them more numerous, and where they committed the greatest cruelties against them. Six thousand of them were butchered in the single town of Estella; none escaped but such as could retreat into some of the fortified castles belonging to the nobility. Only R. Menabem, then a youth, but since a learned chief of the synagogue of Toledo, found means to save his life by the help of a young soldier, who, being moved with the groans which he uttered for the loss of his father, mother, and four brothers, who had all been butchered just before, and were left naked and covered with wounds on the floor, carried him into his own house, and got him cured of his hurts.

The shepherds passed thence, some into Languedoc, Provence, and other parts of France; whilst others spread themselves farther through Spain, and ravaged and plundered where-ever they came, Christians as well as Jews; but the latter were every-where more cruelly used. The pope, then at Avignon, thundered in vain his excommunication against them; and the princes in both kingdoms tried in vain to suppress them. The kings of Aragon and France, with the nobility and choicest of their troops, marched at length against them; and so closely beset them, that one part of them perished by the sword, and the other by a pestilence which raged among them. Thus ended that dreadful inundation, after having caused a prodigious effusion of blood, and an infinite variety of other disasters (7).

(B) The king had, we are told, dreamt that he saw some wolves assembled to demand of a shepherd to murder his flock, to make them reparation for the damages they had sustained from it; and that the frightened shepherd was just on the point of doing it, but was happily diverted from it by a young lion; upon which the wolves came some days after, destroyed a number of his sheep, and fled. The dream seemed too singular and uniform not to have some momentous meaning; and the interpretation, which a favourite of that prince gave him, was, that his mutinous subjects would one day demand of him to banish the Jews out of his kingdom; but that his son, pointed out by the young lion, would dissuade him from such an unjust proceeding; which was actually verified by the event (8). Whether the dream and interpretation were real, or a fiction in favour of the Jews, the whole story plainly shews how powerful they were then at that court. And it is not unlikely that the evidence of the young Christian's spilling of the water upon the chalice was trumped up by their friends to save them. For the Jews, whether young or old, were always forward enough to affront the Christians, whenever they thought they might do it with impunity.

(7) Vide Basnag. ubi sup. r. 18, & seq. Solom. Ben Virg. p. 181, & seq. p. 38. Solom. Ben Virg. p. 184, & seq.

(8) Mariana, Hist. Hisp. lib. xv.

- a whom, perceiving the zealots breaking into the house with an intent to massacre them all, Their despair, was seized with such fury and despair, that he killed all his relations who had taken shelter A. C. 1349- in his house, together with his own wife, and that of his brother Jaacob (C); and last of all dispatched himself, to prevent falling into the hands of those butchers. Alphonso XI. who was still alive, and a great friend to them, was forced to suffer that sedition, which he found impossible to suppress. His son and successor Peter, surnamed the Cruel, who mounted the throne the next year, being some time after killed, at the taking of Toledo by his natural brother Henry de Tristemar, this last went and besieged Burgos, where the Jews had fortified themselves in their quarter, and refused to surrender to him; alleging, that Peter was their Fidelity to king lawful king (not knowing of his death), and vowing, that they would sooner sacrifice their Patr. lives than receive any other master than the true heir to the crown. This singular instance of loyalty so affected Henry, that he granted them much better terms when they came over to his side <sup>x</sup>.

ACCORDINGLY Tristemar, being come to the crown, made Don Meir his physician; but Meir tortured dying some time after, not without suspicion of having been poisoned, Meir was put to the for poisoning torture, and confessed that he had killed the king <sup>y</sup>. But other Spanish authors, such as Gus- man and Mariana, think that he was rather poisoned by a Moor, whom the king of Granada had sent thither for that purpose. But as his death was occasioned by a weakness in his nerves, there is no great probability that he was poisoned, especially by his physician, to whom he the king. had been so good a friend, as well as to his nation <sup>z</sup>. However, that did not hinder the Jews from being hated and insulted on that account. They complain accordingly, that, towards the latter end of the fourteenth century, the monks, from a principle of zeal, declared themselves their irreconcilable enemies; and had obtained, by the queen's means, an edict for expelling them the kingdom; but that princess, being told that it was not right to root up a vine that bore good fruit, suffered herself to be bought off by a sum of fifty thousand crowns.

THEY suffered much more under the reign of Henry III. of Castile, when Martin, arch- Jews persecuted deacon of Astigi, went preaching through the streets of Seville and Cordoua, and so exasper- by Hen. III. ated the people, that they massacred the Jews in both places. The fire spread itself to To- A. C. 1394. ledo, Valencia, and Barcelona, where they plundered some, and murdered others; whilst the more artful ones changed their religion, to escape their violence. The great and populous synagogues of Seville and Cordoua became in some measure desert; the young king still pursuing them. Those that retired into Andalusia, and other provinces, were murdered by the inhabitants <sup>a</sup> (D). His son John proved no less cruel to them; insomuch that those who had concealed themselves under his father's reign perished under his, being deprived even of the necessaries of life, and obliged to wear a red mark of distinction, by which they were easily known. Those of Arragon did not fare much better than these of Castile, that kingdom being In Arragon. torn by intestine wars, which could not be maintained without heavy taxes; with which the Jews were not only the heaviest loaded, but exposed to continual vexations and prosecutions, Learned men. which reduced them to the lowest degree of misery <sup>b</sup>. All this did not prevent their having several learned men during this century, the most eminent of whom the reader will find in the margin (E). But it is now time to see how they fared in other parts of Europe during these two centuries.

FRANCE

<sup>x</sup> CARDOSO, Las Excellentias, p. 371.
<sup>a</sup> SOLOM. BEN VIRG. MARIANA, BZOV. & al.

<sup>y</sup> Fortalit. Fid. <sup>z</sup> CARDOSO, ubi supra, p. 373.
<sup>b</sup> MARIANA, ubi sup. tom. i. p. 134.

(C) This last was not only a very learned, but a very generous doctor, who commonly taught his disciples gratis. He was the author of a famed treatise, intituled, אַרְבַּע טוּרִים, Arbah Turim, or the four orders or rows, alluding to those mentioned Exod. xxviii. 17, & seq.; and of some other works which the reader may see in the authors quoted below (9).

Some place this persecution in the year 1340, but others, more rightly, nine years after; seeing, according to Gantz and the Shalsheleth, Jaacob was still in Germany, an. 1340, and was then writing the book above-mentioned; which is a kind of collection of civil and ecclesiastical laws, out of the Gemarrab, and other Jewish writings.

(D) Solomon Ben Virga places this persecution in the year of the world 5130, answering to that of Christ 1390; Spondanus in 1391; and Mariana, an. 1392. But as Henry III. did not come to the crown till the year 1393, Bzovius hath rightly placed it in the year 1394 (10).

(E) We may place at their head the famed Isaac Sci- prut, or rather Sprott, one of the bitterest enemies and violent writers against the Christians. Authors are not indeed agreed about the time in which he flourished, tho' they all place him in the 14th century; some an. 1374, and others 1390. But Bartolucci tells us, he had seen a manuscript of his work against the Christian religion; at the beginning and end of which it was said to have been compiled at Turiasso, a city of ancient Castile, an. 1340, which was the very year wherein, as we lately

(9) Bartoloc. ubi sup. Wolf, ubi sup. N. 1023. p. 582.
c. 18. §. 13.

(10) Bzov. Ann. sub an. 1391. Basnag. l. ix.

Jews persecuted in France.
A. C. 1218.

In Brittany,
A. C. 1239.

FRANCE was not more favourable to them. We saw them in the twelfth century banished<sup>a</sup> and recalled by king Philip; and they were no sooner settled in it, than they resumed their old usury and extortions; by which they not only grew powerful and wealthy, but bought lands and estates, and grew so insolent and tyrannical, whilst the French nation became daily more and more impoverished, that the government was again obliged to make new laws to suppress the monstrous abuses which were daily committed by them (F). But as those laws did not prove sufficient to put a stop to that evil, St. Lewis, in the beginning of his reign, called a council at Melun; in which a new law was made, expressly forbidding all his subjects to borrow any money from the Jews<sup>c</sup>. But the most remarkable of all was that which John le Roux, duke of Brittany, published against them, in the year 1239. They were then very numerous, and dispersed through that province, and every where such great usurers, that the people were almost ruined by them; upon which the nobility and merchants joined in a complaint to the duke, who immediately summoned all the states of that duchy; and in that assembly was passed that law, the substance of which the reader will find in the margin, and which was prefaced, among other things, with these words; “At the request of the bishops, abbots, barons, and vassals of Brittany, all the Jews shall be for ever banished from it (G).”<sup>b</sup>

<sup>c</sup> Vid. DECRET. PHILIP AUGUST. de Judeis, an. 1218. SPICILEG. DACHERII, tom. vi. p. 471. Stabiliment. ap. Melend. Ibid. p. 473. BASNAG. lib. ix. c. 20. § 2.

took notice, R. Jaacob Ben Asher was writing his Arbah Thurim (11).

His son Shem Tob, or good name, inherited all his father's hatred against the Christians. He flourished, an. 1375, and translated St. Matthew's gospel into Hebrew, and gave it the title of אֵבֶן בֹּחֵן, Eben Bochen, or the touchstone, probably to render it more contemptible to his nation; the gospels being esteemed by Christians the touchstone or rule of their faith. He wrote afterwards his disputes against the Christian mysteries; to which he added, the contradictions of his antagonist, master Alphonso the apostate. Who he means by him is somewhat doubtful; for Alphonso de Spina, who wrote against the Jews after he had turned Christian (12), did not live till an. 1458; by which time Shem Tob must in all likelihood have been dead. Bartolucci mentions another Alphonso (13), who confuted all the objections against the Christian religion; and which Kimchi collected in his book of the Wars of the Lord; but it is uncertain whether he lived in this century. However that be, Shem Tob published another treatise on Paradise, in which he endeavours to shew, that most of the stories in the thalmud ought to be understood allegorically (14).

We must here take notice, that there have been several rabbies of his name; particularly Shem Tob of Leon, who wrote a treatise against the Eucharist, in order to reduce a young Jew, who was retired to Avignon, where the pope then resided. He wrote likewise his Derek Gadol Emunah, or highway to truth, in which he pretended to prove the truth of the Jewish religion by philosophical demonstrations. There was a third of that name, the son of Joseph Palkera, who lived in the sixteenth century; he was not only a celebrated preacher, and printed his sermons on the Pentateuch, and the great festivals of the year, but was the author of a letter, or dispute, whether piety is to be preferred to the study of the law, or this to that; which letter is held in great esteem.

Another learned rabbi of this century, was Solomon Ben Chanok (15), who came from Constantinople to Burgos, that he might display the depths of the divine law. For that was the title of a book which he wrote; and in which he explained the most difficult texts of the Pentateuch, and the Rabbinic glosses, which were either too metaphorical or hyperbolical. Zerachiah the younger flourished about the same time with Shem Tob (16), and is therefore different from one of the same name, who lived in the twelfth century, and was a native of Lunel in Languedoc, and hath been mentioned in his proper place. To these we may add, the two physicians of the Castilian king, both men of note, especially Meir Alguades, who was also chief of all the synagogues in Spain. He translated Aristotle's Ethics, and flourished till an. 1405 (17). At this time, Aristotle's works were in such esteem among the rabbies, that Shem Tob, another learned Jew, inserted them in his treatise on the excellence of the law; which is the more remarkable, because, as we have frequently hinted in the Jewish history, they commonly expressed a singular contempt for all foreign learning.

(F) That the reader may guess at the one by the other, we have here subjoined some of those ordinances of the council: as, 1st. That it should not be lawful for them to lend money to monks or priests, unless the latter had a permission in writing from the monastery or chapter they belonged to; nor to take in pledge any of the utensils or ornaments of the church; nor the tools of any tradesman. A trooper had liberty to pledge his horse; but the artist, husbandman, and labourer, were not allowed to borrow any money from them; if they did, it was to be lost to the Jew. In Normandy, the laws were still more severe against them; where the lender was bound to summon the borrower before the magistrates, and those debts to be declared null that were not registered before them (18).

(G) It was farther enacted by it, 1st. That all the debts due to the Jews should be discharged; and that those who had received any pledges from them, should keep them. 2d. That all that should kill a Jew, should be deemed guiltless; and a prohibition was made to the judges to take cognizance of any such facts. 3d. That the king of France should be desired to do the same in his dominions; that is, to banish them, to strip them of their property, and to permit his subjects to butcher them. 4th. The duke did then engage for himself, and his successors, for the time present and to come, to maintain the same law against them inviolate; in default of which the bishops were not only impowered to excommunicate him, but to confiscate all the lands he had in their respective dioceses, without regard to any privileges then annexed, or hereafter to be annexed to them. 5th. Lastly, he declared, that no vassals of Brittany should be admitted to pay homage, till they had sworn before two bishops or barons to conform to this law, and not to suffer any Jews to live in their territories (19).

(11) Bartol. tom. iii. p. 927. Conf. Wolf. Bibl. Rabbin. N. 1282. p. 695, & N. 1023. p. 582. (12) Fortalit. fid. (13) Bartoloc. ub. sup. tom. iii. p. 927. Wolf. ub. sup. (14) Bartol. ub. sup. tom. i. p. 366. & tom. iv. p. 508. Wolf. Bibl. Rabbin. N. 2157, & seq. p. 1127, & seq. (15) Id. ibid. N. 1976. p. 1054. Bartoloc. ub. sup. tom. iv. p. 376. (16) Wolf. ub. sup. N. 581, & seq. p. 361. (17) Id. ibid. N. 1368. p. 744. (18) Phil. Aug. Decret. de Judeis, an. 1218. Spicil. Dacherii, tom. vi. p. 471. (19) D'Argentre, Hist. de Bretagn. lib. iv. c. 23. p. 207. Vid. & Basnag. ub. sup. lib. ix. c. 20. §. 10.

<sup>a</sup> THE famed council of Lions, which excommunicated the emperor, passed a decree, enjoining, under pain of excommunication, all the Christian princes who had any Jews in their dominions, to oblige them to refund to the crusaders all the usury they had got by lending to their subjects, under penalty of being deprived of all the privileges of civil society. The Jews were likewise forbidden by it to demand any debts due from the crusaders till their return, or till an authentic certificate was received of their death <sup>d</sup>. The council of Vienna, held in the same century, found itself obliged likewise to defend the Christians against the vexatious suits, as well as extortions of the Jews. Notwithstanding all which decrees and precautions, the Jews still found means to maintain themselves; insomuch that in some provinces of France, particularly in Languedoc, they had the privilege of being raised to the magistracy (H), and in most places of the kingdom, to have Christian slaves; which was attended with very great inconveniencies, and often with enormous abuses (I).

Council of Lions,
A. C. 1240.

Of Vienna,
A. C. 1267.

Their privileges in Languedoc suppressed.

Persecuted
under St.
Lewis.
A. C. 1236.

BUT the greatest persecution that befel them during this interval, was that which was raised against them by the Parisians, in the reign of St. Lewis, on account, as was pretended, of their sacrificing some Christian children on Good Friday, and using their blood on their Passover-solemnity; and for which many of them were cruelly butchered at that metropolis. It did not stop there, but spread itself into the provinces of Brie, Tauraine, Anjou, Poitou, and Maine, where above 2500, who refused to turn Christians, were put to the most torturing deaths; and would, in all likelihood, have gone much farther, had not the pope interposed, and sent a letter to desire that monarch to let them have liberty of conscience <sup>e</sup>. But though this put a stop to their misery at present, it did not prevent their suffering greatly under the crusade of shepherds, which was raised during his imprisonment in the Holy Land, in order to go thither to release him; and which was carried on with the same enthusiastic fury as that which we have mentioned in speaking of Spain, and which happened in the subsequent century. The head of that mobbish army was an Hungarian, named James, first a Mohammedan, then a Cistercian monk, and now a deserter from that order. He led them first to Orleans, where he massacred all the priests and friars he could find; thence marched to Bourges, where he caused all the Jewish books to be seized, in order to burn them; and so went on, committing the vilest disorders, till they were at length overpowered, and a great many of them put to death <sup>f</sup>. We are told of a conference which was held on the year following, between R. Jechiel, a learned cabbalistical Jew, and Nicholas Donim, a famed convert from Judaism, before queen Blanche, then regent of the kingdom, and a private encourager of this new crusade. The Christians and Jews give us different accounts of the success of it (K): but that St. Lewis was no friend to the Jews, plainly appears from the edict which he sent, whilst under his confinement, to have them banished out of France, which his queen regent punctually executed, and died on the year following <sup>g</sup>. The Jews however pretend, that it was the king himself that banished them after his return.

Banished out
of France,
A. C. 1253.

THEY were recalled in the next reign by Philip the Bold, a prince of a sweet disposition, who was moreover induced to it from their known usefulness in promoting trade, making money circulate, and thereby improving his finances which were almost exhausted. This

Recalled,
A. C. 1275.

<sup>d</sup> Conc. Lugd. can. xvii. tom. ii. p. 656.

<sup>e</sup> INNOCENT III. epist. 155. <sup>f</sup> Vid. gest. S. Ludovic. per GUILLELM. DE NANGIACO, Hist. Franc. script. tom. v. p. 359. MATTH. PARIS, Hist. Angl. Henr. III. p. 530. SOLOM. BEN VIRG. p. 417.

<sup>g</sup> M. PARIS, ibid. p. 576. SOLOM. BEN VIRG. ibid. & seq.

(H) The city of Montpelier, in particular, had been frequently in danger of seeing a Jew at the head of the magistracy: upon which account, William IV. lord of it, found himself obliged to forbid it by his last will, as his grandfather had done about fifty years before. Nevertheless, to discharge his conscience, he bequeathed a considerable sum to one Bonet a Jew, from whom he had received singular favours (20). This shews in what credit they were still in these southern parts.

(I) The continuators of Baronius give an instance of a young Christian woman, who had been by her Jewish master inspired with such contempt of the Christian mysteries, that, having communicated on Easter-day as usual, she conveyed the consecrated wafer to her master in a handkerchief; and adds, that upon clapping it into his purse, in which were seven pieces of silver, he found them all turned into wafers. It was well that his avarice did not provoke him to offer some great indignity to those miraculous symbols; but he was struck with such a reverence for them, that he acknowledged his crime, and desired to become a Christian (21).

(K) The Jews, who make him a great favourite of St. Lewis, and his prime minister, give him by far the victory in this conference. But whatever may have been the success of it, it is absurd to suppose him to have been raised to that height of power by a prince that was so great an enemy to his nation. The French authors, on the contrary, pretend, that he was so overpowered by his antagonist, that he had not a word more to say; and, through shame of his defeat, left that kingdom, and retired into the Holy Land; though it may as well be that devotion, such as reigned at this time among Christians as well as Jews, for pilgrimages thither, and not his defeat, was the motive that sent him thither.

However, one may guess how numerous the Jews were then in France, since their banishment did so depopulate the country, that they were obliged to send for artists, workmen, &c. to supply their place; and at length, to permit such Jews as would turn merchants or tradesmen to stay. And we read moreover, of a city near Paris which was called the Jewish city (22).

(20) Testament Guillelm. Monspel. Spicil. tom. ix. p. 145, & 161. (21) Bzov. An. sub A. C. 1213. N. 19. Sponian. sub cod. an. N. 25. p. 53. (22) De hac, vid. Basnag. ubi sup. c. xx. §. 10.

Levi Ben Geršhom,
A. C. 1290.
Jews in Gascony banished by Edward I.
A. C. 1288.

Great abuses
among them.

Banished by Philip.

recall admits of no contradiction, nor their becoming powerful and wealthy under his reign; a since they were afterwards wholly banished in great numbers by Philip the Fair, as will be seen in its proper place. Towards the latter end of this thirteenth century flourished the famed rabbi Levi Ben Geršhom, and grandson by a daughter of R. Nachmanides. He was born in Provence<sup>h</sup>, which being then subject to Spain, both French and Spaniards claim him as their countryman (L). Gascony had likewise a great number of Jews, who had gained such an ascendant there, that complaint was made to Edward I. then in possession of it, by an English knight, who, having mortgaged some lands to one of them, and summoned him before a judge, refused to appear or release the mortgage. The king gave him such an answer, as gave the Jew to understand that he must comply; and that, though he had suffered them to enjoy all the privileges which his father had granted to them, yet, if he found they had b abused them, he would himself be judge, and shew, that he did not design to give them the preference over the Christians; upon which the Jew submitted to the law. But the king having soon after escaped being killed by a clap of thunder which passed over his bed, and killed two of his officers in the same chamber, thereupon banished them out of Gascony, and all his other dominions in France<sup>i</sup>. There had, by this time, crept such abominable abuses among the Christians, as well as the Jews, in all those Gallic parts (M), that pope Nicholas IV. was obliged to send orders to all his inquisitors there to be more watchful over them both, and to suppress all those scandalous practices; which they did accordingly with great exactness as well as severity. However, it is not unlikely, that our king Edward, being then on the point of going to the holy war, had, like the rest of the crusaders, given into the notion, that the c persecution of those enemies to Christ was the most effectual means of obtaining a blessing on that enterprize.

His example was not long after followed by Philip the Fair, who wholly banished them out of his dominions (N); and though several causes are assigned for their expulsion, yet it is commonly allowed that he did that good deed from a bad principle, that is, in order to enrich himself by their plunder; and sacrificed the whole nation to his extreme avarice<sup>k</sup>. For he seized on all their wealth and effects, and suffered them to take only their cloaths, and as much money as would conduct them out of the kingdom: by which means great numbers perished in the way, and the rest happily reached Germany. And hence it is, that the generality of the German Jews look upon themselves of French extract. Those only saved themselves from banishment who embraced Christianity; among whom was the famous Nicholas d tom. xi. p. 637. ap. Basnag. ub. sup. §. 6.

<sup>h</sup> GANTZ TZEMACH, p. 145. BARTOLOC. ub. sup. WOLF, ubi sup. N. 348. p. 726. <sup>i</sup> WALSHING-
HAM, vit. Reg. Angl. p. 53. <sup>k</sup> Contin. Chron. GUIL. NANGIS, sub A. C. 1310. DACHER. Spicil.

(L) He wrote a comment on the Pentateuch, which he finished in the year 1330, wherein he affirmed that the angels there mentioned to have appeared to Abraham, Balaam, &c. were only visions and dreams; and would never be prevailed on to admit of the different interpretations of the thalmud concerning them. Eight years after, he published his comment on Samuel, and some other works, which the reader may see in Bartolocci and Wolf above quoted; and lived to see the ruin of his own nation in France.

(M) Among the former, there were many that had turned to the Jewish religion; and these were circumcised in some peculiar manner, by which they might be known from the original Jews. Others judaized only in part, observing the Sabbath, going to their synagogues, lighting of candles, and offering their prayers and oblations there; though, in other cases, they conformed to the established religion. The Jews, on the other hand, not only had from these instances been industrious in unhinging and perverting the Christians, but in reclaiming the converts which those had made upon them; insomuch, that there was a new order of Rejudaizers, as they were called by them, or Relapsed, as the Christians stiled them, who were readmitted into the synagogue by washings and other ceremonies; and these commonly went with their crowns shaved like the monks (23).

We are told of another kind of abuse under that pontif (24): a woman, who had pledged her best cloaths to a Jew, went to desire the use of them for the Easter holidays; which he refused, unless she brought him a consecrated wafer: this she did; and he having pierced it in several places, and perceiving it bleed abundantly, he flung it into boiling water. Some Christians coming in at that instant to borrow money of him, perceived it, and went and indicted him for it. He was accordingly condemned; all his effects were confiscated, his house demolished, and the church of St. Saviour built upon that spot. The reader is at liberty to believe or reject this story; but we shall find in the sequel, that very many of their persecutions and sufferings in these late centuries were founded upon such abuses and miraculous discoveries.

(N) The Jews have greatly exaggerated their sufferings, as well as the number of the banished, which they make to exceed that of the Israelites that took possession of Canaan, under Joshua (25); tho' it is scarcely credible that ever they amounted to half that number in all France. Some authors attribute this persecution to much such a miraculous discovery of a wafer pierced by a Jew, as we mentioned in the last note; and add, that he was condemned to be burnt alive for it, but saved himself from the flames, by holding the thalmud in his hands (26). One of the continuators of Baronius owns the miracle of the wafer, but says, it happened sixteen years earlier, and so could not be the cause of their present banishment; which Platina attributes to their exercising of the magic art (27).

(23) Vid. Basnag. ub. sup. c. xx. §. 10. Wolf. Bartol. ub. sup. Chron. gener. xlv. tom. ii. p. 875. Basnag. ub. sup. §. 15.
A. C. 1306, p. 83. (26) Spontan. Ann. Eccl. sub A. C. 1305.

(24) Id. ibid. Walshingb. ub. sup. Naueter.
(25) Gantz, ub. sup. p. 143. Bzovius, sub
(27) In vit. Clement.

a de Lyra, who wrote more learnedly and strongly against the Jews than any did either before or since (O). But of those that were baptized, few were sincere, and many of them relapsed, and shewed their<sup>a</sup> resentment by spitting upon the images of the saints, and other such indignities; and one of them was burnt alive four years after this edict<sup>1</sup>; and yet the Jews pretend, that Philip died suddenly by a fall in hunting, as a punishment for this injustice to them<sup>m</sup>; which is manifestly false.

THEY were, however, recalled eight years after, by his successor Lewis, surnamed the Hutin Recalled, or Mutin, in order to replenish his empty coffers, recover his finances, and make trade flourish. He exacted also great sums of them for their liberty, which they readily granted; and, in consequence of it, lived very peaceably during his reign; but that proving short, they were again exposed to new troubles<sup>n</sup>. We have already taken notice of what they suffered in Spain and France, under the second invasion of the enthusiastic shepherds. This misfortune was soon followed by another, pretended to have been occasioned by their suffering themselves to be bribed by the Saracen king of Granada to poison all the rivers, wells, and reservoirs of water; which they not daring to do, as being too much suspected, committed the execution of it to a number of lepers, whom they hired by dint of money, and the prospect of the rich spoils of the dead (P). The waters were accordingly found poisoned in France and Germany; and a leper having deposed, that a certain rich Jew had hired him to it, the information was sent to court, and the lepers were all either imprisoned, or confined to their lazarettos; and the people in several provinces, especially in Languedoc, without staying for farther orders or proceedings, fell foul on the Jews, and massacred them in such a barbarous manner as cannot be read without horror; whilst the pretended criminals marched to the flames, and other cruel executions, with such intrepidity and joy, as if they had gone to a wedding. Those of Paris were used with more equity, where they only put the guilty to death. Others were banished, and the rich fort imprisoned till they had discovered all their treasures and effects; by which Philip, surnamed the Long, proved a very considerable gainer<sup>o</sup>. Great numbers of them were likewise massacred in Dauphine, and their effects confiscated, and yielded to the dauphin of France<sup>p</sup>.

d CHARLES, whilst dauphin of Viennois and duke of Normandy, was forced afterwards to recall them, during his father's imprisonment, and the disorders that reigned in his dominions; and, upon his mounting the throne, confirmed their former privileges, and only obliged them to wear some mark of distinction<sup>q</sup>. But being afterwards grown senseless, or, as some affirm, having been bewitched, the Jews began again to be accused of committing some murders, and other outrages<sup>r</sup>; for which some of them were hanged, others whipt, and the synagogues

<sup>1</sup> Continuat. Chronol. ub. sup. <sup>m</sup> SOLOM. BEN VIRG. p. 149. <sup>n</sup> Id. ibid. <sup>o</sup> Continuat. Chron. GUIL. DE NAUGIS. ub. sup. p. 691, & seq. <sup>p</sup> Memoires pour servir a l'histoire du Dauphine, ap. BASNAGE, ub. sup. §. 7, & seq. <sup>q</sup> Id. ibid. <sup>r</sup> DU HAILLON, Hist. de France, lib. xvii. sub an. 1395. JUVENAL DES URSINS, Hist. de Charl. VI. p. 129. BASNAGE, ub. sup. & seq.

(O) There is some controversy about his native country, as well as about his being a convert from Judaism; though with respect to the latter, his great skill in the Hebrew and rabbinic learning, will not suffer us to doubt of his having been of Jewish extract and education. However, after his conversion, he studied some time in the university of Paris; after which he entered into the Franciscan order, and wrote his treatise against the Jews; and applied his whole life in commenting and expounding the sacred books, which he divided, as the Jews and protestants do, into canonical and apocryphal. He seems indeed to have been too fond of Aristotle's philosophy, then in vogue; but in the main, he was justly esteemed one of the best and most judicious comentators of that age, as may appear by the monkish verse in praise of him;

Si Lyranus non lyraffet, Totus mundus aberrasset.

He died in his convent of Verneuil, an. 1340 (28).

(P) This accusation appears from many circumstances, with which it is transmitted to us, to be altogether false. Such as, that the lepers convened four general councils of the deputies from every lazaretto in Christendom, in which they disposed before-hand of all the dignities, estates, &c. of those that were to be poisoned by those waters; the deposition made by one of them, before the lord of Pernay, in which was contained the receipt for poisoning them, viz. human blood and urine, three sorts of weeds, and a consecrated wafer, which were to be tied in a bag, and flung into them; and some others equally ridiculous and incredible. Besides, if the Saracen king had hired any Jews for such a black deed against the Christians, he would doubtless have ordered it to be done in Spain, where they were most obnoxious to them, and not in France and Germany, where he had nothing to fear.

It must be owned, that there reigned then such a mortality in both these countries, as carried off more people than any pestilence had ever done. It began, we are told, at Rheims, and spread itself through France and Germany; and, as the physicians were unable to discover the cause of it, they had every-where recourse to the old superstitious notion of the waters, &c. being poisoned by magic, and of the Jews being the authors of it; which was easily credited by the rest, who were always fond of the notion of wizards and magicians being the authors of such public calamities. However, a late author of theirs hath undertaken to confirm the story of the waters being poisoned, and to justify the severities which were used against the Jews; though he hath done it in such a manner as will convince very few of his readers, unless they are as partial as he (29); as those that read him in the place above quoted will easily own. He likewise there affirms, that the Jewish nation were for ever banished that kingdom, and never settled there more by authority; though we shall see presently that they were recalled in the next reign.

(28) Vid. Wolf, ub. sup. N. 1697, p. 912. Basnag. ub. sup. c. 21. §. 5, &c. (29) P. Daniel Hist. de France sub Philip le Long, an. 1321. p. 414, & seq. ap. Basnag. ub. sup. § 13.

Banished for ever out of France.
Obtain their privileges at Metz.

finer; which obliged many of them to turn Christians. At length came out, two years after, a that edict which for ever banished their whole nation from the French dominions; and it is from that sad epocha that they have since reckoned their years (Q). We must, however, except the city of Metz in Lorraine, in which they have preserved their ancient privileges and synagogue; that city being then an imperial one, where they had therefore the same liberty as in all others of the empire. This was afterwards confirmed to them by Lewis XIII. and an edict granted in their favour, by which all criminal causes relating to them were to be referred to the council; and their ancient privileges confirmed: which edict, given at St. Germain, bears date 1617.

Jews in Italy,
during the 13th and 14th centuries, favoured by the pope;

It is now time to pass into Italy, and other parts of Europe, during these two centuries. We begin with Italy, where we find the pope still very favourable and kind to them, both b in his own territories, and where-ever his authority reached (R). We have seen those pontiffs receive with open arms those whom Ferdinand X. and other zealous princes, had banished out of their dominions; though at the same time they seemed to commend their zeal against them. Gregory IX. now on the papal throne, followed the steps of his predecessors; and, tho' he was a zealous promoter of the holy war, yet observing that the crusaders began their pious work in divers places with the massacre of the Jews, took all the proper methods of preventing such butcheries. They were grown very numerous also in the kingdom of Naples, particularly in that capital, and the city of Trani, where they had very learned rabbis and c good poets, who were protected and caressed by the king on account of some signal services they had done him. He likewise recommended them at his death to his states; but these thought it a greater kindness to try to convert them, than to give them the full enjoyment of their religion; so that, to avoid the impending persecution, they promised to turn Christians, with a permission included to marry the daughters of the richest and noblest families in the kingdom. Every body was surprised at such a compromise (except the clergy, who were willing to convert them at any price): and much more still to see such marriages permitted in favour of conversions so little to be depended upon: for those who could not thus marry to advantage, made no scruple to relapse. It was therefore upon this last account that a monk of Trani took it into his head to punish them; and, having buried a cross in a dunghill, charged a Jew of that city with the fact. This was enough to raise the fury of the zealots, d who immediately butchered all the Jews they could lay hands on. The riot passed from thence to Naples, where they would likewise have been murdered, had not the chief of the nobility interposed, and concealed the most wealthy, and consequently the most obnoxious, in their houses, and thereby saved them from the fury of the populace. Pope Alexander IV. who then reigned at Rome, was so far from being suspected to encourage that persecution, that he endeavoured to suppress it; but his interposition proved fruitless, and he died soon after.

by the king of Naples;

Massacred at Trani.

(Q) But, for all this edict, they still kept a considerable interest in the nation, by means of the money which they lent to private persons; the management of which they committed to one Nicholas Flamel, a citizen of Pontoise, allowing him half the profit; by which he became so rich, that he was supposed to have found out the philosopher's stone; built several churches in Paris, particularly that called St. Jaques de la Boucherie, where he and his wife Prenella lie buried, and their tomb is still to be seen. He is said to have been a philosopher, painter, and poet.

We read moreover of some eminent Jews that were since then tolerated in France, tho' they had not the same full liberty as formerly; and among them Profanus, a celebrated astronomer, who taught at Montpelier about the middle of the 15th century. Montallo, another famed Jew, was sent for to Paris to be physician to Mary de Medicis, who obtained of Henry IV. full liberty of religion for himself and family; insomuch that being sent for by a certain great patient at some distance, they furnished him with fresh relays, that he might reach him before the Sabbath began (30).

They have been since in great numbers in Gascony, whence Isaac Castro de Tartas, being gone into Brasil, and taken by the Portuguese, was condemned to the flames. A Jewish writer adds, that it was upon his account that the law for burning them alive was abrogated in Portugal; for that all the time he continued alive in the flames, he was heard to say, Hear, O Israel, the Lord our God is one Lord! which so surprised those that heard him, that they repeated the same words after him, and became Jews, without knowing how (31).

We could instance in many others; but it is sufficiently known, that they still live there, though in disguise, to avoid the severity of the laws against them; insomuch that they have got admittance into some of the highest places in church and state, as we shall have farther occasion to shew towards the end of this chapter.

(R) Thus we find pope Nicholas interposing with the emperor Rodolphus in favour of R. Meir, a German, whom he had caused to be imprisoned, in hopes of extorting a large sum from him; and told that prince, that if Meir had been guilty of no other crime than that of stiffly adhering to his religion, he deserved no punishment for it, and therefore expected that he should set him at liberty. We have seen a little higher, how Gregory IX. put a stop to the persecution raised against them in France and Spain. And though there was then a misunderstanding between him and the emperor Frederic, yet he made no hesitation to write a letter to him, in which he allowed the Jews indeed to be turned over to the secular power for crimes of state; but added, that such punishments ought to be confined within due bounds, and not extend to what was barely matter of religion and conscience. And we may add, that few popes were ever against giving them full liberty of conscience; and many of them have even raised them to dignities of authority and trust in the dominions under them.

(30) De hoc, vid. Barrios. Relacion de los poetas. p. 55. Bassompierre, Memoirs of Montallo, an. 1615. Bagnag. ubi sup. lib. ix. c. 21. §. 20. & seq.

(31) Cardoso, Las Excellencias, p. 324.

However,

a However, as the nobility had done it so effectually, there was the less need of his intervention.

THE marquissate of Ancona, though not then in the pope's possession, had likewise been very favourable to them, and allowed them full liberty of conscience (S). And here it was that the famed R. Menahem, a native of Ricina Nova, by some kind of miracle, from a stupid dunce, became one of the greatest cabbalists of that age (T). We have lately seen how Clement V. who had moved the papal seat to Avignon, strove to stop the persecution of the shepherds against them, as far as his anathemas could do it; he was no less industrious to promote their instruction; and ordered that every university should have professors to teach the Hebrew tongue, and to bring up men that should be able to dispute with and convince them by their own books'. His successor indeed, John XXII. took a contrary method, being induced thereto by a zealous sister, and much more so by some of his bishops, whom she had brought with her, and who had accused the Jews of having shewn some indignity to the cross, as it was carried in procession before them.

THIS produced an edict, by which they were to be banished from all the territories of the church; which caused so much the greater consternation among them, as they were grown very numerous and rich under the favour of his predecessors. They applied themselves to Robert, king of Jerusalem, a good friend of theirs, and a favourite of that pontif, who soon after prevailed upon him to revoke his edict; which he promised to do, provided his sister could be satisfied about it; and accordingly abrogated it, as soon as she had received 100,000 florins from them (U). It is plain, therefore, that this edict was issued out against his inclination, since he was so easily prevailed upon to recall it'. We have seen already how Clement VI. endeavoured to suppress the persecution which was raised against them in Spain, France, and Germany, on the absurd pretence of their poisoning the rivers there; and made no difficulty to give as many as could come a safe sanctuary in his dominions. Some historians have indeed accused him of doing it out of covetousness; but he easily retorted the charge against them, by shewing, that these persecutions were only raised against them with a view of plundering them of all their riches. His very inquisitors, who exercised such severities against the Albigenses, a kind of ancient Protestants, suffered the Jews to live in peace, and seldom gave them any disturbance, except when they found them guilty of some such enormous abuses as those we have lately taken notice of.

THEY were no less numerous and powerful at Bologna, where, besides their old synagogue, which was too small to contain them, they built a new one much larger and finer, and erected a kind of academy, in that city. This last owes its erection to one of the family of the Hannabarim (children) who was then going from Rome thither. This family, which deduces its original from those Jews whom Titus transplanted from Jerusalem to Rome, had continued there till the latter end of the fourteenth century, and was both numerous and considerable; but about this time went and settled at Bologna, where they grew so wealthy that they built stately houses, and the synagogue above-mentioned, which is the noblest in all Italy. They became still more famous for the many learned rabbies which came to teach in it; which is a fresh proof of what hath been said of the popes protecting and favouring them (W). But it is time to pass on to other countries of Europe.

WE

* SOLOM. BEN VIRG. p. 123.

† BASNAC. ubi sup. lib. ix. c. 19. §. 8.

(S) The popes did not become masters of this territory till an. 1532, when Clement VII. sent his troops to seize on it, in order to protect it against the Turks.

(T) The Jews tell us, that he fell asleep one day in the synagogue, where he saw in a dream, or vision, a man who offered him a vessel full of water, of which he had scarcely drank a draught, before he found himself as learned as before he had been ignorant. He is commonly known by the name of Recanati, from the place of his birth; and wrote several learned treatises in the cabbalistical way (32). We do not vouch for his miraculous change; but mention it chiefly to shew, that the Jews flourished in this age in most parts of Italy.

(U) Our authors do not name the pope who issued and revoked this edict; but mention his sister Sanguisa, who is still more unknown. But since they affirm, that this transaction happened under Robert king of Jerusalem, and there was then a king of that name of Jerusalem, Naples, and Sicily, whose chancellor John XXII. had been, and lived ever after, in perfect friendship with him; he is most likely to be the pontif meant by them, especially as his successor Benedict XII. had no sister.

(W) This city then belonged to the ecclesiastical state; and pope Boniface IX. though so much dreaded by his subjects, permitted them nevertheless to erect the academy above-mentioned, and to build that grand synagogue, which, for its largeness and beauty, is justly admired by all travellers (33).

The Jews here likewise presented Emeric, the pope's inquisitor (who flourished about the middle of the fourteenth century, and compiled the directory of the inquisition), with a bible, said to have been written by Ezra; which is still carefully preserved in the library of the Dominicans there. It hath the following inscription in Hebrew, at the end of the Pentateuch;

This is the book of the law of Moses, which Ezra had wrote, and which he read on a wooden desk to a numerous assembly both of men and women.

(32) Shalsbelith, p. 61. Bartoloc. ubi sup. Wolf, N. 1457. p. 775. Basnage, & alib. ubi sup. c. xix. §. ult.

(33) Basnage.

Jews in England; invited by William the Conqueror.
Accused of crucifying Christian
children.

WE do not read of any thing worth mentioning concerning the Jews in England, till the time of king John; except that they were invited into this kingdom by William the Conqueror, and came from Rouen hither; and where, even so early as the reign of king Stephen, an. 1145, they were accused of crucifying a young Christian, in contempt of Christ and his religion, and were accordingly punished for it. They were again prosecuted for the same atrocious fact at Gloucester, in the reign of Henry II. an. 1160; and for a third committed at St. Edmondsbury, an. 1181. More of such persecutions there may have happened in other places, which Matthew Paris hath not mentioned; and these he hath accompanied with some circumstances which we shall pass by at present, because we shall have perhaps more frequent instances of them in the following centuries, than the generality of our readers will be inclined to believe; though we shall be obliged to mention the most remarkable of them, as they were always, if not the true cause, yet at least the pretence and forerunners, of the most severe punishments inflicted on that unhappy nation.

Banished by king John,
A. C. 1210.

under Hen. III.
1233.

WE pass on therefore to king John, whose reign was so troubled with intestine feuds, that he was forced to maintain himself by the hardest exactions; the heaviest of which fell of course on the Jews in his dominions, whom he caused to be imprisoned, and put to most violent tortures, when they refused to pay such taxes as he laid on them (X); and at length, we are told<sup>u</sup>, confiscated all their effects, and banished them by a public edict. They did not fare much better under the long reign of Henry III. during which many of them chose to turn Christians, to avoid the severity of his government; but, being afterwards detected, were justly punished for their dissimulation. This did not discourage that prince from endeavouring their conversion; to promote which the more effectually, he caused a seminary to be founded for the maintenance of Jewish converts, and where they might live without labour or usury; which soon induced great numbers of them to come into it: and that house, we are told, subsisted a considerable time<sup>w</sup>.

Jews at Norwich punished,
A. C. 1235;

at London,
1243.

THE Jews of Norwich were some time after accused of having stolen a Christian child, and of having kept him one year, in order to circumcise and crucify him on the ensuing Passover; but, the fact being timely detected, they underwent a due punishment (Y). Some years after, those of London were indicted for the same crime, but with some difference in the manner; the child having been sold to them by his parents, and crucified, and the fact discovered by some miraculous circumstances not worth relating; so that he was canonized for a martyr, and his relics wrought strange wonders. However, the murderers could not be found out; only some Jews, having left London about that time, were shrewdly suspected<sup>x</sup>. Their whole nation was still more alarmed on the following year, when the shepherds made such havock of them in Spain, France, and Germany; and they had reason to fear the storm would fall next upon them here; to prevent which, they purchased an edict from the king, for-

<sup>u</sup> TRIVET, MAT. PARIS, Chronic. an. 1210. p. 159.

<sup>w</sup> Id. ibid.

<sup>x</sup> Id. sub an. 1244. p. 436.

But there is added another Latin one, which more fully explains it; and in which it is affirmed, that that roll of the law was written with Esdra's own hand, at his return from the Babylonish captivity: 2. That it is assuredly the original, from the testimony of the ancient Jews, who recived it in their synagogues, where it was kept: 3. That the Jews believed it such from one generation to another, and, as such, presented it to Emeric: 4. That the learned rabbies, who had examined it before witnesses, had acknowledged it as such, from some peculiar characters and strokes which are not to be met with in the modern manuscripts: 5. It is there affirmed to have been the manuscript which was shewn to the people on festival days; whence it is concluded, that it ought to be held in great veneration, and as a book dictated by the Holy Ghost, after all the other sacred ones had been burnt (34).

They likewise shew you there a Megillath, or roll of the book of Esther, still more ancient than that of Exra; and a bible written for the use of R. Menachem, the inscription of which was, that it was finished in the month of Adar, an. 953 (answering to A. C. 1187), to the end that Menachem and his posterity, and the posterity of his posterity, might be instructed out of that book.

(X) Our author (35) mentions one of them at Bristol, of whom the king demanded ten thousand marks; and who suffered his flesh to be torn off his bones, and seven of his teeth to be drawn out, one on each day, till he complied; but paid the sum, rather than lose the eighth.

(Y) They are charged by the same author (36) with having repeated the same crime three times in that city, with very little variation of circumstances. On the first, they were brought to the king's court at Wimminster, and there confessed the fact; for which they were only confined, and their lives left at the king's disposal. The same accusation was laid against them on the following year; and four of the wealthiest of them were hanged, and their effects confiscated. Lastly, they were accused of the same fact before the bishop, an. 1239, at which time it was that the child's father found him in the Jew's house, after he had been lost a whole year. The accused in vain appealed to the king; the bishop maintained, that the crime, being of a religious nature, was cognizable only by the spiritual court; upon which four of them were dragged at the tails of so many horses to a gibbet, where they were put to death. So that they must have been very incorrigible to dare to commit the same crime so many times within the space of five years, and after having been so severely punished for it.

(34) Montfaucon, Diar. Ital. c. xxviii. p. 400. Paris, an. 1235, p. 231. 280. & an. 1236. p. 359.

(35) M. Paris, sub an. 1210. p. 159.

(36) M.

a bidding any one to hurt them in any of his dominions<sup>7</sup>. But, as that prince's minister was still craving for more money, and they refused to pay it, they were accused of some murder committed in London, where, after various vexations and sufferings, they were obliged to pay one third of all their wealth<sup>2</sup> (Z).

THE holy war, to which Henry was pressingly invited by the pope, proved another pre-New taxes, tence for squeezing money out of his subjects, and especially the Jews, whom he made no A. C. 1252. scruple to strip of all they had left. The next was the pretended Spanish war, to which the nobility and gentry refused to contribute till it was actually declared. The Jews were again 1254. called upon for new supplies: but, being quite exhausted, begged they might be permitted to leave the kingdom for some more propitious country (A); but that was refused to them, 1255. and they were forced to pay the sum, only with some alleviation. On the next year he demanded 8000 marks of them; and, upon their pleading insolvency, sold them to his brother Richard, who paid him that sum for them; and would in all likelihood have made them refund it double, had he not been convinced of their real poverty and misery.

THOSE of Lincoln were about the same time accused of having crucified a young Christian, A child cruci- with several circumstances of inhumanity, which the reader may see in the margin (B). One fixed at Lin- Copin, at whose house the fact was committed, not only confessed it before the lord Lexing- ton, upon promise of having his life spared, but owned it to be an usual custom among them to do so every year, if they could procure any such children. The king, upon his coming from the north of England, being informed of all, highly blamed that nobleman for pro- c mising to spare such a villain's life, and revoked his pardon; upon which Copin was dragged at a horse's tail to the place of execution, where he was hanged in chains, or, as our author words it, his body and soul were made a present to the demons of the air<sup>3</sup>. Their condition was still more desperate all the time of the league and civil wars which happened during that prince's reign; wherein, let which side soever get the better, they were sure to be crushed by it; at least we find that the leaguers seized on their synagogue at Lincoln, and from thence Their syna- passed into the Isle of Ely, and made dreadful havock among them. And it is likewise pre- gogue seized, tended that Henry III. at length banished them by a perpetual edict (C). A. C. 1267.

It

<sup>7</sup> MAT. PARIS, Chronic. sub an. 1244. p. 436. Vide BASNAG. ubi supra, c. 22. §. 9. <sup>2</sup> Id. sub A. C. 1243, & 1250. <sup>a</sup> TRIVET, Chron. A. C. 1267. Specil. tom. viii. BASNAG. ubi sup. §. 18.

(Z) Our author tells us of one single Jew, named Aaron, who paid at different times, to extricate himself out of prison, and other vexations, about 200 marks of gold, and 30,000 of silver. The rest fared no better, being prosecuted sometimes for coining false money, at others for counterfeiting the king's seal, and such-like; from which they found no other way to escape than by bleeding freely to that monarch, or bribing, as they did in several instances, their judges to be favourable to them. (37).

(A) Elias, one of their brethren, undertook to plead for them before the council; and in a pathetic speech, which was accompanied with a flood of tears, represented the impossibility of their paying such an exorbitant sum as was demanded of them; and begged they might be rather banished the kingdom than be thus inhumanly oppressed; professing, that if they were to be flayed alive, they were not able to raise the money. He swooned away, or pretended to do so, at the conclusion; but the council, who probably gave no credit to him, obliged them to produce the greatest part of the sum demanded (38).

(B) These are, that they fed him some time before with milk, to make him more susceptible of pain: that they convened an assembly of the most considerable Jews in England, to assist at his execution: that they appointed one of them to act the part of Pontius Pilate, and pronounce sentence of death against him: that they caused him to be whipt till the blood gushed out; to be crowned with thorns, buffeted, spit upon; that every one plunged his knife into him: that they made him drink vinegar, and crucified him by the name of Jesus: that they pierced his heart with a spear, and, after he was dead, took out his entrails, to use in their magic operations, and flung the rest of his body into a well belonging to that house, where the sorrowful mother, after a long search, found it (39).

(C) This banishment is variously related by historians, as well as the motives of it. The Jews affirmed it to have happened A. M. 5020 (of Christ 1260); which our learned Selden (40) justly looked upon as a palpable mistake, and that the former date ought to be 5050; which would be more probable, if that error had not been in more authors than one; but as it is the same in most of them (41), it is more likely that they have either designedly or inadvertently antedated the disaster by 30 years.

Accordingly an inscription was found engraven, in Hebrew letters, on a stone in Winchester gaol, where probably the Jews of that county had been confined, to this purpose (42): "The commonalty of the Jews were arrested and imprisoned A. M. 5047." So that they could not have been banished either in the year 5020, or 1260. Besides, the leaguers, being defeated by king Henry, seized on the synagogue above named A. C. 1267. From which it is evident that they were still in the kingdom, and had their public meetings about the latter end of that monarch's reign. We may add, that none of our English annalists have made any mention of the perpetual edict, but, on the contrary, observe, that his son Edward I. caused the Jews to be imprisoned A. C. 1287, and to be all banished three years after. The annals of the Dominicans of Colmar affirm, that this happened an. 1291 (43); which is the more probable, because the council which was held in London, and occasioned their banishment, bears date 1291.

(37) M. Paris, ibid. A. C. 1250, & seq. (38) Id. sub an. 1254. p. 596. (39) Id. sub A. C. 1255. p. ibid. (40) De Jure Gent. lib. ii. c. 6. p. 190. (41) Shalsheleth Hakkabalah, fol. 112. So- lom. Ben Yrg. p. 139. Gantz Tzemach, p. 142. (42) Selden, ubi supra. (43) Apud Wurft. Hist. Germ. tom. ii. p. 25. Vide Basnag. ubi sup. l. ix. c. 22. §. 18.

*Their final expulsion by K. Edward,
A. C. 1291.*

IT is however agreed by most Christian authors, that this edict was published against them<sup>a</sup> about the latter end of the 13th century †, which is farther proved by public records found in some chanceries. Trivet affirms, moreover, that king Edward, who banished them out of his kingdom, granted them money to transport them into France, and afterwards confiscated their effects<sup>b</sup>. Walsingham says much the same thing<sup>c</sup>; and Polydore Virgil tells us, that this edict was enacted by a council which sat at London A. C. 1291, and, being desirous to sever the goats from the lambs, ordered the Jews to leave England in a few days, but with a permission to take their effects with them<sup>d</sup>. He adds, that they obeyed; and that the nation, which was then very numerous in England, took their final leave of it, and still removed from place to place till they all perished; whose loss, says he, needs not be much regretted, provided they leave behind those sacred books, without which it would be difficult for us to preserve our religion for the future (D). It is plain our author had no great belief in those prophecies which assure us that they will be actually recalled before the end of the world. However that be, it is plain they never more appeared in a body in this kingdom, from that time, till they were recalled to it, in the time of Oliver Cromwell, as will be seen in its proper place. It is therefore time to pass on to those of Germany, Hungary, and other northern regions.

*Jews in Germany, &c.
A. C. 1222.*

WHETHER the Jews were really more wicked in Germany than in other countries, or the people more superstitiously zealous against them, there is hardly a kingdom where they have been accused of more enormous crimes, and of greater number and variety of them, during these two centuries. We have already taken notice of their having encouraged the invasion<sup>c</sup> of the Persians and Tartars, under a false Messiah, and of the joy with which they, especially those of Cologne, were ready to receive them, had not their project proved abortive. Notwithstanding which disappointment, and the bad effects it brought upon them, they seem to have been no less flushed at a fresh irruption of Tartars, who had already penetrated into Hungary, insomuch that the emperor Frederic himself was beyond measure alarmed at it. But what seems to justify them from the imputation, was, that even that monarch was suspected, as well as they, of having invited those barbarians; which scandalous surmise was, it seems, invented by the pope and his clergy, whom he had disobliged, and was soon after wiped off by the effectual repulse which he gave them. They were perhaps more justly accused, in the same year, of having obstructed the conversion of a young man of their nation<sup>d</sup>; for in such cases the Jews lost all patience, and the seeing of their children or relations taken from them, and abjure their religion, seldom failed of driving them into some extravagant violence. On the other hand, the zealots, who were extremely fond and proud of such conversions, could not brook the least opposition, without double retaliation. This is what happened at Francfort upon such an occasion, and where their fury on both sides ran to such a height, that they took up arms; several Christians lost their lives, and about 180 Jews perished in the flames they had kindled. Half of the city was consumed by them, and the Jews all in danger of being sacrificed to the resentment of the populace; to avoid which, some of the most politic, to the number of 24, turned Christians, and among them the chief of their synagogue, whom our author<sup>e</sup> absurdly calls their bishop: for the Jews had no dignity which answered to that.

1241.

Accusations against them.

*A sad fire and slaughter at Francfort,
A. C. 1241.*

† Vide SELDEN, ubi sup. lib. ii. c. 6.

T. WALSHING.

<sup>a</sup> Hist. Ang. lib. xvii. p. 327.

man. PISTOR. tom. ii. p. 257. BASNAG. ubi sup. §. 4.

<sup>b</sup> Chronic. sub an. 1290.

<sup>c</sup> Hypodigm. Neutr. per

<sup>e</sup> Addition. ad LAMBERT SCHAFFSABURGH, Ger-

The occasion of the banishment is likewise variously related. One Jewish writer pretends, that they had been falsely accused to king Henry of counterfeiting his coin, and by those very rogues who had done it; and that the prosecution was carried on with such vehemence against them, that the king, who saw through it, ordered them to be banished, to save them from a more cruel punishment (44). Another tells us, that a priest, being fallen in love with a beautiful Jewess, and not being able to obtain her by any other means, submitted himself to be circumcised, and abjured Christianity; which being soon after known, the zealots insisted that all the Jews in London should be burnt alive; but that the king only caused those to be burnt who had a hand in that fact, and banished the rest (45). But in neither case is it credible that he would, for the crime of a few private persons, banish a whole nation which had so often filled his coffers.

A third pretends that his son Edward, seeing the country almost ruined by famine and pestilence, was easily persuaded that the incredulity and wickedness of the Jews had drawn down those two dreadful punishments on the whole nation; upon which they were all called upon to turn Christians. But that not having removed the famine, they began to ascribe the continuation of it to the violence they had offered to their consciences. Upon which the king ordered two pavilions to be reared near the sea-side, the one with a red cross over it, into which the sincere proselytes, and the other with the law of Moses in it, into which the dissatisfied converts, were bid to repair. But many of the latter, suspecting some private design against them, forbore to go to the Mosaic booth; and well it was for them, for those that did were immediately massacred, and their bodies flung into the sea. Thus far our Spanish Jew (46).

(D) The reader may remember that Edward had given the same decree against them in all his French dominions, on account of their corrupting the faith and practice of the Christians there*.

(44) Solom. Ben Virg. p. 140. Shalsheleth, fol. 113. p. 382.

* See before, p. 562.

(45) Id. ibid.

(46) Cordoso Las Excellencias,

a THEY were likewise often accused of murdering and crucifying the children of the Christians: the first time was at Haguenau, in Lower Alsatia, where three of them were found dead in a Jewish house. Complaint of it was made to the emperor, who, not being inclined to believe those idle stories, dismissed the plaintiffs with an illufory answer (E), which still more exasperated the people; but as the fact could not be proved, they obtained, by means of a considerable fum, a favourable judgment from him. They did not meet with fo kind a Massacred in judge at Munich in Bavaria, where an old woman having confessed that she had sold a child Bavaria, to the Jews, whose blood they had drawn for some sacrifice or forcery, the people, without A. C. 1286. staying for a farther trial, massacred all that came in their way. The town officers having in vain endeavoured to suppress the tumult, advised the rest of the Jews to retire into their synagogues, which was a stone building; which they did, but were all burnt and destroyed in it, notwithstanding all the efforts of the duke himself, and all his officers, to appease and disperse them<sup>f</sup>. Much such another accusation was brought against the Jews of Wurtzburg and Bern, where they were massacred in the same manner, and the two children killed by them At Bern, &c. canonized for martyrs and miraculous saints<sup>g</sup>.

NOTWITHSTANDING all these persecutions, and bitter zeal against them, Germany produced several great and learned rabbies, during these two centuries. The town of Germer- Learned rab- sheim gave birth to two of them, who took their surname from it, as it began about this time bies in Ger- to be the custom to do; viz. Baruc and Eliezer de Germer-sheim (F). That of Vienna pro- many. duced the famed R. Isaac, author of The light sown, and a great transcriber of Jewish books, which he dispersed among the synagogues of Germany, more exact and correct than the com- mon ones. He had several learned disciples, particularly R. Meir de Rottemburgh, who ex- ceeded him in learning, and became the judge and chief doctor of the German Jews (G). They likewise extol their R. Annon for his learning, riches, and handsomeness, as well as for his miraculous recovery of all his fingers and toes, which the bishop of Mentz had caused to be cut off, for declining a conference with him, which he had promised three days before; but this last may well pass for a Jewish legend.

THEY flourished no less in Lithuania during the 13th century; king Borissas, surnamed the Chaste, having granted them full liberty of conscience, and several other considerable privi- leges, which they have preserved ever since. This seems, indeed, to have been in a great measure their case thro' all those northern tracts, where the high ones favoured and protected them for their services, and the large fums they brought to them; whilst those of the inferior rank, especially the zealots among the clergy, beholding their prosperity with an envious eye, and being, as is most likely, often provoked at their insolence, and the contempt they shewed for their superstitions, were ever and anon raising some accusation to disturb their peace, and render them odious to the world. This doth but too plainly appear to have been the case, by what passed in the council of Vienna, which was held about this time. It was Council of there observed, that the Jews were grown so numerous and powerful, that the clergy's in- Vienna held, come was considerably lessened; for which reason it was decreed, that they should reimburse A. C. 1267. them in proportion to what they might have been intitled to, had their families been Chris-

<sup>f</sup> AFFENTIN, Ann. Bojor. lib. vii. p. 441. Ann. RENON, sub an. 1288. Hist. German. tom. vi. p. 396.
<sup>g</sup> Id. ibid. vid. & Fascicul. Tempor. Aetas vi. Hist. Germ. PISTOR. tom. iii. fol. 83.

(E) He told them, it seems, that those children must be buried, since they were dead; for which our author, a zealous monk, makes no scruple to accuse that monarch of having been bribed by the Jews, and to damn him into hell for it (47). But another, of more candour and temper, tells us, that Frederic convened an assembly of learned divines, and inquired whether it were indeed true that the Jews thought themselves obliged to shed some Christian blood on Good Friday? But as they could produce nothing certain about it, he suffered the prosecution to go no farther (48).

(F) They were both great cabbalists; and the latter is affirmed (49) to have written a famed treatise in that strain, stiled, the Mantle of the Lord, an. 1240. But he should rather be of older date, since he is said to have taught the cabbalah to Moses Nachmanides; who, as hath been formerly mentioned, died an. 1260, aged sixty-six years.

(G) This rabbi was at length taxed by the emperor in a large sum, and imprisoned for non-payment; whereupon one of his disciples became bound for him, but he died before he could get his liberty. On which account we must observe a gross mistake which some authors have made (50), who pretend that he died in a city called Beith-Sahar; whereas those two words mean only a prison-house; and such was that in which he died of grief.

Another thing we observe, is, that Buxtorf has mistaken him for another Meir Cohen, who wrote against Maimonides, of whom we have spoken elsewhere. And, 3dly, those are likewise mistaken who affirm, that Rodolphus was the emperor that imprisoned him, an. 1305; for that prince died an. 1292; so that it must have been either his successor Adolphus of Nassau, or perhaps rather Robert archduke of Austria, and the son of Rodolphus. There is likewise a book attributed to him called Hatti Sbatz, which he had begun, but was afterwards finished by his disciples, and is a collection of his decisions.

(47) Richen. Chronic. Senon. lib. iv. c. 32, & 33. Specul. tom. iii. p. 401.
Histor. ante Albert Argentines. Chron. ap. Wurft. tom. ii. p. 91.

(48) Auct. incert. Fragm.

(49) Gantz Tzemach, sub an.

(50) Bar-

tian (H). They farther decreed, that they should be obliged to pull down their new and a stately synagogues which they had built, and be contented with their old ones <sup>a</sup>.

ALL these decrees, however, could not but prove abortive, whilst the princes and great ones publicly protected those that refused to obey them, and obliged their officers to shelter those who should implore their assistance. So that the evil grew up to such a height, that the clergy was obliged to take more violent measures, and to excommunicate all those that should protect the Jews, and refuse to execute those decrees which had been enacted against them.
At Augsb. A. C. 1285. They were forced soon after to make fresh ones at Augsburg, on account of the improper oaths which were till then administered to them, and which they made no scruple to break (I);
and to oblige them to swear by the name of God, and the law of Moses, holding their hand on the Pentateuch <sup>1</sup>. The misfortune is, that even this last kind of oaths is held by them to b be annulled on the grand expiation day; so that at the most they can be of force but one whole year. And we may add, that they have their casuists likewise, who allow them to equivocate, and to tell officious lies, according to that concession of the thalmud, that it is lawful to dissemble for the sake of peace <sup>k</sup>.

Disputes with the Caraites. ABOUT this time the dispute between the thalmudists and Caraites arose to such a height, that
R. Aaron, head of the latter, and a man of great learning, wrote a treatise to expose the extravagances of the thalmud (K), in order to suppress a certain fondness which those of his sect began to betray for that book; insomuch that R. Nissi, the son of Noah, another Caraites, had been obliged to expound the Mishnah, at the earnest request of his disciples. Aaron in vain strove to oppose himself against the current, for a time; but he was at length obliged to follow c Nissi's steps, for fear of disgusting his disciples, and to give an allegorical sense to divers places of scripture. The thalmudists were not a little pleased to see their antagonists make such steps towards them, but that did not reconcile them the more to each other; on the contrary, their hatred and animosity continued as fierce as ever †.

Jews mas- sacred, A. C. 1264. THEY underwent soon after a much greater misfortune during the contest between Adolphus of Nassau, and Albert of Austria, who had been both chosen emperor; when a peasant, named
Raind Fleish, took the advantage of the war then raging to set up for a preacher in the high Palatinate, Franconia, and other provinces, and to pretend that God had sent him to exterminate all the Jews. His pretence was, their having stolen a consecrated wafer; and the people taking him at his word without farther enquiry, fell upon them at Nuremberg, Nieu- d mark, Rottemburgh, Amberg, and other towns of Franconia and Bavaria, and burnt as many as fell into their hands; whilst many of the rest chose rather to burn themselves, with their wives, children, houses, &c. than to be dragged into the flames by the Christians. Duke Albert would fain have suppressed those butcheries, but was afraid lest Raind Fleish, who was looked upon as sent from God, should draw the people over to his competitor. The persecution was at length suppressed, probably by him, and the city of Nuremberg laid under a severe fine, besides having been above half burnt by the fire which the oppressed Jews had

<sup>a</sup> Concil. Vienn. ap. CANIS. lect. antiq. tom. i. p. 621.

<sup>k</sup> MANASS. Conciliator quest. in Gen. quest. 37. p. 48, & seq.

<sup>1</sup> CRUSIUS, Annal Suevor. c. viii. p. 3, & seq.

† De his vid. Anc. Hist. vol. i. p. 597.

(H) It was farther objected that they prevented the conversion of their sons, daughters, wives, &c. and brought over many Christians to their religion, insomuch, that their synagogues multiplied, the new ones were made larger and more sumptuous, to the great decay of their churches and congregations.

(I) The custom, it seems, was, before that time, to make them swear by the saints, by the Blessed Virgin, and even by the Son of God; which oaths they made no difficulty either to take or break (1).

(K) This treatise, which he intitled Morch Aharon, or Doctor Aharon, is an explication of the articles of their faith, to which he gave the title of Hetz Hacha- jim, or Tree of Life, because he did not believe any man intitled to eternal life that did not believe them.
And therefore, though he acknowledged a resurrection, yet he confined it only to the true believers of the house of Israel.

Bartolucci pretends that he rejected all the sacred books, except the Pentateuch (2); but that is a mistake, since he wrote comments on the Psalms, and on the prophecies of Ijaiab and Jeremiah, which are still preserved in MS. in the library of Leyden (3).

We must here observe, that there were two famed Caraites rabbies of that name; viz. this who was the son of Joseph, and stiled himself Aaron Cohen (Aaron the priest), and flourished about the end of the 13th century; and Aaron the son of Eliab, who lived about fifty years after him. The former, whose commentary was found in the library of the fathers of the oratory at Paris, by Morinus, and brought thither from Con- stantinople by Mr. Sanci, hath made some learned men think that he had written it in the East. But as he opposes in it the rites of the German Jews, he must be supposed at least to have lived some time amongst them, and to have designed his work for the synagogues of that country (4). He was likewise the author of another work, which he intitled Miklol Joppi, or The Per- fection of Beauty.

As for Aaron the son of Eliab, he lived in the East, an. 1362, and attacked the great Aben Ezra, and other traditionalists, with great zeal and reasoning, in a book which he intitled The Crown of the Law, which is a literal comment of the Pentateuch, after the method of the Caraites; and in another work, the MS. of which was brought from Buda into Germany (5).

(1) Crusius, Annal. Suev. c. viii. p. 3, & seq. Basnag. ubi sup. c. 23. §. 14. (2) Bibl. Rabb. tom. i. p. 29.
(3) Fréji excerpt. Abaronis explan. in Pentateuch. Basn. ubi sup. (4) Id. ib. §. 16. (5) Id. ibid.

a set to their houses (L). This did not hinder it from resuming its hatred against them, ten or twelve years after, and hanging the famed R. Mordecai, who had written some learned comments on the thalmud, and on the works of R. Isaac Aphez, which are highly esteemed by the Jews (M). Mordecai hanged, A. C. 1310.

SOME years after, the council convened at Vienna, by pope Clement, against the Templars, likewise condemned the usury of the Jews, and those as heretics who approved of them; which was a fresh cause of vexatious law-suits and other mischiefs to them, especially in Germany<sup>1</sup>. They were, however, in some measure relieved, by Menicho bishop of Spire, who forbade them to be molested on that account in his dominions, alleging that law could not concern them, seeing the church doth not judge those that are without<sup>m</sup>. A few years after which they were quite banished by Lewis I. king of Hungary, who had lately subdued the Moldavians, out of all his dominions<sup>n</sup>. Protected by the bishop of Spire, A. C. 1339. Banished by the king of Hungary, A. C. 1344. Persecuted by the Flagellants, A. C. 1349. at Francfort.

ABOUT five years after, a great number of them were plundered and burnt, by the newly started up fraternity of Flagellants (N), at Spire, Strasburgh, and other places<sup>o</sup>, especially at Thuringen, where they exasperated the people against them; but the worst of all happened at Francfort, where, after some disorders committed against them, and their being at length come to some kind of accommodation, a Jew, named Cicogne, whose family was very numerous in that city, not satisfied with it, threw a piece of fire-work into the town-house, which consumed both it and all the records preserved in it. The flame spread itself to the cathedral, which was likewise reduced to ashes, and burnt quite as far as Saxenhouse. The crime did not go unpunished, for not only the incendiary, but all the Jews of that city, except some few that retired into Bohemia (O), were put to death<sup>p</sup>.

A NEW accusation was brought against them, which hath been already mentioned in speaking of those of France and Spain; viz. of poisoning the wells and spring-heads of rivers: though upon no other foundation than that they escaped from the common mortality which happened in most parts of Europe. This caused a fresh massacre in most provinces of Germany, the very year after that which had happened at Francfort. In some places they were burnt alive, in others most cruelly butchered. Those of Mentz, however, resolved to stand in their own defence; and having seized on about 200 unarmed Christians, massacred them in a most barbarous manner; upon which the incensed populace came in shoals, and fell furiously upon them, that they murdered about 12,000 of them on that single occasion. After Revenge on the Christians severely retaliated.

<sup>1</sup> CLEMENT lib. v. p. 510. NAUCLER. Chronol. p. 3003. <sup>m</sup> SZENTIVANY Soc. Jesu Dissertat. Paralipomenic. rer. memorabil. Hungar. Catalog. p. 236. ap. BASNAG. lib. ix. c. 23. §. 22. <sup>n</sup> Id. ibid. <sup>o</sup> Hist. Landgr. Thuring. c. 105. p. 941. <sup>p</sup> BASNAG. ubi sup.

(L) Some place this transaction after the death of Adolphus, and add two circumstances to it; viz. 1st. That this tumult was raised on account of the blood which came out of the consecrated wafer, whilst the Jews were braying it in a mortar. And, 2dly. That a great number of Christians joined themselves with the oppressed, and made so stout a defence, that the populace was forced to besiege and pursue them into their retreat (6). But these two facts explode each other; for it is by no means credible that such numbers of Christians would have sided with the Jews, if they had been convinced of the miracle of the bloody host; and much less that the archduke would have put himself at their head. So that this was no other than a popular uproar, which the better sort condemned; for there was no man put to death at Francfort on that accusation, after the magistrates had taken full cognizance of the affair, and proceeded on it according to their laws.

(M) He was hanged soon after his return into Nuremberg, after having retired some years to Triers, where he taught in company with Isaac of Dijon. The Jews have made a martyr of him (7). But the mischief did not stop there; for soon after, A. C. 1338, one Armleder put himself at the head of a troop of peasants, and made a sad havock and slaughter among them; but being taken, was beheaded by the order of the emperor Lewis of Bavaria; upon which the rest dispersed themselves (8). Bzovius adds, that the Jews were then accused of having stolen an host, and that upon piercing it, they were so alarmed to see rivulets of blood issuing from it, that they fled out of the house. Information being made of it to the duke of Austria, he refused to act in it without consulting the then pope, Benedict XII. who only sent him word that the host ought to be revered, and those who had pierced it to be punished (9).

(N) So called from their assembling and stripping themselves stark naked, twice a day, and whipping themselves with cords, armed with barbed iron, and accompanying that ceremony with psalms sung to mournful tunes, and some prayers which they repeated aloud. This sect, which had been almost suppressed, took fresh vigour about this time, under some new chiefs, and pretended to have received a letter from heaven, by an angel, by which they were ordered to inflict those macerations on themselves, to relieve the souls which languished in purgatory, and to put a stop to the sins which then reigned in Germany; which letter was read aloud every time they met.

(O) And even these met but with a short respite; the citizens of Prague, displeased to see them celebrate their passover, chose that time to burn their synagogue; and those that were then at their devotions in it, which they did without any opposition, so that not one of them escaped. This misfortune proved so much the more grievous, as it was unexpected, as well as undeserved; and the Jews of Prague have preserved a regretful sense of it in a prayer which was composed some time after, in memory of that event.

(6) Stenon, Annal. Hist. Germ. tom. v. p. 402. Histor. Austral. ap. Reub. Hist. Germ. tom. v. p. 341. vid. Basnag. lib. ix. c. 23. (7) De hoc, vid. Bartoloc. ubi sup. tom. iv. p. 47. Gantz Tezmach, p. 147. (8) Spond. sub an. 1338. p. 453. (9) Ann. lib. ix. 1338. N. 20.

this, they set fire to their houses, which spread and burnt with such vehemence, that the great bell, glass and grate of the cathedral were melted down †. Their rage spread itself all over Germany; the imperial cities demolished all their houses, and built castles and towers with the materials, and the populace was the more eager to pull them down, because they found money and other rich things among the rubbish. The then count Palatine, and his ministers, strove in vain to suppress their violence, and to give shelter to them: they were opposed by some of the nobility, as well as by the common people, and accused of having been bribed by large sums to take their part. All the inhabitants of Ulm were burnt alive<sup>a</sup>, with their wives, children, and effects; and in a word, the whole Jewish nation saw themselves without friends or place of retreat, the princes not daring to interpose in their favour, at so critical a juncture. Lithuania was the only country where they enjoyed any tranquility; which was chiefly owing to a beautiful Jewess, named Esther, with whom Casimir the Great was enamoured, and at whose request he had granted them several considerable privileges.

Massacred in Bohemia,
A. C. 1391.

THOSE who had taken refuge in Bohemia, did not fare much better than those in Germany, as appears by what we said in the last note. Two years after which catastrophe, Vincenzlas, emperor, and king of Bohemia, desirous to ingratiate himself with his subjects, to whom his excessive love of wine and women had rendered him odious, discharged all his nobility of the debts they owed to the Jews<sup>r</sup>. The people thereupon looking upon them as discarded from his protection, began to make a sad massacre of them at Gotha, which became still more dreadful, as the peasants joined the populace in it. Those of Spire put them all to the sword, without regard to age or sex, some few children excepted, which were spared, and hurried away to the font to be baptised (P). But as such violent persecutions are not only odious, but seldom fail of unpeopling a country, they found it necessary to put a stop to this, by the punishment of some of the ringleaders.

Banished the empire,
A. D. 1400.

THEY were soon after accused afresh of having poisoned the wells, springs, &c. and punished for it by the most severe deaths, not only all over Germany, but in Italy, Provence, and other parts. The Jewish historians, however, tell us, that the emperor, being fully convinced of their innocence, represented again to his council, the impossibility of poisoning springs, which have a continual run of water<sup>s</sup>; but that the people pretending to have seen them throw the poison into them, and muttering some words all the time, made the emperor resolve to banish them, to the no small disappointment of the seditious zealots, who cried out, that no punishment was too severe for them. His edict came out accordingly against them, either to flee or be baptised; and the Jewish writers above-quoted, highly extol the perseverance of those of their nation, who, notwithstanding the great misery which then reigned among them, not inferior in their account to that which followed the destruction of Jerusalem, yet few, if any, were thereby driven to apostatize, or, as they word it, to forsake the glory of their God. But for this we have only their bare word, and with it we now close these two centuries, and pass on to the 15th.

Jews in the 15th century
banished out of Spain.

IN running through which, we shall not, as formerly, begin with the eastern Jews, for reasons which will more visibly appear in the sequel; but pass now from Germany into Spain, where we shall find them (after a long and peaceable abode there, during which their synagogues and learned men flourished, and their nation was greatly multiplied) banished at length from that country, excepting those who preferred dissembling to a mortifying exile; which fatal revolution hath ever since excited the complaints of the Jews, as well as the pity of the more moderate Christians for them; but as it did not take place till the close of this 15th century, and was ushered in by several considerable events, it will be necessary to give our readers an account of them before we pass on to their final expulsion. The first step towards it was promoted by the anti-pope Benedict XIII. who was then in Arragon, the only province left that owned his authority, and was trying to ingratiate himself with the rest of the Spanish nation by his zeal for the conversion of the Jews. He accordingly appointed a conference with them (Q), in which, as he defrayed all their charges, they treated him with unusual complaisance

A conference held between the Christians and them,
A. C. 1413.

† NAUCLER. Chronol. gener. 45. p. 1009. ap. eund.
<sup>r</sup> CRUS. ibid. lib. vi. c. 3. Hist. Landgr. Thuring. c. 132. p. 948. PISTOR, Hist. Germ. tom. i. ÆN. SYLV. Hist. Bohem. c. 3. BASNAG. ubi sup. TZEMACH, sub. eod. an. p. 146.

<sup>s</sup> CRUS. Antiq. Suevor. lib. v. p. 253.
<sup>a</sup> SOLOM. BEN VIRG. sub A. 160. p. 151. GANTZ

(P) The pretence for this cruelty was, that they had insulted a priest, as he was carrying the viaticum to a sick person.

(Q) He was induced to it by one Hieronimo de Sante Fé, who had forsaken the synagogue to turn Christian, and was then his physician, and promised that he would convince all the Jews, from express passages out of the thalmud, that Jesus Christ was the Messiah. Accordingly he and one Bertrand, a native of Valentia, another proselyte, and then Benedict's almoner, together with one Garcias Avares d'Alarcon, a man well versed in the Hebrew, challenged the Jews to a disputation. All the learned rabbies in Spain were summoned to it, and one Dom. Vidal chosen to manage it on their side. This last must not be confounded with another of that name, surnamed de Tolosa, who flourished in Catalonia forty years before this conference.

As to the title of Dom, which is an abbreviation of Dominus

a complaisance and respect; though they expressed themselves with some bitterness against his physician, who was the chief promoter as well as conductor of it against them†.

THE tenor and success of this conference is variously related by the Jewish and Christian historians that have transmitted it to us, though they were both present and bore a share in it<sup>u</sup>. Both sides pretend to have gained the victory, as is usual in such cases (R). But as neither the arguments on one side, nor the answers on the other, have any thing particular in them, we shall, for brevity's sake, refer our readers for the further account of the whole, to the historian often quoted by us<sup>w</sup>, and only add, that though Benedict XIII. was present at some of the sessions of it, yet he soon left his room to be filled by the general of the Dominicans<sup>x</sup>; and that it was begun February 7, 1413, and lasted till May 10, 1414. On the 10th of November following, Hieronymo de Santa Fé presented that pontif with his relation of it, which was confirmed on the 12th of December, and was afterwards published at Francfort, an. 1602, in the Bibliotheca patrum. With relation to the fruits of this conference, we are told, that about 3000, or according to others 5000, Jews were converted upon the reading of Hieronymo's relation of it; for which he grew into such esteem, that Joseph Albo, fearing lest their synagogues should be forsaken, compiled his Articles of Faith, by which he endeavoured to confirm the wavering belief of the rest (S). As for Benedict XIII. he published in the year following his constitution against the thalmud, and the usury of the Jews<sup>y</sup>, but as he was<sup>Benedict XIII's bull, A. C. 1415.</sup> deposed soon after, and all his ordinances were revoked, they felt not the effects of them. Neither do we find that his successor, Martin of Florence, followed his steps against the Jews.

BUT the greatest converter of them at this time was Vincent Ferrario, since canonized and extolled to the skies for his great zeal and miraculous exploits (T). The Christians reckoned that <sup>Vincent Ferrario's numerous conversions not sincere.</sup>

† SOLOM. BEN VIRG. p. 227—246—264.

<sup>u</sup> Shalsheleth Hakkabal. p. 113. HIERONYM. DE S. FE,

cont. Jud. lib. i. c. 2. in Bibl. patr. tom. iv. pt. i. p. 750.

<sup>w</sup> BASNAG. lib. ix. c. 24. §. 4, & seq.

<sup>x</sup> D'AGUIRA Bibl. Hisp. tom. ii. c. 1. ap. eund. ibid. p. 731—797.

<sup>y</sup> See his bull in BARTOLOC. ubi sup. tom. iii.

Dominus, the Jewish rabbies had begun about this time to take it, in imitation of the Spanish doctors, among whom it was then a mark of high honour; but is since become much cheaper, and commonly given to abbots, priors, and other heads of convents. The Jewish writers do indeed likewise give it to some of their ancient rabbies: and Gedaliah calls one of his ancestors by it, whom he places in the 10th century; but it is plain, it did not come into use among them till after the end of the 14th (10).

(R) The Jews pretend that they bribed several of the bishops to persuade Benedict to break off the conference as soon as possible, being afraid lest it should exasperate the Christians against them; but that the pontif insisted strenuously on Hieronymo's making good his promise against them. They add, that their rabbies came off with honour, and that the Jews were only ordered to refund some part of their exorbitant usuries on the Christians; which they, however, evaded; by applying to Martin of Florence, who was chosen pope after the deposition of Benedict, and resided some time in that city, and revoked the edict of that anti-pope against them. We omit several blunders and anachronisms which those authors (11) have been guilty of, and content ourselves with stating the time and fact as they are related on both sides.

The Christians, on the other hand, pretend not only to have gained the victory, but likewise that, in that very year, Hieronymo de S. Fé presented to Benedict a writing, which exposed the dangerous doctrines contained in the thalmud, against the law, against the Messiah, and against the Christians; and that rabbi Asmuth presented another soon after to the cardinal de S. Angelo, in which he owned that the passages extracted out of that book appeared shocking and erroneous to him; and that it was true, indeed, they might be capable of a better sense, which yet he did not pretend to know. For that reason he declares, that he neither pretends to defend or justify them, and disowns any answer he may before have made use of to elude them. This was likewise assented to, and signed by all the rabbies there present, except Joseph Albo and Ferrarius (12). This would be indeed a signal triumph against the Jews, and a sufficient, as well as solemn condemnation of their thalmud, by those who were the professed defenders of it, if the MS. out of which our author hath taken it, could be depended upon. But as neither Hieronymo de S. Fé takes notice of any such recantation in the book which he wrote soon after against the thalmud, nor Astroch, who sent an account of this conference to Girona, it may be justly called in question. Especially, considering that all the rabbies assenting to it, except the two above-named, the declaration ought rather to have been drawn up by R. Vidal, who was at the head of the rest, than by Asmuth. However that be, the former wrote against the conference itself, his Kadesch Kadoshim, or Holy of Holies; and R. Isaac Nathan, his censure of the Seducer; though the latter did not appear in public till after the death of Hieronymo de S. Fé (13).

(S) These he reduced to three, viz. the existence of God, the law of Moses, and the rewards and punishments of belief and disbelief. Whether, therefore, he found his brethren too closely pressed on the article of the coming of the Messiah, it is plain he struck it out of his confession, as not necessary to salvation; and censures Maimonides, without naming of him, for having made the belief of his coming an essential article of the Jewish faith.

This work of his, published at such a juncture, was held in such esteem, that the Polish Gedakah hath written a comment upon it, which he intitled, The Planted, or Complete Tree; and of which his notes are the roots; the indexes to the places of scripture, the branches; and the allegorical explanations, the leaves (14).

(T) He is stiled by their martyrologists (15), the bright star of Spain, the light of Valentia, the prodigy of the universe, the pattern of the Dominicans, and the

(10) De hoc, vid. Basnag. lib. ix. c. 24. §. 3. (11) Shalsheleth Hakkabalab, p. 113, & seq. Gantz Chron. p. 144. (12) Bartoloc. ubi sup. tom. iii. p. 177. (13) Hottinger, Bibl. Orient. (14) Vid. Juchasin, p. 134; Gantz, p. 147. Wolf Bibl. Hæbr. N. 453, & 862. Hotting. ubi sup. Basnag. & al. (15) Tamaio Salazar, Martyrol. Hispan. tom. ii. p. 509. Saussay. Martyrol. Gal. tom. i. fol. 190. Legend. Manuscr. lect. lib. iv. ap. Tamajum. p. 510. Basn. ubi sup. §. 11.

A. C. 1415, that he converted about 8000 Moors, and about 30 or 35,000 Jews. And these last, willing a & seq. to raise his character still higher, or, which is more probable, to discredit what the former say of him, allow him to have made about 200,000 converts out of their nation, besides near 100,000 of bad Christians. But whatever be the number of these Jewish converts, their sincerity was far enough for passing unsuspected, and not without good grounds; for the greatest part of them, after having dissembled as long as they saw occasion, made no scruple of throwing off the mask, as soon as opportunity offered; by which one might see that they had only given way to necessity, and merely to avoid a more severe treatment (U); for they themselves complain, that he was a great persecutor and calumniator<sup>z</sup>; so that it is no wonder that they only conformed to outward appearance, but privately and within doors, lived intirely like Jews, circumcised their children, observed the Passover, and all other Jewish festivals and b rites<sup>a</sup>.

The inquisition ordered to suppress their relapses. THIS dissimulation did not go long unobserved by the clergy, who acquainted the king (Ferdinand) and the pope (Xistus IV.) with it: upon which the tribunal of inquisition was strictly charged to watch more closely over those delinquents, and Christian princes were exhorted to assist it in the punishment of them. This decree, which was published in most cities of Spain, so alarmed the Jews, that 17,000 immediately returned to the church, and submitted to whatever censures or penance it should impose upon them. Two thousand of them were burnt alive, some of whom, nevertheless, acknowledged Christ to be the Messiah.

The punishment inflicted on them. A great number of others were thrown into dungeons, where they continued a long time; and those that were let out were declared infamous, and ordered to wear two red crosses on c their upper garments, in acknowledgement that they had deserved the flames. They did not even spare the dead, but took up and burnt their bones, confiscated their effects, and declared the children incapable of succeeding their parents. These great severities made several of them flee into other countries, notwithstanding the watchfulness of that tribunal; whilst the rest took care either to dissemble more closely, or to be better instructed before they turned, that they might be less exposed to the punishment of apostacy (W). These conversions did not hinder the populace from often insulting and oppressing them, and from attributing every misfortune or calamity that befel them either to the obstinacy of the recusant, or to the dissimulation of the conforming Jews; witness the insurrection they made against them at Toledo, on d a pretended infringement of their privileges, and laying a new tax on that city, which, though small and light, was at the time of war very necessary; on account of which, the inhabitants vented their resentment on the Jews, without sparing even the posterity of those that had been converted, and after having broke into and plundered their houses, and murdered all that opposed them, as soon as the city had resumed its tranquility, enacted some laws against the glory of the glorified saints. They tell us moreover, that he was heard to bark in his mother's womb, as a pre-sage that he would become a celebrated preacher; and that tho' he only understood his own mother tongue, yet by a prodigy, greater than that which happened to the apostles, every nation could plainly understand him. His credit was become so great that he was raised to the highest dignities in church and state, and particularly to that of confessor to the anti-pope Benedict.

<sup>z</sup> CARDOSO las Excellencias & auct. ab eo citat.

<sup>a</sup> Bzov. ann. ubi sup.

It is not agreed whether or no he was a convert from Judaism; the Jews, by calling him Meskumad, or apostate, seem to allow it; but others pretend that he was descended of an illustrious Christian family in Valentia.
However that be, we are told that he converted more by his miracles than by his eloquence; insomuch, that being once got into a synagogue, with a cross in his hand, the mens garments, and the womens linen, were all covered with red crosses; which obliged them to acknowledge Christ crucified, and to turn their synagogue into a church, for which it has been called ever since the Church of the holy Cross (16).

(U) We have a pregnant instance of this in a MS.
letter, preserved in the Vatican library, written from a Jewish rabbi named Duran, who, after having embraced Christianity, artfully strove to dissuade his son from imitating his forefathers. The whole tenor of it was equivocal, and seemed, at first reading, as intended to persuade him to continue steadfast in the religion he had embraced; but upon closer reading, the whole mystery was soon unravelled, and the design found to be to persuade him to return to Judaism, which he himself owned he had forsaken at the instigation of Vincent Ferrario (17).

(W) Among them who were esteemed sincere converts, was Solomon the son of Levi, who having read the Summ. of Th. Aquinas, was convinced of the truth of Christianity, and took the name of Paul of Burges. He was soon after raised to the bishoprick of that city, which was his native place, and afterwards to the patriarchate of Aquileia. He hath left behind some additions to N. Delyra, formerly mentioned, but doth so often take upon him to correct him, that himself wants a fresh corrector, having been guilty of some egregious blunders in his criticisms. He was accordingly criticised by Simon de Girona, but with little credit or success, since that rabbi is often forced to give up the authority of the thalmud, though of such great weight among the Jews.

Paul left a son, who succeeded him in his bishoprick, and wrote the history of Spain that goes by his name.
He had a second, who was raised to the see of Pla-centia; and a third, who married into an illustrious Spanish family, and became preceptor to the king of Castile. But in the midst of all his preferments, he declared that no dignities either in church or state ought to be given to any of his nation, because they were too much accustomed to dissemble. May not he have been one of that class?

(16) Bzov. sub A. C. 1412. N. 11. Ægid. Gonzal Albulens. Historiogr. Philip III. lib. iii. c. 15.
the letter in Bartolucci, tom. i. p. 404.

(17) See

a new converts, whether from Judaism or Paganism, by which they were excluded from all offices of honour and trust <sup>b</sup>. The clergy, however, more equitable to those neophytes, took them under their protection, and condemned those laws as unchristian, and had their censure soon after ratified by the pope (X).

ALL this while the Jews were still protected and loved by king Alphonso the Great and his grandees; and it is under his reign that one of their writers <sup>c</sup> places a conference which hap-<sup>A conference before Alphonso.</sup> pened between that monarch and one Thomas, surnamed the subtle philosopher (Y), who came so much the more opportunely thither, as one of the bishops had preached a severe sermon against them, in which he imprudently affirmed that they could not celebrate their Passover without shedding of some Christian blood; which, if true, he said, he was resolved to drive b them out of his territories; whereupon the king was glad to have so learned a man to confute that absurd notion; which he accordingly did, though not with that strength and energy which might be expected from a person of his character. The same author mentions another A second. conference that passed between Alphonso of Portugal and the Jews, on the subject of the 22d Psalm, and the application which the Christians make of several pregnant passages of it to Christ, but which these denied to relate to him; but as he hath not told us how that dispute ended, we shall say no more of it, there being nothing extraordinary urged on either side.

AMONG the learned rabbies who flourished during this 15th century, besides those we have <sup>Learned Jews, A. C. 1482. & seqq.</sup> already mentioned at Arragon, &c. we may name their celebrated Shammai <sup>d</sup>, one of the greatest cabbalists of the age (Z). Joel, the son of Sciocu, was no less famed a preacher, c whose sermons, though too long and diffuse, had some very judicious expositions of certain sections of the Pentateuch. The family of Alcaleb produced two excellent astronomers, the uncle and the nephew, who both compiled astronomical tables <sup>e</sup>. The first was named R. Isaac Ben Tzadic, and the other R. Isaac Ben Solomon Ben Tzadic. We shall by-and-by have occasion to mention several others of their learned men, who were unhappily included in the edict of condemnation and banishment, and involved in the same misfortunes with the rest of that unhappy nation, of which we are going now to speak (A).

THIS dreadful edict was issued out against them by Ferdinand and Isabella, soon after he <sup>Jews banished out of Spain, A. C. 1492.</sup> had happily ended his war with the Moors, and obliged the whole Jewish nation to quit Spain in four months after the date of it (in March, A. C. 1492). Turre Cremata, who was d the soul of this persecution, advised the king to shorten that term, and forbade the people,

<sup>b</sup> MARIANA, ubi sup. lib. xxii. c. i. p. 840.

<sup>c</sup> SOLOM. BEN VIRG.

<sup>d</sup> BARToloc. Bibl. Rab. tom. ii.

<sup>e</sup> Id. ibid. tom. iii. p. 290, & 925. WOLF Bibl. Hæbr. N. 1263, & seq.

(X) The dean of that city was the first who fulminated his anathemas against those laws, and ordered public theses to be held, in which they were condemned; and to give the greater weight to his defence, mentioned a good number of families of high rank, who had intermarried with the Jews, and were likely to be deprived of their public employments by them. All his endeavours and struggles would, however, have proved fruitless, had not pope Nicholas I. published a thundering bull against them, by which he excommunicated all those who were for depriving these proselytes of any place either civil or ecclesiastical, or from the priesthood and government, whether they were converts from Judaism or Paganism. This bull meeting but with a cold reception, that pontif was obliged to send a second to confirm it; and Mariana is almost the only Spanish writer who hath vouchsafed it a place in his history, so displeasing was it to that whole nation (18).

(Y) One might be apt to think, by the name and character, that this must have been the famed Thomas Aquinas, especially as he flourished in the reign of king Alphonso, the then great favourer of the Jews. But as it doth not appear that he ever was in Spain, and in this conference quotes Nich. de Lyra, and Abrawanel, who both lived after the subtile doctor, our author must have either jumbled some persons together that were not cotemporary, or mean Alphonso V. of Portugal, who reigned about the middle of the 15th century. However that be, this conference, which lasted several days, concluded in favour of the Jews; and Thomas, by quoting Abrawanel, who acquits the Christians of idolatry, and telling that he, the king, was lineally descended from king David, easily engaged him to protect and favour their nation; whilst at the same time he counselled him to make some laws against their usury and luxury, which were the two main things that rendered them odious to his subjects.

(Z) Among other cabbalistical secrets, he published that of begetting more boys than girls in the married state, by placing the bed from the north to the south. And the rabbies, who abound with such kind of superstition, affirm, that the Divine Majesty resides from east to west, and that it is a dishonour to it to place one's bed in that point. But when, out of respect to it, men plant it from north to south, God recompenses them with a breed of boys, which the Jews prefer to the girls. But one would rather think they did it in imitation of, or conformity to, the notion of the old philosophers, who believed that the cold north winds contributed to the procreation of boys.

(A) We must here once more observe, that R. Abraham, prince of the Jewish nation, and tutor to the great Aben Ezra, had foretold 200 years before, that the same configuration which Moses their great law-giver was born under, namely, the conjunction of Saturn and Jupiter, would bring in the Messiah. It was to happen, according to his calculation, 2859 years after the former; that is, A. C. 1464. And there actually happened such a conjunction twice within this 15th century, viz. 1444 in Cancer, and twenty years after in Pisces. But instead of that glorious train of miracles which was to accompany the birth of that long expected prince, and exalt the Jewish nation above all the rest, they met with nothing but disasters, and a general banishment out of all the Spanish dominions, which proved the ruin and destruction of the greatest part of it.

under the severest penalties, to afford either victuals, or any other assistance, to such as were found in the kingdom after the month of April. Some historians likewise think that they were forbid, by a new order, to carry away either gold or precious stones, or any thing but a few cloaths, wine, and such other merchandize (B). If so, it is plain that order was not punctually executed, since they found means, we are told, to convey away thirty thousand millions of ducats<sup>f</sup>. The Spaniards tell us, that 70,000 families, or 800,000 persons, left the kingdom pursuant to this edict; and the Jews make them amount to 160,000 families, or 600,000 persons<sup>g</sup>, and even some of those who had been most in credit at court (among whom was the learned Abravanel, who had been a long while a favourite of the king and queen) (C), were obliged to embark for foreign countries; and none permitted to stay, but those who preferred Christianity to banishment, which were likewise very numerous.

The number of
them,

and grievous misery.

Learned men
banished.

THE misery of those who embarked is almost inexpressible. In some the vessels took fire, and they either perished in the flames, or were drowned; others were so loaded, that they bulged and sunk with them to the bottom. Others were shipwrecked on some foreign coasts, and either perished with hunger and cold, or were exposed to some new disasters. In some the plague began to rage, and they were set down at the next shore, where those that outlived it perished for want; others reached the city of Fez, where the inhabitants, being frightened at their vast number and misery, shut their gates against them; so that they were forced to spread tents in the fields, and to live upon such few herbs as that dry and barren ground afforded. And this might even pass for a mercy, in comparison of the insults and horrid hardships which they were forced to undergo from some barbarians there, who thought they might impunely commit any inhumanities against those unfortunate fugitives. The reader

<sup>f</sup> BASNAG. ubi sup. c. 25. §. 1.

<sup>g</sup> ABRAMAN. CARDOSO las Excellencias, &c.

(B) We are told that many of them who had courage enough to leave the country, found themselves obliged to stay and be sold for slaves for want of a few ducats, which every one that embarked was obliged to pay to the captain of the vessel; and to such a degree of strictness were the king's orders executed, that two vessels, loaded with Jewish families, not having been able to sail before the time prefixed, set them on shore again, where they were unmercifully seized and sold, and all their goods confiscated.

(C) We took notice lately that this learned rabbi pretended to be lineally descended from king David, and as such was in great esteem among his nation, as well for his learning, riches, and employment; notwithstanding which, he had been often forced to flee from one country to another. He appeared even from his younger years at the court of Alphonso king of Portugal, and was in great credit with him; but upon his death, not finding the same favour from his son and successor, John II. he privately retired into Castile, where Ferdinand and Isabella intrusted him with the care of their finances, which gave him an opportunity of getting an immense treasure in a short time.

Being obliged to leave Spain, with the rest of his nation, he embarked for Naples, where he soon recommended himself to the favour of the king, and did him considerable service. But that prince dying, and Charles VIII. having seized on that kingdom, he was forced to flee into Sicily, with Alphonso II. who had succeeded his father. His faithfulness to him, in the midst of his misfortunes, which had deprived him of his riches and crown, obliged him again, after his death, to leave that island, and sail to Corfu, and thence into Puglia; where having resided some time, he went and died at Venice. His corpse did not rest there, but was conveyed to Padua, and there interred.

He was no less esteemed for his learned works; and we may truly say that he is, of all the Jewish doctors, the most clear and useful for the right understanding of the sacred text. His style is pure, and easy to be understood; and only sometimes rather too swollen, and more like that of an orator than a commentator. He explains the literal sense of the sacred volumes, and learnedly handles those questions that fall in his way in those books he hath commented upon. He was moreover of a sweet and affable disposition, and lived in a friendly and familiar manner with the Christians. One fault however, is commonly found in his writings, that he frequently inveighs against them, particularly against the pope and his clergy; on which account some are of opinion that the Jews ought to be debarred from the reading of them (19).

Among other learned Jews that followed Abravanel's fate, were R. Isaac Ben Aruma, a great philosopher and cabbalist, whose exposition of the Mosaic law is highly esteemed by the Jews, though some critics (20) think it too diffuse, allegorical, and full of a moral altogether Jewish. He took with him his son R. Meir, one of the greatest rabbies of that age, and author of a comment upon Job, which Buxtorf hath attributed to his father.

Another was Joseph Gigatella, surnamed the divine Cabbalist; and Taumaturgus, who, during his exile, applied himself to the exposition of the divine Attributes and Names, and of the ten Sephiroth; that is, of the most mystical, and at the same time of the most admired, part of the Jewish theology.

Isaac Karo was another learned exile: he retired at first into Portugal, and thence to Jerusalem, but lost his children and books in his passage. He lived a perfect recluse there, and compiled his book of generations (or of the sons of Isaac, to comfort himself for the loss of his own) which is only a comment or clear solution of some doubtful questions on the Pentateuch, partly cabbalistical, and partly literal (21).

Abraham Zacchut flourished likewise about the same time. Bartolacci hath confounded him with Abraham the Jew, who translated an Arabic treatise on the virtue of remedies. Both of them were good astronomers, and published a perpetual almanac. Zacchut was a native of Salamanca, and taught at Saragossa; but being obliged to leave the country, pursuant to Ferdinand's edict, retired into Portugal, where king Emanuel made him his historiographer. And here it was that he compiled his famed book of Juchasin, or genealogies from the creation to the year of Christ 1590. We omit many more, for want of room; but these are the most celebrated ones that underwent this dreadful exile.

(19) De hoc, vid. Bartoloc. ubi sup. tom. iii. p. 857. Simon Critic. Ant. Test. lib. iii. c. 6. Basnag. ubi sup. c. 25. §. 4, &c. (20) Simon ubi sup. (21) Bartol. ubi sup. Wolf Bibl. Hæbr. N. 1266. p. 689, & seq.

- a may see some instances of it in the margin (D). All this while the king and queen were highly blamed by all sober Christians, not only for depopulating their dominions, but for running the risk of involving them in a civil war; for whatever precaution he might have taken against it, the resentment and despair of 800,000 subjects, so cruelly used, might, not unlikely, have defeated all his measures; and Abravanel had reason to extol their submission and fidelity for not opposing so severe and unjust a decree. What induced that monarch to it, whether avarice, and prospect of seizing upon their immense riches, or religion, and the notion of gaining heaven by the persecution of the enemies of Christ, or the hopes of ingratiating himself with his clergy, we leave to our readers to guess. However, he soon after received Ferdinand the title of Catholic for it, from pope Alexander VI. who probably laughed at his zeal, whilst filed Catholic.
- b himself received those fugitives which he had banished.

But a good part of them met with a much nearer refuge from John II. king of Portugal, Jews received who had already done him some great service (E); and though he did not love them, yet in Portugal found it his interest to receive them into his dominions; and though upon very hard conditions, upon hard conditions, yet such as they chose to submit to, rather than expose themselves to new misfortunes. His son and successor Emanuel, seemed indeed at first to pity them, but was soon induced to sacrifice them and the Moors to his interest, and the alliance he made with Ferdinand and Isabella. He accordingly banished both nations by an edict; and as he feared reprisals from the Moors, he suffered them to go with their effects; but doubly broke his promise to the Jews, first, The king's treachery to them, by detaining their children that were under 14 years of age, which piece of treachery drove them into such despair, that some of them killed themselves, and others, sacrificing their natural affection to religion, became the executioners of their own children: and secondly, by reducing the three ports, which he had assigned them to embark in to one; by which many of them were forced to make a kind of double journey, to take quite new measures, and exhaust their purses; to which we may add, the delay which was caused to their embarkation, which increased their poverty and misery. Those that had the good fortune at length to embark, were nevertheless obliged to bear very severe hardships and insults from the ship captains and seamen, even to the deflowering of their wives and daughters, or exacting large sums to preserve them from being so. Even among those that turned Christians, to avoid such a train of miseries as they saw before their eyes, many of them were very harshly used, from a too just mistrust of their sincerity, and a great number of them were massacred upon the first, though but slight, occasion that offered itself (F). All which seemed but too well encouraged by

(D) One of these wretches, we are told, ravished a Jewish virgin before her parents; and returned presently after and cut her throat, for fear she should have conceived, and should bring forth a Jew. A seaman seized on a number of Jewish children, who were gathering of cockles and other shell-fish on the shore, at low water, and brought them to his ship, where he gave them some bread; which brought many more thither, with whom he sailed away, and sold some of them to persons of quality, and the rest he made slaves of. The captain of a vessel that was transporting a number of them, took one day a resolution to murder them all, and thereby, as he pretended, revenge the death of Christ, whom they had crucified; upon which they represented to him that the blood which Christ had shed was for the sins of mankind, and did not want to be revenged; and that he did not desire the death, but salvation of the sinner. The brutish sailor, being somewhat softened by this reply, forbore indeed murdering them, but caused them to be stripped naked, and set down on the next shore; where part of them perished with hunger, others were torn in pieces by lions, that came out of a neighbouring cavern; and the rest were saved by the humanity of a master of a vessel, who seeing them in that dismal plight, took them in, and cut his sails to cover their nakedness. Those who sailed for Italy, being arrived at Genoa, found that country afflicted with a sore famine, which made all victuals exceedingly dear. The Genoese beholding them so macerated by sufferings, and destitute of money to buy food, met them in the streets, with bread in one hand, and a cross in the other, and gave the one to those that would worship the other, which temptation proved so powerful, that those poor famished wretches, who had had the courage to abandon their country, riches, &c. could not now be proof against it.

(E) That monarch had formerly sent some of them, particularly Abraham de Beja and Joseph Zapatero, to make new discoveries along the coasts of the Red Sea, of which they had made an exact and faithful report to him. They had likewise been assisting the Portuguese adventurers in the discovery of the East Indies; and could be made still more useful to him in other matters. However, as he privately hated them, he found means at once to satisfy his aversion and policy, by laying them under very severe conditions.

These were, that every person was to pay him eight crowns of gold for his protection; and that, at the end of a certain term by him prefixed, they should be obliged to quit his dominions, under the penalty of being made slaves. They complain, moreover, that he sent great numbers of them to the isles of los Ladrones, lately discovered, where they came to a miserable end; whilst the rest comforted themselves with the notion that God punished him for his severity to them, by the disasters which happened to him and his family (22).

(F) There was, it seems, in a church at Lisbon, a crucifix, the bloody wound of which was covered with a glass, out of which some fanciful devotees thought they saw an extraordinary light emanating, which made them cry out, a miracle! One of these converts having imprudently denied the fact, gave occasion to this bloody uproar, which lasted three days; during which, the zealots, headed by two Dominican friars, stirred up the populace, and massacred above 2000 of them. They broke into their houses, plundered and unmercifully butchered them, and snatched them even out of the churches, and from the foot of the altar; whilst the by the cruelty and treachery with which king Emanuel had used them. But though this a action of his hath been so highly applauded by some of his flatterers <sup>b</sup>, it hath been no less condemned by some of their more candid and equitable historians <sup>1</sup>.

An account of those that staid.

Their dissimulation.

The number and danger of them.

Some of their learned turn Jews again.

WE have now seen the Jews banished out of four kingdoms of Europe, viz. Great Britain, France, Spain, and Portugal; but before we pass into the eastern parts, it will be very proper to say something of those which still remain in the two last-mentioned kingdoms, in great numbers, though under the cloak and title of new Christians, and under the mask of zealous catholics, though in their hearts as firmly attached to Judaism, as those who make open profession of it where they are tolerated. It is indeed surprising to see how so impious a dissimulation hath been able to support and propagate itself through so many generations as it has done; so that the grandees of those two nations have in vain made new alliances, b changed their names, and have taken up ancient coats of arms; they are still known to be of Jewish extract, if not still Jews in their hearts. The monasteries and nunneries are full of them, and the greatest parts of their prebends, priests, inquisitors, and even bishops, are descended from the same stock <sup>k</sup>. This ought to make both clergy and laity tremble, to think that such ecclesiastics do only abuse and prophane their sacraments, and most solemn part of their worship and religion. And yet, Orobio, who relates the fact, was not only perfectly acquainted with those dissemblers, and had been himself of the number †, but gives pregnant proofs of what he says; insomuch that he mentions in the very synagogue of Amsterdam, Jews and Jewesses, which are brothers, sisters, or near relations to some of the best families in Spain and Portugal: as likewise others that have heretofore been friers and nuns of almost c every order, the Jesuits not excepted, who came thither to do penance and reparation for their former apostacy.

WE may add, that among those who being at length tired with such impious dissimulation, have returned to Judaism, several of them were men of great learning, and appear by their works to have been better versed in the Jewish law than in the gospel. Of that number was Joseph the son of Jehoshuab, who hath continued his chronology down to A. C. 1554. He was a Spaniard by birth, and perhaps the best historian that the Jewish nation hath had since the great Josephus. Such was also Joseph Ben Shevetb, or the son of the rod, another Spaniard, who hath written a collection of sundry necessary rules, for the right understanding of the Gemarrab. The last we shall name was the famed Isaac Cardoso, descended from some of the d false converts of Portugal, and became one of the first physicians in Castile, one of whose works we have often quoted in this chapter (G). For these reasons the inquisition always keeps a watchful eye over all those new Christians; and the least cause of suspicion given by them, is sufficient to bring the severest punishments upon them; and both Spaniards and Portuguese are still so superstitiously prejudiced against them, that there scarcely happens any public calamity, but they look upon them as the cause of it, and make them suffer for it, as they formerly did the professed Jews. Cardoso last-mentioned, hath given us a flagrant instance of it, which happened towards the beginning of the last century, when a Dominican, at the head of a numerous populace, on some suspicious pretence, fell upon those new converts, and plundered and massacred between four and five thousand of them <sup>1</sup>.

<sup>b</sup> LEQUIRA Nouvel. Hist. de Portug. lib. iv. p. 8.

<sup>1</sup> OSORIUS, lib. i. MARIAN. lib. xxvi. c. 13.

<sup>k</sup> Vide LIMBORG Collat. cum Judeo, p. 102.

† Ap. BASNAG. l. ix. c. 25. §. 11.

<sup>1</sup> CARDOSO las

Excellantias, sub an. 1605. p. 383.

magistracy, instead of suppressing, encouraged the butchery. At length the king himself put a stop to it, and upon full enquiry into the cause of it, condemned the two friers to be burnt, and the magistrates to be degraded. Some foreign authors have indeed pretended that these converts had been found celebrating their Passover after the Jewish manner; but Mariana's testimony (23) ought to be of more weight than that of Germans or strangers, who relates the fact as we have done. Though it must be owned, at the same time, that the greatest part of those who staid both in Spain and in Portugal, were rather dissemblers than sincere profelytes; and such must prove all conversions which are wrought by violent means.

(G) He wrote two treatises in Spanish, one on the usefulness of common and snow-water, and of drinking liquors hot or cold. The other on the then excellencies or prerogatives belonging to the Jewish nation, and which ought to be esteemed an honour to it, in spite of all the misfortunes and dispersions which have happened to them for the punishment of their sins. He therein observes, that God chose them for his peculiar people; that they alone are separated by him from all other nations; that they received the Sabbath and Circumcision from him; and that they were taught his law by men inspired by him. This work is followed by a kind of second part, which he styles Las Colonias de los Hebreos; wherein he confutes ten accusations which the Christians object against them. This last treatise was written after he had left Spain, and his name of Ferdi- nand, which he had received at his baptism, and retired to Venice and Verona, where he took that of Isaac, about the middle of the last century. He wrote likewise a treatise at Madrid, concerning fevers; and another of the origin and restoration of the world; both learned and curious in their kind (24). It is surprising that Bartolucci, who was so well versed in Jewish learning, and their writings, should have made no mention of the treatise de las Excellencias above-mentioned.

(23) Hist. de Reb. Spanic. lib. xxviii. tom. ii. c. 17. p. 593.
Wolf Bibl. Hæbr. N. 1265. p. 689.

(24) De hoc, vid. Basnag. ubi sup. c. 25. §. 18.

- a NOTWITHSTANDING all these cruel severities both on staunch Jews and false converts, they made once more a bold push for getting a fresh settlement in Spain, as soon as they heard that Charles V. was come to that crown. They sent some of the most considerable of their nation to him into Flanders, to represent to him, that they groaned under the yoke of a religion, which they had been forced to embrace, and were daily exposed to the rigorous prosecutions of the merciless tribunal of the inquisition: that they carried on with honour the whole commerce of the nation, and were the most useful and perhaps the most faithful subjects of the kingdom; on which account they trusted in his justice and goodness, that he would grant them the free exercise of their religion; and engaged, on that condition, to give him all the assistance they could, and to make him a present of 800,000 crowns in gold, in return for his kindness. They met with a very gracious reception from that monarch; and the council of Flanders was likewise of opinion, that he ought to accept of their offer, and grant their request. But cardinal Ximenes no sooner heard of this resolution, than he sent a courier with all speed to inform him, that it was not lawful for him to make a traffick of religion, and to barter the blood of Christ for money; and that the tribunal of the holy inquisition had been instituted for very good and wise ends; that he ought therefore to follow the steps of king Ferdinand the Catholic, who, in his greatest need, had refused the 600,000 crowns which those very Jews had offered to him for the liberty of continuing peaceably in his dominions: that those who had rejected Christ from reigning over them, were unworthy of the protection of a Christian prince. Our author adds <sup>m</sup>, that Charles yielded to these reasons, and preferred the wholesome council of the cardinal to the persuasions of his selfish ministers. This was their last effort; which proving so successful, they have had recourse ever since to dissimulation, and by pretending to a greater zeal than ordinary for a religion which they abhor, do for the most part pass unobserved, if not unsuspected.
- b a very gracious reception from that monarch; and the council of Flanders was likewise of opinion, that he ought to accept of their offer, and grant their request. But cardinal Ximenes no sooner heard of this resolution, than he sent a courier with all speed to inform him, that it was not lawful for him to make a traffick of religion, and to barter the blood of Christ for money; and that the tribunal of the holy inquisition had been instituted for very good and wise ends; that he ought therefore to follow the steps of king Ferdinand the Catholic, who, in his greatest need, had refused the 600,000 crowns which those very Jews had offered to him for the liberty of continuing peaceably in his dominions: that those who had rejected Christ from reigning over them, were unworthy of the protection of a Christian prince. Our author adds <sup>m</sup>, that Charles yielded to these reasons, and preferred the wholesome council of the cardinal to the persuasions of his selfish ministers. This was their last effort; which proving so successful, they have had recourse ever since to dissimulation, and by pretending to a greater zeal than ordinary for a religion which they abhor, do for the most part pass unobserved, if not unsuspected.
- c suasions of his selfish ministers. This was their last effort; which proving so successful, they have had recourse ever since to dissimulation, and by pretending to a greater zeal than ordinary for a religion which they abhor, do for the most part pass unobserved, if not unsuspected.

We need not here give an account of the inquisition's proceedings against such as are indicted for apostacy, nor of their dreadful punishment when found guilty. It will be sufficient to say, that in such cases they are delivered up to the secular power to be put to death, though with a strict and solemn charge not to shed their blood: to prevent which they are condemned to be burnt alive. The Jewish authors do bitterly complain that these severities are still continued in full rigour against them, at Cordoua, Lisbon, Coimbra, &c. and even in the East and West Indies; and for want of better reprisals, do in their return canonize all those sufferers for saints and martyrs, and embellish their sufferings with legends of miracles wrought in their favour, that is, either to save them from, or to revenge their deaths: the reader may see a specimen in the margin (H). In the mean time, in order to honour and perpetuate their memory, they have taken the method of writing martyrologies of them in some places <sup>n</sup>. A sketch of which may likewise be seen in the same note. But it is now time to pass over into the eastern parts.

We begin with those that were settled in Persia, Media, Armenia, under the Great Mogul, &c. where, to avoid the frequent breaking off the thread of their history, as well as the scarcity of materials, we shall continue their history thro' the 15th, 16th, and 17th centuries. They had hardly recovered themselves from the long and fatal disasters which they suffered during the wars of the great Timur Bekh † and his successors, during which those in Persia and Media were not only greatly attenuated and impoverished, but their academies, learning, and learned men, had totally disappeared (I), before they received a new mortification from the conqueror Ismael

<sup>m</sup> Vid. FLECHIER's Life of Cardinal Ximenes, lib. vi. p. 772. VIRNO popular. Judaico, p. 42. MENASSEH. Esperanza d'Iracl, p. 99. † See the history of that conqueror in vol. ii. p. 501, & seqq.

<sup>n</sup> At Amsterdam, vid. BARRIOS GOUVINHO popular. Judaico, p. 42. MENASSEH. Esperanza d'Iracl, p. 99. † See the history of that conqueror in vol. ii. p. 501, & seqq.

(H) Thus they tell us of one Sylva a physician, who had been kept a prisoner at Lima, during the space of 13 years, where he circumcised himself, forbore eating of flesh and drinking of wine, and became a perfect Nazarite, under the name of Heli Nazareno Indigno Siervo de Dios al. Sylva. Being at length condemned to the flames, he was no sooner flung into them, than a prodigious storm arose, which overturned the house in which he had received his sentence, to the great astonishment of the very Indians, who owned they never had seen any thing like it (25).

Another that was burnt in Portugal, beheld his chains fall off in the midst of the flames, and was no more seen; which made his executioners say that the devil had fetched him away: but the Jews believe that he was miraculously preserved.

One Sobremont, a physician at Lima, was there burnt alive, after an imprisonment of 22 years. Dom Lope de Vera, of a noble and Christian family, having studied sometime at Salamanca, turned Jew, and circumcised himself in prison, and gave himself the name of Judah the believer. He was likewise burnt alive at Valladolid, An. 1644, and died with such surprising constancy, that the chief of the inquisition was forced to own, that he had never seen such an ardent desire to die, such a firm assurance of salvation, and such an intrepidity, as he beheld in that young man, who died in the flower of his age (26). Thus they preserve their memory to posterity; and affirm, that God suffers these frequent executions, because he is willing to have such faithful witnesses of his unity in all ages and nations of the world.

(I) We are told, however, that one of the provinces of Cochemir was filled with Jews which had come thither ever since the time of Solomon, or of Shalmanezzer. Mr.

(25) Cardoso las Excellent. c. 10. p. 322. Basnag. lib. ix. c. 25 ad fin.

(26) Carta del Inquisidor Moscoso a la Condesa de Monterey. ap.

- Ishmael's conquests. A. C. 1500. Ishmael Sophi, chief of the family of the Persian kings, who reigned there ever since, till the late great revolution that drove them from the throne*. The Jews, who were very numerous in Media, where Ishmael had begun his conquests, were so surprised at his wonderful and swift success, that they began to look upon him as the Messiah; in which they seemed more-over confirmed, because he gave himself out to be a prophet sent by God to reform the Mohammedan religion. But that prince, who despised them in his heart, refused all their homages and proffered services, and treated them with greater severity than any of his subjects. He died in the year 1523, and was succeeded by his son Thabamasp, and he by Ishmael, a blind prince, and father of the famed Shâh Abbas, who became a great persecutor of them. The fact, as it is commonly related, being in some cases very improbable, may be seen in the margin (K). However, according to our author°, it did not take place till an. 1642, in the reign of Abbas II. who, having a more peaceable reign, began to search into the register of the palace, and, among others, found that of his father's contract with them, mentioned in the last note; and was so much more surprised at it, because Zabbathai Tzevi made then a great noise, and was looked upon by the Jews as the Messiah, who came to disengage them from it.
- A. C. 1666. ACCORDINGLY Abbas II. called a great council to deliberate on that important affair, where it was unanimously agreed, that the Jewish nation ought to be destroyed without delay; which encouraged so many cheats, who aimed at nothing but to oppress the rest of mankind. The order was accordingly issued out, both to the Persians and strangers, to butcher them without exception of age or sex, or of any but those that turned Moslems. The massacre began at Ispahan, the capital of the kingdom, and was carried on with the same severity in the provinces of Schiras, Ghelan, Hamadan, Ardan, and Tauris, where the Jews were killed, and lasted three years, or from A. C. 1663 to 1666, without intermission or pity; insomuch that there was not one of them left in all those provinces, where they had gained immense wealth. Some few found indeed means to flee into the Turkish dominions, and others into
- Jews rejected.
- Persecuted, A. C. 1577.
- Massacred at Ispahan, &c.

* De hoc, vide sup. vol. ii. p. 601, & seq.

° Hist. of the three impostors, p. 114.

Thevenot desired a correspondent of his there to enquire whether they had the holy scriptures, and whether they were the same with ours; but was answered, that if there had been any Jews there formerly, there were none of them left then, and that all those inhabitants were either Mohammedans or heathens (27). That author tells him, however, that there were some in China who still preserved the Old Testament, and had never heard of Jesus Christ. He mentions a Jesuit's relation concerning one part of that spacious empire, "Just upon entering it, and passing the mountain called Pire Pen-jale, where most of the inhabitants appeared to be Jews, both by their air and complexion, by their making use of the name of Moufa, or Moses, and a tradition they have, that Solomon came into that country, and caused that mountain to be cut across to make a conveyance for the waters. They add, that Moses died at Cochemir, and that his tomb was about a league from it; and, lastly, shew a small edifice, built on a high mountain, at some distance, which they say was built by Solomon, and was still called Solomon's throne." All which are too fabulous to deserve farther mention; though we readily own that many Jews may have passed into those parts, and may have easily settled themselves there*, as they are commonly given to traffick, and have many good physicians and astronomers among them; though some of them may, through length of time, and variety of changes, have so far forgot their religion, as to have adopted all these fables.

(K) Shâh Abbas having granted great privileges to all strangers to settle in his depopulated dominions, the Jews came in such shoals, and so soon engrossed the commerce and riches from the rest, that complaint was made of it to that prince.

But he being afraid lest his severity to them should make others retire from his dominions, found a lucky pretence to persecute them by the authority of the Koran; where it is said, that they were to embrace the

Muslim faith, 600 years after its publication; and would have destroyed them accordingly, on refusal, if the Mufti had not prevented it. However, their Chakhams, or doctors, were summoned, and closely examined concerning several parts of their religion; such as the abolition of their sacrifices, and other rites, at the coming of Isai (Jesus Christ), their refusing to believe in him, though the Koran speaks honourably of him, and what they thought of Mohammed and his book; and not being able to give satisfactory answers, had recourse to prayers for mercy, and to protestations that they only settled in his dominions with a design to serve him (28).

After several bitter reproaches, Abbas insisted that they should fix a time for the coming of their expected Messiah; and promised that they should be tolerated till then; and that, if he came accordingly, he and his successors would embrace his religion; but that if he did not, they should either turn Moslems, or suffer the loss of their lives, children, and effects: they had some time granted to make their answer; and, after mature deliberation, told the Shâh that the Messiah was to appear in 70 years, reckoning from the day on which they had been summoned before him; by which they at least procrastinated the threatened punishment till after his death. Abbas, who was avaricious as well as cruel, made them pay dear for their toleration, caused the agreement to be registered, and signed on both sides; and taxed the Jews at two millions of gold. Abbas died in the 63d year of his age (A. C. 1629)†; and 115 years elapsed from his reign, before the contract above-mentioned was thought on, the Persian kingdom being all that time distracted with wars against the Turks. Amurat IV. who, A. C. 1638, made himself master of Bagdad, found great numbers of Jews in it; but though he massacred the Persians, contrary to his promise, yet he shewed favour to the Jews, in hopes they would prove serviceable to him (29).

(27) Bernier Voyag. tom. ii.

* See before, vol. iii. p. 572, & seq.

† See before, vol. ii. p. 617, & seq.

(28) Hist. of the three impostors, p. 114. Kidder's Demonstration of the Messiah, part iii. c. 2. p. 435.

(29) Dom. Miguel de Barrios Hist. Univers. Judaic. p. 4. Basnag. lib. ix. c. 26. §. 9.

- a India; and many saved their lives, &c. by abjuring Judaism (L). But as he afterwards observed that most of those conversions were feigned and forced, it is not improbable that they might disgust him from proceeding farther, and induce him to restore to them the full liberty of their religion, as was the custom of the Persians to do to all strangers. And we read accordingly that they enjoyed it a long time after, that is, till one of the Shâh's ministers, either out of hatred to them, or with a design to enrich himself by their spoil, prevailed upon his master to persecute them afresh<sup>p</sup>. He spared neither fair nor violent means to gain his end, and even obtained an order from him to forbid the exercise of the Jewish religion, in order to make them turn Mohammedans. He caused them to be closely watched; and found upon the whole, that, whatever shew they might make of a change, they still continued in their old religion; which at length obliged him to let them still remain bad Jews, since he could not make them good Moslems. However, continues our author, those that are at Ispahan are very poor, and in small number, and are obliged to pay a sequin per head to the king, and to wear a piece of cloth on their breasts, of about two or three inches, and of a different colour, upon their upper garment, by way of distinction. It is plain moreover, from the traveller who was in those parts from an. 1663 to 1665, that is, some years before the time of the Jewish massacre, that, upon his coming thither, they enjoyed full liberty of conscience; since he adds, that the Persians thought it strange that one Eatemad Doulet should have taken it into his head some time before to oblige them to turn Mohammedans. Obtain liberty of conscience. Their sham conversions.
- b religion; which at length obliged him to let them still remain bad Jews, since he could not make them good Moslems. However, continues our author, those that are at Ispahan are very poor, and in small number, and are obliged to pay a sequin per head to the king, and to wear a piece of cloth on their breasts, of about two or three inches, and of a different colour, upon their upper garment, by way of distinction. It is plain moreover, from the traveller who was in those parts from an. 1663 to 1665, that is, some years before the time of the Jewish massacre, that, upon his coming thither, they enjoyed full liberty of conscience; since he adds, that the Persians thought it strange that one Eatemad Doulet should have taken it into his head some time before to oblige them to turn Mohammedans. Distinction of dress in Persia.
- c have a famed academy; and we are told, that there is a greater number of Jews in it than in Ispahan; but how the Levitical tribe, whether it be the descendants of those that staid in Babylon, or of those that returned with Ezra†, should have maintained itself there, and ingrossed the wine and glass trade (for that is what they are chiefly employed in), is not easy to guess. They are still more numerous at Lar, the metropolis of one of those provinces; and have a quarter peculiar to them at the foot of the mountain between the town and the castle; and extend themselves into the country, on the side of Ormuz and Bender Abassi, in order to get some part of the Indian trade into their hands, which was once carried on by their brethren, who were formerly very numerous in those parts (M). But to return to Persia, and the provinces depending on it. Tribe of Levi at Schiras. Jews at Lar, &c.
- d BAGHDAD, once the residence of the princes of the captivity, is so gradually dwindled, since its being taken by Amurat IV. an. 1638, that it hath not above 15,000 inhabitants; and among them a good number of Jews, who have their synagogue in it, and increase yearly by the concourse of pilgrims, who visit the tomb of Ezekiel formerly mentioned; but still they are hated by the Persians, and kept very poor, though they enjoy the free exercise of their religion. at Baghdad;

<sup>p</sup> THEVENOT, Voyag. Engl. part ii. lib. ii. c. 14. p. 110. & seq.

<sup>q</sup> THEVENOT, ubi sup. lib. iii. c. 4. p. 131.

† De his, vide Anc. Hist. vol. iv. p. 5.

(L) It is no less difficult to reconcile our author's chronology above-mentioned with the reign of Abbas I. than to reconcile the above contract with the character of that haughty monarch. He did not put his brother to death till an. 1586, 16 months after his father's death; and from his mounting the throne to the last year of this massacre (1666) could elapse but 80, instead of 115 years. Besides, he could not presently make such a treaty with the Jews, from the beginning of his reign; nor the Jews themselves be grown so wealthy in so short a time. So that the most that can be supposed to have elapsed between the one and the other, is about sixty or seventy years. Wherefore it is absurd to say the execution of the contract was suppressed for so long a time, either on account of this Turkish war, or of a toleration by virtue of this imaginary treaty with them: for who can imagine that so despotic a prince would treat with his slaves on such terms, and engage to be of their religion, if their promise about the Messiah proved true? It is therefore more likely that he at first persecuted them, to make as many proselytes of them as he could to his own religion; a piece of zeal which all the Moslem princes glory in; and, in case of recusancy, the confiscation of their riches might be no less powerful a motive to his avarice.

(M) There was a manifest difference made there between those who were born Indians, and had embraced Judaism, and those that were descended from Abraham. And the king of Portugal, who had banished them out of his kingdom, suffered them to live at Goa, and other places, where they were allowed the free exercise of their religion (30). But, at length, an impostor having appeared there, an. 1639, who was believed by them to be the Messiah; and whose fame had reached even to Portugal, where some of the Jewish converts betrayed their old leaven, in hopes of him, the inquisition took such care to suppress them, that they were all forced either to flee, or to turn Christians (31), in those eastern parts that were under him.

They were moreover accused there of sacrificing, like the Indians, to the devil, to prevent his hurting them; but, though that accusation may be false, they have learned from them the doctrine of transmigration, and set up for great foretellers of things to come; which they pretend to do by their cabbalistical art, and by the motions of the planets, which the Indians are highly pleased with.

(30) Mandesto's Voyage into India, lib. ii. p. 272.

(31) Basnag. ubi sup. c. 27. §. 14.

in Armenia; religion. They are said to live more peaceably in Armenia<sup>r</sup>, though their own writers allow a no such thing; but tell us, that those of Masca having accused them of killing a Christian, because he was seen to go into a Jewish house, and not to come out of it again, an information was immediately lodged against them; and the murder being confessed by the accused, they crucified some, and burnt others, not even sparing Abiob, a celebrated physician, whom they cast into the flames. Three days after the Christian appeared, the accusation was found to have been laid out of hatred to them, and the confession to have been extorted by torture. Complaint being made of it to Soliman II. the Armenian magistrates were forbidden from thenceforth to take cognisance of such criminal cases, and ordered to bring them before the sultan. This story, if true, which is taken from an anonymous writer who lived in Egypt, and is intituled, The sufferings of the Jews, shews plainly, that, if they live quietly among the Armenians, it is rather owing to the protection of the Porte, than to any good liking or conformity between them, hinted at by the author last quoted.

persecuted.

Their number in Media; THEY are still numerous in Media, whither they had been transplanted by Sennacherib†; but whether they kept footing there ever since, as they pretend, is hard to guess (N). However, they are said to have 100 families against 40 of Christians. They are not suffered to settle at Scamachia, a trading city on the Caspian sea; but the Tartars, who bring thither boys, girls, and horses, to sell, are obliged to tolerate, and intermix with them, for the sake of that commerce. They spread themselves as far as the foot of mount Caucasus; and we are told, that the prince of Mingrelia, as well as that of Imiretta, pretend to be descended from king David. The ancient monarchs of Georgia boasted the same extract; and the Cham of that country, among his other titles, takes that of a descendant from that Jewish king by his son Solomon<sup>s</sup>. They give indeed no solid proof of it, though there is a great mixture of Judaism among them; and there is the small city, situate at the foot of Caucasus, called Alakzike, in which they had formerly a synagogue built by the Georgians, but which the Turks have since taken from them<sup>c</sup>. This is the state of the Jews in Persia, Media, Armenia, and other provinces of this large part of the East. They have their synagogues, and are very numerous, since they are found in all the trading cities from Bassora and the Indies, quite to Mingrelia, Georgia, &c. But their tribes have long since been so confounded and blended, that they are no longer distinguished.

in Georgia, &c.

Trade. What is still worse, they are very poor and ignorant, and, for the most part, get a miserable living, by the lowest and meanest services in life; they have neither commerce nor correspondence with their brethren in the West, and hardly know any thing of them. But it is now time to see how they fare in other provinces of the East.

Poverty.

Why so few in Judea. AND here one would naturally expect that Judea, their once delightful country, should have a greater number of them than either Syria, Egypt, &c.; but, as all its noble streams of milk and honey have been long since dried up, their love for it hath cooled in proportion. It is indeed frequently visited by their devotees, who go thither in pilgrimage, as well as the Christians; but few of either sort care to settle in it, since they find it so difficult not only to grow rich, but even to get a tolerable subsistence in it.

The academy of Sapheta. SAPHETA, or, as the Jews commonly call it, Sephet, or rather Tzepbeth, a city in Galilee, is the most populous and the most noted that the Jews have in this province. It enjoys several advantages above the rest (O); and they are used with greater mildness than in any other part of the Ottoman empire<sup>u</sup>. A traveller of the last century affirms, that none but Jews were in it; but he was misinformed, having only rode by the foot of it<sup>w</sup>; for it hath about one-third Mohammedans, and the rest all Jews. It hath an academy which is still famous, and much resorted to, and hath had some learned professors in it; and, tho' the Jewish nation have for a good while lost their relish for learning, yet they send their children to be instructed in the Hebrew tongue; for it is their notion, that it can be no-where taught in its purity so well as there; and Sapheta is now become what Tiberias was once. The

Learned men.

<sup>r</sup> HERBERT'S Voy. into Persia, an. 1677. into Persia, p. 107, & seq. <sup>s</sup> Ibid. p. 168. CHOVE'S Voy. of the Levant, p. 342.

† Vide 2 Kings, c. xix. & seq.

<sup>c</sup> CHARDIN'S Voy.

<sup>u</sup> FULLER'S Pisgah sight, p. 111.

<sup>w</sup> STO-

(N) Whether Tauris be the ancient Ecbatane, or rather a new one near it, here is a considerable commerce carried on by the Jews. The same may be said of Chasbin, which some geographers believe to be the ancient Ragesh of Media, where the Jews had been transported, and where Gabael lived, whom Tobit had intrusted with his ten talents (32). It is still a rich trading place, and advantageously situated to link the commerce between

Hyrcania, Iberia, and Media, with the other parts of the empire; insomuch that it was made the capital of Persia, and the royal residence for the winter, by Thahamasp, and continued so till Abbas I. removed it to Ispahan *.

(O) It is situate in the tribe of Naphtali, about nine miles from Bethsaidah, and built on a mountain with three heads, and difficult of access, and consequently more free from the incursions of the plundering Arabs.

(32) Tobit iv. 20.

* De hac, vid. sup. vol. i. p. 443, & seq.

a reader may see in the margin an account of their most celebrated rabbies and professors (P). Rabbies. All that we need add, is, that there is not a city in Palestine where they have subsisted so long, and even to this day, and with so much credit and safety. They had likewise set up here a printing-house for Hebrew books, as they also had at Theſſalonica and Constantinople, which were afterwards suppressed by the Porte *.

THE Jews are still in much smaller numbers at Jerusalem, where there are reckoned only Few Jews at Jerusalem. about 100 families, who live mostly upon Mount Sion, and a few of them are employed in the customs, or by the governor, as secretaries and clerks; and all the rest are poor beggars, who live chiefly upon alms sent to them from their richer brethren in the East and West (Q). These * De his, vide MAITTAIR's Annal. Typogr. ORLANDI ORIG. della Stampa. PALMER's Hist. of Printing.

(P) It is plain, from Benjamin de Tudela's not mentioning it, that it must have been founded since he was in Judea, that is, since the twelfth century. Accordingly, we do not find any persons to have flourished in it till the latter end of the thirteenth. The first, and one of the most celebrated, was Moses, surnamed Cordovero and Cordubensis, from the city of Cordova, his native place, who left it, and retired to this city; and was perhaps one of the first founders of that academy. He was reckoned the most learned cabbalist that hath been since Simeon Joachides, formerly mentioned. He hath left a work in that kind, intituled, The garden of pomgranates (33); wherein the paradise or garden includes the four different senses of the Old Testament; the P is the literal, R the mystical, D the enigmatical, and S the hidden or concealed (34).

The next was Dominic of Jerusalem, who taught some time, and had been dubbed Rav, or doctor, in it, after he had finished his studies and lectures on the thalmud. But he was still more famed for his skill in physic; for which he was sent for to Constantinople, and became the sultan's physician. He lived till the beginning of the last century; and, having embraced Christianity, translated the New Testament into Hebrew, and answered some objections which the Jewish rabbies made against the martyrdom of St. Stephen. Mursus seems to mention two of the same name, both Jews by birth, both physicians to the sultan, and both new converts to Christianity; but, in all likelihood, they have been split into two without any reason (35).

But those who have done most credit to this academy, were, the learned Moses Trani and Joseph Caro, who presided in it about the middle of the 16th century. The former was a native of Trani, a city in Puglia, and taught here with such success, that he was stiled The light of Israel, the Sinaite of Mount Sinai, and the Rooter up of Mountains; because he takes off all the difficulties that occur in the law. His work is not a set of sermons, as Buxtorf hath imagined; for the title of it shews it to be a body of Jewish laws, wherein that author goes back to their fountain-head, and distinguishes between those penned by Moses, those which have been transmitted by oral tradition, and those which are only founded on the decisions of their Jewish doctors (36). Joseph Caro was a native of Spain, whence he retired into Galilee, where he died, an. 1575. He wrote so well on the rights of the Jewish nation, that he was called, The prodigy of the world (37).

Besides those doctors which were strangers, Sapheta was not without some others that were bred up in her bosom. Moses Alsheb was a native of it, and distinguished himself in the seventeenth century, not only by his eloquent sermons, but by his learned commentaries upon some part of the law. All the titles of his works are metaphorical. One is called, The eye of Moses; another, The rose of Sharon; a 3d, The lily of the valley; 4th, Good words; 5th, Comforting words; 6th, The portion of the lawgiver; 7th, Hundred gates; 8th, Moses's burden; 9th, The warrior's looking-glass; 10th, The voice of the weepers; 11th, The law of Moses; and some others of the like nature. He is much admired for aiming still at something new in his expositions of Scripture, and for his fondness for ancient writers above the moderns; and fairly relates their sentiments, even when they favour the Christians. He doth not, for instance, disguise that the Messiah was to be a man of sorrows, &c. (38). On the contrary, he proves it, by the three-fold distinction which the ancients have made of those afflictions; viz. 1. Of those which related to the patriarchs; 2. Those that related to the people of God; and, 3. Those that related to the Messiah. But he is not so exact and uniform in the application of these prophecies; seeing some of them he absurdly refers back quite to Moses, which plainly belong to Christ (39).

R. Samuel Oxida was likewise born at Sapheta, and was a celebrated preacher. He wrote a commentary on the Lamentations of Jeremy, which he stiles, The bread of tears. Moses Nagaira was another native of Galilee; though some make him a Portuguese, on account of his name. He likewise taught at Sapheta, and hath left a commentary on the Pentateuch, which is much esteemed by the Jews.

The last we shall mention was the famed R. Judah Jonah, a native of the place, and master of our Bartolucci, and who inspired him with the design of writing his Bibliotheca Rabbinica, so often quoted in this chapter. Judah Jonah was descended from a Spanish family, which retired into Tuscany upon the edict of king Ferdinand; and being thence again expelled by pope Pius V. passed into the East, and some of them to Sapheta, where Jonah was born. Here he finished his studies, and took the degree of doctor; and then came to Amsterdam, where he rendered himself famous for the judgment which he passed on the validity of a will in favour of a bastard son, which was afterwards ratified by 87 rabbies of Germany and Theſſalonica. He was afterwards chosen judge by the Jews of Hamburg; and soon after passed into Poland, where he turned Christian, and became jeweller to Sigismund III. He was afterwards sent by him to Constantinople, under pretence of buying precious stones, and was there seized as a spy; and would have lost his life, had not the Venetian ambassador redeemed him. He settled next at Rome, where he taught Bartolucci the Hebrew tongue; and is said to have had such a tenacious memory, that, if the thalmud had been lost, he could have recovered it. He died an. 1688 (40).

(Q) Nothing can be a greater proof of their extreme poverty, than the frequent deputations they send to

(33) See Canticles, chap. iv. ver. 13. (34) Bartoloc. ubi sup. tom. iv. p. 230. tom. ii. p. 282. (35) Nic. Mursi. Relazione della città de Constantinopoli, con. Riti, &c. del Ottomano Imperio, p. 34. Basn. ubi sup. c. xxviii. §. 4. (36) Bartol. tom. iv. p. 31. (37) Ibid. tom. iii. p. 819. Vid. Wolf, Basnag. (38) Isaiab liii. pass. Wolf, Bibl. Hæbr. N. 1523. p. 808, & seq. (39) R. M. Alsheb. In Isai. ex vers. Constant. l'Empereur præfat. & p. 232, 238, 240. Basnag. ubi sup. §. 6. p. 430. (40) Bartoloc. ubi sup. tom. iii. Wolf, Bibl. Hæbr. N. 720.

Their pretence for it. These have hammered out a strange excuse for their want of zeal, and their averfeness to a settle in that holy city. They tell us, that it is to be reduced to ashes at the coming of the Messiah, by a fire from heaven, which is to be immediately followed by a miraculous rain that shall extinguish it; to the end that the holy place may be purified by fire and water, from the pollutions which the Christians and Mohammedans have committed in it; their fear, therefore, of being involved in that dreadful conflagration, they tell you, is the motive that keeps them from dwelling near it. They would doubtless speak more sincerely, if they owned that the little traffick that is carried on there, the heavy imposts laid on them by the Turks, the extreme poverty which reigns among them that live in it, and the insults and mortifications they are exposed to from the Mohammedans, who have an equal, if not a greater, veneration for that city, and many fanons living in it, are the real discouragements that keep them b from settling there.

The true reason of it. THERE was the famed Rabbi Jaacob in this city at the time that Selim took it, at the beginning of the sixteenth century, who compiled a learned work, called The eye of Israel, which was a collection of the various expositions of the law which are found in the thalmud. Several doctors had already compiled all that concerns the questions of Jewish rights and rites; but Jaacob collected those that relate to the law, and are scattered in that large volume. He did not live to finish his design, but left it to his son Levi, who was no less learned than his father; and who completed, published, and prefaced it with lively tokens of sorrow for his father's untimely death. And it was on account of this work that a violent rupture happened among the contemplative professors of Sapheta, which lasted during Levi's whole life. But, c after his death, the jealousy which his learning had raised began to cool, his memory to be revered, and his book, which saved the reading of several large volumes, was received with great applause (R).

A rupture among the rabbies of Sapheta, A. C. 1538. WE read of another learned Jew of this city, whose avarice or ambition induced him to make such a fair profession of Christianity, that he, by degrees, raised himself to the dignity of patriarch of Jerusalem (S), after having gone through all the inferior ones with great applause. Not yet satisfied with his good fortune, he removed thence to Constantinople, in hopes of obtaining the patriarchate of it, which was then vacant; but being there seized with a dangerous sickness, which made him think himself near his end, he sent for several bishops, and a much greater number of Jewish doctors, to his bed-side, to whom he openly d declared, that he had always believed the Jewish religion to be the best; that he renounced his bishoprick of Jerusalem, in order to die in his old faith, which he had never forsaken but in word<sup>y</sup>, to the great astonishment of those that heard him; especially of all those whom he had so long deceived, in a church where the intention of the priest is declared necessary for the administering and efficacy of the sacraments.

Jews at Damascus; THE Jews in Syria are much more numerous and flourishing than in Judea. They have always had their synagogues, chakams, and learned men, at Damascus<sup>z</sup>. Besides which, they have got from the Christians a celebrated spot of ground, pretended to be that where Elijah the prophet called Elisha to be his servant<sup>a</sup>, and where they have reared a sumptuous synagogue instead of the church which the Christians had built. They have likewise a public e burying-ground near the city, which is only parted by an alley from that of the Christians<sup>b</sup>. They are no less numerous at Aleppo, which is the ancient Berea, and where they have stately synagogues, drive a considerable traffick, and signalize themselves in an uncommon manner on all public shows and festivals, especially on the birth of young princes, in order to ingratiate themselves with the Ottoman court, and with the governor of the place<sup>c</sup>.

<sup>y</sup> HILAR. Continuat. Phil. Cypr. Chron. Eccl. Græc. p. 497, & seq. Ap. BASNAG. ubi sup. c. 28. §. ult.
<sup>z</sup> THEVENOT's Voyage of the Levant, lib. i. tom. iv. p. 50. <sup>a</sup> 1 Kings xix. 19, & seq. <sup>b</sup> STOC-CHOV. Voy. of the Levant, p. 314. <sup>c</sup> Id. ibid. an. 1638.

make collections in other parts for their maintenance. It was upon this errand that Jaacob Tomerita passed thro' Franckfort, Germany, and Holland, an. 1684. His father was one of those, who, on his leaving of Portugal, had retired to a small town in Judea called Tomer, not far from Sapheta. The Jews there having deputed him to beg some relief from them for these parts; and it was upon his return thither that Mr. Ludolph sent some letters by him to the Samaritans of Mount Garizzim, to whom he was known.

(R) Leo de Modena, a learned Italian rabbi of the last century, afterwards gave that work the finishing stroke, by adding to it the sentiments of several learned rabbies that were wanting in it, and a table of the chief matters, for the more readily finding them. He intituled his additions, The house of Judah; and his table, The bread of the house of Judah; and published both an. 1635.

(S) As this patriarch was no friend to the Jesuits, it is still doubtful, whether he was really guilty of such enormous dissimulation, or whether they have not charged him with it only to tarnish his memory. It is not easy, at this distance, to come at the truth of it: however, supposing the fact true, he is not the only Jew by a great number that hath done so; witness what we have said of those in Spain and Portugal, who still follow this dissimulation, though they have not so much honesty as to confess it at their deaths.

2 It was in this city that the infamous Zabathai Tzevi, another false Messiah, was born; and, notwithstanding his mean extract and education (T), formed the design of setting up for the great deliverer of Israel. As this imposture exceeds any thing we have met with of that kind among the many false Messiahs that have appeared hitherto, both as to its circumstances and consequences, and is, notwithstanding, so little known, the reader will be glad, no doubt, of an account of what is most material in this whole transaction.

The false Messiah Zabathai Tzevi, A. C. 1666.

WE have seen in the last note both his extract, and the method he took to gain credit among those of his own nation, notwithstanding the strenuous opposition of the best and most learned of them. To make his character most conspicuous and agreeable to the predictions of the prophets, there was a necessity that it should be ushered in by an Eliab, or forerunner; and he made choice accordingly of a very noted Jew at Gaza, named Nathan Levi, or, according to others, Benjamin, a very fit person to promote his design; and who gave the more easily into it, because, according to the interpretation of the cabbalists on a passage of Daniel, the Messiah was to appear on or about the year 1675. His first step was to assemble all the Jews at Jerusalem, and to abolish the fast which was there celebrated in the month of June, because it was now inconsistent with the coming of the Messiah. After which, he shewed Tzevi to them, and told them, that he was the miraculous person who was to be their deliverer, and to destroy the Ottoman empire, on November following. He met, however, with fresh opposition from the wiser sort, who plainly foresaw, that this intended insurrection would go near to cause the ruin of their nation in that empire; upon which they pronounced him an impostor, anathematized, and condemned him to death; alleging, that he neither had the characteristics of a Messiah, nor Levi those of his forerunner (U).

His precursor shews him to them.

Condemned to death.

Tzevi, however, who found his party much more numerous than that of his opposers, caused them to assemble in the great synagogue of Smyrna, where he several times pronounced the name Jehovah, and made some few alterations in their liturgy; whilst the audience not only acknowledged his authority, but pretended to behold something divine in his person. A fresh sentence of anathema and death, pronounced against him by the rabbies, did not in the least intimidate him, because he knew that none would dare to put it in execution against him. He went however to the Kadi, whom his friends had found means to gain, and put himself under his protection; the giddy multitude giving out, that they had seen fire come out of his mouth like a pillar, which had obliged them to protect instead of putting him to death; upon which he was brought back in triumph, accompanied with shouts out of Psalm cxviii. ver. 16. The right hand of the LORD is exalted, &c.

Bribes the Kadi;

As he wanted now nothing but a throne to complete his character, he caused one to be raised for himself, from which he spoke to his subjects; and another for his queen, as he styled her. He gave them likewise a new set form of faith, which all the world was to receive as from the mouth of the Messiah. Some of those who opposed it were forced to save them-

erects his throne.

(T) Some make him a native of Smyrna, but more of Aleppo. He was a poulterer's son, and was scarcely come from school, before he began to preach in the streets and fields, even before the Turks, who only laugh'd at him, whilst his disciples highly admired him. He married a young Jewess in the twenty-fourth year of his age, and divorced her immediately after, without having touched her. He took a second, with whom he lived in abstinence, probably to dazzle the eyes of the multitude by his pretended love of chastity. He conversed so long with the writings of the prophets, that it is supposed in some measure to have turned his brains, by endeavouring to apply them to himself; insomuch that he fancied he could fly up into the air, and blamed his followers for not having perceived him mounted on the clouds. He also pretended to do other miracles by the power of the name Jehovah; for which some of the wiser sort summoned him before the synagogue, and condemned him to death. But, as they could not get any to execute their sentence, they contented themselves with banishing him.

He passed over to Theffalonica, a city where the Jews were very numerous, and which, consequently, appeared a very fit place to play his tricks in; but he was soon banished out of it, and from Athens and other Greek towns, and retired to Alexandria. He had by this time taken for his third wife a young Jewish woman that had been debauched, and whom her parents had left in Poland under the care of a Christian nobleman. Tzevi gave out, that the soul of her father, loosed from the body, had passed from Asia into Poland, to transport her stark naked into his house; and married her after she had travelled with him through Germany and Italy; and he found credit enough among those of his nation to have her looked upon as queen of his future empire. His brother, who was a tobacco-nist at Frankfort, left his shop to go to him, in hopes to get some of the best posts under him; and had the comfort to be added to the vast number of the fools he had already made. So well had the cheat hitherto succeeded thro' the credulity of the Jews.

(U) He was thereupon forced to leave Jerusalem, and to go to Smyrna and Constantinople, in which last he expected a plentiful harvest of disciples; but the Jews there had already been informed, by letters from the twenty-five rabbies, who had excommunicated him, of the sentence passed against him; in which they pronounced him an impious wretch, and that whoever killed him would do an acceptable service to God, and gain many souls to him. This obliged him to post away back to Smyrna, where his presence was necessary upon another account, viz. to receive four ambassadors sent him by his pretended precursor, to acknowledge him for the Messiah. This embassy imposed still more upon the people; insomuch that several of their doctors were caught by it: What added still more weight to it, was his affected humility, his frequent washings, his being the first at their synagogues; but especially his pathetic sermons to them there, which had such an effect upon them, that they could no longer resist acknowledging him for their king, and making suitable presents to him.

- Imposes on the Jews.* selves by flight; others, who had been incredulous till then, own themselves convinced, being either really so, or borne away by the torrent; and were industrious in applying to him the accomplishment of the divine oracles. When he found himself raised to this height of authority, he ordered the sultan's name to be erased out of the Jewish liturgy, and his own to be written in its stead. After which he began to dispense the high dignities of his future kingdom among his most staunch favourites, styling himself the king of kings of Israel, and his brother Joseph Tzevi king of kings of Judab. He embarked at length for Constantinople, in a small vessel, whilst the rest of his followers went thither by land, and was nine-and-thirty days at sea; by which time the Grand Signor, being informed of his coming, sent orders to his vizir Azem to apprehend him, and have him severely bastonadoed, which was accordingly done.
- His title.* THE Jews were not at all surprised at this accident, but began to recollect, that, according to Levi's prediction, the Messiah was to be concealed nine months, during which he was to be a great sufferer; so that they looked upon this misfortune as an accomplishment of that prediction. Tzevi, on the other hand, being asked why he had taken upon himself the title of king? answered, that it was done against his will, and to avoid the resentment of the Jews, who forced him to it. This answer obliged the vizir, who was then preparing for his departure into Candia, to use him more mildly, and to confine him in the *Dardanel*s, which was looked upon as a new miracle; and the Jews began to give out, that it was out of the sultan's power to put him to death, seeing he had not done it. There came, immediately after, a vast concourse of them to the *Dardanel*s, where having, by dint of presents, bribed the governor, they went and made much richer ones to their Messiah, who, being thereby greatly puffed up, gave orders to have his birth-day celebrated; and sent ambassadors to all the Jews, to declare to them, that he was the Messiah, and to acquaint them with the miracles which he pretended to have wrought, and was still to work. He gave at the same time a plenary indulgence to those that should go and offer their devotions at his mother's tomb; and the Jews, on their part, came in shoals to pay their homage to him in prison. Even those of the Portuguese synagogue at Amsterdam composed a form of prayer, which was to be used by those who went to Adrianople to see this pretended Messiah<sup>d</sup>. But, in the height of all his success, came one Nebemiah Cohen, a Polish Jew, to his very prison, to prove him an impostor; and, the more effectually to ruin him, turned Mohammedan, and revealed the whole mystery to the kaimakam. The mufti, being also acquainted with it, was highly exasperated that such a man should be suffered to live, who disgraced the Mohammedan religion by pretending to be the Messiah. Application was thereupon made to the sultan, who ordered the impostor to be brought to him at Adrianople, and that he should be pierced through with a sword or dart, to try whether he was invulnerable.
- Apprehended and bastonadored.* Tzevi, alarmed at this, found no other way to escape than by turning Mohammedan, by the advice, and after the example, of the sultan's physician, who had done so before. His wife turned likewise, and all the Jews hearing of it, were greatly surprised and disheartened. But his cabbalistical friends found means to keep up their hopes, by affirming, that the Messiah was to be for some time among the Turks, as Esther had formerly been with king Abasuerus; but all the wiser Jews were covered with shame at his apostacy and imposture (W). Nevertheless, such was the credulity of the greatest part of them, that, though Tzevi was afterwards beheaded by order of the Grand Signor, the generality of them believe him to be still alive, another impostor being since risen, as it were out of his tomb, who persuaded them, that that was the real Messiah, and that he should appear again in the world in a glorious manner. This new event being still more singular, and little known, we shall give it now to our readers, as it was communicated by Mr. Hochepied, the then consul at Smyrna, to the late Mr. Cuper, an. 1703, and by him to Mr. Basnage, author of the history of the Jews. The letter is to the following purport<sup>e</sup>:
- The blindness of his followers.* “ TZEVI being beheaded by order of the sultan, was in a manner forgot, when a Jew, named Daniel Israel, who had dwelt in that city (Smyrna) six or seven years, took it into his head to persuade his nation, that he is still alive, and concealed in some corner, where he is to continue about forty-five years: after which, said he, he will appear again, according to
- Confined in the Dardanel.* and is beheaded. Pretended to be still alive.
- Sends ambassadors to the Jews.*
- Opposed in his prison.*
- Brought to the sultan.*
- Turns Mohammedan;*
- A new impostor proclaims his second coming.*

<sup>d</sup> SIMON. Letters, tom. ii. p. 19. January 6th, 1703.

<sup>e</sup> Letter of Mr. HOCHÉPIED, cons. of Smyrn. to Mr. Cuper,

(W) This was, it seems, what gave birth to the book, or compiled. The three impostors mentioned by this intitled, The three impostors, different from another of we are speaking of, were, Zabathai Tzevi, Mahomed the same title, much talked of, but probably never seen Bey, alias John Cigala, and Padre Ottomano (41).

(41) Vide Basnag. ubi sup. lib. ix. c. 17. §. 15.

a “ Daniel’s prophecy, to this purpose <sup>f</sup>: And from the time that the daily sacrifice shall be taken away, and the abomination of the desolation set up, shall elapse one thousand two hundred and ninety days: blessed is he that watcheth and cometh to the 1335 days! when he shall appear and deliver his people. These days are prophetic years; the accomplishment of which he makes to fall precisely to the term of forty-five years after the death (or, as that new impostor words it, the retreat) of Zabathai Tzevi.

“ THIS Daniel,” continues the consul, “ is neither rabbi nor doctor, but one that reads <sup>Some surprising tricks per-</sup> the law in the synagogue, and uses divers artifices to deceive those that hear him; and it is <sup>formed by him.</sup> hard to guess by what means he doth them. Being seated at table, he pronounces these words in Hebrew with a loud voice, I have heard, and my entrails were troubled; and at once rises up with such velocity, that one would imagine he was carried off by some superior force. As he moves farther, one sees in the air behind him a globe of fire, which seems to follow all his motions, until he turns his face about towards the beholders; and as he tacks about, he is heard to pronounce these words, The Lord is king, the Lord is king, the Lord shall reign for ever and ever; at which time the fiery globe is seen to remove itself upon his breast, where the word Jehovah appears written upon it; but presently after disappears.”

THESE prodigies (with some other juggling and surprising tricks, which the above letter <sup>Great Jews</sup> mentions, but which we omit for brevity’s sake <sup>taken with</sup>) have astonished a great number of Jews, <sup>them.</sup> and, among them, the famed Abraham Michael Raphael Cardoso, who dwells in Candia. They will not believe Daniel to be a magician, but a real prophet, who acts by the power of God; and that, as he affirms it, Zabathai Tzevi is still alive, and wait with impatience for his appearing; and, in the mean time, celebrate the 26th of Kastew, or 18th of December, which is his birth-day, with great solemnity.

NEITHER the Christians nor the Kadi would have known any thing of this imposture, had <sup>The cheat discovered.</sup> there not happened a rupture among the Jews; for, to do the wiser sort of them justice, they strenuously opposed the impostor; so that of necessity the matter broke out, and was brought before that judge, to whom they offered a sum of 175 rixdollars, to cause him to be expelled the city, in order to wipe off themselves the shame of such a cheat. Daniel’s friends at the same time offered a much larger sum to save him; and, though these officers commonly turn the scale to the heaviest side, yet the Kadi, fearing lest he should be called to <sup>Kadi banishes him.</sup> an account for having protected one of Tzevi’s disciples, who was raising a man from the dead, whom the Porte had caused to be executed, actually banished him; and he continued some time at the small town of Cassaba, in the valley of Magnesia, near the river Ormus, and still pretended to return to Smyrna with all his followers; because the government of the Kadi was to expire within six months.

SINCE then, Mr. Cuper, willing to know how the matter was ended, received a letter <sup>The end of that imposture.</sup> from Mr. Heyman, minister of the Flemish church at Smyrna, which gave him an account, That the death of Cardoso, who maintained the impostor, and had been murdered by his son-in-law at Grand Cairo, had put a final end to the cheat; that the murderer fled into a Turkish mosque, and turned Moslem; but he doth not tell us what became of Daniel Israel. Cardoso was, it seems, a great admirer of Nostradamus’s predictions, which he had read at Salamanca, whilst he was a student there <sup>h</sup>. We need not here observe, from what has been related above, how numerous, powerful, and flourishing, they are in all these Turkish dominions; and indeed they have found means, though despised by all the Mohammedans, to make them- <sup>Jews carry on a great traffic.</sup> selves so useful to them, that there is hardly any traffick carried on without them, but especially with the Christians, with whom they scorn to deal without a Jewish go-between, or broker; and as the Turks are commonly honest and well-meaning, they seldom fail of being made the dupes of both, and the Jews of being well paid for their knavery: so that they would of course grow vastly rich, if the government did not load them with heavy taxes for the liberty they enjoy. But let us now pass on to those in Ethiopia, Egypt, and the rest of Africa, during these three last centuries.

WE begin with Ethiopia, where they live more peaceably, and more easily maintain them- <sup>Jews in Ethi-</sup> selves, by the conformity there is between their religion and customs and those of the Ethio- <sup>opia.</sup> pians (X), who boast themselves to be sprung from the same stock. Those that live here never <sup>f</sup> Chap. xii. ver. 11, 12.

Mr. Cuper, 29th Jan. 1707.

<sup>g</sup> See BASNAG. lib. ix. c. 27. §. 19, & seq.

<sup>h</sup> HEYMAN’S Let. to

(X) We shall have occasion to speak more fully of the religion of the Abyssinians in their history, and shall here content ourselves with observing, that they not only agree with the Jews in several customs, such as circumcision, strict observance of the Sabbath, and abstaining from swine’s flesh, but their kings boast themselves to be descended from those of the ancient Jews; and bear for their arms a lion holding a cross, with this motto; The Lion of Judah hath conquered. We find likewise their king David, in the letter he sent to pope Clement VII. taking

Their high situation.

Fidelity to king
Claude,
A. C. 1540.

Live independent from him.

Driven from their strong holds.

never received the thalmud, nor any of that heap of traditions under which their religion is buried in other places. Upon the inundation of the Saracens into that country, they went and sheltered themselves in Abyssinia, where they met with a very kind reception<sup>1</sup>; and they still pretend to be very numerous and powerful there, and to have been masters of some considerable kingdoms in it (Y). It is not easy to guess how early they were settled in this country; but if we may believe a modern traveller, who hath been in those parts, there were not any to be found in any part of Ethiopia, except upon a vast high and spacious mountain in the heart of it, and inaccessible on all sides but one, and that very rocky, difficult, and dangerous; and here it was that our author tells us they were seated<sup>k</sup>, the top of it having a most delicious plain, of vast extent, full of small brooks, fine fruits, and excellent pasturage, where they live in plenty of all things, without ever coming down, or having any communication with the inhabitants of Abyssinia. Here it was that Claude, the son of David, mentioned in the last note, being driven by his brother, and Goranba king of Adel, took refuge, and was received by the Jews with open arms, and defended by them with such bravery and faithfulness, against the forces of the latter, that they obliged them to retire, for which brave action they enjoyed his protection and friendship, after he had mounted the throne, during his whole reign.

OVIEDO, sent thither patriarch by pope Julius III. confirms their living only in such high and inaccessible mountains; and adds, that they had stripped the Christians of many tracts of land upon them. He adds, that the kings of Ethiopia cannot bring them into subjection, by reason of the difficulty of coming at them; so that they live in a manner independent, and form a kind of republic of their own. They still maintained themselves in the same independency towards the beginning of the last century; insomuch that they were sometimes dreaded by the Abyssinian kings, and were masters of near three provinces of theirs. Susneus al Soltan Saged, a bold and successful prince, who had gained several victories over the Gallas, or Gallani, and died afterwards, an. 1632, came at length against them with a powerful army, and attacked them on their inaccessible rocks, and forced them to dislodge thence, and to disperse themselves through the kingdom<sup>l</sup>. Upon which some of them retired quite up to the springs of the Nile, and among the Caffres; others are still in the province of Demba, where they apply themselves to the iron and woollen manufactures; which being odious to the Abyssinians, are left wholly to them, on condition that they shall furnish them with all the necessary implements of war. They have their synagogues and free exercise of religion, in which they make use of the thalmudic Hebrew, tho' they have not adopted that book. They are likewise very numerous at the court of the Abyssinian princes, insomuch, that an Arabian who had been there, told Mr. Ludolph that there were no less than 60,000 attending their taking the following titles upon him; David, beloved of God, the pillar of faith, sprung from the tribe of Judah, the son of David, the son of Solomon, the son of the pillar of Sion, and of the seed of Jaacob. Mr. Ludolph (42) doth indeed think, that that prince swelled those titles on this occasion above the common standard; but that doth not hinder their believing themselves to be descended from those Jewish monarchs.

<sup>1</sup> LUDOLPH'S Hist. Ethiop. l. ii. c. i. p. 32.

<sup>k</sup> JOH. DE CASTRO Sinus Arab. seu Maris Rubr. Itinerar. p. 491.

<sup>l</sup> PAULI V. Epist. ad Susneum. ap. Ludolph, Comm. ad Hist. Æthiop. p. 491.

(Y) An Arabian author, who has written a panegyric on the Ethiopians, tells us, that the massacre of all the inhabitants having been resolved on, they applied themselves to the Arabian king, and begged, that they might be treated like the people of the Scripture, which, in the Arabic stile, signifies the Jews. They are called by Mohammed, the people of the book, meaning the Old Testament (43); so that the Ethiopians only desired to have the same treatment with the Jews (44); which the Arabian prince granted to them, on condition they should wear a scar on their face, by way of distinction.

We pass by here the pretended embassy sent by the king of Ethiopia to pope Clement VII. mentioned by R. Gedaliah (45), and by Peritfol (46), of which a little swarthy Jewish rabbi was the chief, and came to beg his holiness's assistance; and that he would send his master cannon, bombs, and other ammunition, together with engineers, and other proper persons, to defend his kingdom against the incursions of the Arabs, and other bad neighbours; in return for which, the king his master was to send his holiness spices of all sorts from his country, and go and conquer the Holy Land, and put it under his government.

Peritfol says, that the pope granted him his request, and sent him home in a vessel loaded with cannon and other warlike engines, and a proper number of engineers. He adds, that, during his eight months stay at Rome, the cardinals and persons of distinction invited him, and offered to visit him, but that he refused both. He was wont to ride on a mule about the street, to observe all the curiosities of the place; and went so far one day as to ride a good way up into the church of St. Peter; and when he was bid to come down, he only answered, Do well, O God, unto Israel! The reader may see a fuller account of this embassy in the three authors last quoted, as well as a confutation of it in Bartolucci (47), and Basnage (48), which we omit for want of room; and, for the same reason, we shall pass by likewise all the fabulous stories about this country being the true Prester John's, and of the fabulation, or sabbatic river, which never flows during the Sabbath, and others of the like kind, which are foreign to the design of this chapter.

(42) Ludolph's Hist. Ethiop. l. ii. c. i. l. i. c. 2. p. 214. Basnag. l. ix. c. 39. §. 2.

(43) Koran, sur. iii. p. 38.

(44) Hottinger. Hist. Orient.

(45) Shalshaleth Hakkabala, sub A. C. 1524. (46) Peritfol Cosmog. c. xiv. p. 93, & seq. Vid. & Ludolph, ubi sup. & lib. iii. c. 9. comm. 5.

(47) Bibl.

(48) Hist. des Juifs. lib. ix. c. 29. §. 7, & seq.

a camp<sup>m</sup>. They trade with the Christians as well as the Ethiopians, and live in perfect friendship with them. Live quietly.

THOSE of Egypt were like to have undergone a more severe fate, when Achmed, governor of it, revolted against Soliman II. and laid a tax on them of 200 talents; and because they pleaded insolvency, and had brought but 15 talents into the treasury, gave orders that all who had not paid should be imprisoned<sup>n</sup>. But here Providence proved on their side, Achmed was seized and put to death, and tranquility restored to the city of Cairo, where they celebrated a feast in memory of their deliverance, and called it Nassimo, which signifies both a miracle, and the post on which Achmed's head was affixed<sup>o</sup>. That city was very full of Jews, most of them very rich merchants; but the liberty that was granted to their nation, invited the b rest to disperse themselves all over that country, where they exercised a great variety of trades, and carried on some considerable manufactures; and they pretend to have been there more numerous about this time than ever they were in Moses's days, but their number, we are assured, is since very much dwindled, they having hardly any settlements except at Cairo, and some of the maritime towns, but so far from having any in the country, that they were obliged to go disguised, whenever trade, or any other occasion, called them thither, to prevent being insulted or abused by peasants and common people<sup>p</sup>. Vast number. A. C. 1673. Lessened.

ABOUT the middle of the 16th century flourished the famed Moses Alefcar, or the red (Z), who wrote a learned defence of Maimonides, in which he confuted all that had been objected against that learned rabbi. R. Moses Alefcar, A. C. 1555.

c Most other known parts of Afric not only protect but encourage the Jewish nation; and they are the principal traders into the inland provinces, whence they bring not only slaves and gold dust, but abundance of other commodities, especially gums and physical drugs. The misfortune is, that they adulterate every thing that comes through their hands. And so rich some of them are, that it was by the bare spoil of one of them that Muley Archey, king of Taphilet, was enabled to seize on the province of Quiviana, and to dispossess his brother, then king of Morocco and Fez; in gratitude for which he granted the Jews all their former privileges, and made Josiah Ben Hamosheth, prince of that nation<sup>q</sup>. His brother Ishmael, who succeeded him, favoured them still more, and as an acknowledgement for the great services which he had received from Dom Joseph de Toledo, during his disgrace at Mequinez, not only made him one of the principal officers of his household, but sent him envoy into divers courts of Europe; and he was the person who concluded the peace with the United Provinces, an. 1684<sup>r</sup>. His son had all the same dignities confirmed to him. Jews in Afric. Rich and powerful.

THEY had likewise been a long while settled at Oran, and were intrusted in some of the highest places in that city, yet such was their fidelity to the Spaniards, notwithstanding the ill treatment they had received from them, that they were the people who betrayed it to them, if it was not rather their avarice, and the great sums with which cardinal Ximenes bought their perfidy. However that be, they have continued very faithful to them ever since; and when it was in great danger from their neighbours of being re-taken, the Jews resolved to lose their lives in its defence; and when the garrison threatened to revolt, at another time, for want of pay and provisions, they suppressed it by a timely supply of both. All this did not prevent their being banished from the place, an. 1669<sup>s</sup>, on what account is not easy to guess (A). Since which, they have not been able to get footing into it. Betray Oran to the Spaniards. Banished from it. A. C. 1669.

THEY have likewise been very numerous and flourishing in the province of Suz, which formerly depended on the kingdom of Morocco, but has been since dismembered from it. They had in the capital of that principality a very rich and sumptuous synagogue, which was served by several priests and officers. They had their judges and interpreters of the law, who were maintained at the charge of the people, and these get their living by traffick and labour. There are great numbers of them in the mountains of Morocco, who are employed in the iron manufacture, building, and other such laborious employments, to which the inhabitants are

<sup>m</sup> Ap. LUDOLPH, lib. ii. c. 7. lib. iv. c. 5. N. 12.

TZEMACH, sub. an.

general de Barrios. BASNAG. ubi sup. §. 17.

<sup>n</sup> SOLOM. BEN VIRG. p. 402.

<sup>p</sup> VANSLEB Relat. of Egypt. p. 15.

<sup>q</sup> Hist. of Taphilet.

<sup>o</sup> GANTZ

<sup>r</sup> Histor.

(Z) Supposed from that surname to be descended from the noble family de Rubeis in that country. He wrote some other small treatises, besides Maimonides's defence, against R. Shem Tob (49). Buxtorf mentions one of them intitled, Sepher Haggeulah, or, a Treatise on Redemption, which was more probably wrote by R. Moses Gerundensis (50).

(A) They do indeed accuse the marquis de las Voles to have used several artifices at court, to obtain this edict of banishment, in order to bestow on an ambitious favourite woman a post which had been of long date hereditary in a Jewish family: but could not that have been done with less bustle and injustice to all the rest?

(49) Gedaliah Shalsheleth, p. 63. Bartoloc. ubi sup. tom. iv. p. 59, & 61.

(50) Wolf, ubi sup. N.

Synagogues
re-built,
A. C. 1660.

Jews in Turkey and Constantinople.

Trade and privileges.

Capitation.

Poverty.

Bajazet
poisoned.
A. C. 1472.

Cyprus taken by Selim II
A. C. 1579

Printing set up at Constantinople,
A. C. 1576.

averse. But this doth not hinder others from trying their fortunes at court, and raising themselves to eminent posts. It was one of that nation, named Pacheco, who was sent ambassador to the United Provinces, and died at the Hague, an. 1604, and was buried there with great pomp. Some time after, their synagogues having been demolished in the kingdom of Fez, Muley Mohammed not only caused them to be rebuilt as soon as he came to the throne, but made one of that nation his high treasurer and prime minister <sup>a</sup>.

BUT of all other countries the Turkish dominions have the greatest number of, and favour them most, and Constantinople above all other places; insomuch that there is neither lord or merchant, Moslem or Christian, but hath one of them in pay, who is the chief steward of the household, makes all his bargains, takes care of affairs both at home and abroad; besides which, they are employed by the ambassadors, as well as the inhabitants, as couriers, in all their negotiations (B). We formerly took notice that they had their quarter in the suburb of Galata, called from thence the Jewry; but it hath been since removed to the sea-side, where they have their synagogue, houses, and shops, and have the privilege of selling of wine, of which they make a considerable gain, because theirs is preferred to that of the Armenians, on account of the Jewish law forbidding all mixtures; so that they reckon theirs the purest and best.
They carry on likewise a great commerce, and are brokers between the Turks and Christians, and lend money on usury, as they do in most other countries (C). For all these privileges they pay a capitation to the Porte; but instead of its being levied on them by the officer of the empire, they have agreed with him for a certain sum, which is brought to him by the chief of each synagogue, who lays it on them according to every man's worth, by which the poorer sort are relieved from too heavy imposts <sup>b</sup>.

NOTWITHSTANDING all this, they have a great many among them, whom extreme misery obliges to turn Moslems <sup>c</sup>, in which no other ceremony is required than an examination of the motives of their change, and their pronouncing the following words, La Illah Ilallah Moham- med Resoul Allah; that is, There is no other God but God, and Mohammed is his prophet (D); but for the generality, they are very thriving and in great credit. The Christians accuse one of them that was physician to Bajazet II. of having been bribed by his son Selim to poison him in his flight to Demoticha; which he had no sooner done, than Selim caused him to be put to death <sup>d</sup>. But neither Selim nor the Jew are charged by the Turks with that black deed; Bajazet's death being looked upon by them to have been natural. However that be, it was a Jew named Michses, who, out of spite to the Venetians, inspired Selim II. with the first notion of conquering the fair island of Cyprus; which he soon after did, and granted the Jewish nation very great privileges in it (E); and not long afterwards sent another Jew, called Solomon
Rephe, to Venice, to negotiate a peace with that republic.

THEY obtained soon after a much greater privilege from him, viz. that of setting up printing both in his metropolis and in Theffalonica, by which their books, especially the sacred ones, which were then very scarce and dear, came to be dispersed every-where, and were bought at such an easy rate, that people applied themselves more closely and universally to the study of them. The consequence was, that there appeared soon after several eminent rabbies, and chiefs of the synagogues there. Solomon the son of Japhe, who had left Germany to settle in that capital, read his expositions on the Jerusalem thalmud, and rendered it much <sup>e</sup>

<sup>a</sup> CARIO Marochens. Regn. Descript. p. 308—341.
HILL, THEVENOT, & al.
Bib. Orient. p. 104.

<sup>b</sup> SMITH Notitia vii. Eccles. p. 116. RICAUT, THEVENOT's Voyage into the Levant, lib. i. ch. 32.

<sup>c</sup> D'HERBELOT,

(B) They are accordingly distinguished by their dress into two different orders; those that belong to foreign princes, or to their ministers there, wear the livery of those they serve: the rest wear a high crown'd hat without a brim, with a bluish turban and slippers; which is no mark of ignominy to them, because every nation hath its particular distinction.

(C) A vast number of them are employed likewise as porters; but with this disadvantage, that they are forbid the use of knots, or of a bag filled with hay under their burdens, which is only allowed to the Turkish ones. And we are told of one of the former, who having met Mohammed IV. straying in a wood, (where he had been hunting, and must in all likelihood have staid all night) and conducted him to his capital, was bid to ask what reward he would have for his service; and only begged that he might be permitted the use of the Turkish knot; which was granted him as a singular favour.

(D) These words are esteemed so sacred among them that whoever pronounces them, must either turn Moslem or is condemned to the flames.

There is a common notion, that a Jew cannot be received into the Turkish mosk unless he first turn Christian, and is baptized; but that is a raillery rather than a truth. And as for circumcision, they never repeat it, because their old one is reckoned sufficient.

(E) Among other encomiums which Michses gave of that island to the Soltan, for which it was justly stiled Macaria, or the abode of the blessed, he commended its excellent wines; and Selim, who was very fond of that liquor, promised, in a drunken fit, to make him king of it. He did not, however, keep his word with him, but recompensed him in some other way; and gave such encouragement to those of his nation in that island, that they became very numerous and rich in it, and continue so to this day.

a easier and clearer by them (F). R. Gedaliah, another learned doctor, who boasted himself descended from king David, did likewise leave Lisbon, his native place, to settle there as a physician, and at the same time taught the rites of the Jewish nation. He became afterwards chief of the synagogue, and laboured much to re-unite the Caraites and rabbinites, but found both sides too stiff to yield; so that the former only took the advantage of their mutual conferences to print and publish several of their own books (G). The last of note we shall mention, is Mordecai, the son of Eliezer, who called himself the Constantinopolitan; though he commonly resided at Adrianople, and there expounded the grammar of Aben-Ezra, intituled, Jessod Morab, or, The Foundation of Fear (H).

There are some places indeed in Greece, out of which they have been expelled, particularly the city of Salona, whose inhabitants, Turks as well as Greeks, mortally hate them. The same may be said of Athens, where they had been fixed ever since the apostles time<sup>y</sup>, but are since forbid to settle in it: which may be perhaps owing to the Christians being by far more numerous there than the Turks, there being between 8 and 9000 of the former, and but about a fourth part of the latter in it<sup>z</sup>. But there are others, in which they are numerous and powerful; especially at Patras, where they have four synagogues, chuse their own judges from among themselves, and have a spacious burying-place on a neighbouring mountain, which at a distance looks like a large city (I). They are settled at Lepanto, Livadia, Corinth, and other cities of Greece, and live by their commerce; but that country is in so sad and desolate a condition, through the heavy taxes they are obliged to pay to the Porte, and its more ravenous officers, that they are for the most part very poor. They fare much better at Theffalonica, where we find them settled ever since the time of St. Paul, and have had a considerable academy for some centuries, as well as a printing-house; which last was since taken from them. Here flourished likewise several eminent rabbies, whose names and works the reader will find in the margin (K); and hither it is that the Jews do still send their children from Constantinople, and other parts, to be taught the Hebrew tongue.

We read of about 6000 being settled at Gallipoli, a city in the Thracian Chersonesus, near the mouth of the Propontis, and a much greater number at Prusia, on the Mysian coast, near Mount Olympus; there being reckoned near 12,000 living within the walls of it, whilst the Christians are forced to dwell in the suburbs<sup>a</sup>. They had formerly also a settlement at Rhodes, near one of the walls of the city, which was thence called the wall and quarter of the Jews<sup>b</sup>; but soon after the raising of the siege by the Turks, the master of the Rhodian knights proposed to their council the banishing of them; which was readily agreed to, not only out of

<sup>y</sup> Acts xvii. 17.<sup>z</sup> Sir G. WHEELER VOY. tom. i. p. 398.<sup>a</sup> Sir G. WHEELER, id. ib. p. 185.<sup>b</sup> SPON. VOY. tom. i. p. 209.

(F) He printed several other works, one of which he titled The beauty of the eyes; and another, The fair look, alluding to his surname of Japhe, which signifies fair or beautiful: the one contained a set of sermons, and the other an exposition of the Middrash Rabbah, or larger comment on the Pentateuch (1).

(G) Gedaliah likewise printed his treatise of Shibha Enajim, or seven eyes, alluding to Zachariah's vision (2); and some others which are not known. He must not, however, be confounded with a relation of his of the same name, of whom we shall speak in the sequel.

(H) There hath been since discovered another work of his; viz. a MS. comment on the Pentateuch, the expositions of which are so literal, that he hath been thought a Caraites; but whether he was really so or not, this work hath been much commended by a learned author, who had thoroughly examined it (3).

(I) This hill, it seems, is full of little houses, which serve for a repository for their dead; and have a kind of marble door, at which they are conveyed in, and whereon are the epitaphs of the dead, and of the family to which each doth belong.

(K) Among them was the famed R. Moses Abelda, whom Plantavitius mistook for a Sicilian (4), on account of his being stiled Salonichi, which is the name by which that city, and not Sicily, is called. He published several works there, particularly his Deraash Mosheh, or mystical expositions or sermons on the Pentateuch; and his Shabare Dimbab, or gates of tears; which is a moral treatise on the vanity and miseries of this life, written to comfort those of his nation under their frequent disasters (5); and some others of less note.

Here flourished likewise R. Joseph, the son of Levi, who taught in it, an. 1490, and published a treatise on the use of the Gemarrab. He was at once chief of the synagogue of Constantinople, and of this academy; and this last it was that the false Messiah Zabathai Tzevi, lately mentioned, chose for the scene of his imposture; not doubting but if he could impose on the doctors of so famed an academy, he should find it easy to do so on all the rest.

This was also the place where the apostate Victor Pardo retired from the university of Marpurg, where he had been professor; and, upon his turning Jew, on pretence that he could not believe the mystery of the Trinity, took the name of Moses Pardo, An. Ch. 1614. Being here grown very poor, he wrote a letter to his quondam friend Hertman, in which he told him, among other things, that all the bibles were sadly corrupted, except those of the original Hebrew, which he said he had closely studied since his coming to Salonichi. He moreover declared himself a firm adherent to the Jewish religion, which, he said, was allowed on all hands to be of divine original; whereas mankind was much divided about Christianity; and in that faith he died, though very poor and troubled in mind (6).

(1) Bartoloc. ubi sup. tom. iv. p. 395, &amp; 549.

(2) Zachar. 3 &amp; 9.

(3) Frey's Basileens. Excerpt.

Aaronis. Vid. Basnag. ubi sup. c. 30. §. 9.

(4) Plantavit. Bibl. Rab. p. 136.

(5) Wolf, ubi sup.

N. 1518. p. 804.

(6) Epist. Mos. Pardo, ap. Shud Compén. Hist. Jud. lib. iii. c. 1. Vid. Basnag. ubi sup. §. 13.

Rhodes retaken by the Turks,
A. C. 1652.

the whole island, but out of all the places under their dominions. It was likewise there a resolved, that the Jews not having the same natural right over their children that other parents have, they should baptise and educate them at the public charge, lest they in time should go out of the island, and return to their old religion. As for their parents, they were ordered to sell their effects, and depart within the space of forty days, but were forbid to go and settle in the Levant, lest they should serve as spies to the Porte. However, upon that island being re-taken by the Turks, the Jews returned and settled in it, and are used with greater mildness than the Christians<sup>c</sup>, who are obliged to leave their shops and warehouses at night, and go and lie in the suburbs, and villages adjacent, which the Jews are not. These, however, do not amount to above 200; but they are more numerous at Smyrna, where they are reckoned about 6000, and have a good number of synagogues<sup>d</sup>. Upon the whole, there is hardly any con- b siderable city or town in the Ottoman empire in which there are not some of them, though every-where oppressed by the Soltan's officers, in which they only fare as the rest of his subjects do.

Jews in Italy,
&c during the three last centuries.

Thus much may suffice for their history in the eastern parts, during the three last centuries; it is now time to return into Europe, and take a view of them through all those Christian states wherein they are still tolerated. But here we hope our readers will gladly permit us to be more brief than we have been, with respect to the sufferings and horrid persecutions they have been forced to undergo, especially during the 15th and 16th centuries, and beyond, on false accusations of crucifying Christian children, stealing consecrated wafers, to use them in their conjurations, and the various miracles by which their pretended crimes have been brought c to light, and exposed them to the barbarous fury of a zealous populace, and subjected them to such dreadful punishments, as can hardly be read without horror. These, we say, have been so frequent, and in so many parts of Europe, during this epocha, that a bare narrative of them would more than fill one of these volumes; for which reason we shall content ourselves with mentioning some of the most considerable instances of this zealous cruelty, and the year and place where they have happened, without descending into the many shocking particulars that attend them. As for matters of a different nature, and which we think worth a curious reader's notice, we shall gladly impart them to him, as they come in course.

Persecuted by pope John XXIII.
A. C. 1412.

We begin with Italy, where, though we have seen them hitherto protected and favoured for the most part by the popes, yet their writers open this 15th century with a dreadful perse- d cution, which the then warlike pontif John XXIII. raised by his several edicts against them; and not content to persecute them in his dominions, wrote a letter to the then queen regent of Spain, during the minority of her son John II. desiring her to act in concert with him; which she did accordingly, and with such severity, that she obliged 16,000 of them to renounce Judaism, whilst of those who persisted in it, one part were condemned to the flames and other cruel deaths, and the rest were massacred by the peasants in their flight, except some few who bought their lives by dint of money<sup>e</sup>. This calamity, however, proved but of short duration, at least in Italy; and the Jews had the pleasure soon after to hear that their persecutor was himself reduced to a more desperate state than they (L). Nicholas II. being come to the papal chair, began not only to comfort and protect those within his dominions, but to suppress e the inquisitors that plagued them. He likewise sent letters into Spain, to prevent their forcing them to abjure their religion; and as to those who did it with a good will, he affirmed that they had a right to be admitted into the public posts, from which the city of Toledo had unjustly excluded them, as hath been hinted before.

Protected by pope Nicholas
II.
A. C. 1447.

A new storm
against them,
A. C. 1472.

THEY had not enjoyed the fruits of that pontif's patronage many years, before a new storm arose against them from another quarter; but whether designedly or no, we will not affirm. Sextus IV. had been prevailed upon to canonize the little Simon, who had been murdered, or pretended to have been so, by the Jews (M), in the city of Trent, ever since the

<sup>c</sup> STOCHOVE. voy. of the Levant, p. 227. THEVENOT, ubi sup. tom. i.
<sup>e</sup> SOLOM BEN VIRG. p. 312.

<sup>d</sup> SMITH Sept. Eccl. notit.

(L) The dire change of fortune of that haughty pontif is elegantly set forth in the following distichs:

*Qui modo summus eram gaudens & nomine præsul
Tristis & abjectus nunc mea fata gemo.
Excelsus Soli nuper versabar in alto
Cunctaque gens pedibus oscula prona dabat;
Nunc ego pænarum fundo devolvor in imo,
Vultum deformem quemque videre piget.
Omnibus ex terris aurum mihi sponte ferebant;
Sed, nec Gaza juvat, nec quis amicus adest (7).*

(M) The Jews are accused of having murdered that youth, who was a tradesman's son, in a most cruel manner. They shew you still in that city a knife, a pair of pincers, and four large needles, with which they had let out his blood, and two silver tumblers, out of which they had drank it. The whole story of that butchery is painted at full length in one of the churches of that city, in a chapel dedicated to the little faint (8).

(7) Vid. Basn. lib. ix. c. 31. §. 1.

(8) Misson, ubi sup. Basnag. ubi sup.

a year 1276; but, for what reason may be better guessed than told, had not been fainted till now, that is, near 200 years after his pretended martyrdom. This at once revived the hatred and zeal of the people against them, not only in that city and bishopric, but in the territories of the city of Venice. The preachers, under pretence of some special miracle, excited them to such a degree, that they plundered and killed all the Jews that fell in their way; insomuch that the doge and the senate were obliged to interpose their authority, to suppress the disaster; and in their order to the magistrates of Padua, commanded them to be treated like their other subjects, and to prevent their being ill used by the populace; because the rumour spread at Trent appeared to them to be false, and artfully invented, for some ends which the senate did not care to dive into<sup>f</sup>. However, this did not hinder the less equitable magistrates of Trent from banishing them, though some time after they obtained leave to tarry there three days, because they drove a considerable commerce in that city. We learn since, that those three days were shortened into three hours, on account of their so strenuously defending the city of Buda against the Christians, in the last war with the Turks.

Senate of Venice's order, in their favour.

Banished out of Trent.

POPE Alexander VI. not only received those whom the kings of Spain and Portugal had banished, but observing that those that came to Rome met but with a sorry reception from their unnatural brethren there, (insomuch, that they must have perished with hunger and misery, if he had not assisted them) sent express orders to the rest to alter their conduct towards them, and to supply those poor refugees with means to settle themselves in his dominions, and threatened to banish them if they did not comply. To those that staid in his territories he gave the same privileges as the ancient Jews had enjoyed, and endeavoured to procure the same for the rest from the other states of Italy, which soon brought vast numbers thither (N). Another part went and settled in the kingdom of Naples<sup>g</sup>, where they met with such severe usage from the inquisitors, that the people mutinied, and the viceroy resolved to banish them all out of that kingdom, that he might be at once rid both of them and of the plague of those inquisitors. Charles V. soon after authorised his viceroy's conduct, by refusing to grant them any toleration either in that kingdom or in Sicily. And indeed his whole behaviour towards them shows that he really hated them, on account of some impostures he had found them guilty of, and which they seem too much to have deserved of him: the reader may see an instance or two in the margin (O). This did not however discourage one Ricci, a converted Jew, from

Some come to Naples, and are persecuted, A. C. 1510.

A. C. 1539;

Hated by Charles V. A. C. 1534.

<sup>f</sup> See the order of the doge Mocenigo, dated April 22, indiction viii. an. 1475, ap. CARDOSO's Las Excellencias, p. 27. MISSON's voyage into Italy.

<sup>g</sup> DACHERII Specil. tom. ix. p. 162.

(N) Among those whom that pontif's kindness had invited to Rome, was the learned R. Jochanan, a German, who had been lately settled at Constantinople, and became afterwards the master of the famed Picus of Mirandula, a prince who had already betrayed an extraordinary fondness for the cabbalistical writings (9), and was so confirmed in it by that Jew, that he is reported to have declared, that those who dived into them, dived in the true head spring; whereas those rivulets that had flowed thence into Greece, were no better than corrupt and stagnated waters. He likewise affirmed, that Ezra had caused certain cabbalistical books to be written, which he had then in his possession, and had purchased at a vast price, and which Sextus IV. had ordered to be translated into Latin.

Picus hath been much censured for his too great esteem of them; in answer to which he took God to witness (10) that he had found in them the mystery of the Trinity, and all the other mysteries of Christianity; so that there was not the least controversy or difference between them and the writings of St. Paul, or St. Jerom; but that he had by them converted a very learned cabbalist, named Dattilius. No wonder then that a prince of that character should prove so kind a friend and patron to the persecuted Jews.

About the same time one Bonis de Latis, a native of Provence, dedicated to pope Alexander VI. his treatise on the usefulness of an astronomical ring, which he had invented. He wrote it in tolerable good Latin, tho' he thought himself obliged to make an apology for it in the following distich prefixed to it.

*Parce, precor, quæ sunt rudibus errata Latino.
Lex Hæbreæ mihi est, lingua Latina minus* (11).

(O) One of them had, it seems, been so impudent before him, as to affirm himself to be the Messiah; and Charles being convinced that he was a cheat, had caused him to be burnt alive, an. 1534. This did not deter two others from attempting the like imposture; only they acted their parts with more caution. The one was originally a Jew, but had been brought up a Christian, and had already got some small employment at the court of Portugal, when the other named David Lemelein came thither from Rome, and resolved to make him act in concert with him. David gave himself out to be the chief of the army of Israel, and had done the same at Rome before Clement VII. and being arrived at Lisbon, persuaded the young convert to return to his Judaism, and gave him the name of Solomon Malcho.

He set him immediately upon studying the rabbinic writings; in which he made so swift a progress, that the Italian Jews affirmed, that some angel dictated his sermons. Not content with preaching, he compiled several curious treatises, which still added to his fame. All this while David distinguished himself by his long fasting, being sometimes six whole days without taking any sustenance; insomuch, that those who were witnesses of it, looked upon him as something more than human. Neither he nor Malcho, however, had dared to assume the title of Messiah, but contented themselves with that of his fore-runner. At length Malcho was imprudent enough to desire an audience of Charles V. then at Mantua, which he readily granted; but as soon as he was got out of his presence, that prince caused him to be arrested, and burnt alive; and David Lemelein was sent prisoner into Spain, and died there a few days after his confinement. Yet such was the stupidity of the Italian Jews, that they would not believe, for

(9) Ap. Manasse. de Fragilit. præfat.
MOD. HIST. VOL. V.

(10) Pic. Mirand. apolog. p. 82.
7 M

(11) Basnag. ubi sup. §. 4.
a good

from dedicating to that monarch his celebrated treatise on what he stiled celestial agriculture. a He was a physician in Germany, and a most profound cabbalist, and pretended to prove all the mysteries of Christianity from the cabbalah; but whoever reads that work, or his 50 theorems and expositions on the Sephiroths, &c. will own that they did not deserve those encomiums which some learned men have made on them (P); and that some of them, especially his dialogue on the apostles creed, are far below the dignity of a sound and reasoning divine<sup>h</sup>.

Jews powerful under Paul III. A. C. 1539. Opposed by cardinal Sadolet.

THE Jews were become so powerful under pope Paul III. that cardinal Sadolet, bishop of Carpentras (R), grew quite out of patience with them and their protector, against whom he bitterly inveighs, as being kinder to them than to the Christians, who lived amongst them as sheep amongst wolves. His letter, which was written to cardinal Farnese<sup>1</sup>, is full of the severest reflections against that pontif, and his partial fondness for those enemies of Christ; and that none could be raised either to civil or ecclesiastical dignities, but through their favour and interest, whilst he scrupled not to persecute the Lutherans, &c. He concludes with discovering the true motives of it, the great profit they helped to bring into his finances and treasury. This complaint, if it had not quite the desired effect, procured at least a redress of the most flagrant abuses; whilst those that were of a more profitable nature were palliated and winked at.

Thalmud burnt, A. C. 1554. 1582.

SOME time after this, pope Julius III. being of opinion that all the allegorical interpretations of the Gemarrab were dangerous<sup>k</sup>, caused the thalmud to be burnt; so that, according to the Jewish writers, all the Gemarrabs in Italy were destroyed<sup>l</sup>. And it was under the same pontif that one Joseph Tzarphati, a celebrated rabbi, after having taught a considerable time at Rome, embraced Christianity, and, in honour of that pope, took the surname de Monte (S), and proved that pontif, by the help of the Gemarrab, to have been mentioned in the sacred text. But of all the learned Jews that flourished at Rome about this time, Elias Levita, author of several excellent treatises, deserves the first rank. Some make him a native of Padua, and say that some of his relations were still settled at Rome, particularly Abraham Aschenazi, chief of that family, and one of the judges of the synagogue<sup>m</sup>; not considering that the word Aschenazi is the appellative which all the German Jews take from Alkenaz, the son of Gomer<sup>n</sup>, whom they suppose to have peopled Germany†, and is accordingly affirmed by others, with more probability, to have been born at the small town of Eysch, near Nuremberg<sup>o</sup>. Some d have likewise imagined that he turned Christian, because he was very conversant among them; but that is a mistake, for he died a Jew; and in one of his works gives God thanks that he was born one (T). However, he was a very moderate one, and free from that rancour and free

Elias Levita, his extract, learned works, &c.

<sup>h</sup> BASNAG. ubi sup. c. 31. §. 7, & seq.

<sup>1</sup> SADOLET, lib. xii. epist. 5 & 6.

<sup>k</sup> BULLAR. tom. i.

CONF. Paul IV. p. 19 & 24.

<sup>l</sup> GANTZ TZEMACH, p. 153.

<sup>m</sup> BARToloc. ubi sup. tom. i. p. 135.

<sup>n</sup> Genes. x. 3.

† Anc. Hist. vol. ii. p. 241, & seq.

<sup>o</sup> GENEBR. BUXTORF. WOLF, Bib. Rab.

Num. 249. p. 153.

a good while, but that he was still alive there, and that he came constantly once a week to pay a private visit to his wife, who was still in Italy (12).

(P) Erasmus, who was commonly as lavish of his praises as of his satires, and was intimately acquainted with him, cries him up to the skies, as a good philosopher, and profound divine: he knew him professor of philosophy in Pavia, and was charmed with him. But he still more admired the simplicity of his manners, which shewed him to be a guileless Israelite, who had no other pleasure or exercise but the study of the scriptures; on which account he was extremely solicitous to procure him some honourable employment, by the help of which he might make the best advantage of his talents (13).

But, besides what we have observed above of his writings, he displays but an indifferent judgment in the parallel he makes in his theorems of the writings of Dionysius the areopagite, and the book of Zohar, formerly mentioned, as well as by his unskilfulness in his chronology, and making those two authors to have been contemporaries, and to have lived about the time of the destruction of Jerusalem.

(R) This city [which is in the county of Avignon, and had been sold to the pope by Joan queen of Sicily] had ever since that time had a Jewish synagogue, as well as that of Avignon, and the Jews protected by those pontifs, have ever since then enjoyed the full liberty of their religion: only they are forced to live in a quarter by themselves, and to wear, the men yellow hats, and the women a yellow bit of silk or stuff on their upper head garment.

(S) He was born in France, but of Fezan extract; but finding that the Jewish learning flourished more at Rome, he removed thither, and expounded the thalmud both in the synagogue and in their academy. After his conversion he wrote a peaceful letter to the Jews there, an. 1582, in which he proved to them that the Messiah was really come, and was made soon after to preach both to them and to the new converts; but his defection had rendered him so odious to the former, that they complained of it to the cardinal Sirlet; upon which that employment was taken from him. He wrote afterwards a treatise, stiled, The confusion of the Jews, in which he pretended to prove that all the mysteries of Christianity are found in the Old Testament (14); but as it was not printed, an Italian writer, author of the Dialogo di fede, hath taken the liberty to plunder what he thought fit for his purpose out of it.

(T) Elias was no less unfortunate than learned; and this obliged him, having been totally ruined at Padua,

(12) Imbonat. Bibliot. Rabb. tom. v. Gantz Tzemach, sub an. 293. Shalsheleth, p. 45 & 48. Wolf, Eibl. Rab. N. 2004. p. 1076. Peritfol Itinerar. c. 14. p. 91, & seq. & al. (13) Erasmi epist. lib. i. epist. 37. p. 88. (14) Fabian Fiocchi. Bartoloc. Bibliot. Rabb. tom. iii. p. 818. Basnag. ubi sup. §. 12.

a gall against the Christians that one meets with in the writings of those of his nation. The rest of his character and works the reader may see in the last note. There flourished likewise at Rome a celebrated Jewess poetess, named Deborah, who began to make herself famous, by her poetic and other works, about the year 1560, and lived to the beginning of the 17th century<sup>p</sup>. She was wife to Joseph Ascariel, a learned rabbi, commonly known by the name of Ascarellus Romanus.

THE Jews fared much worse under Paul IV. who really hated them, and from the beginning of his pontificate issued out two severe bulls against them; by the first of which, every synagogue within his dominions was to pay ten crowns per an. for the instruction of the catechumens who were willing to embrace Christianity; and by the second they were obliged to wear, the men yellow hats, and the women yellow hoods, to live separate from the rest of the Christians, and to have their quarter shut up every night. They were moreover deprived of all society, places, merchandize, or commerce, with the Christians, except that of cloth-bro-
b wear, which was the only traffick allowed to them. They were limited to one synagogue in every city, and ordered to sell all their lands in six months; which so lowered the price of them, that they did not get the fifth part of their value, which yet amounted to 500,000 crowns<sup>q</sup>. He issued likewise an ordinance against their books; not indeed like that of his predecessor Julius III. who caused them all to be burnt in the lump; for this distinguished between those that contained blasphemies against Christ, and those which only taught or expounded the Jewish religion; the latter of which were tolerated, and the former flung into c the flames (U).

THE cardinal Charles de Boromeo, bishop of Milan, and since canonized, not only enacted several canons against them, in the first council he held in that metropolis, which were much of the same kind with those of Paul IV. above-mentioned, but desired all the Christian princes to do the same<sup>r</sup>; and all this in order to promote as much as possible their conversion. But when that city was taken and plundered, to teach Hebrew, to maintain himself and family, particularly to cardinal Gilles, who proved a generous patron to him. But, for this, his whole nation cried him down at a severe rate, some charging him with apostacy, and others with exposing the divine mysteries and oracles to the Christians; whereas, according to the words of the psalmist (16), he gave his laws unto Jacob, and his statutes unto Israel: he hath not done so to any nation, &c. they said, that they ought not to have instructed any strangers in that sacred language. And this might be the reason of his having been looked upon as a convert to Christianity, unless we will suppose this notion to have arisen from one of his grandsons, of the same name, having afterwards embraced Christianity, and become a Jesuit, under that of J. Baptista Elianus.

<sup>p</sup> GENEBR. BUXTORF, WOLF, Bibl. Rab. N. 465. p. 287.
<sup>r</sup> Concil. Mediolan. I. an. 1565. cap. 14.

<sup>q</sup> BASNAG. ubi supra, §. 17, & seq.

However that be, Elias easily disculpated himself from those slanders, partly in the preface to his book באור, Bachur, or The chosen, and partly in a poetical preface prefixed to another work of his, intituled, Massechet Hamassoreth, in which he owns that the narrowness of his circumstances had obliged him to teach the Hebrew tongue; but at the same time declares, that he never explained or betrayed any of the mysteries of the Jewish faith, no, not even the first verse of Genesis.

He was again reduced to such extreme poverty, by the plundering of Rome by the high constable of Bourbon, that, to use his own words, he had neither bread to eat, fire to warm himself, nor cloaths to cover his nakedness. This obliged him to retire to Venice, and thence into Germany, to seek his bread; but being by this time very old, and unable to bear the coldness of that country, he was forced to cross the Alps once more, and died in the 80th year of his age (17).

His chief works are as follows:

An exposition of Kimchi's grammar. His own grammar, or Bachur, divided into four parts or treatises: the first of which treats of the conjugations; the second of verbs regular and irregular; the third, of perfect names; and the fourth, of imperfect ones: with rules for the true pronunciation of the Hebrew tongue. His treatise on composition is another grammatical book. His Sepher Zichronoth, or book of remembrances; or a collection of Massoretic observations from ancient authors. His Tob Taham (Ps. cxix. 66.) or treatise on Hebrew accents. His Massoreth Hamassoreth, or critical art on the Hebrew text. His Meturgaman, or Chaldaic, targumic and rabbinic lexicon. His Pirke Eliahu, or grammatical rules in verse. His Shibre Luchoth, or breaking of the tables, a grammatic treatise on true reading, &c. His Thishby, or dictionary. Some other poetical performances, in praise of certain books and authors, with some others of inferior note, the reader may see a fuller account of, in the authors last quoted.

(U) They were likely to have fared much worse, on an information of 89 women converts from Judaism, who pretended to be possessed; and, upon being exorcised, answered, that the Jews had sent those devils into them out of spite and revenge. The pope, who hated them, and was no great divine, was, on hearing it, resolving to banish them all, when a Jesuit diverted him from it, by representing to him the absurdity of the accusation, and the necessity of making a stricter enquiry into it. The pretended demoniacs were accordingly ordered to be examined by scourging; and, upon receiving the first strokes, confessed that they had been drawn into this imposture by some courtiers, who hoped to enrich themselves by the spoils of the Jews, whether they were banished or put to death. Those courtiers were thereupon put to death that night; and the pontif, being informed of it, cried out, I might have been damned for unjustly putting the Jews to death, had not my good Jesuit prevented it. I will pray to God to convert them; but whilst I live will I never hate nor molest them as I have done. This story we have from an author (18) who lived pretty near this time, and who tells us he had it from his own brother, who was chaplain to cardinal Granville; and, if true, may be a good caution against giving too easy credit to such kinds of accusations against the Jews, as well as to the notion of possessions and witchcraft (19).

(16) Ps. cxlvii. 19, 20.
divers. lessons, tom. ii. lib. iii. c. 9.

(17) Vid. Basnag. ubi sup. Bartoloc. Wolf, ubi sup.

(19) Basnag. ubi sup. §. 18.

(18) Lewis Guion

that edict shews at the same time that they were become so numerous and powerful, as well as interspersed with the Christians, that there was some reason to fear them, not only at Milan, but in other places of Italy, unless they were confined to their own separate quarters, and interdicted as much as possible all kind of converse and dealings with the Christians.

Pius V.'s edict against them,
A. C. 1569.

POPE Pius V. was still more severe to them, not only laying them under the same harsh restrictions, but charging them in his bull against them with treachery and falshood; with encouraging theft, lewdness, and other vices; with dealing in magic, forcery, and fortune-telling, and with every thing that could render them odious to the Christians: on which account they were ordered to be banished out of all places of his dominions, excepting the cities of Rome and Ancona (W). Sextus V. acted with more frankness towards them, and fairly owned that the profit he reaped from them was the chief motive of his tolerating them. A certain rabbi named Meir, or Magin, of French extract, but who had resided some time at Venice, came about this time to Rome, and, being a man of learning and address, dedicated a book to him, with some verses in his commendation, and presently after petitioned him for the sole privilege of settling there a silk manufacture, pretending that he had an excellent secret for multiplying of silk-worms. Sextus not only granted his request, but revoked all bulls and edicts of his predecessors to the contrary; though confirmed by oath, or backed with sentence of excommunication. His view was to enrich himself by laying a good heavy tax on every pound of silk; though his granting the monopoly to him could not but prove prejudicial to all that dealt in that commodity.

Sextus V.'s
grant,
A. C. 1587.

Clement
VIII. his bull,
A. C. 1593.

CLEMENT VIII. confirmed the bull of Pius V. against them, by which they were banished out of the ecclesiastical states; but added the city of Avignon to those of Rome and Ancona, where they have been settled ever since, with full liberty of their religion. He gave much the same reason for his indulgence that his predecessor Pius had done, viz. the promoting their conversion. However, they did not make him a suitable acknowledgement for it, but, on the contrary, applied to him that prophecy of Zechariah, Smite the shepherd, and the sheep shall be scattered (X); which made Abraham Echelenfis tax them with horrid ingratitude, for cursing, like Shimei, a prince from whom they had received such singular favours. But it is time to take a view of them in other parts of Italy, where they had likewise very considerable settlements.

Jews at Venice.

THEY are tolerated in all the Venetian territories, and claim in part their protection from that republic, on account of some eminent services they did to it in the wars with the Turks, particularly at the siege of Candia. But they are still more numerous and flourishing in its capital, whither the great printer, Daniel Bomberg, came from Antwerp, and began for the first time to print Hebrew bibles; for the correcting of which he kept several, some say above 100, learned Jews in pay (Y). Bomberg was likewise desirous to print some good Hebrew grammar, and R. Abraham de Balnais was ordered to compile one accordingly; but dying before it was finished, it was afterwards completed by R. Calonymos, a learned Jew, then at Venice. Besides those two books, he printed a great number of other works of the Jewish rabbies, for which his memory is still dear to the learned world, especially to the Jews. Here likewise lived R. David, the son of Isaac de Pomis, who, in gratitude to this republic, wrote a book to prove that its laws were of divine original, and that God had promised by his prophet to

Hebrew bible printed,
A. C. 1511.

R. David de Pomis.

* De Judæis Conc. tom. xv. p. 333. ap. eund. ann. sub an. 1569.

† BULLAR, tom. ii. Pii V. Constitut. 80. SPOND.

‡ See his Privilege in BARTOLOC. Bibl. Rabb. tom. iv. p. 20. BASNAG. ubi sup.

§. 22. * LUZAT CARDOZO, ap. Basnag. ibid. c. 32. §. 1. † GANTZ TZEMACH, sub an. 1271. p. 151.

‡ Vid. MATTAIR. annal. Typogr. Orlandi. Orig. della Stampa. PALMER's History of Printing, &c.

(W) It is somewhat surprising, that if they were really guilty of those crimes, they should be suffered to stay in any place, much more in his capital; but that pontif had his reasons for it: tho' those he gives in his edict will hardly be deemed serious, viz. that he indulged them to live there, to put the people in mind of Christ's sufferings; that he might have a more watchful eye over them; that the sanctity of the place, and example of the Christians, might encourage their conversion, &c. But the true motive was, the promoting commerce with the eastern parts, and the great advantage accruing to the holy chamber from it.

(X) This prophecy (20) was variously applied by them; by some to the grand signor, under whom they lived a miserable life, as we have lately seen, and whose empire being destroyed, the Jews were to conquer the Holy Land, and afterwards the world. R. Solomon Jar-

chi applied it to the Roman emperors. But the famed Manasse Ben Israel hath fixed it upon the Roman pontif, who styles himself the great shephera, the head shepherd next to God, and his vicar upon earth. And it was this his comment on the prophet which filled Echelenfis with such indignation against them.

(Y) Felix Pratensis had the care of that impression of the bible, with the Chaldee paraphrase, and the commentaries of several learned rabbies, and dedicated it to pope Leo X. But the edition is far from being the best, through the difficulty of ranging the various Mafforetic readings in a right order. He printed a second, in which the inquisitors retrenched several things, which they thought injurious to Christianity; the preference is therefore given to a third in folio, printed an. 1548, at the head of which is a preface of R. Jacob Chajim, formerly mentioned.

- a preserve so holy a commonwealth. This learned rabbi boasted himself to be descended from some of those Jewish families whom Titus had transported from Jerusalem to Rome; and mentions two of his ancestors, viz. Isaac Rich, and Eliab Hak'odesh, or the saint, over the tombs of which two miraculous fires had been observed to shine during the space of seven nights. David must have been a prodigy of learning even from his infancy, if, as Bartolucci affirms<sup>a</sup>, he wrote his Tzemach David, the sprout or branch of David, but different from that often quoted in this chapter, at the age of seven years. But this is a mistake of that author (Z); and he only compiled it at his leisure, from a MS. dictionary in Hebrew, written by one of his ancestors, about the beginning of the 12th century, which he enriched with every thing valuable in those of rabbi Nathan, Elias Levita, and D. Kimchi; so that it hath all the Hebrew words, and all the rabbinic terms, in an alphabetical order, together with the Latin and Italian explanation of them.

- HERE flourished likewise R. Shimsha, since named Simeon Luzati, who published his So- R. Shimsha, crates, in which he shews that the greatest geniuses are weak, and apt to err, when they are not guided by revelation<sup>b</sup>. He published likewise another treatise on the present state of his nation, of which we shall have a more proper occasion to speak in the close of this chapter. R. Samuel Nachmiah, a native of Theffalonica, also settled in this metropolis; and with his son David, and some of his family, abjured Judaism, and took the name of Morefini. Samuel, to shew the sincerity of his conversion, wrote the book called Derek Emunah, or, The way to the faith, in Italian, wherein he shews the uselessness of the Jewish ceremonies; that the 613 precepts taken from the law† are observed by no Jew, and explodes all the sects and superstitions of the Jews. He retired to Rome, where he died in a good old age, an. 1613. R. Mordecai Korkos, who taught at Venice, and was a native of it, did an action no less bold and odious to those of his nation, in writing a treatise against the Cabbalah, and even against the ten Sephiroth, the most sublime part of it, which shews his excellent taste for true sound divinity, as well as his courage in exposing himself to the hatred, resentment, and anathema, of the cabbalistic tribe. For so high is their esteem of that science, that they look upon every such attempt against it as levelled against the fundamentals of religion, for which reason their doctors would not suffer it to be printed. R. Mordecai Korkos's book against the cabbalah, A. C. 1672. 1674.

- MUCH about the time that Bomberg set up his printing-house at Venice, some Jews, come from Spire in Germany, were doing the same at Soncino, a small town in the duchy of Milan, near the river Oglio, and began to print Hebrew books there, about the end of the 15th century; by which means many considerable manuscripts were preserved, which had lain so long buried in the dust, that they were scarcely legible. These printers exchanged the name of their family for that of the town of Soncino, and became celebrated under the name of Soncinates; and as they were the first that did their nation so great a service, they became very rich and famous. They spread themselves from that into other parts of Italy, and have had some learned men among them, particularly R. Asher, who was a native of that place, and descended from that family: the reader may see a list of the books they there published, in the authors quoted in the margin<sup>d</sup>. R. Jacob Tzephalon, born at Rome, an. 1630, where he had also taken his degree of doctor in physic, came and taught at Ferrara, and became one of the principal rabbies of the last century. The nearness of that city to Venice gave him an opportunity of printing several learned books, the chief of which may be seen in the margin (A). Jacob Tzephalon, A. C. 1490, & seq.

THE

<sup>a</sup> BARTOL. ubi sup. tom. ii. p. 40.
Anc. Hist. vol. i. p. 596, (C).
DI, PALMER, CHEVILIER, & al.

<sup>b</sup> FRA. PAULO, Histor. de gli Uscocchi.
<sup>c</sup> BARTOLOC. ubi sup. tom. iv. p. 404.

† De his, vid.
<sup>d</sup> MATTAIR, ORLANDI.

(Z) Bartolucci seems quite to have mistaken his meaning, where he tells us, that being at Bevagna (whither his father and he had retired from Spoletto, and having been plundered of all their effects on their journey, were reduced to the greatest poverty) he found the book of R. Nathan, and, having read it attentively, formed the design of abridging it. Some time after, the Meturgaman and Thibbby of Elias Levita being fallen into his hands, together with Kimchi's Roots, from all these he compiled his Tzemach, at his leisure, and called it by that name, because he wrote it by little and little; and it is plain that he did not publish it till the year 1587, that is, after some others of his works.

He was invited into several places where he practised physic with great success; but the bishop of Chiuffi caused the gates of that city to be shut up against him, though he was very much wanted there. He passed from thence to Rome, and thence to Venice, where he ended his days; and there, to comfort himself in some measure for the great misfortunes he had gone through, he wrote his Treatise on the miseries of human life; which he interspersed with some of the brightest texts in Ecclesiastes, and is rather a comment in Italian on that sacred book, with his notes upon it (21).

(A) The first was a book of precious prayers and meditations; in which there is in particular a long prayer, to be said by physicians when they go to visit their patients. It seems this good Jew thought it necessary to implore the blessing of heaven, before he went to prescribe to the sick; and did not, like the greatest

(21) Vid. Bartoloc. ubi sup. Wolf, Bibl. Rabb. N. 499. Basnag. ubi sup. &c.

R. Gedaliah. THE Jews had likewise a synagogue at Imola, where the celebrated R. Gedaliah, of Portuguese extract, was born, and wrote afterwards his genealogical work, stiled by him Shalsheleth Hakkabalab, or the Chain of the Cabbalah, often quoted in this chapter, which he wrote an. 1539, and is the only work of his that we know of that hath been printed, though he wrote above twenty more on other subjects (B). And though that work is very erroneous, both in its chronology and facts, and for the greater part taken from another of the same nature, yet is owned by Bartolucci, and others, to have been of great use to them; and is more especially so to those who are fond of the chain of oral tradition, and of the personal succession of its doctors. We refer our readers, for the rest of his works in manuscript, to the authors quoted below <sup>c</sup>.

R. Samuel of Modena. THE synagogue of Modena produced several learned men, particularly R. Samuel, who was chief of it, and published his judgments of Samuel, an. 1550; which is a collection of thal- mudic and rabbinic decisions, to which he hath added some of his own, which are much esteemed <sup>f</sup> (C). That of Padua had also a good number of great rabbies; and there the Jews received the title of doctors of physic, and are thereby authorized to practise it in all the dominions of the republic of Venice. They have there three synagogues, and about 800 Jews, and a very handsome Ghetto, or quarter, with three gates, which are shut up every night. Over one of them one reads an inscription, which begins with these words, Ne populo cælestis regni hæredi usus cum exhærede esset, &c. <sup>g</sup>; alluding to the words of Sarah to Abraham <sup>h</sup>. In this synagogue flourished the great R. Meir, who was chief of it. R. Joseph de Padua, so called from that city, his native place; R. Isaac Phea, author of the way to faith, a treatise which gained him great reputation; R. Menahem Rabba, whose sermons on the four seasons of the year have been since printed by his son: he was still alive in the beginning of the last century, 1605. <sup>c</sup>

A diffension at Mantua, A. C. 1460. THE synagogue and academy of Mantua have been long since famed; but a diffension having been unhappily raised between R. Messer Leone de Mantua and R. Koloa, the two chiefs there, towards the end of the 15th century, through their mutual ambition and jealousy, the Mantuan Jews divided themselves, and called the Christians to their help; and the dispute ran so high, that they came to take up arms one party against the other. Lewis de Gonzaga, then marquis of Mantua, strove in vain to pacify them; and was at length forced to take the most effectual means of suppressing the uproar, by banishing those two chiefs that had caused it. After which, both synagogue and academy resumed their ancient tranquillity, and were governed by several eminent chiefs and learned doctors, particularly by Mose Vecchio, or Moses the Elder, who gained a great reputation by his corrections on Alphez, and his commentators. The small city of Pesaro, in the duchy of Urbino, had likewise a synagogue of the Jews; till that duchy falling into the pope's hands, they were obliged to go out of it, by the pope's edict lately mentioned (D). They have, generally speaking, upheld themselves in most cities of Italy; and have had many learned rabbies during the foregoing century, the most celebrated of whom were those that follow: <sup>d</sup>

Leo de Modena's works. R. JEHUDAH ARIE, more commonly known by the name of Leo de Modena, the place of his nativity, as that of Leo (Lion) answered to his Hebrew name Arie. He was a learned man, though a professed enemy to the Christians, against whom he hath, out of his cabbalistical head, forged many dishonourable anagrams, and numerical devices and puns, not worthy his <sup>e</sup>

<sup>c</sup> BARTOLOCC. ubi sup. tom. i. p. 722, & seq. WOLF, ubi sup. N. 451. p. 277, & seq. <sup>f</sup> Id. ibid. N. 2137. <sup>g</sup> Misson's journey into Italy. <sup>h</sup> Conf. Gen. xxi. 10. & Galat. iv. 30.

part of those of his profession, depend wholly on the natural efficacy of the medicines.

He wrote some other works, one of which is called the light of Jacob; and another, the light of the preachers; a third he stiles the stage of life, which is a physical treatise of fevers, and diseases peculiar to every part of the human body, of their cures, of simple poisons, &c.

(B) He was the son of R. Joseph Jacobijah, who was forced to retire to Imola, upon the banishment of his nation out of Portugal. His family boasts itself descended in a direct line from Jesse, the father of Dawid, king of Israel. But, in his deducing this genealogy, he is grossly out in his chronology (22). He was a much better preacher, and published 180 sermons, which he dedicated to his son Moses, besides other works; an account of which may be seen in Wolf's Bibliotheca Rabbinica above-quoted.

(C) This book is by a mistake called the judgments of Solomon, by Mr. Basnage (23), and was published at Venice by Dan. Saneti, in folio, an. 1599 (24).

(D) Pesaro was the native place of R. Jechiel, who took his surname from it. He went thence to Florence; where having heard for some time the sermons of an inquisitor, he went thence to Rome, to abjure Judaism. Pope Gregory XIII. assisted at the numerous assembly, where he made his speech of recantation; and, at his coming down from the chair, received him with these words, Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord. He was baptized some days after, and became a preacher; and some of the Italian sermons which he preached against the Jews at Florence, where they were very numerous, were printed an. 1585 (25).

(22) De hoc, vid. Basnag. lib. ix. c. 32. §. 9. N. 2137. p. 1120.

(23) Ibid. §. 10.

(24) Vid. Wolf, ubi sup.

(25) Bartoloc. ex Schedis Magliakek, Bibl. Rabb. tom. iv. p. 564.

a learned pen<sup>i</sup>. But he hath given the world a treatise of the Ceremonies of the Jews, which is highly esteemed by the learned of all nations. His book, intituled, The mouth of the lion, is another useful work, wherein he hath judiciously collected and explained all the words used by the rabbies, which are neither altogether Hebrew nor altogether Chaldee; and hath endeavoured to fix the pronounciation of them so as to be understood by Jews of all nations (E). He was for a considerable time chief of the synagogue, and reckoned a good poet, both in Hebrew and Italian; and hath written several other treatises; and designed to have translated the Old Testament into Italian; but was forbidden to go on by the inquisitors; instead of which, he wrote his lexicon above-mentioned. He died at Venice, in the year 1654, being almost eighty years old<sup>k</sup>. His death.

b R. JEHUDAH AZAEL was no less famous for his sermons preached at Ferrara in the last century, infomuch that the Christians went also to hear him. He was the author of a cabbalistical treatise, intituled, The thrones of the house of David (F); and died at Ferrara, an. 1677<sup>l</sup>. About the same time flourished R. Jehoshua Menahem at Rome, where he was chief of the academy; and another famed doctor named Jaacob Dattillo Delli Piatelli, who was esteemed one of the best masters to breed up their youth in learning. Here was also, about the middle of the last century, one Nathaniel Tribotti, who wrote a treatise on womens bathing, wherein he advanced some propositions which raised a number of antagonists against him. The synagogue and academy of that city were at length obliged to interpose their authority, to prevent the multiplication of books on that subject, by declaring for Tribotti, and obliging the opposing doctors to submit to their decision<sup>m</sup>. Tribotti upheld by the synagogues,
A. C. 1644.

c THE Jews at Rome are reckoned to amount to between 12 and 15,000. They have nine synagogues, and an academy which they stile Tbalmud Thorab, the study of the law, and their learned professors in it; among whom was, about the latter end of the last century, the famed Joseph Kimchi. They seem to have a kind of superiority here over the rest of those in Italy; for they consult them in doubtful cases, and pay a singular regard to their decisions. They are governed in this city by their triumvirs, whom they stile Memmonim, or governors, who decide all quarrels and disputes between private men, and take care of the privileges granted to them by the popes. They are changed every year, lest they should abuse their authority; and live in such great friendship with the Christians, that they made no scruple to go into their synagogues in such numbers; that pope Innocent XI. was obliged to threaten them with excommunication, and to lay a fine of twenty crowns on every one that goes into them<sup>n</sup>. The Jews were heretofore wont to be employed by the popes, as we have had occasion to observe; but, as it was apt to give offence, it hath been since left off<sup>o</sup>. Jews numerous at Rome;

their government, &c.

Christian for-bidden their synagogues.

<sup>i</sup> De his, vid. BASNAG. ubi sup. c. 32. §. 15.

p. 412, & seq. <sup>l</sup> WOLF, ibid. N. 766. p. 452.

ROQUE'S Memoires de l'Eglise, lib. v. p. 605.

<sup>k</sup> Idem ibid. & seq. WOLF, Bibl. Hæbr. N. 692.

<sup>m</sup> Id. ibid. N. 1742. p. 928.

<sup>o</sup> NAUDEANA, p. 54.

<sup>n</sup> LA

(E) The Jews having no Italian version of the sacred books, caused a great confusion in the pronounciation of the Hebrew words, according to the different masters they had been taught by: to prevent which, our rabbi compiled this work in Italian, and added to it a grammar. Both were esteemed very useful, and bore a double impression; the last of which, viz. that of Padua, an. 1640, though very scarce, is reckoned the best.

There is a poetic piece, wrote by him in the fourteenth year of his age, which is much cried up; tho' it shews rather the patience and laboriousness, than the genius or judgment, of its author; and wherein he hath, with much hammering doubtless, so associated the Hebrew and Italian tongues, though so vastly different, that one finds in the former the same syllables that run in the Italian verses. One line will suffice to give an idea of it:

Cbi nasce muor. Oi me che pass. acerbo è. That is,
He that is born dies. Ah me, how bitter is that step!

Now those syllables are found in the following Hebrew words, though of a quite different signification;

Kinab scemor aimek ccpas aotzer ba.

There can be nothing said in favour of such a laborious piece, but its being written by such a juvenile hand.

His other works are, The captivity of Juda, or Pesbar dabar, the interpretation of words. His historical narrative of the passover in Italian, but in Hebrew characters. His Leb Arie, or Lion's heart, in Hebrew; which is a treatise on artificial memory, adapted to all sorts of learning. His Sod Jesharim, Secret of the righteous, a treatise of the secrets of nature. His Sur merah, Depart from evil, a dialogue between Eldad and Medad about the game of aice, wherein one defends and the other condemns it. His Tzemach Tzadik, or Branch of the righteous; a moral treatise, by way of fables and apologies; with some few others of less note (26).

(F) He is however shrewdly suspected to have stolen it from his father R. Eliezer, commonly called Leone del Bene, who taught also at Ferrara, and had compiled and intituled it, Hir David, The city of David (27). However that be, the book is divided, according to the cabbalistical cant, into ten houses, to each of which are assigned fifty doors; each chapter and section having its argument at the head, and at the end an index of the author's. It was printed at Verona, an. 1646 (28).

He wrote another book called Jehudah Mecokeki, Judah is my lawgiver, Ps. lx. 7. which consists partly of poetical pieces, and partly of epistles, both elegant in their kind.

(26) Wolf, ubi sup. N. 692, p. 412, & seq.

(27) Bartoloc. sub an.

(28) Wolf, ubi sup. N. 766. p. 452.

Innocent XI. a friend to the Jews, A. C. 1685. POPE Innocent IX. gave them several marks of his favour ; particularly when the Venetian general Morosini, after his successful war in the Morea, brought back a good number of Jewish and Christian captives, and gave liberty to the latter, but would have kept the former under slavery ; that pontif, being applied to by their brethren, who are there very numerous (G), ordered a congregation to take cognisance of their case, and censured the conduct of the Venetians ; whereupon these gave them their liberty, without suffering the pope's ministers to intermeddle farther in that matter <sup>p</sup>. The same pontif strove much to promote their conversion, and built seminaries for the maintenance of these new converts, hospitals for their sick, and caused sermons to be preached, to prove that the Messiah was come, and that Jesus Christ was that Messiah ; but little benefit was reaped from it ; because the Jews either absented from them, or only came to ridicule them, and sometimes committed shameful indecencies in the churches, where they were preached, though there were proper officers to punish them for it. As a farther encouragement to new converts, some cardinal, or great person, was commonly their godfather, and made them some handsome present after baptism ; they were dressed in white sattin, and carried about the city in a fine coach during a fortnight, to be seen and congratulated by the spectators ; after which they appeared in a common dress ; and, to prevent their apostatising, all that were found guilty of it were condemned to the flames †. But, after all these pains and cost, one sees plainly enough, that the far greater part still remain in their unbelief ; and as for those few converts they make, cardinal Barberini, who had bestowed great pains and sums towards that work, was forced to own, a little before his death, that such conversions were only feigned and insignificant <sup>q</sup>.

Means to promote their conversion prove ineffectual.

Their homage to the new popes.

It must be owned, however, notwithstanding their tenaciousness for their old religion, that they are not over scrupulous whenever their interest clashes with it ; since they oblige themselves to celebrate the inauguration of every new pontif, and to wait on him in the way to the Lateran church, to pay their homage to him. They endeavour, indeed, to disculpate themselves, by pretending, that they pay it to him only as a temporal prince ; but they cannot be ignorant that the inauguration of a pope is a mere act of religion, by which he is raised to the dignity of head of the church, and vicar of Christ upon earth. After all, it is hard to say who are most to blame ; the Jews for paying such an homage to the vicar or representative of Christ whom they abhor ; or the popes for exacting that homage to be paid to themselves, whilst they suffer them to refuse it to their divine master (H).

Jews in Piedmont.

THE Jews have been settled a long time at Turin, the capital of Piedmont, or Pignerot, and some other places of that principality, by an edict or grant, which secures to them a plenary liberty of conscience ; and, though they now-and-then meet with some disaster from the zealous populace, yet they live more quietly and friendly than in other places of Italy. They had indeed an accident happened to them, an. 1671, which was like to have been attended with some ill consequences (I), but was by some means compromised, for we have heard no more of it since <sup>r</sup>. And thus much shall suffice for the history of the Jews in Italy, down to the end of the last century. Those who desire to have a fuller account of their number, wealth, and the present state of their synagogues, may consult the tax of those that are in the ecclesiastical territories ; of which they reckon nine at Rome, nineteen in Campania, thirty-six in the Marcha D'Ancona, twelve in the patrimony of St. Peter, eleven at Bolonia, and thirteen in Romandiola ; for all which, besides what may be extorted from them by vexatious suits, they are obliged to pay a yearly tax of 700 crowns and upwards to the holy see <sup>s</sup> (K).

Total of their synagogues in Italy.

WE

<sup>p</sup> LA ROQUE, ubi sup.      † NAUDEANA. ones ceremonial. Rom. lib. i. sect. 2. p. 26.

<sup>q</sup> WAGENSEN's Tela Ignea præfat.      <sup>r</sup> Sancti-
<sup>s</sup> BASNAGE, ubi supra, c. 32. §. 25, & seq.

(G) They are reckoned to amount to about 2000 in that capital, where they enjoy full liberty of conscience, have their synagogues, academy, and burying-ground, with many handsome monuments, and pompous epitaphs (29).

(H) There is another ceremony performed at Rome, which, though they have no hand in it, is very mortifying to them. It is the custom of the pope and priests to pray for their conversion in all churches, on Good Friday ; in doing which, instead of kneeling, as they do at the rest of the prayers, they stand up whilst that collect is said, to testify their abhorrence of the indignities they offered to Christ on that day, in mocking him with their bended knees (30).

(I) A Jewish boy going by some water, a Christian boy took some of it, and threw it over his head, pronouncing the form of baptism over him ; whereupon the grand vicar of Turin, being informed of it, caused him to be taken from his parents, pretending he now belonged to the church (31). The doctors of Sorbon, and other universities, were consulted upon it, but differed in their opinion. At length the Jews appealed to the pope ; but we have not been able to learn how that pontif decided the matter.

(K) The reader may further consult the last will of Zachariah a Porto, a rich Jewish merchant of Urbino, who died at Florence, an. 1671, after he had compiled a concordance on the comments of the thalmud, which he

(29) La Roque's Memoirs, ubi sup. See also the Description of the city of Venice. parafr. p. 182. Cajetan. ordo Roman. xiv. p. 368, apud Basnage, ubi supra, c. 30, §. 23.

(30) Missal. Rom. Ferr. in
(31) Idem

<sup>a</sup> WE come now to speak of those of Germany, and the more northern regions, during the three last centuries, where they were very numerous, though much poorer than those of Italy, as well as worse treated by the priests and populace. The fifteenth century opened upon them with a very melancholy prospect. Great numbers had settled themselves in Thuringia and Misnia, where the Landgraves, whether through avarice or need, made them pay dear for the quiet and liberty they enjoyed, and were still exacting vast sums from them. Particularly at the very entrance of this century, such a large one was imposed on them as they refused to pay; upon which they were all arrested and imprisoned, and could not be discharged till they had complied<sup>1</sup>. They had, however, some learned men among them; particularly the famed R. Jacob Movilin, who was no less eminent for the number of his disciples, than <sup>Jews in Germany, Poland, &c., Oppressed, A. C. 1401.</sup> <sup>Learned men, A. C. 1427.</sup> <sup>b</sup> for his judicious answers which he wrote to the questions that had been proposed to him<sup>2</sup> (L). About this time the title of doctor came to be in vogue among the German rabbies; the occasion of which may be seen in the margin (M). And Movilin was one of the first who took it upon himself, instead of the old one of rabbi, which was become despicable.

THEY received soon after a new mortification from the council of Basil; which, finding them very numerous in that city and elsewhere, issued out a decree, by which all the prelates, where-ever any Jews were, should be obliged to have sermons preached against them, and oblige them to assist at them under severe penalties. They were likewise excluded from having any commerce with Christians, to be used for servants, nurses, farmers, or even physicians, or to have any houses near the churches, or towards the center of cities. They were farther <sup>c</sup> obliged to wear a different habit, by way of distinction; and condemned to lose whatever sums they lent on church-books, utensils, and ornaments<sup>3</sup> (N). All this struggle, however, produced little or no change in Germany; except that about twenty years after, Lewis X. duke of Bavaria, banished them out of his dominions, in spite of all remonstrances from them or their friends, as well as against his own interest. He even ordered them to march out of forty towns, and as many boroughs as they were settled in, at one and the same day and hour, confiscated all their goods, and built gaols, and other public edifices, in the places where they had lived<sup>4</sup>. <sup>Council of Basil's decree against them, A. C. 1434. Banished Bavaria, A. C. 1454.</sup> left at his death to the rabbies at Rome, and his library to the academy of it. He bequeathed moreover 24,000 piasters to his nation; one-fourth part of which was to be divided between the academies of Leghorn, Venice, Jerusalem, and of the Holy Land. The other 18,000 piasters were to be distributed to serve for dowry to the Jewish daughters of the synagogues of Rome, Ferrara, Ancona, Urbino, which was his native place, Pesaro, Cesano, Venice, Padua, Vercina, Rowigo, Florence, Siena, Pisa, Leghorn, Mantua, Modina, and Reggio; which shews how numerous they are still in Italy (32).

<sup>1</sup> BASNAGE, c. 33, §. 1. <sup>2</sup> GANTZ Tzemach, p. 147. <sup>3</sup> Confil. Basil. sess. 19. art. 5 & 6. c. 2. p. 547. <sup>4</sup> AVENTINE's Annal. Bojor. l. vii. p. 513. Status Europ. sub Frederick III. c. 32. apud FREHER's Hist. Germ. tom. vi. p. 79.

(L) It is supposed to be about this time that the famed concordance, intituled, Meir Nelib, or The Enlightener of the Way, was compiled. The learned are indeed divided about its genuine author, though it is universally allowed that his name was R. Nathan, who flourished soon after the beginning of this fifteenth century. However that be, Reuchlinus caused it to be printed; since which there have been several editions of that work; the most approved of which is that of Marias Calasio, a learned monk, who made some considerable additions to it, particularly a concordance of the books of Ezher and Daniel, and an explanation of several Cabalaic terms, and of whatever relates to the description of the places mentioned in Holy Writ.

Calasio died at Rome, an. 1602, and his book was printed, an. 1622 (†), but was become so scarce, that a new edition was greatly wished for by the learned; and this is what the Rev. Dr. Romain hath lately obliged them with, with very considerable improvements.

(M) There was about this time a strong dispute among the Jewish rabbies, concerning divorce; some young and unlearned fellows among them, having taken upon them to write these bills or instruments, had committed such faults in wording them, for want of being well versed in the Jewish rites, as rendered them null and ineffectual. To prevent which therefore, the old ones made an order, that none of those bills should be valid, but such as were drawn by persons that had been dubbed doctors. And in imitation of the Germans, who bestowed that title on theirs with great ceremony, they began likewise to use some formality in it: and hence is supposed that change to have been owing here, as those in Spain and Portugal had done by assuming that of Dom, instead of the worn-out one of Rabbi. Abrawanel, however, was not a little surprised to see the ceremony performed, and the title of Morena, or doctor or teacher, given to those men; but his wonder ceased, when he found the same done in Italy (33).

(N) The same council made likewise sundry regulations for the encouragement of new converts; such as their being allowed to enjoy all their wealth, except what they had got by usury, which they were obliged to refund to the owners or their heirs. They were likewise allowed to be chosen to offices and places in those cities where they received baptism; but, lest they should corrupt each other, as they often did, they were forbid to converse with each other frequently, to bury their dead after the Jewish manner, or to observe the sabbaths, or any other Jewish rites; and, if they complied with those orders, they were to be married into some of the richest Christian families; but, if they apostatized, they were to be turned over to the secular power, and punished with the utmost rigour (34).

(32) Idem ibid. c. ult. Wolf, Bibl. Hæb. N. 573. p. 358. (†) Vid. Imbonat. Bibl. Rabb. p. 156. (33) Basnage, ubi sup. c. 33, §. 3. (34) Concil. Basil. ubi sup.

Burnt at Mecklen-
burgh, A. C.
1492.

A. C. 1494.

Banished out of Nuremberg, A. C.
1499.

And Cologn.
Victor à Carbe's book against the Jews, A. C.
1509.

Pfeffer Corn's advice against the Jews, A.
C. 1509.

THERE was a dreadful execution made of thirty of them in Mecklenburgh, who were condemned to the flames, together with a priest, accused to have sold them an host, which they had pierced, and was found bloody. Some women and children being of the number of the condemned, a mother in despair killed two of her daughters with her own hands; and was going to kill a third, but she was snatched out of her hands to be made to undergo a severer fate <sup>y</sup>. Two years after, some others were accused at Tirnavo in Hungary, to have drank the blood of a Christian whom they had murdered. The accused were put to the torture, to find out whether the whole nation were not guilty of the crime; if not, perhaps to extort such a confession from them (O). However, those only were punished who had a hand in it <sup>z</sup>.
About five years after, those of Nuremberg, who were both numerous and wealthy, were all banished out of that city; and went and settled in a small town in the neighbourhood of it, <sup>b</sup> where they built a synagogue. The citizens laid several crimes to their charge, in order to palliate their severity to them; but the true motive seems to have been their wealth, which made them insolent, their great number, which made them appear dangerous, and their usuries, which helped to debauch their youth, and rendered them at length so odious, that they resolved to rid themselves of them (P).

Not long after the bishop of Cologn followed the example, and banished them out of his diocese; on which account one Victor à Carbe, who renounced Judaism to become a priest, wrote some books against them, wherein he highly complimented that prelate, for having thus happily plucked up the tares from among the wheat in the Lord's field, and cleared his bishoprick from them. He affirmed, at the same time, that Christians ought never to enter into disputes with the Jews, who are used to them from their infancy, but that they must be overcome by violence, or, as he words it, by the quiver and arrows (Q). <sup>c</sup>

SOME years after, another profelyte, named Pfeffer Corn, kindled a war among the learned of this century, by endeavouring to persuade the emperor Maximilian, that all the Jewish books ought to be burned; because they were full of fables, lies, and blasphemies, against Christ. He had written, some years before, a book on the manner of the Jews celebrating

<sup>y</sup> NAUCLER. Chronogr. gener. tom. ii. p. 1110.

<sup>z</sup> See WOLF, ubi supra, N. 1145. p. 641.

(O) Nothing more plainly shews the falshood of those murders, than the reasons which that writer and others give for their committing them; and which, for that reason, we shall here subjoin, that our readers may judge of one by the other (35): he tells us, 1. That human blood hath a peculiar virtue for healing and consolidating the scar of circumcision. 2. That they have a fluor sanguis, like the women: some say every Friday, others, every moon, which was inflicted on them on account of their shedding that of Christ's; and that a dose of it gives those in this way great relief. 3. That it is likewise of singular efficacy to excite love, and promote conception: and, 4. That they are bound by a vow, in all parts of the world, to sacrifice a Christian, to wipe off the infamy they are under: which sacrifice they call, Joel, or Coming from God; or, perhaps, rather Goel, Redeemer, in derision of Christ the redeemer of the world (36).

(P) Another motive for their banishment might be the appearing of the impostor David Leimleiri, about this time. He did not, indeed, declare himself the Messiah, but assured them with such confidence that he was to appear in the year 1500, that the credulous Jews were even prevailed upon to pull down their ovens, in which they used to bake their unleavened bread, which were now become useless, since they were to eat it on the next year at Jerusalem (37).

As they were preparing themselves for the voyage,
David, who perceived that he had set too short a time for their pretended deliverance, was obliged to declare, that the sins of the nation had retarded the coming of the Messiah; which set them all on fasting, and praying to God to hasten that happy time. All these things were sufficient to alarm the jealous Nurembergers fears, lest they should hatch some other design against them; and they were not the only ones that took that method to rid themselves of them, as we shall see presently.

(Q) Bartolacci mentions four books written by him on that subject; and Mr. Basnage and Dr. Wolf a fifth, intitled, The manners of the Jews; of which the former gives an extract, to which we refer the reader (38).
There is still an inscription to be seen over the church of St. Ursula, at Cologn, importing, That "Victor, formerly a Jew, wrote four books against the errors of the Jews, an. 1509." He was fifty years of age when he turned Christian; and it is from him that we learn, that the Jews had been persecuted in that diocese, about the beginning of the fifteenth century.

About the same time flourished, in the neighbourhood of that city, the great R. Simeon, an eloquent preacher, and author of that famed book Talkut (Pouch); which is a judicious collection of such interpretations of the ancient Jewish doctors on the sacred books, as were the best and easiest to be understood. It was presently printed at Theffalonica. Soon after which one Abraham, another rabbi of the family of the learned Gedaliah, who had retired to Jerusalem, wrote a long comment upon the Pouch; and, not being able to pay the charges of printing it, one Dias Mokato, a rich Spanish Jew, defrayed them; and the Pouch was printed with his notes at Leghorn, an. 1658; the corrector of it, named Abraham Ben Solomon Chajim, dedicating it to duke Ferdinand II.

There hath been since a new edition of it printed at Amsterdam, an. 1678, with the title of Talkut Chadaish, or, The new Pouch; wherein the anonymous editor hath digested all the literal and mystical interpretations in an alphabetical order: whereas that of R. Simeon followed the order of the sacred books, and only took in the allegorical sense. There is still a third Pouch, written by R. Reuben, and printed also at Amsterdam, an. 1700, which is only a collection of notes on the pentateuch (39).

(35) Bonifin. rerum Hungaric. d. cad. iv. lib. v.

p. 217. Basnage, ubi supra, §. 7.

Wolf, ubi supra, N. 565. p. 355.

(37) Idem ibid. §. 9.

(39) Idem ibid. §. 11.

(36) Spondan. Annal. sub A. C. 1494. N. 10.

(38) Basnage, ubi supra, §. 10. vid. & a the passover, wherein he charged them with heresy, and to be apostates from the Old, and enemies to the New, Testament. In another book, intituled, The enemy of the Jews, he discovered all their usuries and imprecations against the Christians; by which means he had drawn so many divines to his opinion, that that monarch was almost inclined to grant his petition. However, being willing to hear both sides, the famed Campnion, or Reuchlinus, a man well versed in all the Jewish and other learning, and who had been employed in several important matters, opposed it; and alleged, that such only ought to be burnt, as contained any blasphemies against Christ (R). But declared against doing the same by those which only treated of the tenets, morals, and rites of the Jews. He likewise rightly observed the impossibility there was of suppressing books, by an imperial decree, which were dispersed all over the world, and which might be easily reprinted in any other part.

Reuchlinus pleads against burning their books.

The prosecutions which this equitable judgment brought upon that great man, and the warm contests of the divines on that subject, being foreign to the subject of this chapter, may be seen in the history of those times. It will be sufficient to say, that the matter was brought by an appeal to Rome, whither Hochstrate, one of his most violent enemies, hastened, backed with recommendations from several princes to bias, with money to bribe, and with threatenings to intimidate, that court; all which could neither hinder Reuchlin from being absolved, nor himself from being condemned; and all he could obtain was a Supersedeas from the pope, just as judgment was going to be pronounced against him. Reuchlinus returned again victorious; but this did not prevent the opposite party from being very vexatious to him; much that he said, he did not doubt but Martin Luther, who began then to make some figure in Germany, would cut them out so much work, that they should be glad to let him end his days in peace; and it happened so accordingly; for the Jewish books were not only spared, but began to be read, and confuted with better success; so that it is hard to decide, whether the Jews have gained or lost by the reformation that ensued, and introduced the study of their books, and hath enabled Christians to beat them at their own weapons (S). Though Protestants do indeed claim the merit of this, especially those of Germany, where many of their doctors have proved the truth of the Christian religion, in a manner not only new and unanswerable, but likewise vastly different from what had been formerly done by those of the church of Rome; but it must be also owned, that these have since produced a vast number of divines, equally excellent and thoroughly versed in Jewish learning. However, the Jews have reaped one singular benefit from the reformation, that it hath, in a great measure, suppressed those prosecutions usually raised against them, on account of crucifying Christian children, stealing and piercing of consecrated wafers, and such like black accusations, upon the authority of pretended miracles, which have since lost all their credit.

Prosecuted and acquitted.

Jews since the reformation.

On the other hand, the Jews, being more closely pressed by the Christians than usual, were obliged to steer a better course in their own defence; and it must be owned, that they have produced some learned champions on their side; at the head of whom we may reckon R. Isaac Ben Abraham, supposed to be by nation a Polander; but he tells us himself that he had spent the most of his time in the courts of Germany, and had been in great credit

Become more wary and learned.

(R) These were more particularly the Nitzachon of R. Lipman, a poetical book, full of the bitterest invectives against Christ and his Gospel; and which we have had frequent occasion to confute in the second part of the history of the Jews (†). We shall find a more proper place to speak both of it and its author by-and-by, and the Tholedoth Jesu, or Generations of Jesus, a blasphemous piece, which makes Christ to have been an idolater, born in adultery, and guilty of the blackest crimes, for which he was put to death. And, as Reuchlinus was so well acquainted with the thalmud, and all the Jewish books, and was at that time so well known by all the learned, to be a proper judge of the merit or demerit of them, it was no wonder he should be consulted about the fate of them.

On the other hand, Pfeffer Corn's conversion and zeal were very much suspected; and he hath been accused of a design of seizing upon all these books, with no other view than to oblige the Jews to redeem them at an extravagant price. He was likewise openly charged with several enormous crimes, and represented as a vile dissembler, who only assumed the name of a Christian, to sow the more easily the seeds of discord among them; on which account some authors have confounded him with one Jaacob Melfinski, another Jewish counterfeit, who was burnt at Hall, in Saxony, an. 1515; and who confessed at his death, that he had exercised the priestly office twenty years; and then, turning physician, had administered a deadly poison to the elector of Brandenburg, and to his brother the bishop of Magd. burg. But they plainly appear to have been two different persons, whatever likeness there may be found in their characters. And it is mostly agreed that Pfeffer Corn died a natural death (40).

(S) It is plain Luther was no lover of the Jews, nor they of him. He accused them of divers cheats (*), particularly, that one of them had pretended, by his art, to have rendered the duke of Saxony invulnerable. On the other hand, they gave out, that he had promised to the Jews of Frauckfort, on consideration of a good sum of money, to preach and write in praise and vindication of their nation; and that their refusal was the cause of his spleen against them (41). This last appears a mere forgery; and the true reason of their hatred against him, was his having, by his credit, prevented several princes of Germany from protecting and tolerating them.

(†) Ancient History, vol. iv. p. 157, & seq.
(*) See his little book De Judeorum mendaciis.

(40) Vide Basnage, ibid. §. 16. & au3. ab eo citat.
(41) Cardoso's Las Excellencias.

with several princes. He it was that wrote a most virulent and dangerous book (T) against the Christian religion, wherein he runs through all the Gospel, endeavours to explode all the proofs of it, raises all the difficulties he can against it, and presses them with all possible vigour and bitterness; and, with the same heat, confutes the objections of Christians against the Jews. This book he composed against the disciples of Luther, with whom he had had frequent conferences and disputes; and it was not long before that piece was followed by another, equally, if not more, virulent; viz.

THE Nitzachon, or Victories, commonly ascribed to R. Jom Tob Lipman, was published and answered by Mr. Wagenfeil, as was lately hinted, and by Sebastian Munster, in his Hebrew version of St. Mathew's Gospel. The reader may see a farther account of that virulent book and its author in the margin (U).

IN the mean time these disputes between the Jews and Christians seem to have produced some new sects among the latter, which are called in contempt Judaizers, or half Jews. Of that sort was Seidelius, who maintained, that the Messiah regarded only the Jews, to whom he had been promised in the same manner as the land of Canaan; and that the heathen had no more share in the promise of the former than of the latter. He further affirmed, that the whole of religion was contained in the decalogue, and written in the hearts of men<sup>a</sup>. He was

<sup>a</sup> MARTIN. SEIDELII, ad Cæt. Cracov. ep. i. p. 806.

(T) This book, which the author intitles הזק אמונה, Chafuk Emunah, and the Latin translator Munimen Fidei, shews the author to have lived about the beginning of the seventeenth century. Its editor Jos. ph., the son of Mardocai, published it, an. 1616, after it had remained a long while in manuscript, and was become very scarce. The Portuguese Jews, indeed, got it translated into Spanish, and dispersed it about in all the neighbouring kingdoms; and it was also in high esteem among the African Jews; and it was from thence that the learned Wagenfeil brought it into Germany; and having translated it into Latin, inserted it into his Tela Ignea Satanæ. It were to be wished he had likewise answered him paragraph by paragraph, in the same clear and nervous manner with which he hath the Nitzachon of Lipman, of which more hereafter; for his author doth in the preface make great parade of proving the truth of the Jewish religion, and confuting the Christian, by the clearest and strongest reasoning, by the most theological, powerful, and convincing arguments. And it must be owned, that he argues more judiciously and warily than the rest of the rabbies; and the Jews have such an high opinion of this work, that they look upon it as unanswerable. And yet he often blunders in his historical facts; as when he makes Julian the apostate to have been an Arian emperor, and gives him a grandson, who was also a great stickler for that heretical sect. However, that doth not hinder his book from being one of the strongest that hath been written against Christianity. It hath had some editions since that of Wagenfeil above-mentioned, and hath been as learnedly confuted by eminent divines; for both which we refer the reader to Dr. Wolf above-quoted (42).

(U) It is not unlikely, as some authors have observed against Bartolucci (who hath not distinguished here with his usual exactness), that there have been some other books printed under the name of Nitzachon (victories or triumphs), the rabbies being, as we have observed more than once, very fond of such pompous titles; one of them seems to have appeared in the twelfth century, from his quoting no authors below but all above it. Another, which is attributed to one R. Mattathiah, appeared, an. 1399; and was written by him against one Peter, who had renounced Judaism, and had been baptized by that name. This is supposed to be the book which the learned Skikard had designed to confute; but which Mr. Hackspan, having with great difficulty procured from a Jewish rabbi, an. 1643, caused to be printed at Altorf the very next year, in Hebrew; and was since reprinted with much greater correctness by Mr. Wagenfeil, and with proper notes.

Since then R. Lipman, who flourished towards the end of the fifteenth century, wrote two books with the same title; the one in confutation of the proofs which Christians urge against the Jews, from Jaacob's prophecy, That the sceptre shall not depart from Judah, &c. (43). The other which was only an abridgment of that, he reduced into verse, that it might be the more easily learned by heart by the Jewish youth; and it is this that Wagenfeil hath thought so dangerous, as well as worth confuting. But that which Munster so often takes to task, in his Hebrew version of St. Mathew's Gospel, and sometimes quotes whole paragraphs out of it, being written in prose, is, in all likelihood, the first of Lipman's writing, of which more by-and-by.

There hath been a fifth published since under the same title, which must have been written since Luther and Calvin, as they are often quoted in it. But the Jews have been so fearful of its coming to light, that one of their rabbies, being informed that Hackspan had got one of them, and was translating it into Latin, stole it from him, so that it hath never appeared since (*).

Lipman, in that above-mentioned in prose, not only strives to overturn all the proofs of Christ's being the Messiah, but doth every-where express himself with the greatest bitterness against him and his religion, taking his Gospel to task in the most virulent manner; and descends even to the lowest puns, stiling it, in allusion to its Greek and Latin names, Havon-ghelion, that is, The Revelation of Iniquity; and calling his blessed Virgin Mother by the filthy name of Charia, which will not bear Englisking, instead of Maria. Those who desire to know more of that pestilent work, may consult the authors last quoted, and Munster's notes to his Hebrew version of St. Mathew above mentioned.

In the mean time, we hope the generality of our readers will not be displeased, if we tell them, that our present Jews, those especially of the higher class, are so far from following his example, or using his blasphemous expressions against our divine lawgiver, that they make no scruple to own a deep admiration of his precepts above those of their own, especially those which relate to universal charity, beneficence, meekness, humility, forgiveness, &c.; and how much deeper an impression they would make on them in his favour, were his professed disciples, like him, to display those excellent Gospel virtues in practice, as they do in theory, every considerate reader may easily guess.

(42) Bibl. Hæbr. N. 1145. p. 641. p. 462 (G). vol. iv. p. 256. §. 5—10. Wagenfeil Tela Ignea.

(43) Genesis, xlix. 10. De hoc, vide Ancient History, vol. i. (*) See Wolf, ubi supra, N. 1364. p. 734. Basnage, ubi supra, c. 34.

a a native of Silesia, and there he divulged his notions, but gained few disciples to them. Another, named Francis David, was called half a Jew, because he maintained it unlawful to pray to Jesus Christ, who had taught us to pray to the Father only; and being now in heaven could know nothing either of our wants or of our prayers<sup>b</sup>. Such was likewise reckoned George de Novara, who was burned at Bolonia, for denying that the Messiah was come: and such were also esteemed some other sectaries, who observed the Jewish Sabbath, abstained from blood and things strangled, &c.; several of whom also suffered as half Jews, in England and other parts.

ABOUT the beginning of the sixteenth century, the Jews of Mersburgh, though they pretended to have been settled there ever since the destruction of Jerusalem, were nevertheless banished out of that city and diocese by the bishop of it. They found, however, a safe retreat in other parts; and the emperor Ferdinand I. not only protected them, but granted them the privilege of having a chief, or prince of the captivity; and ordered that the chief Rabbi of Worms should have that advantage above any other of his nation. They reckon in the number of them the famed R. Jakob, a native of that city, and a man of great learning, who left four sons, who were all presidents of academies, princes of the dispersion, and highly admired by their nation<sup>c</sup>. One of them taught chiefly at Friburg, where they had an academy and synagogue, as well as in other cities of the empire, particularly at Vienna, where they had erected a magnificent building. This century likewise produced a good number of learned doctors, both in Germany and Poland (W), who enjoyed very great privileges, as well as liberty and quiet, in the latter; insomuch, that at Cracow they had a synagogue, an academy, a house of judgment, and a great assembly. They were likewise dispersed in several other cities of that kingdom, and flourished under the protection of that government: only they were now and then liable to suffer by popular commotions. Thus, for instance, their houses were one day set on fire in Posnania, without their daring to quench it, being afraid lest the populace should fall on them if they attempted it. The people, indeed, pretended, that a kind of supernatural terror had seized on them from above, which would not suffer them so much as to draw water to quench the flames, or to save any thing out of them; so that they were forced to stand still, and see their houses, effects, and even their sacred books reduced to ashes<sup>d</sup>. But, excepting those popular disasters, learning, as well as traffick, flourished among them; and their academies were governed by men of great reputation (X).

CARDINAL Commendon, in his way into Russia, found likewise in the province of Ukrania a great number of Jews, in great credit, who did not enrich themselves, as they do everywhere else, by usury, &c. but by a fair and honest commerce. They cultivated their lands, and applied themselves to the study of physic and astrology, and others farmed the customs and carriage of merchandize. They are not only exempt from wearing a mark of distinction, but are even allowed to wear a sword, and to enjoy the same posts and employments as the natives of the country<sup>e</sup>.

WE took notice a while ago, that they had been advantageously settled in Bohemia, ever since the tenth century, on account of great services they had done to the Christians there, against <sup>b</sup> FRANK. DAVID, defens. inter oper. Socini. tom. ii. p. 717. BASNAGE, ubi supra, c. 34, §. 11, & seq. <sup>c</sup> GANTZ Tzemach, p. 153. <sup>d</sup> Ibid. p. 157. <sup>e</sup> See the life of that prelate, written by FLECHIER, p. 270. BASNAGE, ubi supra, §. 18.

(W) There flourished in Austria the famed R. Solomon Luria, who was esteemed even more learned than Jakob above-mentioned, and was stiled, according to their pompous way, The crown of Israel; the wonder of the age; all people walked by his light, and all the Israelitish dispersions drank of his water; and his name was known in all the world. He wrote a treatise, intituled, The Sea of Solomon, Jam Shlomoh, alluding to his name, wherein he pretended to dive into the greatest depths of the thalmud; and took a particular examen of its stile and phrases. He was, according to their stile, called up to the celestial council, that is, he died, an. 1573 (44).

He wrote several other tracts of the same kind, such as his Wisdom of Solomon, Curtains of Solomon, Crown of Solomon, Columns of Solomon; together with some other expositions, his Bircath Hammazon, or Blessing of the food, and his Shechitoh Ubedicoh, which is a kind of directory how to kill and examine beasts used for food (45).

About the same time flourished also R. Samson de Guntzburg, so called from his native place, who was a great master of geometry and architecture, gained immense wealth, and distributed it with the same liberality he got it. Bartolucci says he published a treatise of architecture, but which was never printed (46).

(X) Among them was the celebrated R. Iserdes, who taught at Cracow, an. 1553, and was followed by a vast number of disciples, who flocked to him from all parts to hear his lectures. He was pious, perfect, and expounded the law, during the space of twenty years (47).

Joseph Cets, born in the same city (48), was another learned professor, who is affirmed to have worn four crowns, viz. that of the priesthood, of the law, of the imperial dignity, and of a great reputation (49).

(44) Theod. Ebert. in poetic. Hæbr. Gantz, ubi supra.

(46) Idem ibid. N. 2211. p. 1153.

(48) Idem ibid.

(49) Idem ibid.

(45) Wolf, ubi supra, N. 2000. p. 1071.

(47) Gantz, ubi sup. Wolf, Basnage, ubi supra, c. 35, §. 15, &c.

An academy at Prague, A.C. 1530. They not only built a noble synagogue, but erected afterwards an academy at Prague, of which R. Falk was chosen chief (Y); and enjoyed some singular privileges in that country. But they met likewise there with persecutions and disasters. A general conflagration having destroyed some part of that kingdom, they were accused, and found guilty of having caused it; so that those that escaped the flames were all banished, ten only excepted, who obtained leave to continue at Prague. Ferdinand was not able to appease the tumultuous Bohemians, by any other means than by their deaths or banishments, till the incendiaries were discovered towards the latter end of the year, when they were all recalled, and settled there afresh <sup>f</sup>.

Banished.

Recalled.

A new storm, A. C. 1558. It was not long before another storm was raised against them, on a suspicion that they had prayed at Prague against the Christians; whereupon all their books were immediately seized, and sent to Vienna. The loss of them was very afflicting, not only on account of their value, but because they were forced to officiate in the synagogue without them, and that by dint of memory. They were, however, so soon restored to them, that it looked as if they had been taken away with no other view but to force them to redeem them. But even then their happiness proved short-lived, since the emperor banished them all but ten families out of Bohemia, before that year was out. What his reasons were, our author <sup>e</sup> doth not tell us; but they were permitted at the same time to go and settle in any other part of his dominions; and it was not long before they were resettled in that. What learned doctors flourished in it may be seen in the next note (Z).

Banished and settled afresh.

Learned men.

THOSE

<sup>f</sup> GANTZ, ubi supra, p. 151, & seq.<sup>e</sup> RODOLPH. Imp. Decret. Posan. an. 1578. art. ii. apud Verboz Corp. per Hungar. tom. i. p. 52. RODOLPH. ii. Decret. Posan. an. 1595. art. x.

(Y) This rabbi took it into his head to introduce the Christian manner of disputing in his school; but soon found that it disgusted all their wise men, and that the Jewish theology is too mystical and abstruse to bear being canvassed by arguments and regular syllogisms.

(Z) They had several here that maintained the glory of their nation, among whom was the famed Isaac Mebeling, who taught in that academy about the end of the sixteenth century, and at his death left the chair to his son Charam. Here likewise flourished the celebrated Liava Bitzleer, who conversed with the emperor Rodolphus; and of whom the Jews say, that all Israel drank of his waters, and walked by his light (50). He founded the academy called Klaufe, an. 1592, which became so famous in his time, that it drew a vast concourse of disciples to him. He was chosen at last superintendent of all the synagogues in Poland.

Jebudah Betzaleel, or Leo Pragensis, a native of Bohemia, likewise flourished in it, an. 1553, and was chief of the Moravian academies, and judge of the nation in that country. He went thence to Prague, an. 1573, and there founded a new school, in which he taught eleven years with great applause, but left it at length to pass into Poland, where he died about the beginning of the seventeenth century. He left several learned works behind, among which is that, intitled, The Redemption and Eternity of Israel, wherein he assures the Jews of the certainty of the Messiah's coming, and of his settling them in a perpetual state of prosperity. Some time before him lived one Abraham of Prague, who wrote a commentary on that of R. Jarchi; and who died, an. 1540, as his epitaph shews.

Mordechai Japhe, or The Fair, was likewise a native of Prague, and gained no small reputation among those of his nation for his great learning; but retired at last into Poland, where he died, an. 1611. He wrote several learned volumes; the principal one is that which he intitled, The royal Robe (or Apparel); alluding, according to the rabbinic custom, to his namesake Mordechai, and the royal dress which king Ahasuerus caused him to be clothed with (1). The reader will not be displeased, if we subjoin the order in which he ranges this treatise.

He divides it into ten different Royal Habits, though he finished but five of them, which contain an accurate comment on another work. The first part is stiled, The purple Garment, in which he treats of prayers and thanksgivings; the second is, The white, which treats of the Sabbath; the third is, The golden Crown, which treats of things permitted and forbid; the fourth is, A Robe of fine Linen and Scarlet, in which are explained the ceremonies of marriage; and the last is, The Garment of the City of Shushan, and its Rejoicing at the Prosperity of the Jews (2).

The last we shall mention here is the Jewish historian David Gantz, so often quoted in this chapter, who was a native of that city, and there composed his Tzemach David, which is a chronology from the creation to the year 1492 of the Christian æra; and must not, consequently, be confounded with a dictionary of the same name, which we have elsewhere mentioned. He gave it that title, either as it was his first work, or to put his suffering nation in mind of the branch, David, or Messiah, who was to redeem them from thralldom, and to induce them to pray the more fervently for the hastening of his coming.

There are three singularities in his history; viz. 1. That he begins at the creation, mentions the patriarchs and first temple; whereas the rest of the Jewish chronologers go no higher up than the æra of the Greeks. 2. That, though he follows the Hebrew, or Pseudo Josephus, and other Jewish rabbies that wrote before them, yet he is much more exact, and often corrects them. 3. That he hath compiled his second part from Christian authors; and though he hath not been so happy in his choice as he might have been, had he been a better judge of them, yet it is some merit in him that he hath so far departed from the method of his brethren, who despised the help of foreign authors, and thought it a dishonour to make any use of them.

Gantz closes his chronology with an encomium on one Mordechai Meusel, a very rich and liberal Jew, who not only contributed largely towards a synagogue, which was then building at Prague, and was not inferior to those of Poland and Jerusalem, but gave away vast sums to the relief of his poor brethren in Bohemia.

(50) Basnage, ubi supra, c. 34, §. 21.

tom. iii. p. 40. Wolf, ubi supra, N. 1482, p. 792. Gantz, Basnage, &amp;c.

(1) Esster viii. 15.

(2) Bartolucci, ubi supra,

- a THOSE in Hungary were greatly diminished, towards the end of the sixteenth century, when the emperor Rodolphus laid a double tax on them, in order to oblige them to quit that country the quicker; and, at length, obliged them to pay a monthly fine of fifteen denarii per head, which it was thought must have ruined them quite; but, notwithstanding a good number of them made shift to maintain themselves in it, though a much greater was forced to seek their fortune elsewhere. The Moravian synagogues suffered a very severe persecution in the year 1574, a great number of Jews being burnt, and otherwise dispatched, before the emperor could be applied to in their behalf, who was at length moved with pity towards them, and put an end to those massacres. Those in Franconia were accused of having set fire to some houses in the town of Bamberg, for which they were plundered of all their effects, in order to make good that loss, but had their lives spared. They were served much in the same way at Bonn on the Rhine, when that town was taken and plundered by the Dutch general Schenk; but were made ample amends for their loss, towards the close of the sixteenth century, when Henry, then duke of Brunswick, permitted them to settle in his dominions. Till this time the princes of that illustrious house had been possessed with a notion, that the tolerating of them would prove detrimental to that state; insomuch, that they suffered none of them, not even those that were merchants, to pass through it; and if any were caught, they were plundered with impunity. At length, complaint having been made of it to prince Henry Julius, then duke of Brunswick, he not only granted them liberty of conscience in his territories, but appointed them a place in Lower Saxony, to carry on their commerce<sup>b</sup>: so that there were but few places in Germany where they were not allowed to traffick, towards the latter end of the sixteenth century. It is now time to see how they fared in the seventeenth, or last.

Oppressed in Hungary, A. C. 1595.

Persecution in Moravia, A. C. 1574.

Plundered in Franconia, A. D. 1575. At Bonn, 1588.

Settled in Brunswick, A. C. 1592.

- THERE is hardly any country in Europe, wherein the Jews enjoy greater liberty and privileges than in Poland, though it grant none to the protestants. They have their stately synagogues and academies; and their house of judgment or court of judicature is endowed with singular authority, since it is allowed to judge of criminal as well as civil cases. It hath been even affirmed<sup>i</sup>, that they had once the privilege of coining money; but both the shekels, and Hebrew inscription†, and the tomb out of which they were taken, and on which that conjecture is founded, are too suspicious to persuade one, that any crowned head would make them such a grant. However, Poland is looked upon as a nursery of learned rabbies, and the place where the Jews send all their youths to study the talmud<sup>k</sup>, and rites of their religion. In speaking of the preceding century, we mentioned some rabbies there who were an honour to their nation; this hath produced one who hath not only renounced Judaism, but wrote and published 37 demonstrations against it. But the condition he then was in, as well as the affected swoln stile in which he wrote, gives one reason to suspect the sincerity of his conversion (A).

Jews in Poland, during the last century.

R. Solomon converted. A. C. 1656.

- THE city of Hamburg is called the Lesser Jerusalem, on account of the many Jews that live and traffick in it. Their synagogue is indeed at Altena, a little city near it, under the king of Denmark, who protects them likewise at Gluckstadt; but that doth not hinder Hamburg from entertaining a vast number of them; some of whom are very rich, and others learned in various sciences, especially physic. They are observed to have been more tractable in that city than elsewhere; and that a good number of them were converted in this century by one *Esdra*s, or Edzar (whom some have mistaken for a converted Jew), and who made it his chief business to instruct and confirm them in the Christian faith. A divine of that city once imagined, that if those instructions were armed with some violence, they would become

At Hamburg.

<sup>b</sup> GANTZ Tzemach, ubi supra. BASNAGE, ubi sup. <sup>i</sup> Historia Univerf. Judaic. c. 3. † De his vol. i. p. 721 & (X), & seq. <sup>k</sup> Histor. Univerf. Judaic. ibid. p. 18. VILLALPAND, tom. ii. p. 2. Juan de la fuente conveniencia de las monarchias, apud BASNAGE, c. 35, §. 1, & seq.

and Posnania. He stiles him The Basis and Wall of the School, the Chief of liberal Souls, the Father of the Poor, the Oak of his Nation, and the Love of his Brethren (4).

His chronology hath been translated into, and continued in, the German rabbinic language, and in Latin; besides which he wrote two other treatises, one on arithmetic, stiled, The Shield of David; and the other, The Tower of David, on geometry (5).

(A) His name was Solomon; he had been bound for one of his brothers, and clapt into a jail, whence nothing could have redeemed him but his turning Christian; and this, and his readiness to yield to every argument of his instructor, made his conversion suspected. He readily owned that the Messiah was come, and that reason could not, ought not, to judge of the mysteries of faith, and that we ought to be wholly guided by revelation. Being told, that if God had given such sensible proofs of his divine presence in the holy ark of the covenant, which was made of wood, how much more, now he was united to our flesh, of which the ark was but a type? he cried out, "These words are sweeter than honey, and pierce my very heart."

After his baptism he endeavoured to convert his brethren, and wrote his 37 demonstrations, in which he proved the Messiah was come, that he was a divine person, distinct from God the Father. He inscribed his book to king Casimir, in an elegant and pompous dedication (6).

(4) Bartolucci, ubi sup. Wolf, ubi supra, N. 481. p. 292. Basnage, ubi supra, §. 24, 25, &c. (5) Idem ibid. (6) Johan. Solomon, Demonstrat. cum Hist. Colloquii. cum Joh. Botzaco, congress. i. prol. v. p. 14, & seq. vide & Basnage, ubi supra, c. 35, §. 2.

more numerous and effectual. But the senate being informed of it, soon cooled his untimely zeal, which tended only to lessen the number of their citizens, and had already caused some popular commotions.

Settled in Prague.

Their defence of that city.

WE have already observed that they were endowed with great privileges at Prague, for their great services at the siege of it; and they glory so much in that piece of merit, that R. Jehudah Leo compiled a history of that transaction, in which he highly extols the fidelity and bravery of his nation; their indefatigable industry in mining and countermining, watching, and defending the place, &c. but especially their piety in often assembling themselves in their synagogues, to intercede with heaven, and to recite a most pious litany, composed for that purpose by R. Simeon, whose head shines with bright lustre. In a word, he seems to ascribe the preservation of that city to their prayers and merit; notwithstanding which, they had the mortification to hear that the enemy, after raising the siege, entered Tabor, and several other cities of Bohemia, and had plundered all the Jews. The author concludes with an exhortation to those of his nation that shall read his history, to shout aloud, Blessed be our God, who hath wrought all these wonders in our favour. All this, however, hath not been capable of creating a tolerable good understanding between the citizens and them; on the contrary, they hate one another, and take all opportunities to shew it: and it must be owned that the Jews have now-and-then been guilty of such enormous deeds, as must render them not only suspected, but hateful to the Christians. The reader may see a few instances of it in the margin (B).

Hated by the Christians.

Strip of their privileges in Hungary, A.
C. 1630 &
1647.

1655.

A form of their oath.

THEY had enjoyed in Hungary the privilege of farming the revenue, till Ferdinand II. took it from them, by an edict dated 1630<sup>1</sup>: notwithstanding which, they found means, it seems, to preserve themselves in it, since Ferdinand III. was afterwards obliged to deprive them of it, by a new one, which condemned those to the loss of their places who admitted the Jews into any of them; because, says this law, they have neither conscience nor honesty, and are therefore unworthy to enjoy the privileges of the kingdom of Hungary<sup>m</sup>. This did not, however, prevent their being winked at, and keeping those employments, till that emperor sent once and again express commissioners to drive them out, and to punish those communities that had connived at it; the last of which commissions was in the year 1655<sup>n</sup>. However, they continue there still, not only under the protection of the Grand Signor, in those parts which are under his dominion, but in those of the empire. In this last, when they go to law against the Christians, there is a form of an oath prescribed to them, which is very singular, and which the reader may see in the margin (C).

NOTWITHSTANDING

<sup>1</sup> Vide Ferdin. II. imper. decret. art. xv. an. 1630. apud VERBOZ Corp. jur. Hungar. tom. ii. p. 256.
<sup>m</sup> Ferdin. III. decret. ii. Posoniens. an. 1647. art. ix. apud eund. p. 344. <sup>n</sup> Ibid. sub an. 1649. p. 383. & decret. Poson. v. an. 1655. art. xxix. p. 402. vide BASNAGE, c. 35, §. 8 & 9.

(B) R. Chajim, or Joachim, put one of the greatest cheats and affronts on this city that ever was heard. He had committed some signal theft; to avoid the shame and punishment of which, he renounced Judaism, and wrote a severe censure against it. From thence he removed to Vienna, where he at first ingratiated himself with the court and emperor Ferdinand; but finding his fortune beginning to sink, he associated himself with some other Jews, and robbed the treasury. They were soon discovered and condemned for it; and Chajim, who in his baptism had been named Ferdinand Francis Engelberg, dissembled, in hopes of a pardon, till he came to the place of execution; but there openly owned that he had never been a Christian, but a Jew in heart, and died such. That he had received the sacrament a few hours before, which they would find in his urinal, where he had thrown it; and breaking the crucifix he held in his hand, threw the pieces away (7), and was executed. Bartolucci suspects him to have been the author of the virulent book, lately mentioned, called Theolodot Jesu, or, The Generations of Jesus; but upon no probable grounds.

We have another instance of their hatred to the Christians and their religion, in a Jew of this city, named Lazarus, who, an. 1694, finding his son inclined to receive baptism, fell upon and killed him. Being imprisoned for it, he fell into a fresh fit of despair, and by the help of another Jew, who was in the same place, strangled himself. This last was condemned to be broke upon the wheel; and, in hopes to save his life, begged to be baptized, which was granted to him; but that did not prevent his being executed (8).

On the other hand, the Christians are not wanting in means to spite and mortify them; and have, among other things, erected a brass crucifix on the bridge which parts the two cities; and in order to oblige them to pay homage to it, have engraven the names of God about it in Hebrew characters. But as they are brought up to look upon all such things as idols, they pass by without taking notice of it, or of the names of God written upon it, which is often attended with vexatious consequences. For the scholars, who are there very numerous, seldom fail of abusing and drubbing them; whereupon a riot ensues, of which they are commonly obliged to pay the cost, as well as bear the blows and disgrace. All this doth not hinder their being so numerous, that they fill the third part of the city of Prague; but they are mostly very poor and miserable, and forced to hire themselves to the meanest offices, both to the citizens and to strangers (9).

(C) They are obliged to turn their faces towards the sun; to stand barefoot, their bodies covered with a

(7) Wagenfui Tela Ignea Satanæ, p. 189.

(8) Basnage, ubi supra, §. 5, & seq.

(9) Histo- ric. remarks in a voyage from Italy to Holland, an. 1704, p. 130, & seq. Basnage, ubi supra.

- a NOTWITHSTANDING all this, the Jews made choice of this kingdom, preferably to all other countries, to hold their grand council, an. 1650, in which was to be debated the most important point of their religion; viz. whether the Messiah was come. A countryman of our own, who tells us he was present at it, hath given us the following account of it °. The Jews being in doubt about the great number of centuries which have elapsed since the time in which they expected him to appear, agreed to call a general assembly of all their rabbies, to clear up that point. Hungary appeared to them a proper place, because the Turkish wars had in a great measure depopulated it; and they made choice of the plain of Ageda, about 30 leagues from Buda, and the princes then at war readily granted them that liberty. Three hundred of their most learned rabbies, out of different nations, met there accordingly, with a vast multitude of other Jews, who flocked thither from other countries. They all encamped under their tents; and one, larger than all the rest, was reared for the grand council to sit in (D); and R. Zachariah, of the tribe of Levi, was chosen their president and speaker. He was seated before a large table, with his face towards the eastern door of the pavilion, and all the rest sat round him.

A great assembly of them held in Hungary about the Messiah.

- THE first day was spent in compliments and mutual congratulations, and in excluding those who could not prove their Jewish origin, which amounted to about 5 or 600. On the second day the president proposed the question, in words to this effect: "We are here met to examine, whether the Messiah is come, or whether we must still wait for his coming?" Upon which some professed themselves inclined to believe he was already come, seeing those great misfortunes and disasters which Providence had continued to send down amongst them, during such a series of centuries, could not be owing to their idolatry; a crime from which their nation had kept themselves wholly free, ever since their return from the Babylonish captivity. So that all those miseries which they had suffered since their dispersion, must be owing to some other cause. This was rightly judged; and they might have justly added, that it was solely owing to their still rejecting of that Messiah whom God had sent at the appointed time, as we have elsewhere shewn †: but the majority of votes carried it against them, and it was agreed that the Messiah was not yet come, and that his delay was owing to their sins and impenitence.

The result of it.

- THEY next debated in what manner the Messiah was to come; and easily agreed to these three particulars. 1st. That he would appear as a great conqueror, and deliver them from all foreign yokes. 2dly. That he would alter nothing in the Mosaic religion. And, 3dly. That he was to be born of a virgin; and that his miraculous birth was to be a characteristic by which he should be known to those who were strangers to the covenant. Some farther debates they had, the substance of which may be seen in the margin (E). The congress had lasted six cloak, and their heads with a Jewish hat; and laying their hand upon a roll or volume of their law, repeat the following words: "I, such-a-one, a Jew, do swear by the living God, the almighty God, who hath made the heavens and the earth, and all that is in them, that I am innocent of the crime of which that Christian accuses me. And if I am guilty of it, may the earth open itself and swallow me up, as it did Dathan and Abiram: may the palsy and leprosy, which Elisha removed from Naaman upon Gehazi, fall upon me: may the falling sickness, the bloody-flux, and gout, seize me in an instant: may a sudden death carry me off: may my body and soul perish: may my good fortune be overturned: may I never get admittance into the bosom of Abraham: may the law given on Mount-Sinai blot me out (me delect): may all the holy writ contained in the five books of Moses confound me. And, if my present oath is not true and just, may God (Adonai), by his divine power, blot me out of the book of life (10)."

° BRETT'S narrative of the proceedings, &c. phoenix xv. tom. ii. p. 544. 153, & seq. sub not. & al.

† See before, vol. iv. p.

(D) In this vast assembly, which consisted of some of the most considerable persons of their nation, who came thither from most countries of Europe, if not likewise from the East, and for which great plenty of provisions and all other conveniences had been brought, it was resolved that none but those who spoke the Hebrew tongue, and could trace their own genealogies, should be admitted; which caused great numbers of them to be excluded: and these were only admitted to stand without, and at a certain distance from the great pavilion, and among the strangers whom curiosity had brought thither also.

(E) They debated, among other points, whether Jesus Christ, who had been crucified, might not be the Messiah; to which the Pharisees, who over-ruled the assembly, answered, on the following day, that he could not be that person, because he appeared in a low and despised state; whereas the Messiah was to appear in a glorious and triumphant manner. They likewise objected his being the son of a carpenter, and the aversion he had long shewn against the law of Moses.

Here a rabbi, named Abraham, who was still unsatisfied with the Pharisaic reasoning, strenuously insisted upon Christ's miracles; and asked them by what power they thought he could work them? To this Zebedee, one of the chiefs of that sect, answered, that he wrought them by his magic art. Abraham objected, that no magic art could give sight, hearing, or speech, to those that were born blind, deaf, and dumb: to which the other replied, that those blind, deaf, and dumb, had been so formed in the womb by magic art; and that he that cured them did nothing else but dissolve the charm by the same diabolical power. The Sadducees, though in other things so opposite to them, agreed with fix days, when some ecclesiastics, sent thither from Rome, presented themselves before it; and a not content to prove to them that Jesus Christ was the promised Messiah, began to extoll the worship, ceremonies, and the authority of the church, whose head was the vicar of that divine Person. This declaration immediately caused a strange uproar in the council, among which nothing was now to be heard but a tumultuous out-cry of No Christ! no God man! no intercession of saints! no worship of images! no prayers to the Virgin! accompanied with loud clamours, rending of cloaths, stopping of ears, &c. and in this manner they parted for that day. On the next, which was the 8th, they only met to agree upon another council, which should be held three years after in Syria, where, our author tells us, there are still some of the ancient Rechabites *. He farther observes, that some of the Jewish doctors owned themselves not a little shaken at what had passed, and expressed a desire to converse with some protestant b divines; but that the presence of so many monks, they said, deterred them, and made them fear some tragical conclusion to their assembly.

(10) Virboz. Corp. jur. Hung. part iii. titul. 36. tom. i. p. 139. apud Basnage, ubi supra. §. 10.

A new one agreed on.

High credit at Vienna, A.C.
1660.

Banished, A.
C. 1669.

Recalled,
1673.

Stript by the populace, 1705.

Settled in other parts of the empire.

ABOUT ten years after, they were in such high credit at Vienna, that R. Zachariah had obtained leave to build a stately synagogue and academy, in order to revive learning among them. He had endowed the latter with a sufficient pension for twenty-four doctors, who were to read lectures on the thalmud night and day; so that the school was to be always open, and some doctors teaching in it. The building, however, was scarcely finished, when the emperor banished all the Jews out of that capital, and turned their synagogue into a church <sup>p</sup>. They complain, that the empress superstitiously ascribed her barrenness to their toleration; for which God punished her soon after; for that she was brought to-bed of a daughter, and died c in child-bed. Not long after which, they were all recalled and settled in that capital. That monarch did not a little resent the zeal with which those of Buda sustained the siege against him; though in reality they did but their duty in it, seeing they were subjects of the Ottoman empire. However, they are not only tolerated at Vienna, but are admitted to several high posts, and titles of honour; but the people, who begrudge them the wealth which they acquire under the government, sometimes raise vexatious commotions, in order to strip them of it. They were no less numerous and flourishing in most other large cities of the empire, as well as in the provinces of Servia, Croatia, Moldavia, Valantina, &c. and though they are banished d out of the city of Nuremberg, yet they are settled in most of the neighbouring towns, and have a synagogue at Pfurt, and are even permitted to enter that city, under a guide, who stays with them all the time. The same may be said of the city of Ausburg, where they had formerly a synagogue and academy, and their doctors and disciples were maintained by the rich merchants of the place <sup>q</sup>, but have been since banished from it, and must buy the liberty of coming into it at the price of a florin for every hour they stay in it.

THE Jews of Ratisbon are accused of having stolen from the Christians there, one of their greatest saints, whom they call Emmeron, and affirmed to have come from Poitou, and to have converted the Huns; whereas the former affirm him to have been of their nation, and descended from Amram the father of Moses. It is not easy to decide the controversy; only this may be said in favour of them, that they don't appear so fond of saints as to steal those of the Christians; which is more than these can say for themselves. Those of Worms are also e charged, by one who abjured Judaism, to have written the name of God on the top of their synagogue, out of a superstitious notion, that it was an effectual means of preserving it to them; insomuch, that they suffered it to be covered with spiders webs, rather than run the risque of defacing it by brushing them off. But the French soon convinced them of the vanity of that notion, when they took that city, and demolished that building to the ground.

Numerous, and dispersed at Frankfort.

A late traveller reckons 30,000 Jews in Frankfort <sup>r</sup>; yet they are but ill used there, being often plundered, fined, and made to carry water, where-ever any fire happens; and the citizens paint them in their houses in all manner of ridiculous and other forms, on purpose to render them despicable and odious: and yet they seem fond of living, though in extreme poverty and contempt, in all these parts, and often produce some very learned men among f them (F).

WE

* De his, vide Ancient History, vol. i. p. 820 (T).
supra, §. 20. <sup>q</sup> BENJAMIN DE TUDELA, Itinerar.
Italy, apud BASNAGE, ubi supra, §. 25.

<sup>p</sup> BARRIOS's Hist. Judaic. BASNAGE, ubi
<sup>r</sup> Historical remarks on a journey into them in this; and the more readily, as they denied the resurrection, which Christ had so strenuously defended against them.

(F) Among them was the famed cabbalist Nathan de Spira, who, about an. 1640, wrote a panegyric on the Holy Land, intitled, The Good of the Earth; and another called Megillath Humucoth, or Volume of the Profundities; which is a cabbalistical comment on some verses in the third chapter of Deuteronomy, wherein he hath discovered sundry deep mysteries, which he there explains, and removes the difficulties which occur to him.

There flourished another famed one at Cisenstadt, about an. 1682, named Mordechai, who set up at first for a prophet; and finding the people ready to credit him, gave himself out to be the Messiah. Those of Italy wrote letters to invite him thither, where he was accordingly

- a WE now come to those that are settled in Holland, where, if we may believe one of their writers, they enjoy greater liberty and quietness, and are more flourishing and wealthy, than in any other part of the world<sup>s</sup>. They are here of two sorts; viz. those who come from Germany, and those who come from Portugal and Spain, and are so divided on account of some difference in their ceremonies, that they heartily hate each other (G). Zeigler was once very considerable among the former, and came to Amsterdam, on purpose to delude them with the hopes of a Messiah, whom he pretended to have already seen at Straßburgh, and who would appear immediately after their conversion and agreement were completed (H), and soon after destroy Anti-Christ's and the Turkish empire, and extend his own from one end of the world to the other. He was likewise to assemble a general council at Constance, which would last twelve years, and put an end to all their feuds about matters of religion. This Messiah, however, did not appear; and the Jews found themselves vilely deceived by that impostor<sup>t</sup>.

Jews in Holland numerous.

Deceived by R. Zeigler.

- Of those who retired thither from Portugal and Spain, one of their chiefs, named Michez, of Spanish extract, is accused by Strada<sup>u</sup> of having promoted the wars in the Low Countries, by promising the magistrates of Antwerp a powerful succour; and wrote to them from Constantinople, that the Grand Signor would, in a short time, find so much work for the king of Spain, that they would meet with no great obstruction from him. But though he did not keep his promise with them, it shews that the Jews were safer in those parts than in Spain, since he chose to shelter himself there so early. For it was not till about forty years after that those of Portugal and Spain came to settle in Holland. However, their first assembly at Amsterdam caused no small jealousy among the citizens, who took them at first for Roman-catholics in disguise; till, upon searching their houses, especially those where they met to worship, they found nothing but Hebrew books, and the volume of the Mosaic law: upon which they were only charged to pray for the preservation of the city, which they readily promised; and built soon after their first synagogue there, which they called The house of Jacob, because a rich Jew of that name was the founder of it<sup>w</sup>. They reared another not long after, which they stiled Neve Shalom, The dwelling of peace; and put it under the care of a famed rabbi, named Judab Vega, who was come from Afric; but left it, and retired to Constantinople; where he compiled a history of his nation, down to the destruction of Jerusalem by Titus. He was succeeded by R. Uziel, who censured the faults and remissness of the Jews in such severe terms, that he incurred their hatred; upon which a third synagogue was built, to which the schismatics repaired, under the conduct of another rabbi, named Pardo. This last was stiled Beith Israel, The house of Israel. This schism lasted about twenty years, not

Accus'd of intelligence against the Spaniards.

The first synagogue at Amsterdam.

A second built.

A third, A. C. 1618.

Re-united, A. C. 1639.

<sup>s</sup> DAN. LEVI DE BARRIOS, Casa de Jaacob, p. 24.

<sup>t</sup> VOETII disput. select. tom. ii. p. 95.

<sup>u</sup> STRADA de Bell. Belg. lib. v. p. 214.

<sup>w</sup> Vide Silva del Anton. Alvares Suares.

accordingly received with great respect; but the rabbi who conducted him thither, having discovered his imposture, began to cry him down; but was forced by the rest to retire, and obtained a certificate from them, upon condition that he should speak no more against him; but upon his breaking his word was accused of divers notorious crimes. However, the false Messiah was found out, and forced to retire from Italy into Poland, and it is from the rabbi above-mentioned that we have this account, so that it can hardly be called in question.

But the most celebrated rabbi that Germany hath produced in the last century, was the great Isaac Loria, author of the metaphysical introduction to the cabbalah, in which he examines the reasons which induced God to create the world. He was a native of Jerusalem, and his appellative of Askenasi (German), was only given him on account of his long abode in that country; for he retired again into Palestine, towards the latter end of his life, and was buried at Sapheta in Upper Galilee. He wrote several other treatises, which the reader may see in the authors quoted in the margin (11), but that above-mentioned was so highly admired by our great Henry More, that he thought it might be of singular service to convert not only the Jews, but the heathen, to Christianity (12).

(G) The true reason however, of this extreme hatred, if we may believe the Germans, lies deeper, and is more justifiable; viz. the dissimulation and remissness of those of Portugal and Spain; who as we have observed more than once, live in those countries, and conform in all things with the popish religion for the sake of enriching themselves, and then retire into Holland, to enjoy with more safety the fruits of their hypocrisy. They charge them likewise with being too remiss in many things relating to their law, of which themselves are more scrupulous observers; and if we may judge of those in Holland by those in England, where one sort is tenacious and the other remiss, to an extreme, if not to a fault, the charge will appear far from groundless.

(H) This Messiah, whom he affirmed to be lineally descended from David king of Israel, by the line of Nathan, was then, he said, but fourteen years old. His ancestors had resided about a thousand years in the kingdom of Tunis, whence they passed afterwards into that of Granada in Spain, whence being expelled by king Ferdinand, they had settled themselves in Germany. He was then at Straßburgh, where Zeigler had seen him, and for whom he reserved a diadem and sword, to put into his hand, in order to bring all the world under his dominion. This was his fabulous account of him. However, this cheat must not be confounded with another rabbi of the same name, who was descended from the house of Salmes, born at Landau, and was well versed in most sciences, for this last died about 70 years before (13), and was called James, and the other Philip.

(11) Narratiuncula Judæi cujusdam de R. Mordechai Pseudo Messia, an. 1682, apud Buxtorf Catalæsa, p. 361.

(12) Buxtorf & Wolf, Bibl. Rab. N. 1227, p. 671.

(13) Voetii disput. select. vol. ii.

p. 95, & seq.

without great heat on both sides ; but was at length happily ended, and the three synagogues <sup>a</sup> were reconciled, and united into one, to which they gave the name of Thalmud Hathorath, or, The study of the law (I).

R. Menasse chosen.
His high character.

R. MENASSE, author of several learned treatises, and one of the ablest divines which the Jewish nation hath produced these many centuries, was chosen to expound the thalmud there, at the age of eighteen ; and gained such reputation for his learning and application, that it raised the envy of the jealous rabbies, and created him many enemies. But he despised their calumnies, and pursued his studies with such assiduity, that at the age of twenty he published the first part of his Conciliator on the Pentateuch ; wherein he endeavoured to reconcile the seeming contradictions of the sacred books, by the expositions of ancient and modern doctors, and by his own conjectures. And this work, which he afterwards finished, gained him the esteem and <sup>b</sup> admiration of all the learned, both Jews and Christians * ; and it must be owned, that no rabbi, either before or since, ever handled those difficult points with so much erudition and solidity (K).

Comes to England, A. C.
1656.

Death, A. C.
1662.

BARTOLOCCI accused him of having taken the advantage of the civil wars in England, to prevail upon Oliver Cromwell to permit the Jews to settle there. On the other hand, a Jewish historian affirms, that Cromwell and his parliament invited him over to treat about it <sup>c</sup>. But, without entering farther into the matter of fact, was it not natural for him to endeavour to procure such an advantageous settlement to his nation as that of England ? But whether invited or no, it is plain he came over into England with that design, and was well received by Cromwell and the parliament, as well as his apology for the Jews, in which he exploded all the calumnies raised against his nation, especially those of their crucifying and using the blood of Christian children at their passover ; and pleaded their cause so well there, that, if we may believe some authors of those times, he obtained a much better settlement, and greater privileges for them, than ever they had enjoyed before in England <sup>d</sup>. We shall speak of that apology in the account of his works. However, Bartolucci not only censures him for it, but charges him with other frivolous matters, though he represents them as crimes ; such as his taking part with the remonstrants, in order to obtain their friendship and protection ; and printing his works without the approbation or leave of the Christian divines, &c. from all which he hath been sufficiently cleared by Mr. Basnage. He died at Amsterdam, an. 1662, and left a son, who inherited his printing-house, and printed his father's works in it <sup>d</sup>. His other works may be seen in the margin (L). R. Zachuth, a great friend and panegyrist of Menasse <sup>b</sup>, and * See the Epistle of R. ZACHUTH, prefixed to his Conciliator.

Judaic.

<sup>2</sup> Idem ibid. vide THEOPHIL. SPIZEL. Coronid. Philologic. p. 382, & Pantheon Anabaptistic. part ii. lib. iii. p. 234. WOLF, ubi supra, p. 783.

<sup>b</sup> Idem ibid.

<sup>c</sup> BARRIOS Histor. Univers.

<sup>d</sup> BARTOLOCCI, WOLF, BASNAGE, &c.

(I) Since then they have taken care to found schools as well as synagogues ; and one of them called Kether Hathorath, or the Crown of the Law, hath been still governed by some of their most learned men, and was founded an. 1643. But that which most displays the flourishing state of this nation, is the vast and noble synagogue which they consecrated an. 1673, and hath been so deservedly admired by all the judges of architecture, and so much cried up by their own preachers, that there has been a collection printed of the sermons preached on that occasion (14), and may be rightly called pompous panegyrics in the swoln Jewish stile : not but the Jews deserve the greater commendation for that noble structure, because though it was reared in time of war, which caused some obstruction to the work, yet being begun in April 1671, it was completed in the short space of four years (15).

(K) R. Menasse was of Jewish extract, and of the family of the famed Abraamels, but was so far from the morose conduct of the learned of his nation, who shun the company of Christians, that he made himself many real friends among them. The great poet Barlaeus was one of them, who wrote in his praise, and protested that no difference of opinions should lessen his esteem for so learned a man. Even the learned Grotius often consulted him on difficult passages of scripture with good success, and encouraged him to go on and publish his excellent works, and recommended them to the learned as of great service towards the right understanding of holy writ (16).

He had also many friends among those in power ; all which raised the jealousy of some zealous divines to such a degree, that they condemned Barlaeus's verses in his praise ; and a kind of paper war was begun among the learned, in which every one took what side he pleased (17).

(L) Besides the Conciliator above-mentioned, the 2d, 3d, and 4th parts of which took up the remainder of the Old Testament, he published, 1. A Spanish bible, an. 1630. 2. A Hebrew Pentateuch, with a Spanish version to it, an. 1646. 3. Tesoro dos Dinim, or treasury of rites, in Portuguese, an. 1645. 4. His Oeconomia, or collection of rites relating to women, children, servants, and goods. 5. A panegyric on the queen of Sweden. 6. His Phocylides, in Spanish verse. 7. His Ebn Jekara, or precious stone, or comment on the statue of Nebuchadnezzar. 8. His treatise of the resurrection of the dead, and immortality of the soul. 9. Of Adam's fall, and frailty of human nature. 10. Of the hope of Israel ; in which he endeavours to prove, from the relation of Antonio Montezino, that the ten Israelitish tribes are settled chiefly in America, along the river Sabbation. This book was dedicated to the English parliament, and received the thanks of it from the chairman of the committee, in an

(14) Sermones que pregaracon, &c. De his, vide Basnage, ubi supra, §. 5.

(16) Grotii Epist. an. 1639, p. 564.

(15) Ibid. sub not. (B).
(17) See Wolf, Bibl. Hebr. N. 1463, p. 778, & seq.

a and who flourished at the same place and time, was of Portuguese extract, and born at Lisbon, an. 1575. He was sent by his parent, who made outward profession of popery, to study physic at Salamanca and Conimbra; after which he returned and settled at his native place, where he gained no small reputation for his learning, and more so by the charitable cures he performed among the sick poor, and for some notable ones at court. He wrote several books, particularly an history of the chief physicians, which he dedicated to the pope's residentiary there. And after having dissembled about 30 years, he retired to Amsterdam, where he was circumcised, and died a Jew, leaving several works unfinished, which he designed to print. Those he published were of the physical kind. R. Zachuth's character, and death, A. C. 1642.

R. ABRAHAM ISRAEL PITZARO flourished likewise at Amsterdam. He wrote a book intitled, The Sceptre of Judah, which is an exposition of that prophecy of Jaacob<sup>d</sup>, in a most swoln stile, and dedicated to the Pharnassim, or judges of that synagogue, whom he stiles The Stars which enlighten the Firmament, and the Atlases which bear up the People of Israel. It is a virulent book against Christianity, in which he complains of the danger of confuting it, and of the unfair way of Christians expounding the Scriptures, of their unfitness for such a task, and of their tyrannic way of using those Jews who expound them in a different way from them. And it is not improbable that this was the motive which inclined those Pharnassim to suppress the publishing of that work, notwithstanding his great encomiums on them. Mr. Basnage, who saw it in manuscript, hath given a short account of it, and of his way of interpreting the words Sceptre, Shiloh, &c. in that prophecy, in a manner quite different from that of the Christians, in order to confute the notion of the Messiah's being come, but for which we shall refer our readers to that author, to avoid running into too great a length.<sup>e</sup> R. Abraham Pitzaro's works.

R. MORTERA was another celebrated doctor at Amsterdam, and a more subtle writer than Pitzaro; though his treatise of The Truth of the Mosaic Law, and of the miraculous Providence of God over his People, be designed to prove that the law given to Moses was perfect; and that the Christians have injured it, by pretending to raise it to a higher perfection, by the addition of new precepts. He falls equally foul on the Protestants and Roman-catholics; and endeavours to explode the authority of the New Testament, the efficacy of the Sacraments, and the rewards and punishments of another life. The reader may see a sketch of his book in the author above-quoted<sup>f</sup>. The rest of the Jews of note, who flourished in this city, may be seen in the following note (M). R. Mortera, A. C. 1645.

THEY

<sup>c</sup> See his life, written by LUDOV. LEMOSO, prefixed to his book De Calculorum Morbo. WOLF, ubi supra, N. 568. BASNAGE, c. 36. §. 13. <sup>d</sup> Genes. xlix. 10. <sup>e</sup> Hist. de Juifs, lib. ix. c. 36, §. 14—21. <sup>f</sup> Ibid. §. 22. ad fin.

epistle printed at London, an. 1650, in which the writer stiles Manasse his most dear brother. 11. His 30 problems concerning the creation, in Latin, 8°. an. 1635. 12. His treatise on the certain term of life. His Sepher Phene Rabbah, or Hebrew index of places in Scripture, which are explained in the Middrash Rabbah, or large comment on them, alphabetically digested. 13. His Sod Yescharim, or secret of the righteous, or treatise on the secrets of nature, or natural magic. 14. His Nishmat Chajim, or breath of life, on the immortality of the soul. 15. His Shaphah Berurah, or pure lip, on grammar. 16. His logic, his apology for the Jews, printed first in English, an. 1656, and since re-printed in the Phoenix, 1707, and different from another under the name of Edward Nicholas, who professes himself to be no Jew, but betrays himself such, by his stile and writing. To these we might add his epistles to the learned of his time, on various and difficult points, of which he takes notice in his second part of his Conciliator. His three editions of the Hebrew bible, from his own printing-house, and a much greater number of rabbinic books, which the reader may see in Bartolacci, Wolf, Basnage, Hottinger, and other writers, particularly, Daniel Levi de Barrios's universal Jewish history.

(M) Joseph Atthias, a Spaniard by birth, was at first a teacher of the thalmud at Hamburg, but came afterwards to Amsterdam, where he bought the famed Elzevir's printing-house, and became himself a celebrated printer in the Jewish way. His Hebrew bible, and other works, being not only very correct and commodious, but in such a fair type as had not been yet seen, nor been outdone since, except by that of our excellent Casson, and with the Massoretic notes on the margin, and as such are highly esteemed by the learned.

R. Isaac Aboah, who came thither from Basil, was not only a celebrated preacher but a great cabbalist; and translated from Spanish into Hebrew the treatise, intituled The gate of Heaven (18), written by another Spaniard, named Irira, or Abraham Cohen Herrera (19), and from that Hebrew version it is, that a new Latin one hath since been made. Aboah likewise wrote a paraphrase on the Pentateuch, wherein he sings Moses's triumphs in heroic verse.

Benjamin Musaphia was likewise a very learned commentator on the thalmud, but applied himself to another study, equally abstruse, viz. The Flux and Reflux of the Sea. He was so perfect a master of the Hebrew tongue, that he compiled a dictionary of it, in a quite new and easy method (20), and intituled it, Massaph Hagharuc, or additions to the Gharuc, another lexicon, formerly mentioned (21). He likewise published his Zeker Rab, or large memory, which is a collection of all the Hebrew roots, to which he tacked certain sentences or maxims, for the better learning and retaining their signification. There is likewise an epistle attributed to him on the subject of potable gold, and under the fictitious name of Mezabab (de auro) (22).

But the most remarkable of all the Jews of this city, was the late Spinosa, author of a new kind of Atheism, and well known to all the learned for his philosophical (18) Barrios in vit. Isaac Huzick, p. 45. supra. Wolf, N. 402. p. 251. supra.

(19) Vide Cabbala Denudata. (21) Idem ibid. Basnage, ubi supra, §. 6.

(20) Barrios, ubi supra. (22) Wolf, ubi supra.

Rich ones at the Hague.

THEY are no less numerous and flourishing at the Hague, where they have also a noble a synagogue, and where those who are become wealthy and opulent seek for a peaceable and delightful

works. His parents were of Portuguese extract, and in good circumstances, but he was born at Amsterdam, an. 1632, and, at his father's death, would only accept of a bed of all that he had left him, and chose to live in the meanest and lowest way, and get his living by polishing of spectacles, and other such glasses, which brought him so little gain, that though he lived chiefly upon milk and gruel, he was as poor at the year's end as at the beginning. He refused a considerable sum, however, from a friend; and consented only to accept of a very small pension from him, upon which he lived. Some think that he received the first seeds of his atheism from his Latin master Vanden Ende, who both professed and taught it. But whether so or not, it is probable that the philosophy of Descartes gave him a dislike to all the Jewish learning, and at length to their religion. They soon perceived it, by his absenting himself from the synagogue, and would have retained him by a considerable pension; but he rejected it, and became so odious to them, that some of them attempted more than once to stab him; upon which he left that city, where he found they were too powerful and exasperated against him, to stay any longer amongst them; thence he retired to Leyden, and afterwards to the Hague. They pursued him, however, with their grand excommunication; but he protested against their sentence by a writing in Spanish, directed to the rabbies of the synagogue. He soon after published his geometrical demonstrations, and his meditations, and brought forth at length his Traëtatus Theologico-Politicus, in which was formed his new system of Atheism, for which he hath been so much admired and caressed by all loose lovers of novelty, both in Holland, Germany, and France, from whom he received several invitations, and large encouragements, but refused them all, and died at the Hague, an. 1677, aged 44 years. We shall forbear other particulars of his life and death; such especially as his being often heard, in his last sickness, calling upon God to have mercy on him, a miserable sinner; his having always by him some pieces of mandrake to hasten his death, and stupify him against the approach of it. The reader may see them in his life, written by a Lutheran minister, then at the Hague (23).

His books have been translated into divers languages, and in some with a different title, the better to conceal their author and poison. Particularly the French intitles his version, A Treatise of the ancient and modern ceremonies of the Jews. We are told that he designed to have given the world a compleat version of the Old Testament, and had gone through the Pentateuch, but burnt it a few days before his death. He did the same by his treatise on the rainbow, because some learned, who had read it, did not think it worth printing. He was likewise suspected to be the author of a treatise of ecclesiastical rights, published, an. 1665, in which he maintained, that the clergy, being subject to the civil power, ought not to teach what they believe, but what that commands. However, Spinoza disowned the book, which hath been since supposed to have been written by the physician who assisted him in his last sickness, and who was also the writer of another called Philosophia S. Scripturæ interpres, or the holy Scripture interpreted by Philosophy. He only put the initial letters of his name L. M. or Lewis Meir. Spinoza left another work which was printed after his death, and called his Opera Posthuma; among which one finds a moral geometrically demonstrated, the cure of the understanding, some letters, a Hebrew grammar, and a political treatise (24).

As Spinoza had many followers and disciples, not indeed united into one sect, but scattered here and there;

so had he also many learned opposers, which it is out of our province to take notice of here. We shall content ourselves with mentioning those of his nation, and particularly the learned Balthazar Orobio, a Spaniard by birth, and physician, whose parents outwardly professed Christianity, but he, it seems, could not dissemble well enough to escape suspicion, but was cast into the prison of the inquisition, and after three years close confinement, was put to the torture, in order to be made to confess himself a Jew. He, however, bore it with such constancy, that the inquisitors believing him a Christian indeed, discharged him.

Orobio who had studied philosophy (25), and had been professor of metaphysics at Salamanca, found so much leisure, during his imprisonment, to improve himself in that science, that he was become a perfect master of it; so that instead of retiring into some other country, he once more obtained the chair, and was some while professor at Tholosa; till being at length tired of dissembling his religion, and coming to Amsterdam, he was circumcised, and made open profession of Judaism. He acquired such reputation by his success in physic, that he had hardly time to follow his studies; and when Spinoza's book appeared, he at first despised it, on account of its author, and thought his principles too evidently false to be espoused by any man of sense. But when he received Bredenburg's answer to it, in which that author agreed with him in two dangerous positions, or seemed to hesitate about them; viz. 1st. That nothing ought to be admitted in matters of religion, but what is agreeable to reason. And, 2dly, That as ex nihilo nil fit, God could not be admitted to have created the world out of nothing. Orobio therefore undertook to confute them both, and did it with success, and like the sound philosopher and metaphysician he was, though he seemed to level his answer only against Bredenburg (26).

Orobio likewise entered the lists in defence of Judaism, with the learned remonstrant, professor Limborgh; which gave birth to that excellent conference, well known to all the learned (27), and died soon after the publication of it, an. 1687. He left some other works, of which the reader may see a farther account in the authors quoted in the margin (28).

There flourished about the same time several learned rabbies in other cities in Holland, whom we omit for want of room, and shall mention only two of the most celebrated, viz:

David Cohen de Lara, a disciple of the famed Huziel, and author of the City of Dawid, a treatise in which he proves the affinity of the Hebrew with the Greek, and several other tongues. He compiled likewise the Kether Kebunnah, or Crown of priesthood, which is a much more copious lexicon than that of R. Nathan, formerly mentioned, since he hath added about 2000 words to it. He also translated out of Hebrew into Spanish the book stiled Reshith Cockmah, or, the beginning of wisdom. (29). He lived first at Amsterdam, and died at Hamburg, an. 1674.

The last we shall name is the great Jacob Jehudah Leon, author of the Description of the Temple of Solomon, which he compiled at Middleburgh. He was a Spaniard by birth, but retired into Holland, to be more at liberty to pursue his design; and in order to gain a more perfect idea of that noble edifice, applied himself to the building of a wooden model of it, upon the plans which he had met with among the several authors of his own nation. He afterwards formed his description from it, and published it in French, under the title of Description du temple de Solomon, par Jacob Juda Leon, habitant (23) Coleri vit. Spinoz. pass. & p. 172, 174.

univers. an. 1687, tom. vi.

Collatio, cum erudito Judeo.

§. 16.

(29) Bejn. ibid. Wolf, N. 501. p. 316.

(24) Id. ibid. p. 97, & seq.

(26) Isaac Orobio, certamen philosophic. adversus, I. B. principia.

(28) De his, vid. Wolf, Bibl. Hæbr. N. 1155. p. 646.

(25) Le Clerc Bibliot.

(27) Amica

lib. ix. c. 37.

a delightful retirement. For here it is that they enjoy the greatest prosperity, and live in the greatest luxury, and in the most sumptuous edifices. Yet such is their happiness under that government, that they enjoy their wealth and grandeur without raising the jealousy, zeal, and envy of the populace; whilst the rest carry on a considerable traffick both at home and abroad, without being liable to those heavy impositions, vexatious prosecutions, proscriptions, and other disasters, which we have seen them groan under in other parts of Europe.

Those here in England have no less reason to praise the mildness of our government, and <sup>In England;</sup> the hospitable treatment of our nation towards them. Here they are allowed full liberty of their religion, a full freedom of trade, and the quiet enjoyment of their properties. They are, like those of Holland, commonly distinguished into German and Portuguese, or, more <sup>Divided into</sup> properly, into northern and southern, and have each their respective synagogues, chiefs; <sup>German and</sup> German and Portuguese schools, &c. but no academy; so that they are obliged to send their youth to be educated, the one in some of those in Germany, and the other, in that of Amsterdam. The former are by far the most indigent, as well as the most zealous for their religion, and most careful to instruct their meanest children in it, and in the knowledge of the Hebrew tongue: whereas the latter being rich, and some of them opulent, are more remiss in all these respects; insomuch, that many of them cannot so much as understand the liturgy of their synagogues, but have it translated into Portuguese. However, both have had some learned rabbies, and, among the latter, the late R. Netto was justly esteemed a man well versed, not only in Jewish, but in R. Netto. every other kind of learning. But the generality of them are more used to merchandize and traffick, than to the study of their doctors. The rich among them are very generous and charitable, not only to their own poor, but to those of the Christians; and some of them have diffused their beneficence among their neighbours, round their country seats, to such a degree, and in such a discrete manner, as the noblest Christians might be proud to imitate. As to those of lower rank, especially such as deal in the peddling mercantile way, one may say of them, what the Spaniards say of the Andalusians:

El Andaluz haze la Cruz.

How they were re-admitted into this kingdom, after having been so long kept out of it by <sup>Their new</sup> severe laws, we have already hinted, in speaking of Manasse ben Israel; and this privilege hath <sup>epoch from</sup> appeared so considerable to them, that they have made a new epocha of it, which they cause <sup>their admission</sup> to be engraven on their monuments, and date their most considerable writings from it. And <sup>into England.</sup> having obtained leave to build a synagogue, they stiled it Holy Assembly, and Jewish Parnassus<sup>e</sup>. They are here much more affable, familiar, and conversible, than in most other countries; and will not decline a dispute about religion, where it is only done by way of conversation, and will express their minds with great freedom. But when it is meant in order to convert some of the flock, the very priests and cachams will refuse it. Such a case the late learned bishop Kidder tells us happened unto him, who having desired a conference with one of them, in behalf of a young Jewess, who had already received some knowledge and relish for Christianity; the cacham not only declined it, but advised her parents to shut her up<sup>h</sup>. For, what- <sup>Hatred against</sup> ever kind allowance the strictest of them may make for those who renounce Judaism, to avoid <sup>Christian con-</sup> death, persecution, banishment, or even the loss of their goods, in which cases some of their <sup>verts.</sup> thalmudist doctors affirm, that the law doth allow them to dissemble; yet it is certain, that even the most remiss and loosest among them detest all that turn Christians on any other account; neither do any of these ever think it safe to go among, or converse with them afterwards.

We have now brought the history of the eastern and western Jews down to the close of the <sup>Their present</sup> seventeenth century; there remains only that we give our readers a short account of their <sup>state in all</sup> present state in all the parts of the world. Several eminent hands, both of their nation and <sup>parts of the</sup> among the Christians, have endeavoured to come to some tolerable knowledge of their number; <sup>world.</sup>

<sup>e</sup> BARRIOS Epist. ad. Kahal Kadosh, (Holy Assembly) de Londres, an. 1683. p. 22. of the Messiah.

<sup>h</sup> Demonstration

de Middelburg, dans la Zelande, l'an. du monde 5403, that is, A. C. 1643.

He afterwards enlarged and improved it, and translated it into Hebrew, and gave it the title of Tabnith Hekal, the Figure of the Temple. It was greatly admired by the learned, and the duke of Brunswick ordered a Latin version to be made of it, with proper cuts, that he might judge the better of it. Judab added to it a description of the tabernacle, and a treatise about the ark and the cherubims, and an exposition of the Psalms, in which he undertook to explain the metaphorical expressions of the thalmud, which he said cost him no small pains and study. He likewise wrote an account of some conferences which he had held with Christian doctors; but these two last works, and a third, in which he designed to shew the manner in which the Jewish morning and evening sacrifices were offered, have never been printed (30).

(30) Wolf, ubi sup. N. 1048. p. 593. Basnag. ubi sup. §. 18.

among whom we shall only select some few, who seem to us to have made the best enquiries after it.

R. Luzati's account of
them.

ONE of their late writers, who taught at Venice<sup>1</sup>, owns “it to be very difficult to come at the precise number of them, they being at this time dispersed over so many parts of the world. We can get no intelligence concerning the ten tribes carried away captive by Shalmanezar, nor of the country where they were settled, though the globe is now so well known. If we begin with the East, we know that there is a vast quantity of Jews in the kingdom of Persia, though they enjoy but little liberty there. The Turkish empire is their chief retreat, not only as they have been long since settled in it, but because a very great number of those that were expelled out of Portugal and Spain retired thither. They are more numerous in Constantinople and Salonichi (Theffalonica), than in any other part, and are reckoned to amount to above 80,000 in those two cities, and upwards of a million in the whole empire. A vast concourse of pilgrims flock to Jerusalem from all parts of the world, and bring thither great sums for the maintenance of their academies and numerous poor.

THEY are likewise dispersed all over Germany, especially in the emperor's dominions; but are still more numerous in Poland, Lithuania, and Russia; and it is there we have our academies, and several thousands of disciples, who study our laws both civil and canonical, because they there enjoy the privilege of judging all causes civil and criminal among themselves. They are not so numerous in the protestant states, which are severed from the church of Rome, though they are treated with greater charity and mildness, in the Low Countries, at Rotterdam, Amsterdam, Hamburg, and other free towns, where commerce is open to all strangers.

ALL the Italian princes tolerate and favour the Jews, and inviolably maintain them in their privileges, without any alteration; and I reckon that there are about 25,000 in that country. In Fez, Morocco, and other states, which are not subject to the Turks, they are so much the more numerous, as they can so easily pass thither from Spain and Portugal. There are many other places in Afric, along the sea-coasts, which are mostly peopled by Jews; but as they are not known to us, it is very difficult to fix the number of them.” Thus far our Venetian rabbi, concerning the present state of the Jewish nation.

That of Manasse
Ben Israel.

ON the other hand, R. Manasse Ben Israel, lately mentioned, who believed the return of all the Jews to be near at hand, thought it clearly signified by the prophet Isaiab (N); and justly observed<sup>k</sup> that noble prophecy could not be meant of the return from the Babylonish captivity, because God did not then call all the twelve tribes, much less all the dispersed of Israel, from all the countries of their captivity. He observes, in the next place, that this promised deliverance is stiled a second, because that universal one out of Egypt had preceded it; whereas that from Babylon was only confined to part of the two tribes of Judah and Levi, as was hinted in the last note: and when the Israelites left Affyria, to enter into the land of Judea, they did not go over any river, either of Egypt or Ethiopia, as God promises they shall do, at their second or general return, when the waters of the Nile and Euphrates shall be parted, to open a dry passage to the tribes, as had been done at the Red Sea and the Jordan (O).

BOTH

<sup>1</sup> R. SIMON LUZATI Discors. circa il stato de gli Hebrei. c. 18.

<sup>k</sup> MENASS. Esperanza de Israel.

(N) In that day, says the prophet (31), the Lord shall set his hand again, the second time to recover the remnant of his people, which shall be left, from Affyria, and from Egypt, and from Pathros, and from Cush (Ethiopia), and from Elam (Persia), and from Shinar (Babylon), and from Hamath (the East), and from the isles of the sea (the West). And he shall set up an ensign for the nations, and shall assemble the out-casts of Israel, and gather together the dispersed of Judah, from the four corners of the earth, &c. And in another place (32) he adds, And in that day the Lord shall beat, or shake down from the chanel of the river (Euphrates), unto the stream of Egypt (the Nile), and ye shall be gathered, one by one, O ye children of Israel, &c.

There are many other such passages in Isaiab, Jeremiah, and other prophets, which expressly mention a much more extensive recall of the Israelites than that from the Babylonish captivity ever was, in which not near one third part of even the tribes of Judah and Levi, or, as the thalmudists word it, only the bran or refuse, of them returned into Judea, as we have elsewhere shewn †. So that of course we must expect a more universal one, and more conformable to these prophecies, and which the Jews understand literally of a return of all the twelve tribes, and from all the countries of their dispersion, under the Messiah, and of their literally re-inhabiting of Palestine, the seat of their forefathers; but the generality of Christians, only of their conversion to Christianity. The truth seems to us to be between those two extremes, as we have had occasion to hint more than once, and may still, in the close of this chapter.

(O) According to this learned rabbi, the prophet chiefly mentions, 1. Affyria and Egypt, because it will be in those two provinces that the Israelites will be gathered together. 2. He speaks expressly of Pathros; by which must not be understood either Pelusium or Petra, but the Parthians near the Caspian Sea, where some of their doctors place the river Sabbation, on the other side of which a vast number of Jews are settled. 3. Cush is Ethiopia, where there are several tribes, especially in Abyssinia. 4. Elam is properly a province of Persia, on the other side of the Euphrates, full of dreadful

(31) Isai. xi. 11, & seq.

(32) Ch. xxvii. 12.

(†) See vol. iv. p. 3, & seq. & notes.

deserts,

- a BOTH rabbies differ only in this one point, that Luzatti gives up the ten tribes as long since lost, or so blended, that they cannot be discovered with any tolerable certainty; the other affirms them to be concealed in America, and other parts, where they have been miraculously preserved, by the Divine Providence, against this glorious recall, when they shall come forth from their respective settlements, and be re-united to the rest of their brethren in Affyria, whence the whole nation shall take their flight to Jerusalem, as birds to their nests. He grounds his opinion on several probable conjectures; as first, that some of the people of America are unknown to us, and seem to have no relation with the other nations of it. Secondly, the Spaniards affirm, that, upon their landing in Peru, they found a large stately edifice, dedicated to the Creator of the world; which cannot be supposed to have been built by the Indians, who were idolaters, and wholly then unacquainted with the use of iron tools, such as appeared to have been used in the building of it; so that it must of course be supposed to have been a synagogue, erected by the Jews. And, thirdly, this seems farther confirmed by a tradition of the Indians, that this palace, as they termed it, had been built by a whole nation, that wore beards, and were ancients than their Incas <sup>1</sup>.
- b R. MENASSE doth likewise quote an inscription found on a tomb in the island of St. Michel, which is one of the Azores, and mentioned by Genebrard <sup>m</sup>, and which, though somewhat difficult to be decyphered, unless it be by the transposition of letters, yet, by the character and words, appears plainly enough to have been done by some Jews, who were come into this island. To all which he adds the sentiments of a good number of Christians, who have helped to confirm him in his conjecture, concerning the ten tribes <sup>n</sup>. But all this put together will never outweigh what is urged against it (P). We have shewn in a former volume †, that those tribes were settled in the East, and in the neighbourhood of the river Euphrates, or rather along the Chaboras that falls into it; so that God seems to have brought them back into the very country whence he brought out their patriarch. We have likewise taken notice formerly *, that a great number of them came back into Judea, along with the Jewish captivity of Babylon, though they were from that time blended with them; and a late learned author, who hath endeavoured to vindicate Aristea's history of the Septuagint version, hath proved it still
- Opinion of the ten tribes being in America.*
A Jewish inscription at one of the Azores.
Menasse's notion confuted.
Ten tribes nowhere.

<sup>1</sup> Esperanza de Israel, p. 114, & seq. vol. i. p. 891, & notes.

<sup>m</sup> Ibid. p. 44.

* Id. ibid. vid. & vol. iv. p. 4.

<sup>n</sup> Ibid. p. 26, & seq. & 116.

† See

deserts, in which some part of the Jewish tribes are concealed. 5. Shinar is another province near Babylon, where Moses places the plain of that name; and Daniel mentions the sacred vessels of the temple to have been transported by the king of Babylon into the land of Shinar. 6. The land of Hamath is often mentioned in the sacred writings, and is rendered by the Chaldee Paraphrast, and those that follow him, the city of Antioch, by which he conjectures Antiochia Asiatica en Tartaria to be meant; for there were twelve cities of that name. 7. The Septuagint have rendered the word Hamah, or Hamath, the Sun, which it often signifies, in the prophetic writings, and doth therefore imply the East. So that the prophet speaks here of the Jews dispersed eastward of Palestine, that is in Asia Major, in the East Indies, China, &c. 8. The prophet foretells the coming of the Israelites out of the islands of the sea, which ought rather to have been rendered the isles or countries of the West (32), by which our rabbi understands all the countries west of Judea, or the Jews which are now settled in some parts of America.

Ninthly, and lastly, The prophet affirms that God will bring back the banished (or, as the word more properly implies, the cut-off or excommunicated) Israelites, because the ten tribes, severed from the rest, not only inhabit countries vastly distant from Judea, but lie concealed in the remotest parts of the earth, and among the Gentiles; but as to the Jews, the prophet says, that God will recall them from the four corners of the world; because, in fact, the tribe of Judah is dispersed into divers countries; and as it hath synagogues in America, it will return from all parts of the world; though there will then be no division or jealousy between it and the rest; for, adds the prophet, Ephraim shall not envy Judah, nor Judah vex Ephraim. And accordingly Ezekiel affirms, that they shall then have but one king, and shall not be any longer two nations nor two kingdoms (33).

(P) Much less will that which he adds of their being there concealed by a miracle, and their being conducted thither by the streights of Anian, which were not formed till after their passage, and in order to divide them from the rest. His pretending that they have had their kings, ancient laws, and are in possession of vast territories, &c. may be justly reckoned a Jewish fable, invented on purpose to raise the glory of their nation, and their being thus miraculously preserved and concealed from other nations till the coming of the Messiah, as an evasion against the universal testimony of travellers and historians to the contrary.

For whatever stress he may put on some of those he quotes, there is scarce one of them that speaks of the ten tribes, or of this pretended Jewish colony passing into America. The Spaniards, who have been so long masters of the greatest part of it, mention nothing of it, or, at most, offer only some dark and vague conjectures about it. In a word, this settlement of theirs hath been sought for in vain hitherto, some placing it in Peru, others in Brasil, others along that long ridge of mountains called Las Cordelleras; and where-ever they have found any people that differed ever so little from the native Indians, they have imagined them to be the Jews we are speaking of. So that we may safely conclude, that it is in the East, and not there, that we must seek for these tribes. Jews there are, indeed, in several parts of America; but as they form no body, but are dispersed in every place where gain invites them, they must be supposed to have come thither, since the discovery of that continent; for it would be strange, if the Jews, of all others, should have overlooked so rich a country, and not tried to share in the spoils of that new world.

(32) De hoc, vid. Genes. xxviii. 44. in the original.

(33) Esperanza de Israel, p. 103, & seq.

more fully °. As for those that staid behind, they not only spread themselves still farther as a they multiplied, but kept constantly sending their deputies and oblations at proper seasons to Jerusalem, as long as the temple stood. They appear to have continued there till the 11th century; since, as we have seen through the course of this chapter, they had all that time their chiefs of the captivity, synagogues, and academies; and though they have since been greatly decayed, through the various persecutions that were raised against them, and revolutions of that empire, yet they did still subsist in great numbers, during the 12th, 13th, and 14th centuries, and do so to this day. So that we need not go to America to seek them out, nor suppose them either lost or concealed in some remote quarter of the globe. And if they are so blended one tribe with another, that they cannot now be possibly distinguished, it could hardly, without a miracle, have happened otherwise, during so long a series of ages, and b such various vicissitudes as they have undergone (Q).

Jews in China not of that number.

Alvarez's account of
them.

SEVERAL authors, both Jews and Christians, have likewise affirmed, that the ten tribes were still preserved in China °. And one of the former tells us that there was a synagogue at Peking, the repairing of which had cost them 10,000 crowns, and that they had been settled in that province above 500 years, and still kept one of the volumes of the law. He adds, that in the city of Ham-cheu, capital of the province of Che-kyang, they had a great number of synagogues, and Israelitish families; for that is the name they call themselves by; because, says he, being descended from the ten tribes, they know nothing of that of Jews. Alvarez, who had lived in China a considerable time, affirms, that they had been settled there above 600 years, and had obtained several privileges, on account of their services and fidelity c to king Hun: that they were very numerous in some provinces, and have synagogues in most of their great cities, but more especially in that of Ho-nan, and in its metropolis Kai-tong-fu, where they have a fair synagogue, a repository for the sacred volume, adorned with rich curtains, and in which they preserve an ancient Bible in Hebrew characters, but refuse to let any one see it. These Jews, however, we are told, know nothing of Hebrew, and only mention the names of David, Abraham, and Isaac; are very ignorant and remiss in their law, even to the neglecting of circumcision, because the Chinese upbraid them with the cruelty of performing that ceremony on innocent babes ° (R).

That of other authors.

THAT author tells us moreover, that they have no notion of the Christian Messiah °: whence he infers, that they were settled there before the time of Christ; though this rather proves d their ignorance, than their boasted antiquity, if it was not rather a Jewish evasion, and such as they have since made use of to another of the same fraternity, who had the curiosity to go ° Vindication of the Septuag. p. 121, & seq. expeditione, apud Sinas suscepta. China, c. 30. p. 212.

p MENASSE, Esperanza de Israel, Trigant de Christiana ° ALVAREZ's Hist. of China, part i.

r ALVAREZ's Hist.

(Q) The two Jewish travellers we have quoted under the 12th century, have indeed represented those eastern Jews, and their princes or chiefs, as descended from the tribe of Judab, rather than from the ten tribes; and it is not unlikely, that great numbers of them might not only seek shelter there among their brethren, after the destruction of Jerusalem, but in process of time gain some kind of superiority over the rest, on account of the sceptre and other prerogatives intailed on that tribe. But that will be no argument against what we have said of the other ten continuing still settled in these parts with them, and spreading themselves still farther eastward and northward; and what confirms it still farther, is, that many of the remotest of them still preserved the name of Israelites, and knew little or nothing of what happened to that of Judab, after their being carried away by Shalmanezzer.

(R) It is not easy to reconcile this with what he there adds, that though they marry with Chinese women, they do not give their daughters to the Chinese, for fear they should follow the religion of their husbands; that they live at a distance from slaughter-houses and butchers-shops, on account of their selling of swine's flesh; and that they have their own butchers to kill their beasts after the Jewish manner, and keep a strict eye over them. Another author tells us, that they neither use statues or pictures, but worship the Deity under the title of Tien Chamlin, the name by which the Chinese express the Creator of the Universe (34). This is not the only thing they have taken from the Chinese; for they do, like them, pay some honours to their Chinghims, or great doctors of their law, and burn perfumes to their memory, but do not use images or statues of them, as being forbid by their religion; having only a kind of incense pots of different sizes, the biggest of which are for Abraham, Isaac, Jaacob, Moses, and David. A table likewise they have over the chair, on which is written the emperor's name, and is instead of his picture or arms.

They do moreover pay an honour to the great Confucius, as all the Chinese do; and, when questioned about it, readily owned, "That they honoured him in the same manner, as all the literati of China did, and that they assited with them at the solemn ceremonies, which are performed in the hall of their great men. They added, that they likewise paid honour to their ancestors, as the Chinese were used to do, in spring and autumn; but that they did not offer to them any swine's flesh, but that of other creatures; and that in their ordinary ceremonies, they contented themselves with presenting them with china vessels full of sweet-meats, and other such refreshments; and as to those that are accompanied with profound bowing, &c. they were not performed in the synagogue, but in the hall adjoining to it."

- a and visit that synagogue, an. 1704. This last, whose account we shall subjoin in the next paragraph, having asked one of their chiefs, whether they had ever heard of the promised Messiah, who, he told them, was called Jesus Christ? received this illusory answer: Our Scriptures mentioned only one holy man of that name, viz. Jesus the son of Sirach; and that they knew of no other but him<sup>s</sup>. The reader may find not only the like equivocating answer given to the same Jesuit, upon his asking them, how numerous they were in that empire, in a former volume†; but such a one as not only contradicts all the other accounts we have hitherto quoted from other authors; and was, beyond all question, designed to conceal from him their flourishing state in that country, whether out of suspicion, or hatred to his society, we will not determine.
- b THE farther account he gives of those of this city is, that they had a stately synagogue Jews numerous with divers apartments, in the heart of which was a high desk, on which they placed the in Honan. volume of the law on festival days. They pretended to him, that they had a very ancient copy of it; but that the river Hoembo, or, Yellow River, one of the largest in China, having overflowed the city of Caifom, capital of that province, they had, with much difficulty, saved it; but the leaves of it being wetted, and the letters effaced, they had caused twelve new copies to be written, which were preserved in twelve different tabernacles. There is no room to doubt, but that these were real Jews, since they not only distinguished the five books of Moses by their Hebrew titles, but mentioned likewise the antient judges and monarchs of their nation; and the testimony of that missionary is the less to be suspected, since, being ignorant of the Hebrew tongue, he relates those matters exactly as they were told to him. But those Their pretend- Jews do most likely give themselves a much greater antiquity than is consistent with truth; ed antiquity. seeing they pretend to have been settled there under the government of the fifth dynasty, or royal family called Han, computed to have reigned from 206 years before the Christian æra, to the 220th after it. One might indeed imagine from thence, that they retired thither some time before or after the destruction of Jerusalem; but the difficulty is, how to suppose that they could go so far for a retreat, or reach it so soon, considering the little acquaintance, if any, they had of that remote part of the world. But we shall refer all further disquisition about them here, having given a fuller account of it from the same author in the history of China, to which we refer the reader*.
- d WE are still more at a loss what to think of a letter, written in Hebrew, which the Jews of A Letter from Cochin are said to have sent, some time ago, to the synagogue of Amsterdam†; for they there those of Cochin tell them, "That they retired into the Indies, when the Romans conquered the Holy Land." to those of "They pretend to have had seventy-two kings, who succeeded each other within the space of Amsterdam. 1000 years; but that afterwards, the jealousy of two brothers having kindled a war between them, whilst they were contesting for the crown, the neighbouring princes subdued them. Since which time they have continued in subjection to the Indian kings; but have, however, given such proofs of their fidelity to them, that Samuel Castoel, who died an. 1640, was governor of Cochin, and left his government to a man of the same name and religion." It were hard to decide whether this letter be true or false, as we have no proofs against the Jewish historians; yet that succession of seventy-two monarchs, founded on their retreat to Cochin, ever since the reduction of Judea by Titus, seems rather invented to raise the glory of the Jewish nation. And we are only referred to distant times, and to unknown histories, because their present state hath nothing worth our admiration‡.
- ALL that we can infer from the various accounts above-mentioned is, that the Jews are dis- In the East Indies. persed about in the East Indies; that they are settled at Cochin, at Goa, Malabar, China, and even in America; but that none of these are descended from the ten tribes, whom we have shewn to be seated near the Euphrates in Persia, and other neighbouring countries, where though very poor, yet they have still maintained themselves to this time. The others are only families whom commerce hath attracted into those parts since their dispersion, but which can only be distinguished by some uncertain, not to say false, tradition. Neither doth it appear that they have had any monarchs or supreme government in any country. They live in the Every-where East, and in America, as they do in Europe, under the dominion of other princes, whether in subjection. Christians or Gentiles; and those in America, especially in the Portuguese and Spanish dominions, are often made to pay dear for their avarice and dissimulation; being frequently detected and severely punished by the tribunal of the inquisition, as we have elsewhere hinted. In Turkey, Fez, Barbary, and Egypt, indeed, they are somewhat more than tolerated, and are

* Recueil de lettres edifiantes & curieuses, vol. vii. let. i. ad fin.

† See before, vol. iii. p. 572, & seq.

‡ BARRIOS's Hist. Universal. Jud.

† See before, vol. iii. p. 574.

‡ BASNAG. ubi sup.

ch. 38. §. 13.

sometimes admitted into public functions (S), especially in Egypt *. The Ottoman princes do even send them on some embassies; at which times they value themselves upon making a more than ordinary appearance for the credit of their nation; and their flourishing condition under that government makes them so numerous, that they are reckoned to amount to a million: so that, upon the whole, one may allow them to have about 1,300,000 dispersed all over the East, and upwards of three millions in all the world.

Jews among the Papists and Protestants;

their partiality to the former.

Great freedom in Poland.

Complaint against the Protestants.

High value for themselves.

Great expectation of the Messiah.

THE Jewish writers, whom we lately quoted, divide the West into two sovereignties, or rather into the two principal religions that reign in it, viz. the Roman Catholic and the Protestant; and by an odd perverseness, or perhaps flattery, are not ashamed to extol the kind protection and favour they receive from the former, and to complain of the unkind treatment they meet with from the latter. Roma pontificia, says Barrios, sempre los ha patrocinado desde, quea destruye Jerusalem su general Tito *: “Popish Rome,” says he, “hath always protected them, ever since its general Titus destroyed Jerusalem (T).” It is true, the generality of the popes have been their patrons and protectors; but it is no less certain, that some of them have likewise been their enemies and persecutors; and the same may be said of the other princes and states of Italy; though, upon the whole, they have received more good than harm from them, as we have shewn through this chapter. But how can this be said of France, Portugal, and Spain, from which they have been so long banished; and where those that have ventured to stay, were forced to do it at the expence of their religion; and where they live under the worst of dissimulations, and in continual danger of being discovered and burnt? They meet with kinder usage in the emperor’s dominions, and especially in Poland, Lithuania, and Russia; but though their learning and academies thrive there more than in other places, they are still kept poor, or, at least, they fall far short of the flourishing condition of those in England and Holland; and this might, one would think, make them give the preference to these, in point of encouragement and hospitality: yet so it is, that they complain against the Protestants without exception, as not treating them with so much humanity as they could wish: though, as we have already observed, they enjoy under them all the liberty, both of religion and commerce, and live in all the quietness and safety they can reasonably desire. But, it must be owned, they are excessively proud of their origin, and value themselves so much upon being the witnesses to the whole world of the unity of God, the favourite people of his providence, and the royal offspring of the friend of God, that they think it injurious to them, to suspect them either of baseness or treachery. On these accounts they highly resent, not only every slight they meet with, and every restraint that is laid on them, but are very uneasy and impatient under their present state of servitude and subjection to other nations; whom they look upon as their inferiors, in point of antiquity, religion, and national pre-eminence.

UNDER all these grating disadvantages they comfort themselves with the assurance, that the so long promised Messiah’s appearance cannot be far off, who will turn the tables in their favour; and, in the most triumphant manner, gather them up from all the four corners of the earth, and settle them in the land of their fathers, where they shall, with inexpressible joy and wonder, see their holy temple and city rebuilt more gloriously than ever, their religion embraced by all the sons of Adam, and the whole globe submitted to his sceptre. These are their hopes; which not only they, but a great number of Christians, firmly believe are founded on the clearest and most express prophecies of the Old and New Testament (V). But as to * MENASSE BEN ISRAEL, Esperanza, p. 103, & seq. BASNAG. ubi sup. §. 15.

P. 3.

* BARRIOS, ubi sup.

(S) A modern historian affirms, on what grounds is not easy to guess, that Soliman granted them a city with all its dependencies, at the petition of one Miches, who was in high favour with that Soltan’s son (35). But, as neither Jewish nor any other writer that we know of takes notice of any such grant, and we do not find that they ever had any peculiar town given to them, we may suppose it to be either a mistake of Strada, or else that it was but a short-lived grant.

(T) By this our readers may judge what an expert historian he was, that could imagine Titus to be the pope’s general; and yet he is far enough from being the worst of them, as appears by what we have observed of some of the rest at the beginning of this history (†).

(V) To sum up here all these express texts and prophecies, about their final conversion, would be only to repeat what we have, upon all proper occasions, taken care to inculcate through the first and second part of their history (*); and what cannot fail of occurring to every attentive reader both of the Old and New Testament. Whoever considers part of the prophetic song of the good old Simeon concerning Christ, that he was to be the Glory of his People Israel (36), or what the Apostle says of the latter being again to be received into God’s favour and saving fold (37), and can persuade himself, that these promises have been as yet fulfilled; let those who think so, tell us, what blessings or glory the Jewish nation have gained by the coming

(35) Strada de Bell. Belgic. lib. iv. p. 285.

(†) Anc. Hist. vol. i. & iv. pass.

(*) Id. ibid.

(36) Luke ii. 32.

(37) Vid. int. al. Rom. xi. pass.

- a to the time of their being fulfilled, both sides have been so often out in their calculations, that neither dare now pretend to guess; and the former have even forbid, under the severest anathema, the very enquiring after it. However, both they and we believe, and not without good grounds, that it will not be long before we see some forerunner of those glorious days, when that long-promised sun shall shine, which will at once enlighten both hemispheres. But as these are points that belong more to divines than to historians to discuss, we shall dive no farther into them here. Only thus much we beg leave to observe, from their wonderful preservation to this day, under all difficulties, hatred, persecutions, and other disadvantages we have seen them labour under, not only from their deliverance out of Egypt, and their return from the Babylonish captivity, but more especially from their last and universal dispersion by the Romans into all nations and countries, without either kings or princes, without temple, altar, priests, sacrifices, or any of those more sensible parts of religion, for which they had always such a natural fondness, and which kept them united in their own once happy land; or any comfortable prospect, much less assurance, of their seeing an end to their miserable slavery, to their doubts and fears that the time of the Messiah's coming have been long elapsed; that nothing but a visible and miraculous Providence could effect it, or could have supported their faith and hope, and kept them steady to their religion, during above seventeen centuries, under such difficulties and discouragements.
- b AND, on the other hand, when we reflect on their numbers, the great misery of some, and opulence of other countries, their earnest wishes for a deliverer, their readiness to close in with every impostor that assumed that title, and the many and strenuous efforts they have made under some of them, in order to recover their liberty, and raise themselves above the powers that oppress them, and how strangely they have been disappointed in them all, we cannot but conclude, that a Divine Providence must have displayed itself as much in their disappointment, as it hath in their preservation, till He shall accomplish all his gracious designs and promises both towards them and all the rest of mankind.
- c

Their preservation miraculous.

Vain attempts to recover their liberty as wonderful.

of Christ? "That miserable nation," to use the words of a learned divine (38), "hath been scattered over the face of the earth, is looked upon as the curse and scourging of it, and groans under a servitude and captivity of near two thousand years; and can it be supposed, that they shall continue so to the end of the world, and perish in their misery? If the case be so, we must look upon all those prophecies in their favour as mere illusions; and that they have been deceived by false oracles, and with vain hopes; for it would be a mere ridicule on the Sacred Writings to tell us, that those promises have been fulfilled in those few Jews who embraced Christianity; a great part of whom proved such half converts, that they only served to introduce the cursed sect and heresy of the Ebionites and Nazarites. We must then say, that those great and singular promises will meet with their completion before the end of the world.

"And it is in fact one of the Christian doctrines, founded on a great number of divine prophecies, that the Jews shall be recalled; and the miraculous manner wherein they have been hitherto preserved, seems to be an unanswerable proof it: for it is a fact without example, and at the same time, beyond conception, that God should preserve them these seventeen centuries, dispersed as they are among all nations, without being blended with them, or adopting their religion or manners as other dispersed nations have done: which seems plainly to hint, that God reserves them for some great end. Let us now suppose, that they shall be converted, if the end of the world happens so soon after it, that neither they nor their children shall enjoy those glorious advantages which have been promised to them, how can they be said to see the fulfilling of so many oracles in their favour. Shall such a vast many millions of souls be lost, during these 1700 years, whilst only few, in comparison, shall be saved at the end of the world? And will these be sufficient to answer the high idea which those glorious promises, made to that nation, plainly give us?

"And here let us further observe, that it was to them that the Messiah was promised; and that they were from the beginning nurtured up in the sure hope of his coming, and to look upon him as the greatest blessing that Heaven could pour upon them. He came accordingly; and the only accomplishment of those great promises which they found, was to see their temple and city burnt to the ground, its worship abolished, and themselves and children scattered over the world, and become the contempt and abhorrence of the rest of mankind: so that, instead of such signal and extraordinary blessings, as they hoped from him, he brings them nothing but a long series of shame and misery, and such as never befel any other nation. But at length, about the end of the world, some few millions of them will be converted, and share a better fate than the rest; and this will be all the advantage they shall reap from all those magnificent prophecies. If that be their case, there can be no reconciling the divine conduct with his promises. A time therefore must either come, in which that Messiah shall reign over the Jewish nation, and raise it above all others in the world, according to these express predictions, or else they must be looked upon as false and deceitful, and only given to be a snare unto them." Thus far our author; and we may add, that these are not difficulties raised by an enthusiastic millenarian, but the reflections of a sound and unbiassed divine; and such as, we doubt not, he had either heard from, or read in, the Jewish writings he had been conversant with, and any other man may have heard objected by all the learned Jews he meets with. It will be therefore in vain to hope to make any sincere converts among them, till all these difficulties be more effectually removed than they have hitherto been; or indeed by any other way than by allowing to them this second coming and reign of Christ. But for this, we shall refer our readers to what we have hinted in a former volume (*), and to the additional remarks with which we shall conclude this.

(38) Jurieu accomplissement des propheties, tom. ii. p. 205, & seq. & 307. p. 613.

(*) See Anc. Hist. vol. i.

Aversion to Christianity.

IF it should be objected, that we are here hardening them in their unbelief, and persuade <sup>a</sup> them to put off their conversion till that promised time, let it be considered how few real converts have been made either here or abroad, since the first ages of Christianity, by mere dint of argument; how averse their doctors are to enter into a fair conference with Christians of any denomination, and how fearful their unlearned ought to be to attempt it without them; how many of those pretended and zealous converts have at length apostatized (of which we have given so many pregnant instances through the course of this chapter, and could have added as many more as would fill a volume); what rancour they have shewn, what horrid blasphemies they have vented, against Christ and his Gospel, after their return into Judaism; and what dreadful curses they all vomit against those of their nation that embrace it upon any laudable and sincere motive; and we shall have little cause to fear, that what we have said <sup>b</sup> above will hinder their real, much less their general, conversion; and be apt to think, with our learned Joseph Mede, and many other eminent divines, that this last will not be effected without a miraculous intervention of the same Divine Providence, which so visibly displayed <sup>c</sup> itself at the first planting and propagation of the Gospel.

Final conversion miraculous.

An enquiry into the true causes of the Jews unbelief.

As we are therefore drawing near the conclusion, not only of the Jewish history, but like- <sup>c</sup> wise of the history of Asia, our readers, we hope, will not be displeased, if (setting aside all theological conjectures concerning the time and wondrous manner of their universal recall, whether into the ancient land of Palestine, or their admission into the spiritual church of Christ, which can claim no room in a work like this) we close up the history of their dispersion with a few curious and interesting remarks, which could not be well inserted in the body, without interrupting the thread and series of it: and herein we shall confine ourselves to such only, as will afford them the greatest light that can be possibly struck out of all the numerous volumes which have been written on that dark and so much controverted subject, and at the same time reconcile that unhappy wavering nation to the certainty and infallibility of the divine promises in favour of it, of which their mistaken notions about the time and manner of their completion, have made the major part of it, in a great measure, to despond, if not wholly to despair; inasmuch that, to our certain knowledge, and their own confession, very many of those in England and Holland, carried on by the rapid stream of infidelity now reigning, are sunk into a downright disbelief of the divine authority of their sacred books. <sup>d</sup>

The rock on which they have chiefly split.

It will not therefore appear foreign to our subject, to point out, both to our Jewish and Christian readers, the fatal rock on which the former have unhappily split, and lost all the benefit of those great and singular promises; and the wrong methods which have been taken by the latter to convince them of their error, and which have only served to confirm them the more in their fatal prejudices, against the person, character, and doctrine, of our Divine Messiah. These two points we think the more proper to be fairly stated, as they will at once fully account for the invincible obstinacy of the one, and for the ill-success of the other, in spite of the most soothing attractives, and the most affecting determents, made use of in every age and country, and by no nation more than by those who professed Christianity, to induce or oblige them to abjure a religion so diametrically opposite to their present interest <sup>e</sup> and peace, and so destructive to all their future prospects and ill-grounded hopes.

Their long duration next to miraculous;

EVERY thinking reader, who hath seriously reflected on this invincible attachment of a whole nation, dispersed as they are over every part of the world, without king or high-priest, without authority, or any bands of society to keep them united, and what is still worse, despised, oppressed, and persecuted, yet persevering in it during above sixteen whole centuries, under all the imaginable discouragements, uncertainties, and anxiety of mind, and destitute of even the least glimmering prospect of their so long, so earnestly wished-for restoration; whoever, we say, seriously reflects on this their surprising attachment to a religion, which hath hitherto not only deluded all their fond hopes of a Messiah to come, but hath exposed them to the contempt and scorn of the world, will be forced to own, that some stronger tie than <sup>f</sup> the bare prejudice of education must have supported them in it, or else there would have been long since a total end of Jewish faith and hopes, as well as of all distinction between them and other nations, and they had long enough ago been blended with, and embraced the religion of, such as had given them the greatest encouragement to settle amongst them, had not the Divine Providence, for wise ends, no less in favour of them than for the confirmation of the gospel, prevented their total apostacy, and preserved a more than sufficient number of them every-where, to be standing unexceptionable evidences of the divine authority of the sacred Hebrew code, either until the end of the world, or, as is most probable, till the pre-ordained time of the complete conversion of the Gentiles, when they shall be admitted into the same fold with them, and readily acknowledge the divine authority of the New: so that <sup>g</sup> what was once a great stumbling-block to them, viz. the incorporation of the heathen into the Christian church, shall, by a divine effect of Providence, be turned into a means of their admission into it, and both become glad partakers of the same universal benefit.

and a standing evidence of the truth of the holy scriptures.

- a THAT it was in favour of the former, that the same All-wise Goodness conducted the Septuagint version, or translation of the sacred Hebrew books, into Greek, the language then most known, and in use over the greatest part of the world, some centuries before the completion of the most signal prophecies contained in it, we have fully shewn in a former part of this work <sup>b</sup>, and they alone received the benefit of it; whilst the incredulous Jews, even those among them who had expressed the greatest zeal for it, as having in a great measure lost their Hebrew tongue, being now enraged at the successful use which the primitive preachers made of it, to convert the Gentile world, left no stone unturned, or foul means untried, to sink it into the lowest discredit <sup>c</sup>. It could not enter into their hearts, that the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, ever designed to be the God of the Gentiles also, in the same
- b sense as he was theirs, or would set them on a level with them. Whatever promises and prophecies they had that intimated any thing like it, such as, that in Abraham's seed all nations should be blessed <sup>d</sup>; that they should all in time be gathered under the banner, and be partakers of the light and blessing of the Messiah <sup>e</sup>, they understood in no higher sense than that of a temporal conquest, which should bring them all under his obedience, yet in such a manner, that those who readily submitted to his sceptre, should esteem themselves highly blessed in the service of so illustrious a conqueror, and of a nation so peculiarly chosen, and so highly favoured by the Almighty; whilst those who either unwillingly submitted to the yoke, or behaved contemptuously or cruelly against them, should become the unhappy objects of their resentment, and be doomed to undergo a more dreadful tyranny under them, than they themselves underwent in Egypt, Babylon, or since their last dispersion. This was their notion of the reign of the promised Messiah, at the time of Christ appearing among them; and how opposite to the nature of the Divine Being, who is no respecter of persons, &c. <sup>f</sup>; how contrary to all his express declarations by his prophets; and much more manifestly, and, if we may be allowed the expression, how feelingly opposite to their completion; which, to their dread and amazement, ended in their rejection, and the utter ruin of that small share of power and authority they had left. Nor was this fatal prejudice rooted out of their hearts by this severe shock, but hath been, with the most surprising obstinacy, propagated and cherished by the whole nation from that time to this; and to this day they still retain the same notions of a temporal conquering Messiah, who shall subdue the whole earth, rebuild the holy city and temple, restore the ancient Mosaic worship of it, and oblige all nations and people to forsake their various religions, and observe the Mosaic law under the severest penalties.
- c THIS, therefore, is their grand stumbling-block, the fatal rock of offence against which they have split: nor will they acknowledge a Messiah under any other character than that; how much less can they ever be prevailed on to submit to one who appeared, spoke, and acted, in a manner so very opposite to it, and to all their temporal views and expectations? As for the difficulties which are justly objected out of the sacred writings, against this their vain expectation, such as, that no other Messiah hath appeared since in such a splendid character, much less within the time limited by the most celebrated prophecies that foretold his coming; that is, before the sceptre was departed from Judah <sup>g</sup>; 2dly, before the completion of Daniel's weeks <sup>h</sup>; and, 3dly, during the standing of the second temple <sup>i</sup>; these, and many more of the like nature, irrefragable as they are, and unanswered as they know them to have been by any of their rabbinic tribe, they have found some artful subterfuges and chicanery to evade; but such as, whatever impression they may make on the mind and conscience of a prejudiced Jew, rather betray a tacit desire to disguise their inability to remove them, as we have elsewhere proved against them <sup>k</sup>. And thus, by their false glosses upon, or unfair cavilling about, the most pregnant prophecies against them, they have made shift these sixteen hundred years to keep up the drooping and bewildered hopes of their nation, that whatever delay their sins, and those of their forefathers, may have occasioned with relation to the coming of the Messiah, nothing but a total apostacy of their nation can possibly prevent his appearing in God's time, and in the glorious manner they have been taught to expect him; by which means, they have been enabled to linger out that long series of centuries in this dreadful state of uncertainty, ever eager to catch at the least shadow of hope, and to listen to every impostor, though at the hazard of the most mortifying disappointment, and addition to their anxieties.
- d
- e
- f

OF this we have given a sufficient number of instances during the course of this chapter, and many more we might have added to them, had our stated boundaries permitted it. One, however, we cannot pass by, which happened soon after the pretended discovery of Prestor John's kingdom, or empire of Abissinia, of which we shall speak in the next volume. No sooner had the news reached Europe, that some Portuguese had discovered that much

<sup>b</sup> See Anc. Hist. vol. iv. p. 40, & seq.

<sup>c</sup> Ibid. 39, & seq.

<sup>d</sup> Gen. xxi. 18.

<sup>e</sup> Isai.

xlii. 6. xlix. 6, & alib. plur.

<sup>f</sup> Acts x. 34, & seq.

<sup>g</sup> Genes. xlix. 10. See also Anc. Hist.

vol. i. p. 462 (G), iv. p. 256.

<sup>h</sup> See Anc. Hist. vol. iv. p. 153 (P).

<sup>i</sup> Haggai, ii. 9, & seq.

<sup>k</sup> See the last quoted places out of the Anc. Hist.

sought-for kingdom, and found it to be governed by a monarch lineally descended from king a Solomon, the son of David, that he and all his subjects were circumcised, that they observed the sabbath, and abstained from swine's-flesh, and other unclean meats, &c. than the Jews, both in Europe and Asia, were elevated beyond measure at the report; and took it for granted, that both the Ethiopian monarch and his subjects were Jews; and that the promised sceptre of Judah was preserved among them by a Divine Providence. The vastness of his dominions, the magnificence of his court, and other particulars relating to that newly disco-covered empire, were greatly exaggerated by the two Portuguese Jews who were sent upon that discovery. The learned rabbi Abravanel, of whom, and of whose works we have given an account a little higher <sup>1</sup>, and who was then at Lisbon, took occasion, from this agreeable piece of news, to extol the glory and numerousness of the Jewish nation, in one of his com- b ments on the minor prophets. About the same time a letter was trumped up, and printed by those of Constantinople, and dispersed amongst those of their nation, far and near, in the Hebrew tongue and character, and pretended to be written and sent to them by the Abissinian emperor. They had caused it to be translated into most European languages, and sent to the whole Jewish brotherhood, backed by sundry other artful circumstances, which failed not to raise, as usual, the spirits, if not the triumph, of the tribe of Judah, where-ever the news had reached.

Forge a letter from that emperor to them.

It proved, however, but a short-lived one; and the Portuguese had no sooner penetrated into the Abissinian empire, than they found it to be all Christian, monarch as well as subjects; and that though they still retained the old Jewish rites above-mentioned, yet they had, by their c own confession, been converted to Christianity ever since the time of the apostles, as we shall more fully shew when we come to that part of their history. This new discovery not only put an end at once to all the joy and hopes of the Jewish nation, but filled them with confusion and despondency: and since this so much wished and sought-for sceptre of Judah could not be found in any of the three old known parts of the world, they quickly resolved to go in quest of it among the many vast and newly discovered tracts of America, and try their fortune in that new world; where we shall rejoin them again at the close of this chapter, and see to what a height of triumph one of their great rabbies improved a few dark and vague hints, sent to him from thence in favour of the royal dignity and of the Jewish nation: so deter-minate are they, at all adventures, to compass sea and land in quest of it, or even to believe d it still flourishing in the clouds, or depths of the sea, rather than allow it to have been absorbed in, or, to speak more truly, dignified and exalted into a spiritual sceptre and kingdom, by that very person, whom their grand sanhedrim condemned to the most ignominious of deaths, for impiously arrogating that extraordinary dignity to himself; and which, had it really belonged to him, that supreme court ought, and would, without all doubt, have been the first and readiest to acknowledge and proclaim it to the whole world. For so they actually judge, one and all, of that whole transaction; and cannot, without the utmost abhorrence, imagine the bare possibility, that the grand council of their nation, unerring as they conceive it then was, to have been so fatally blinded in a matter of the greatest consequence, and to have ever been capable of passing so unjust a sentence on a person of his extraordinary merit e and character. This reflexion, just and affecting as it is, must of course give an additional weight to their averfeness to the gospel, which represents them as guilty of that atrocious fact, and as rejected by God, their city and temple demolished, the whole Jewish nation as groaning under the most grievous captivity on that account, and the Gentiles as admitted in their stead into Christ's spiritual kingdom. And what a series of the most mortifying truths are these, for that once so favoured a people to believe and acknowledge, before they can be admitted into it themselves; and what discouragement must it be, moreover, to so carnal a people, to forego and renounce all their expectations of a temporal and glorious one, as their learned men had, with so much care and pains, delineated to themselves, out of the figurative and pompous expressions of the prophets, and described as abounding with every thing that is f magnificent and attractive, for the sake of one that was founded in the deepest humility and self-denial, and promised no other earthly satisfaction, but what resulted from the practice of the sublimest moral and social virtues, and the prospect of a future life. But more especially still, as that is in fact giving up the whole authority of their thalmud, which, we have shewn elsewhere, they hold to be greater than that of the Hebrew text <sup>m</sup>, and casting a heinous reflection on the writers and compilers of it, who have been most lavish in their descriptions of the earthly pomp and glory of it, as having represented it in a manner quite opposite to the meaning of the sacred volumes, and to what Christ now peremptorily affirmed it was to be. And can we wonder at their crying out with one voice, as in the parable, WE WILL NOT HAVE THIS MAN

Disbelief of a spiritual sceptre and kingdom.

Send in quest of it to America.

<sup>1</sup> See before, p. 576 (C), & seq.

<sup>m</sup> See before, Anc. Hist. vol. i. p. 596 (B).

a TO REIGN OVER US", or at those who have come after them, for continuing in the same obdurate averfeness to a religion, which exacts so much, and offers so little, of what they have been so long inured to esteem the greatest blessings of Heaven, peace and riches, power and plenty, a numerous posterity and dominion over all the world? All which, and many more, they expect will flow on all hands like a torrent upon them, under the reign of their Messiah.

BUT, on the other hand, seeing such hath been their fatal blindness, to prefer the uncertain and temporal blessings of the old law, before the more sure, valuable, and lasting ones of the glorious gospel (uncertain we call the former, because, as we have had occasion to observe Bewildered about the temporal one.

b prefixed by the sacred oracles, hath thrown them into the greatest uncertainty<sup>o</sup>), and that preference founded only on an erroneous notion, that the Mosaic dispensation, and consequently its promises, as well as precepts, were of an eternal and unalterable nature; what more effectual method could the Divine Providence take to undeceive them in both respects, after they had rejected the Messiah whom he had sent to them, in his predicted time and character, than, first, to cause his temple at Jerusalem, the centre of the Mosaic worship, to be utterly destroyed, and to lie in ruins ever since, to convince them of the abolition of the one, and then to scatter them over the world, and make them undergo the longest and hardest slavery, under those very Gentiles, over whom they expected to gain an absolute and irreverfible dominion, under their vainly expected Messiah, till it had brought them to the acknowledgement of the true one. Such an affecting argument against them, should, one might have reasonably expected, been more than sufficient to have drove them to it; and to have convinced them long ago, not only of the vanity but absurdity of their expectations; how derogatory to the Divine Justice and Goodness, and how opposite they were to the true interest and happiness of mankind; had not this partial, selfish prejudice, in favour of their own nation, too manifestly verified the charge of the prophet against them<sup>p</sup>; that their hearts The just cause of their blindness, were become gross and carnal; so that, having eyes they saw not, ears but heard not, and hearts incapable of understanding what was of the utmost consequence to them to know; namely, that the blessings designed by the Divine Wisdom to adorn and signalize the Messiah, were of a far nobler, sublimer, and more lasting nature, than all that worldly pomp and grandeur d they so stupidly dreamed of, and their carnal hearts were so strongly set upon. But since all these severe methods, the properest, if not the only ones, that could, without infringement and oppressed state. upon their rational liberty, rectify this strong and long contracted bias, have hitherto proved ineffectual; need we wonder at the Divine Providence continuing them still under the same discipline and regimen, till their end is fully answered, and their cure effectually wrought. But we shall here refer our readers, for a farther display of this dispensation of God towards them, to that most learned and elegant account which the apostle hath given us of it in his epistle to the Romans<sup>q</sup>; and where he will see the source of their incredulity, as well as their wonderful preservation to the happy time of their general conversion, to be standing monuments of the truth of the antient prophecies, fully accounted for, and the Divine Justice and Goodness, with respect to his designs and dealings towards them, clearly vindicated, and duly magnified.

NOR hath this fatal prejudice, in favour of a conquering Messiah, and his supposed glorious reign, stopped here. They have not only renounced, and still persist to do so, and vilify the promised and more signal redemption, which Christ offered to them from sin and punishment, as contrary to their expectation, that he was to deliver them from the Roman yoke, and subdue those tyrants and the rest of the world under their subjection (though this notion of a temporal deliverance appears to have been only taken up about this time, when they had smarted so long under the Romans; the more ancient of their doctors entertained a much more sublime notion of it (W), and dreamed of nothing less than such imaginary conquests and universal dominion); but, in order to justify their unjust and impious deeds, and suppress as much as possible the murmuring and discontent of those few amongst them who condemned it; not <sup>n</sup> Luke xix. 14.

Acts, ult. 26, & seq.

<sup>o</sup> Vid. int. al. p. 609, & seq.

<sup>q</sup> Chap. xi. pass. & alib. plur.

<sup>p</sup> Isai. vi. 9, & seq. & alib. Matth. xiii. 14.

(W) Of this we need no stronger evidence than the author of the Targum of Jerusalem, who, repeating the words of Jaacob at his blessing his twelve sons (1), "I wait for thy salvation, O Lord," paraphrases that pious ejaculation in these terms, "Lord, I wait for thy salvation; I look not for such a redemption as that wrought by Gideon the son of Joash, for that was a "temporary one; nor for such a one as that of Sampson, for that is a transient one; but I look for the redemption to be wrought by the Messiah, the son of David, who is to come and gather together the children of Israel. This is the redemption my soul waits and longs for, and impatiently expects."

(1) Targum Hierosol. in Gen. xlix. 18.

Impious forgeries against Christ's pedigree.

His miracles.

Doctrine and disciples.

Their just punishment.

Small numbers converted to Christianity.

Impudence of their opposers.

Jewish nation of their Messiah's reign.

content to have persecuted him with the utmost malice and cruelty during his life, they have, <sup>a</sup> by the vilest arts, and blackest slanders, aspersed his Divine Character and Doctrine, and rendered his memory odious, and even execrable to their nation. Instead of his lineal descent from the tribe of Judah, and the lineage of David, so clearly set forth by two evangelists (in which genealogies, though there be found some seeming difference and inconsistency, yet a careful and candid reader will easily observe it to be of such a nature, as rather confirms than invalidates their mutual authority, as we have fully proved in a former part of this work *), they have substituted a false and spurious pedigree, and made him the offspring of adultery and incest †. His miracles, the vast number and variety of which they could not deny, but do even confess in their thalmud, they have maliciously, and with the most absurd effrontery, ascribed to a diabolical power, and to the magic art, which they pretend he learned during his <sup>b</sup> abode in Egypt, though but a child both on his going and coming out of it. Those of his disciples met, indeed, with no better reception at first, from their grand council and chief-priest, though with a milder treatment afterwards. But when they perceived what a powerful impression they worked upon the people, especially as they came always backed with the irrefragable testimony of the sacred writings and prophecies, and accompanied with such manifest tokens of the sincerest conversion, and a devout simplicity of life, as astonished the very heathens who beheld it, both in the preachers and their proselytes; when, to their great surprize and perplexity, they found, that neither authority, threats, or punishments, were capable to silence the one, or discourage the other, but rather added fuel to their zeal, and daily increased the number of their converts; when, lastly, they heard themselves charged <sup>c</sup> by poor simple fishermen with having impiously rejected and condemned the true Messiah, and that with such undeniable evidence, as the wisest of them were not able to gainsay, and yet persisted in the same obstinate opposition of the establishment of his spiritual kingdom, and prepossession and preference of an imaginary temporal one (as if it had been indeed more glorious, or brought greater honour and advantage to the Jewish nation, to send them such a temporal conqueror, than a Divine Redeemer; one who could only subdue the world for them, than one who had dominion over this and the next, and could bestow on them the blessings of both in a most eminent degree); when, we say, all was reduced to this desperate state of infidelity and ingratitude, what less could be expected by them, than the speedy accomplishment of that dreadful prediction and sentence pronounced against them; that their city and <sup>d</sup> temple should be reduced to a heap of ruins, and themselves be dispersed and sold for slaves among all nations ‡; as they were soon after accordingly, and have continued ever since, and must still do, till a due sense and acknowledgement of their fault (the express condition of their recall §), obtains the long wished-for revocation of it.

HERE then we may see the fatal cause of their long and severe captivity, as well as of the small number of them, on whom so dreadful an instance of the divine displeasure hath hitherto been sufficient to make a salutary impression, in comparison of those who have remained inflexibly attached to their old prejudices, under a most doleful and comfortless exile of near seventeen centuries, have still supported themselves through all persecutions and calamities, hatred and contempt of the rest of the world, by the bare and faint hopes of that imaginary <sup>e</sup> temporaal Messiah and kingdom; and rejected the offers of the true and promised one, against all the clearest evidence of scripture and reason.

THIS surprising and so long continued obstinacy, hath been variously accounted for and combated, by their Christian opposers of all ages, ever since their dispersion, according as their various tempers and systems of religion led them: some of them ascribing it, though with more zeal than knowlege or charity, to a total rejection, as guilty of the unpardonable sin and blasphemy against the Holy Ghost ¶; which charge, if true, was the more absurdly urged against them, because it excluded all possibility of their being either converted or forgiven: whilst others have, with more reason and equity, ascribed it to an ill-grounded confidence on the peculiar covenant made by God with Abraham, which they deem eternal and <sup>f</sup> unalienable; that, in his seed, that is, as we interpret it, in the Messiah, all the nations of the earth should be blessed ‡; that is, as they firmly believe, should be brought to the knowlege of the one true God, admitted into the covenant by the seal of circumcision, and, in consequence of it, to the privileges annexed to the observation of the Mosaic law, and live happily and peaceably under his obedience and auspicious reign. In consequence of which covenant, the land of Canaan was promised to him, and, in due time, given to his posterity, as their perpetual inheritance; a temple built, which was to be the centre of their religion; and Jerusalem that of their future monarchy, and the chief residence of that promised Messiah: all which hac catastroph. vid. Anc. Hist. vol. iv. p. 282, & seq.

* See Anc. Hist. vol. iv. p. 155. & seq. (Q).
31, & seq.

¶ Gen. xxii. 18.

† See the book. intitled, Tholedoth Jesu.

‡ Vid. Deut. xxx. 1, & seq.

§ De
¶ Match. xii.

- a is exactly consistent with their notion of a temporal conqueror and deliverer ; but in their opinion absolutely incompatible with that of a spiritual deliverance or kingdom, and much more still of an obscure, rejected, and suffering redeemer. How mean his character and appearance, to that in which the prophets have delineated him to us ! how obscure and different his pretended reign, to the glorious description they have given us of it how dreadfully abject and miserable hath been our condition ever since his appearing among us, to that peace and happiness, opulence and dominion, we were promised to enjoy under his conduct and government ! In a word, how should such a Messiah be able to deliver his whole nation from captivity, who could not save himself from an ignominious death * ? Whatever, therefore, be the occasion of our long and dreadful captivity, and to what length soever it may please the Divine Providence to prolong it, we are sure he cannot be the object to whom the Scripture directs us to look up for our deliverance, whom God permitted our grand sanhedrim to condemn and punish, as the vilest of impostors ; and we must either give up the authority of his sacred oracles, and the infallibility of his often repeated promises, or we must look for one of a quite opposite character, under whose banners all Israel shall be gathered ; who shall tread down and destroy all that oppose our re-entrance into our once happy land, cause our city and temple to be rebuilt, our sanctuary and worship restored, and the whole earth submitted to his sceptre.
- b

It will not doubtless be expected, that we should go so far out of our province, as to mention here, by how many learned pens and irrefragable arguments all this specious reasoning, and temporal kingdom of the Messiah, have been long enough ago exploded ; the promise of another and better covenant, the abolition of the Mosaic rites, and the appearance of the Messiah, under the two-fold character of his humiliation and sufferings, and of his exaltation and glory, have been demonstratively proved against them by the ablest divines, ancients and moderns, of every church and age of the Christian æra †, and from those very prophetic writings on which the Jewish doctors have fetched the materials on which they pretend to found their imaginary system of a temporal and conquering Messiah. Our chief design, as hath been already hinted, is to confine ourselves, as much as possible, to such historical facts, as may best inform our readers of the various ways, and artful methods, which the doctors of that nation have made use of since their dispersion, to prevent the utter defection of the whole nation, which seemed but too likely to ensue the destruction of their city and temple, the only place appointed by God for the exercise of his legal worship, and which must therefore cease of course, whilst those two lay in ruins, and in a little time wholly obliterate the very remembrance of it amongst those unhappy exiles, unless some quick and effectual expedient was not found out to prevent it.

No sooner therefore were they recovered from the universal consternation and confusion, which must be supposed to have followed them in every place and country of their captivity, than they set about it with all the zeal and industry they were masters of. Schools, and afterwards universities, were immediately resolved upon, as the likeliest means to revive their drooping spirits, and expectation of a happy deliverance from above ; and these were accordingly reared with surprising speed, as we have seen at the beginning of this chapter ‡ ; and the most learned of their nation sought far and near to preside in them. These were quickly supplied with men of the greatest abilities, and crowded with scholars from all parts of their dispersion, and met with all possible encouragement, both with respect to their rich endowments, and the pompous titles and great honours which were shewn to their professors and proficientes ; so that from them issued out yearly great numbers of disciples, who went and dispensed fresh light and hopes among their desponding brethren. But though they came out sufficiently qualified for that work, being first furnished with such arguments, drawn from the sacred books, as could best contribute to confirm them in their old prejudices, they found themselves greatly deficient, whenever they were obliged to encounter with the Christian converts, especially such as came more completely armed and able to oppose an irrefragable evidence against them from the same divine repository, and such as they could safely challenge the most learned of their rabbies to confute. This proved for some time a mortifying obstacle, both to their professors and their disciples ; against which, the speediest and most effectual remedy they could find, was to forbid the latter holding any conferences with the Christians, and confining their mission and preaching to those only of their own religion, whilst they contented themselves with excommunicating all converts from it to Christianity, and treating them as vile and execrable apostates ; and accordingly loaded them with the most dreadful curses, both in their synagogues and at their private prayers.

Their doctors revive their hopes.

Set up schools and universities,

and learned men to preside in them.

Excommunicate new converts.

* Vid. SEPHER, NIZACHON, in Matth. xxvii. & alib. pass.
LA'BADIE, KIDDER, WILDE, et al. pl.

† De his, vid. int. al. GROT. LIMBORCH.

‡ See before, p. 486, & seq.

THIS expedient did indeed so far answer their end, as to deter vast multitudes, not only <sup>a</sup> from being converted, but even from listening to any thing which looked like an invitation or attempt towards it; but could not suppress the just and loud complaints of the Christian preachers against their foul proceedings, and frequently challenging them to public disputes, which, being as stiffly declined and avoided by their adversaries, obliged the most learned and zealous of them to expose and confute them in writing. The misfortune was, that they were forced, for want of a sufficient knowledge of the Hebrew and Syriac tongues, to make use of the Septuagint version, in their quotations out of the Old Testament, as they did likewise in their discourses, and other disputes. But this the Jews had, upon that very account, found means to cry down and condemn, as spurious and corrupt, and to substitute other versions to it, more suitable to their prejudices and designs <sup>b</sup>; and these illusive shifts gave still some palpable countenance to their obstinacy and jarring, whilst their disciples and agents were every-where employed in inventing or dispersing the most impious forgeries, and such defamatory libels against Christ and his doctrine, against his lineage and miracles, &c. as were most capable to inspire the people with the greatest contempt and abhorrence of him and his gospel <sup>b</sup>. We pass by a great number of other artifices and impostures made use of by them with the same view; such as corrupting and curtailing the Hebrew chronology, in order to make them believe, that his birth happened in the year of the world 3671; that is, 329 years sooner than it did, or than the time prefixed by the prophecies; the lying encomiums they have written on those of their doctors, who have inveighed most bitterly against the Christian religion; some of whom they have raised to the degree of saints, prophets, inspired penmen, <sup>c</sup> and workers of miracles, in order to give the greater sanction to their writings, and a kind of divine authority to those false glosses and interpretations, not to say wilful corruptions, of these prophecies and texts of scripture in dispute between us. These, and many more of the like nature, too absurd and bare-faced to deserve a farther mention, we gladly pass over, to come at some more interesting transactions relating to our subject, and which may be justly stiled the highest and most striking effort of Jewish policy and rabbinic craft.

Decline to dispute with Christians.
Scandalous and impious forgeries against Christ.

THEY could not reasonably suppose, that so many learned and zealous antagonists as they had to deal with, would suffer themselves to be long baffled by their pretended cavils against the Septuagint version, in a matter of such high import, but that some of them would soon be induced to make themselves so far masters of the Hebrew text, as to be able to confute them, and beat them at their own weapons. It was therefore a thing of the utmost concern to them, to ward against a blow, which, once struck home, must prove fatal to their cause and nation, and expose their foul practices to all the world; for if those false traditions, glosses, and interpretations of the sacred writings, with which Christ, his apostles, and primitive fathers, had so justly and severely censured them; and more particularly of those which relate to that most important point of the divine œconomy, the character, sufferings, and doctrine of the Messiah, the time prefixed for his coming, and nature of his spiritual kingdom; if these, we say, came once to be fully and clearly proved against them, on the authority of the sacred Hebrew text, and by persons thoroughly versed in that language; what could they expect from such a conviction, but to become the scorn and abhorrence of mankind? <sup>d</sup>

Their new artifice to discredit the Hebrew text;

To avoid, therefore, as much as possible, the fatal consequences of a discovery (which they knew to be out of their power to prevent), had for some time engrossed the thoughts and study of their ablest doctors; the unanimous result of which was at length, that their Cabbala, or pretended oral tradition, was the most effectual rampart they could oppose against such a dreaded battery; and the most likely means, if not to repel the shafts of the enemy, yet at least to shield themselves and people from being either frightened or endangered by them. This Cabbala we have given an ample account of in a former part of this work <sup>e</sup>, and, as we hope, abundantly confuted, as a most artful and impious expedient, contrived and calculated by them to elude all the scripture proofs alleged against them out of the sacred books, by declaring, upon its own bare authority, the whole Hebrew text, and much more so every <sup>f</sup> version of it, a mere dead letter; the true genuine sense of which lies beyond all human reach, and is only to be found in the thalmudic books, whose compilers received it by an interrupted tradition from the mouth of the sanhedrin, or a great council of seventy, to whom alone Moses communicated it, in the same fulness and clearness he had received it from the mouth of God, during his forty days converse with him on the mount (X). To this were added, a multitude by raising their Cabbala above it.

The pretended origin of its authority;

<sup>a</sup> See Anc. Hist. vol. iv. p. 37, & (O).
Anc. Hist. vol. i. p. 597.

<sup>b</sup> Vid. int. al. SEPHER, Tholedoth Jesu.

<sup>c</sup> See

(X) They add, that Moses, upon his coming down from the mount, sent for his brother Aaron, and seated him on his right-hand, to whom he recapitulated all that God had said and enjoined to him. After him were introduced Eleazer and Itamar, his sons, who being likewise seated on each side of them, he again repeated the

the

- a a multitude of other oral precepts, injunctions, expositions, not to be committed to writing, but transmitted in the same traditional way, lest, as they pretend, they should in time come to the knowledge of, and be prophaned by, the Gentiles: so that, according to them, this oral law had been preserved by a Divine Providence, pure and uncorrupted, during that long series of ages, till their frequent, and especially their last, dispersion; and the danger there was of any part or it being lost, made it necessary to have the whole collected into one body; which was accordingly done, as we have shewn before, by their famed R. Jebuda Hakodesh, or the Saint, and afterwards published under the name of Mishnah and Talmud<sup>d</sup>, consisting of two parts, viz. Mishnah and Gemarah; by his learned disciple R. Jochanan, under that of the Jerusalem Talmud, enriched with a large and learned comment, in which he was assisted by
- b a great number of the most eminent rabbies of that age<sup>e</sup>.

THIS was an effectual way to stop, if not the censures and complaints of the Christians against them, at least the ears of the Jews against all arguments and remonstrances from that quarter; and thus far succeeded accordingly; for after having once impiously stripped the sacred Hebrew text of its plain obvious sense and authority, and transferred it to this pretended collection of divine pandects, or rather to this collection of human, if not hellish forgeries, what could be urged or objected to them from the one, but could not be as readily exploded by the other? And now it was that the Jews began to triumph against all gainsayers, and to be more than ever confirmed in their old prejudices. What encomiums they bestowed, both on the work and its compiler, we have already shewn<sup>f</sup>; and though the latter really was a man of the most consummate pride and arrogance, have not scrupled to dub him a saint, an inspired writer, and a miracle-monger. The Karaites, a more honest and rational sect among them, of whom we have spoke in a former part<sup>g</sup>, were the only ones who opposed them, and condemned the imposture, decried all those pretended traditions as vile forgeries, and closely adhered, and do so to this day, to the plain and obvious sense of the sacred text; and hence arose the distinction of Karaites and Talmudists, between whom hath reigned the most irreconcilable hatred ever since.

FROM that fatal period, we may date the invincible obstinacy and blindness of the Jewish nation; their implacable hatred of Christ and his gospel; of their irreconcilable prejudice and aversion to the notion of a suffering Messiah, and a spiritual deliverance and reign; and their unshaken hopes and expectation of a temporal Messiah, opulent and glorious beyond all conception, and which is to extend itself over all the world, and to endure to the end of it. All these, suited as they are to their gross and carnal genius, and authorised to them under the unquestionable sanction of their Talmud, have been ever since so deeply rooted in their hearts and minds, that they have rendered them more than ever deaf and inflexible to all conviction, in all the various scenes of life, through which we have traced them in the course of this chapter. But we shall have less cause to be surprised at this obstinate constancy, when we consider, that besides the flattering prospect above-mentioned, which that book gives of the Messiah's reign, it furnishes them with such objections against Christianity, as those who own the pretended divinity of that book cannot but think irrefragable; and, on the other hand, denounces such dreadful curses against those who forsake the Jewish faith for it, as can hardly fail of deterring them from it. The greatest wonder therefore is, that any motive should ever have prevailed upon them to ascribe to that wretched performance an authority so far superior to that of the Hebrew text, for which all that went before them had preserved so profound and inviolable a regard. This wonder will still increase, if we reflect on the many gross absurdities, and monstrous fables, these compilers, and their commentators, have filled that spurious volume with, in order to display the pretended glories of that future reign, and the avidity with which

<sup>d</sup> See before, p. 493, & seq.
493, & notes.

<sup>e</sup> Id. ibid. 498, & seq.

<sup>f</sup> See before, p. 483, & seq. sub not.

<sup>g</sup> Anc. Hist. vol. iv. p. 174, (F) (G) & (H) 176, & seq. & notes.

the whole verbatim to them. Next to these were admitted the seventy elders, who being also seated on each side of him, heard the same things recapitulated, and expounded by him in the same manner as he had done to his brother, and to his two sons. Last of all were admitted those of the people, who were willing to come and be instructed; and had the same truths repeated unto them: so that by this time Aaron had the same truths recapitulated to him four times; his sons, three times; the seventy, twice; and the people, once (2).

They have since introduced a more modern sort of Cabbala, which teaches how, by the power and affinity of numerical letters, to discover deep secrets and mysteries in nature and religion; but is of too trifling and uncertain a nature to deserve any further notice. Only we cannot forbear observing here, that the adepts in it do greatly outdo lord Peter in their dextrous management of it; as whenever they cannot strike out the sense they search after, either totidem verbis, or litteris (3), they have found out a way of transposing and jumbling the latter together, so as to make them spell the word or name they want (4).

(2) Vid. Maimon. Prefat. in Talmud. Vid. & Anc. Hist. vol. iv. p. 176, & seq. & alib. pass.

(4) Vid. Buxtorf, Basnag. & al. mult.

(3) Tals of

but such as may in time
open their eyes to the truth.

they are swallowed down by that infatuated people. It would take up a whole volume to a sketch out the portendous wars which the Messiah is to wage against his two grand enemies Gog and Magog; and the manifold and unheard-of prodigies he is to work, in order to subdue and destroy them and their numberless hosts; the many and vast mountains to be levelled; vallies filled up; rivers, lakes, and even seas, to be dried up; and every obstacle to be removed, that might obstruct or retard the Jews from repairing under his standards. But what are even these, to the astonishing care which the Almighty took, from the earliest days of the creation, to provide materials for a banquet suitable to his dignity, to crown his conquests, and regale his victorious Israelites (Y). But we shall readily dispense ourselves from the irksome and unprofitable task of exposing the monstrous absurdities of that book, and its infatuated commentators, which are so well known to every learned person, that is in the least conver- b sistant in the Jewish writings, and which some of their ablest men have endeavoured to allegorize into a more reasonable sense; whilst others, conscious of the impossibility of doing it, have been inspired with a singular contempt of both. And may not this, in God's own time, prove an effectual means of opening the eyes of the whole nation, and make them at length sensible of the dreadful effects of departing from the plain and obvious sense of the Divine oracles, to follow the dictates of their own carnal prejudices; of attempting to measure the unfathomable depths of God's councils, by their own short and carnal line; and imagin- ing, that all the glorious dispensations of the old and new covenant aimed at nothing more than the exalting of their nation above all others, and setting up a people to reign paramount over the whole world; who, of all others, if we may rely on the authority of an unerring Judge c of mankind <sup>h</sup>, shewed themselves the most unworthy of it, and made the most ungrateful use of all his blessings and special promises?

Averseness to a spiritual Messiah and kingdom.

A TRUE sense and acknowledgement of this, seems indeed to be all that is intimated in the scriptures to be wanting in them to hasten their conversion and recall: but how can they be ever induced to it, as long as that pernicious prejudice, in favour of their talmudic notion of a temporal and conquering Messiah, remains rooted and cherished in their minds? How shall they be convinced, that the promised Messiah really appeared in the true character, exact time, and true office, in which he had been delineated by the ancient oracles (and yet all other methods of converting them must appear ridiculous and ineffectual, till that capital point is fully proved to them), whilst their own melancholy state, and a wretched exile and servitude d of near two thousand years, so sadly convinces them of the contrary; and that the greatest part of those extraordinary promises, so clearly revealed by the prophetic, and so gloriously displayed in almost every page of the talmudic writings, and were to make up the most distinguishing parts of the Messiah's reign, not only unfulfilled by every circumstance of their long captivity, but contradicted and confuted; the Jewish nation become the scorn and contempt, instead of the lords and rulers of the whole world; their city, instead of becoming the joy and glory of the whole earth, by the magnificence of the Messiah's court, and the vast enlargement of its walls and territories, reduced to a miserable slavery and merciless tribute, under a long series of insulting tyrants, and her once blest inhabitants scattered and vagabonds e over the whole surface of it; the temple and sanctuary, instead of being become the centre of God's worship, and the joyful concourse of all nations, laid level with the dust, and the very ground on which it stood prophaned by the false respect paid to it by their worst enemies the Christians and Turks, instead of that additional extent and unparalleled improvements which were promised to it under the eye and direction of the Messiah, and are so minutely described by the prophet Ezekiel, and elegantly delineated by the Talmud?

THIS last particular, relating to the temple of Jerusalem, and the additional extent, and other extraordinary embellishments it was to receive in that reign, we purposely mention, not only as it is one of the strongest intrenchments the Jews fly to when hardly pressed upon, but as it will obviate an objection which may start into our reader's mind; viz. if this pretended authority of the Talmud be the main foundation of the Jewish obstinacy, and rejection of a

<sup>h</sup> See Matth. xi. 21, & seq.

(Y) They tell us, that God, in the beginning, created seven things before he made the world; these were, Paradise, or the Garden of Eden, the Lavv, the Righteous, Israel, the Throne of Glory, Jerusalem, and the Messiah. And that among other living creatures that were created on the fifth day, two of them were of an immense size, one of each sex: that to prevent their ingendring, he killed the one and salted it, and let the other live upon the earth, and gave it a thousand mountains for its pasturage; that this also will be slaughtered in the reign of the Messiah, and both the one and the other be dressed and served up at that banquet, to him, and all that have fought under his banner.

They likewise believe, there shall then be a general resurrection of all the righteous seed of Abraham, who shall also be admitted to partake of it; and this hope is so firmly rooted in their minds, that they frequently swear by their title to a share of it (4).

(4) Vid. Munf. in Gen. i. & in Ezekiel 38, & seq. 2 Ezdr. vi. 46, & seq. Caimet, sub voc. Ezdr. & al. pl.

spiritual

a spiritual reign and deliverance, how came the Karaites, lately mentioned, who express so great an abhorrence to that book, to persist in the same infidelity with them, and not rather yield to the testimony of the Hebrew text, and acknowledge the Christian Messiah, on the irrefragable evidence which he gave of his being really such, and of his having amply fulfilled all that the law and the prophets had written concerning him? Karaites not yet converted.

But here it must be observed, that though those Karaites did wholly reject all the pretended traditions and legends of the Talmudists, in other respects they were as rank Jews, that is, as carnal, and as strongly prepossessed with the prejudice of a temporal Messiah, and of the peculiar blessings which their nation was to enjoy under his reign, as the most zealous Talmudists; and though they did not understand the prophecies concerning it in that gross and carnal sense that these did, yet a temporal and glorious Messiah they did and do still expect, who was to bring the whole world under his obedience, and fill it with the knowledge of God, of his laws, and his worship; and, upon their due observance of these, was to dispense to them a fulness of all spiritual and temporal blessings, whilst the stubborn and recusants were to be punished with a total exclusion from both. Carnal fondness for a temporal reign;

This is the sense in which they understood that future reign, and the glory with which it was to be accompanied; but this did not hinder their adhering to the old prejudice, that their nation would paramount above all others, reinhabit the portion of their forefathers, be nearest of all to the city of Jerusalem, enlarge their borders in proportion to their increase, and be abundantly supplied with every thing that was necessary for life, delight, or grandeur, by the voluntary tribute of all the nations round about them: but above all, they firmly believed, and still do with the Talmudists, that the temple and sanctuary shall be rebuilt and enlarged, in proportion to the vast increase of its votaries; the sacrifices and festivals, and other Mosaic rites, be revived, and resorted to by all the people of the earth, and perpetuated to the end of time. In the full hope and expectation of all changes and blessings, they think themselves sufficiently supported by the sacred text; particularly by the writings of the prophets, especially Ezekiel<sup>1</sup>, without having recourse to the fabulous legends of the Talmud, much less to that pretended superior authority which is impiously ascribed to it by its adherers, and was calculated merely to invalidate that of the Hebrew text, and the proofs drawn from it against them and their temporal reign; from which Mohammed hath, in all probability, fetched the greatest part of the materials of his carnal paradise. Our readers, therefore, we hope, will not be displeased, if we here subjoin a short sketch of the said temple and its dimensions, its œconomy, worship, and offerings of the tribes, their situation about, and with respect to, Jerusalem, &c. according to the prophetic delineation of it, divested of all its talmudic embellishments and rabbinic reveries; and in the order in which not only the Karaite Jews, but many very learned, and, in other respects, orthodox Christians, believe they will be disposed by the Messiah, at his first coming, according to the former; but at his second, according to the latter, or, as these term it, his millenarian reign upon earth. And we think, moreover, this system or opinion, so much the more worthy a place in this close of the History of the Jews Dispersion, inasmuch as the pains which some zealous Christians have taken to explode it, and every argument they have urged against it out of the New Testament, hath proved an insurmountable obstacle to their conversion, and been treated by them as a manifest contradiction to some of the plainest prophecies of the Old. It was doubtless this consideration, which induced so many fathers of the church, who were neither sectaries nor heretics, but men of piety, judgment, and learning, to embrace and defend that notion, long enough before the compiling of the Talmud; and which, tho' then very rife among the Jews, as may be seen by some of their apocryphal books<sup>k</sup>, they were far enough from embracing out of complaisance to them, much less from founding it upon their authority, as has been unjustly suggested, but chiefly believed it on that of the prophetic ones of the Old and New Testament, we mean Ezekiel and the Apocalypse<sup>l</sup>, and other collateral proofs from the canonical books of both. The misfortune was, that Papias, bishop of Hierapolis, and formerly a disciple of St. John, who is supposed the first who wrote in defence of that second reign, adopted into it, probably in order to allure the Jews to acknowledge Christ to be the true Messiah, sundry of their selfish prejudices and carnal notions; which being found mostly antisciptural, or at best, founded only on the allegorical expressions concerning it, brought the very notion of it into contempt among the Christians, and by the fatal spirit of opposition, drove the opposers of it into the other extreme; and, in spite of all his arguments in favour of it, and pretensions that he had received it from the apostles, to deride, and treat it as chimerical, and a forgery of the arch heretic Cerintus<sup>m</sup>; tho', in fact, had they examined it with that candour and impartiality which the subject deserved, they would have found, that it wanted nothing but to be stripped of all Founded on the scriptural prophecies;

<sup>1</sup> Ezek. & Isai. ubi sup.<sup>k</sup> Vid. int. al. 2 Esdras, iv. 35, & seq. vi. 18, & seq. Tobit, xiii. 9, & seq.<sup>l</sup> Ezek. xxxix, & seq. Isai. ii. pass. Apocal. xx. 2, & seq. & alib. pass.<sup>m</sup> Vid. EUSEB. Ecc. eccl. Hist. lib. iii. c. 28. & 30. Vid. & DUPIN dissert. in Apocal. & al. pl.

those traditionary Jewish conceits to make it appear more truly scriptural, and better founded than that of his opponents and censurers, as will more fully appear by the following delineation of the most remarkable transactions relating to and foretold of it.

and displayed by Ezekiel.

and the complete return of the Israelites.

Division of the land.

Portion of the priests, &c.

FIRST then, if we seriously examine that notable prophecy, wherein Christ's reign is so elegantly displayed, and the complete return of Judah and Israel (Z) into their own land, and under his conduct, so distinctly specified, we shall be forced to own, that it cannot, without the greatest violence to its plain and obvious meaning, be restrained to those small numbers which came back from the Babylonish captivity; and was by the Jews themselves compared, with respect to the rest, to the bran of the nation, and the flour to those that staid behind<sup>a</sup>: much less still can those few stragglers from among the ten other tribes, which are supposed to have come up with them<sup>o</sup>, be supposed, in any sense, to include all that the prophet meant by the return of the complete tribes of the Israelites; or the fluctuating state the Jewish church and common-wealth hath been in ever since that time, answer the glorious and permanent one, which God expressly promises them in that chapter<sup>p</sup>. We must therefore either look for the completion of that promise to some future period, or elude the force of it by such allegorical explication, as will hardly be admitted by any candid Christian, and must be despised by a Jew.

THE same may be said with respect to the other particulars, which were to dignify the Messiah's reign; such as dividing the land between the twelve tribes, and assigning to them particular lots and stations, with respect to their city and temple: according to which disposition, that of the priests was to be on the north, and that of the Levites on the south; and between these two was the temple to be built, and, at a due distance round about it, the city of Jerusalem. This portion, which the prophet styles תרומה terumah, and our version rightly translates oblation<sup>q</sup>, was to compose a square of 20,000 measures; which, if we reckon by the cubit only, will amount to above eight miles on every side (A); of which portion, that of the priests on the north is to be 25,000 long, and 10,000 broad; or above eight miles in length, and about three and a quarter in breadth, and will be equal to that of all the rest of the tribe of Levi on the south, in which stood mount Zion, the place on which the temple is to be built. The other intermediate space between those two, will probably be the city of Jerusalem, and its suburbs, each according to their respective dimensions, mentioned in the prophecy, as well as the portion of land by which its inhabitants, who are to consist of a proportionable number out of the Christian tribes, are to be maintained<sup>r</sup>.

THE city, which is likewise to be of a square form, is to have twelve gates, three on every side, according to the number of tribes that inhabit it, and which are to be called by their names. The streets, which will probably run in strait lines, like those of Babylon, from gate to gate, will divide the city into sixteen squares, each having streets running to all the gates, will render it exceedingly airy, healthy, and commodious, not only to its inhabitants, as well as to that vast concourse of the other Israelites from all parts of Palestine, to the solemn festivals of the temple, but much more still for that multiplicity of nations that were to resort thither, at proper seasons, from all parts of the world, to the worship of the true God<sup>s</sup>.

<sup>a</sup> See Anc. Hist. vol. iv. p. 4.

<sup>11</sup> Jerem. xxv. 3, & alib. pass.

<sup>o</sup> De his, vid. Zechar. viii. 20, & seq. xiv. ib. & al.

<sup>o</sup> Ibid. & seq.

<sup>q</sup> Ezek. xlv. 2, & seq.

<sup>p</sup> Ezek. xxvii. 24, & seq. Vid. & Isa. xl.

<sup>r</sup> Ibid. ch. xlviii. 15, & seq.

(Z) The words of the prophet are these (5), after having prefaced that wonderful transaction under the most beautiful allusion of a resurrection of dry bones, reclothed with skin and flesh (6), "Thus saith the Lord God; behold, I will take the children of Israel from among the heathen, whither they are gone; and I will gather them on every side, or from every place, and bring them into their own land. And I will make them one nation in the land, upon the mountains of Israel, and one king shall reign over them all; and they shall be no longer two nations, nor be divided into two kingdoms any more. Neither shall they defile themselves any more with their idols, &c.—And David my servant shall be their king, and they all shall have one shepherd (7); and they shall dwell in the land that I gave unto Jaacob—wherein your fathers have dwelt—they and their children for ever; and my servant David shall be their prince for ever.

"Moreover, I will make an everlasting covenant of peace with them, and I will settle and multiply them, and set up my sanctuary in the midst of them for evermore.—And the heathen shall know, that I the Lord do sanctify Israel, when my sanctuary shall be in the midst of them for evermore (8)."

(A) The text doth not specify which, whether feet, cubits, or reeds: our English version supposes it by the last; which, if right, will increase the largeness of the square in proportion: but we think a cubit is more probably meant, seeing, that even according to the Jewish measure, which is twenty inches and three-quarters, the whole will extend to above eight miles on every side, which may be deemed a sufficient allotment; whereas reeds, or even yards, would stretch it to an immoderate largeness (9).

(5) Ch. xxxvii. pass. ver. 26, ad fin.

(6) Ibid. ver. 1. et seq.

(9) De hoc cubit. vid. Ezek. xl. 5. xliii. 13, et alib.

(7) Ibid. ver. 21, et seq.

(8) Ibid.

THUS

- a Thus far we have seen how the first division of the land was to be made, and what portion the priests and Levites were to have in it in this reign of the Messiah. We should be led too far, were we to go through the same examen of the portions of the other tribes, of which that of Judah, (which was to lay north of that of the priests, as that of Benjamin was to be on the south of that of the Levites) was to be by far the largest, excepting that of the Messiah, which was to be by much the most considerable of all; as extending itself westward the whole length of the kingdom, quite to the great, or Mediterranean sea; and on the east quite to the river Jordan. The remainder of the land was next to be divided between the other tribes, in proportion to their numerousness; and with this proviso, that there was likewise a sufficient quantity to be set apart for the encouragement and benefit of their proselytes of either class.
- b THIS distribution of the land, according to the divine appointment, by which every man or master of a family was to know the extent of his possessions, was to be settled by the principal article of all, the building of the temple, according to the plan and dimensions given to the prophet by God<sup>u</sup>; but not now upon mount Moriab, where those of Solomon and Zorobabel had stood, but upon mount Zion, the place he had now made choice of for the habitation of his glory, and to which all nations were to repair, to pay their vows and adoration to him<sup>w</sup>, in common with the twelve tribes; whence it is elegantly stiled by the Psalmist, the joy and wonder of the whole earth<sup>x</sup>; and is by him, and several other prophets, marked out for the center of his future religion and worship, for all nations and people to repair to. It was moreover the highest hill in Jerusalem, and consequently the fittest to display the magnificence of that structure, which was to be erected upon it, to the greatest advantage. We shall, however, dispense with troubling our readers with the farther particulars of it, as delineated by the prophet, which they may see at large in the authors quoted in the margin<sup>y</sup>, it being sufficient to our present purpose, that no such edifice hath been erected on that mount; and we may add, nor any part of the prophecy above-mentioned, either with respect to the complete return of the twelve tribes, the division of the land among them, &c. has been ever literally fulfilled, from the time of their prediction to this day: much less was it after the return of the Jews from Babylon, to which this whole prophecy is pretended to relate; for during that period, the tribe of Judah, to whom the poor remains of the regal dignity belonged, was so far from having the largest portion allotted to it, that it scarcely enjoyed the shadow of it, and that too under a hard servitude to the Babylonians; and, to sum up all, was even stripped of that shadow by the warlike Maccabees, and never recovered it from that time; and as to what degree of obscurity and poverty the house and descendants of David, from whom the Messiah was to spring, were reduced, by jealousy and hatred of the Idumean tyrants, especially Herod the Great, the abject condition into which the whole kindred of that Divine Redeemer was plunged at the time of his birth, sufficiently shews. So that this large promised portion of the tribe of Judah, and of that principal branch of it, the house of David, plainly appears to have been wholly possessed, and swallowed up, during this whole period, (that is, from their return from Babylon to the birth of Christ) one while by the priestly tribe, and during the remainder of it, by utter strangers.
- c BUT what doth farther demonstrate, beyond all contradiction, that this restoration of the Israelitish church and commonwealth, so amply described by the prophet, cannot in any sense be applied to their return from Babylon, is, that he ushers it in with a complete victory gained over some inveterate and powerful tyrant, whom he names Gog<sup>z</sup>, in the land of Magog, and stiles chief prince of Meshech and Tubal; which victory was to pave a way, not to their entrance and re-possession of their land, but to that peace and happiness which they were to enjoy in consequence of it, and to those blessed changes, and glorious improvements which were to establish their religion and commonwealth on a most lasting basis<sup>a</sup> under the Messiah. We shall not here enter into a tedious enquiry about the prince and country, intimated by the names of Gog and Magog, Tubal and Meshech (B); it being sufficient for our present purpose, to observe

<sup>u</sup> De his, vid. Anc. Hist. vol. i. p. 664, & seq. (M). See also Ezek. xlvii. 22, & seq. <sup>w</sup> Ezek. xliii. 1—10. xlv. 1—5. <sup>x</sup> Pf. l. 2. lxxv. i. xlviii. 2. <sup>y</sup> Pf. lxxvi. 2. & seq. lxxviii. 69, & seq. lxxxvii. pass. & alib. plur. See also Micah iv. 7. Joel iii. 17. 21. Zech. viii. 3. Isai. iv. 5, & al. pl. <sup>z</sup> NEWTON Chronol. WHISTON, preface to his Vers. of Joseph. & al. <sup>a</sup> Ezek. xxxviii. 2, & seq. <sup>b</sup> Ibid. ch. xxxix, et seq. pass.

(B) It will not, however, be foreign to our subject, to observe, that in the language of the Old Testament, those nations, commonly called the northern Celts and Scythians, are understood by the descendants of Gomer, the eldest son of Japhet, and of Magog his second son (10), as we have plainly shewn in a former part of this work (11), whilst Madai, Javan, Tubal, Meshech, &c. formed other branches of that numerous family, which first inhabited those northern regions of Tartary, Scythia, and extended themselves quite through Muscovy, Sarmatia, &c. according to their seniority, and left everywhere some footsteps of their ancient names and la-

(10) Genes. x. 2.

(11) See Anc. Hist. vol. ii. p. 211, et seq. et alib. pass.

observe, that the Jews, at their return from Babylon, were neither under a necessity, nor indeed in a condition, to wage a war against so powerful an enemy, but were dismissed from their captivity, and sent back into their own country by an imperial decree <sup>b</sup>, which absolutely forbade and excluded all opposition to their entrance into it, and re-possessed it accordingly without any obstruction, but what was afterwards occasioned by their refusal to admit the Samaritans to join with them in the service of God, and rebuilding of the temple <sup>c</sup>. But this squabble can have no relation to their war with Gog, hinted at by the prophet; the one being a fervile obscure people, under the same subjection with the Jews, and the other a powerful prince, and inveterate enemy, to whom they gave a total and final overthrow, whilst the former never ceased plaguing and annoying them with the bitterest hostilities, all the time they continued in their neighbourhood.

MANY, therefore, have understood this victory and restoration of that glorious state, which the Jews enjoyed under the Maccabees, and the many signal victories which they gained over Antiochus, and other enemies of their nation <sup>d</sup>, as well as that over their great persecutor Ptolemy Philopater; and that they were the enemies intimated by the prophet, under the name of Gog <sup>e</sup>. But besides that, neither those Syrian and Egyptian tyrants rightly square with the scriptural meaning of the names, and other expressions in the prophecy, as we have shewn in the last note, there is one irrefragable objection against that supposition, viz. that the tribe of Judah, according to the prophecy, was to be paramount above all the rest, and to have by far the largest allotment; whereas, as we lately observed, in the period above supposed, they were stripped of both by the Maccabite princes, and languished in an obscure and servile subjection to those politic chiefs. Upon all these accounts, the generality of Christian commentators, both ancient and modern, have chosen to take the words Gog and Magog, in this place, and the Apocalypse <sup>f</sup>, in an allegorical sense, and to signify the enemies of the Jewish and Christian church; whilst the whole Jewish nation, being more attached to the letter of it, as being more suited to their carnal minds and worldly views, firmly believe the nation meant by Gog, &c. to be that of the Turks, long since in possession of their wished-for Canaan, and holding them under a severe subjection, and wait impatiently for the happy completion of the latter part, by the total subversion of that powerful empire, by the irresistible arm of their Messiah; who having once wholly destroyed those enemies of their nation and law, will then complete the remainder of the prophet's prediction, and raise their church and commonwealth to that summit of power and glory, opulence and perpetuity, which is there promised by God <sup>g</sup>.

THIS is the general belief and firm expectation, not only of all the Talmudists, but of all the learned and sober Jews; and what hath supported them through such unheard-of persecutions, and other misfortunes, ever since their dispersion. From what we have hitherto said on that subject, our readers will easily judge, that it is not founded on the authority of an uncertain and exploded tradition, much less on the legendary dreams of its numerous herd of biassed interpreters and commentators, but upon the indisputable evidence of an express prophecy, explained and interpreted in all its various circumstances, according to the plain and obvious sense of the sacred text. The only misfortune is, that a too fond and selfish prejudice, in favour of a temporal and conquering Messiah, hath sadly misled them to understand all the many promised blessings of his reign in too literal and carnal a sense, instead of that more noble and exalted one, which the genius of their language, and the nature of those prophetic allegories, they are couched under, both in this and other prophetic writers, might be justly deemed to imply. And it was from this, and other such gross prejudices and conceits, that Christ, the true Messiah, the Light of the world, and minister of the new promised spiritual covenant <sup>h</sup>, strove in vain to deliver them, upon the testimony of the scripture, as well as by his own authority and example; though this last, which should have proved the most powerful antidote against it, had they paid a due regard to either, served only to harden them the more in it.

<sup>b</sup> De hoc, vid. Ezra, i pass.

seq. vid. & Anc. Hist. vol. iv. p. 50, & seq.

ESPERANZA D'ISRAEL, and the generality of Jewish comments on the above prophecy. Jos. MEDE, on the Apocalypse, ad fin. et al. plur.

<sup>c</sup> See Anc. Hist. vol. iv. p. 6, & seq. & (L).

<sup>e</sup> Ibid. p. 126, & seq.

<sup>d</sup> 2 Maccab. iv. &

<sup>f</sup> Ch. xx 7.

<sup>g</sup> Vid.

<sup>h</sup> Deuter. xviii. 15. John i. 9, & seq.

milies, through which the learned and indefatigable Bochart hath been at the pains to trace them (12). The generality of the learned Jews, who are not infected with the romantic legends of their Talmud, are of the same mind; and as the Turks are now universally allowed to be the descendants of these northern patriarchs (13), they understand by this defeat of Gog, the total overthrow of the Othman empire (under whose yoke they have so long groaned) in the reign of their promised Messiah, as we shall shew in the sequel.

(12) Phaleg.

before, vol. ii. p. 114, & seq.

(13) See Anc. Hist. vol. vi. p. 531, & seq. Additions to Ditto, p. 159, & seq. See also

- a NEITHER indeed could it happen otherwise, seeing the least degree of conviction, of his being that promised Messiah, must have effectually deterred them from accomplishing the determinate council of God, in condemning him to an ignominious death<sup>i</sup>. But then, as nothing but a firm persuasion of the contrary could have emboldened them to pronounce that unjust sentence against him, to which their fatal prejudice furnished them with a sufficient number of pretences; so their blindness and ignorance of the profound mystery of his suffering, was to be no longer pleaded as an excuse for it, than till that was more fully proved by the event, and confirmed by such irrefragable proofs, as it actually was after his resurrection, by himself and his apostles; for if, after all this additional evidence, they still refused to acknowledge him in his suffering character; if, still allured by the glaring prospect of a glorious temporal kingdom, or disgusted by their carnal prejudice, from accepting of that more exalted and spiritual one that was offered them, they became equally guilty, as if they had wilfully and knowingly murdered him, and actually ratified (as they continue still to do to this very day) the sentence they had pronounced against themselves, His blood be upon us and our children<sup>k</sup>, by breeding and confirming these by all possible, and even by the foulest means, in the same fatal unbelief, and abhorrence of him and his gospel<sup>l</sup>.

We have now gone through with our promised enquiry into the true causes of the Jews unbelief; and have, we hope, set forth their principal objections, prejudices, and other obstacles to their conversion, with all the candour and impartiality that the subject demands, and with that brevity which our stated bounds oblige us to. Some others we might have added, no less obstructive to it; such as their over bearing confidence on their election, and being the off-spring of Abraham<sup>m</sup>, and of their being justified by the works of the law, and not by the righteousness of faith<sup>n</sup>; and this, even to the monstrous neglect of the moral law, justice, mercy, charity, &c.<sup>o</sup>. But of all these, they are so clearly charged and censured in the gospel, that it were needless for us to insist longer upon them: and therefore, to those stubborn obstacles, already mentioned, we shall now, in justice to them, add a few more, no less powerful and cogent, which have been as unhappily as injudiciously laid in their way, from the time of their last dispersion, by those fathers and doctors of the Christian church, who have most zealously endeavoured to convert them.

- VARIOUS were the ways and methods which these pious primitive preachers tried, according d as their temper, genius, and course of studies, led them, to reconcile both the bulk of the Jewish nation, and especially their new converts, to the person and character of Christ, and the true nature of his spiritual reign and sublime doctrine, from the earliest ages of Christianity; but few, if any, which did not rather tend to confirm them in their innate hatred against the one, and contempt of the other. They soon began to be divided likewise about the treatment they ought to use towards them; more especially after their dispersion; the warmer sort observing them to persist in their inveterate obstinacy, and looking upon them as rebels to God, betrayers and murderers of his Son, the blasphemers of his name and gospel, the aspersers of his character, memory, lineage, and miracles, by the blackest calumnies and forgeries, looked upon all the miseries which attended their exile as just judgments for their e unbelief, and obstructing the propagation of Christianity, and thought they could not be treated with too great severity, contempt, and even abhorrence. Some went so far as to charge them with the irremissible sin against the Holy Ghost, and of course pronounced them irrecoverably lost, and doomed to the divine displeasure both here and for ever. In consequence of which, and in violation of the divine and human laws, they declared them, in regard to the rest of mankind, unworthy of enjoying either liberty, or any social right; especially that of bringing up their own children; which ought in charity to be snatched from them, as brands out of the fire, and be educated in the principles of Christianity; no mercy was to be shewn to parents that refused to deliver them up for that purpose, or secreted them to avoid it, seeing that was the only likely means to put an end to their incredulity, and to bring, in time, their whole f posterity into the Christian church.

OTHERS, on the contrary, weighing the matter with more becoming charity and impartial coolness, and reflecting seriously on those prophecies, not only of the Old Testament, but on the prediction of Christ and his apostles, particularly St. Paul, which promised them a recall, and universal conversion to the gospel, and that all Israel at length should be saved (C), did

<sup>i</sup> Conf. Acts ii. 23. iii. 17, & seq.

<sup>k</sup> Matth. xxvii. 25.

<sup>m</sup> Rom. ii. pass. 28, & seq. viii. 3, & seq. ix. 31, & seq. et alib. 11.
 & seq. Luke xi. 39, & seq. et alib. pass.

<sup>l</sup> See before, p. 625, & alib. pass.

<sup>n</sup> Ibid.

<sup>o</sup> Matth. xxiii. 23,

(C) We have had occasion to mention already some that express and irrefragable one of Ezekiel, concerning their return and re-establishment in Judea (14).

(14) Ezek. ch. xxxvii. & seq. 1st. See before, p. 631, & 67.

did not only condemn, with a true Christian zeal, all such violent and unjust treatment, as point- a blank opposite to the spirit of the gospel, but clearly confuted the false and uncharitable surmises of their pretended total rejection, from the plain and obvious sense of those predictions ; in consequence of which, they judged, on the contrary, that no kind usage, caresses, or encouragements, ought to be neglected, to allure them to the gospel.

THESE opposite opinions and methods were strenuously maintained and put in practice by their respective partisans ; and each side had for some time the pleasure of being attended with a surprising success ; and that the desperate state the whole Jewish nation then groaned under, had so far rendered them equally susceptible of both, that each greatly contributed to the daily increase of their new converts ; and those which could not be deterred by the threats and severity of the one, were yet easily allured by the caresses and generous treatment of the other, into a b seemingly zealous conversion to Christianity.

IT was not long, however, before both sides had the mortification to see their pretended Neophytes degenerate, some into vile and embittered apostates, and others into blasphemous scoffers of every thing that was held sacred and holy by the Christians ; and that more especially, whenever the Church, whether the Latin or Greek, laboured under the displeasure of, or a persecution from, the secular power ; and they gladly beheld themselves at full liberty, not only to relapse and apostatize, but to vent their most inveterate rancour against Christ and his religion, by such horrid curses and blasphemies, as easily convinced the world that they still retained, under the specious cloke of proselytism, the same obdurate and invincible averseness against the gospel and its professors.

THIS plain and open perfidy of theirs, of which we have given so many pregnant instances through the course of this chapter, and to which they were either driven by the severe, or allured by the generous, treatment which they met with from both clergy and laity, could not fail of awaking their diffidence, and dislike of all such forced and indirect conversions. Accordingly, some councils were convened, both by the Latin and Greek patriarchs, and sundry wise precautions enacted by both, to prevent all such scandalous abuses for the future. One of them was, that they should not be admitted to baptism, but kept as catechumens, till they had given sufficient proof of the sincerity of their conversion ; and another, that some bounds should be put to that profuse liberality, which usually accompanied their admission into the church, lest that should still prove an inducement to a poisonous vermin to creep into her bosom. In other d respects they were ordered to treat them with kindness, and a compassionate regard to their ignorance and prejudices of education, and to avoid every thing that might give them a disgust to the gospel, or revive their native fondness for the more pompous and delightful rites of the Mosaic law. But these wholesome injunctions did not long continue in force, before their old jealousies awakened again, too probably, by the untoward behaviour of their proselytes, and obliged them, especially those of the Greek church, to have recourse to different measures, and such as, how expedient soever they might then think them, will, we doubt not, appear very injudiciously calculated, either to assure the church of their sincerity, or to confirm them in the faith they were going to profess, as the reader will see by the sketch we shall here subjoin of them, taken out of their own formularies (D).

I. THEY

That of the prophet Hosea is no less pregnant of the same kind of promises ; where, after having elegantly described their long and dreadful captivity, under the figure of a people destitute of their king, priests, sacrifices, and altars, and other exterior marks of worship, concludes at length with these words : Afterwards shall
the children of Israel return, and seek the Lord their God, and DAVID their king (15). By which last both Jews and Christians rightly understand the Messiah, or promised deliverer.

Accordingly, the apostle having affirmed that all Israel should be saved, after their long rejection to make room for the Gentiles (16), adds in the same verse, that their promised deliverer should come out of Zion ; or, as some understand it, as more apposite to the apostle's designs (17), should come to Zion, the mountain now on which (and not that of Moriah as formerly) the new temple, whether to be understood spiritually or literally, was to remain, during the Messiah's reign, as we lately shewed : which Messiah, St. Peter tells the Jews of his time (18), the heavens must receive, until the time of the restitution of all things, when the time of re- freshing shall come from the presence of the Lord ; when he shall send Jesus Christ, which had been formerly preached unto you (19) ; and then will that prediction of the redeemer be accomplished. Verily, verily, I say unto you, you shall see me no more, until the time come when ye shall say, Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord (20).

Many other places may be quoted to prove this restoration, but these we hope will be sufficient for our purpose.

(D) Cotelerius mentions two of these formularies, the one inserted in the Greek ritual, and another he found in the French king's library, which is of a later date, and contains some articles of abjuration which are not in the former (21) ; and amongst them, that mentioned above, under the head of their disculpating themselves from having incurred any civil punishment. But the most remarkable is that whereby they oblige the convert to profess his full and sincere belief of transub-stantiation, in the following terms : “ I believe that the “ bread and wine, mystically consecrated by the Chris“ tians, are the body and blood of Christ, which are “ thus changed by his Divine Power, intellectually and

(15) Hosea iii. 4 & 5.

(18) Acts iii. 21.

Catechism. ex Hebræis ap. Goar.

(16) Rom. xi. 25, & seq.

(19) Acts iii. 19, & seq.

(17) J. Mede, Jurica. Basnag. & al.

(20) Luke xiii. 35, & seq.

(21) Ordo &

“ invisibly,

a THEY were first of all to make them protest in the most solemn manner, that their desire to become Christians was entirely free from all worldly views, and uninfluenced by any secular hopes or fears; that neither poverty nor violence, nor the desire of riches or honours, or any sinister motive, had any share in their conversion. 2. They were in the same solemn manner to protest themselves guiltless of any crime or misdemeanour which might render them obnoxious to the punishment of the law, and make them seek to avoid it by their change of religion. 3. They were obliged to abjure every branch of the Jewish worship; the observation of the passover, unleavened bread, the sabbath, and other Jewish festivals, their fasts, &c. 4. They obliged them to anathematise all the various sects of the Jews, not excepting that of the Pharisees; together with their superstitious washing of pots, and other vessels, and all their other traditions. They made them likewise anathematise all that observed the feast of Purim, or of Esther<sup>p</sup>, and the author of another called Monopodana, or more probably some Jewish dance in that way. To these they added the names of four other infamous villains of their nation; and above all, that of the Messiah whom the Jews expect; that is, according to their sense of it, Antichrist, that is to appear at the end of the world. 5. The Neophyte was to make a public confession of his Christian faith, to which they added or changed some of the articles, as the time or the present occasion required. 6. The whole ceremony was concluded with a protestation of his sincerity; and wishing that if he was not really so, if he entertained the least desire in his heart of returning to his old Judaism, or held any converse with those that persisted in it, either by going to their synagogues, or even eating and drinking with them, that all the curses of the law, the guilt and trembling of Cain, the leprosy of Gebazi, &c. might fall upon his head, and that his soul might go to the devil.

c THE Latin made likewise sundry wholesome regulations concerning their converts, in several of their synodical councils; yet all too weak to put an effectual stop to those abuses, and to the just suspicion which their behaviour frequently gave them of their sincerity: and hence proceeded those pathetic complaints and bitter indictments exhibited against them on the one hand, and the severe treatment which they brought upon themselves by their perfidy and hypocrisy on the other. They found indeed, in some countries, a more effectual expedient to assure themselves of the sincerity of those converts, particularly in France and England, where, immediately after their baptism, they were stripped of all their goods, and reduced to live upon the charity of the clergy and laity, and often forced to beg their bread<sup>q</sup>; the king and peers of the realm not only countenancing that injustice, but being partakers of the fruits of it; if that was not done rather to deter them from embracing Christianity, as it is likely too many did merely from such sinister motives (E).

d UPON the whole, the experience of above sixteen centuries hath sufficiently shewn, what right unbiassed reason might have suggested to every thinking Christian, concerning these two opposite ways of converting this hardened and carnal people; viz. that how well and piously soever designed they might be, they would prove little better than incentives to the generality of them, to the most abominable hypocrisy and flagrant impiety, and a means of alluring or frightening them into the feigned worship of a divine Messiah; whom, far from believing to be such, they abhorred and cursed in their hearts, and would be ready to do so openly, whenever they found themselves in circumstances to do it with impunity.

e WE come now to some others, which have been tried for the same charitable ends, and which have proved no less unsuccessful and obstructive to their conversion. One of these, which was attempted by some learned doctors of the church, was the pretending to prove to them the mysteries of Christianity by the writings of heathen philosophers; such as those of the Trinity, Incarnation, and death of the WORD, or Messiah, &c. for if those philosophers, who knew nothing of revelation, and followed only the dictates of reason, could yet discover and believe those mysteries, they concluded from thence, that there could be nothing in them contrary to reason, and consequently, that the Jews could have no objection to the belief of “ invisibly, and above all possible conception, and only “ known unto himself.” From these two articles, but especially from the last, of which there is not the least hint in the old Greek ritual, it may be reasonably inferred, that new ones were added to the old ones, according to the exigence of the time (22).

<sup>p</sup> De hac, vid. Anc. Hist. vol. i. 607. Basnag. ubi sup. ch. 33. (X).

<sup>q</sup> De hoc, vid. CAROLI vii. letter, ap. Mabil. annal. &

(E) This abuse, it seems, was a practice amongst them, of as long standing as it was universal; insomuch that the emperor Arcadius, having observed that the greatest part of them became profelytes merely to screen themselves from justice, either for crimes, debts, or law-suits, enacted a law, forbidding the admission of them into the church, till they had made full satisfaction in all those respects (23); which law was, in all probability, in force in Balsamon's time, who makes particular mention of it (24).

(22) De his, vid. Basnag. Hist. des Juifs, lib. ix. c. xlix. §. 8. in nomine Phot. tom. iv. p. 71. ap. Basnag. ubi sup.

(23) Arcad. Cod. Theod. of.

(24) Balz.

them: which way of reasoning, whatever impression it might make upon a candid Deist, a could be of no weight to a Jew: for besides the singular contempt, which, as we have elsewhere shewn, that nation hath always discovered for prophane learning<sup>r</sup>, it is not from reason, but from the scriptures, that they fetch their objections against those mysteries; and from a multitude of texts, both in the Pentateuch, and other books of the Old Testament, wherein the unity of God is indicated in the strongest and most express terms. And they are too gross and stupid, as well as averse to human learning, to understand, much less to admit of, the solutions and arguments which have been urged in vindication of those Divine Mysteries: so that the calling in the heathen philosophers in confirmation of them, from whatever quarter they might have received those extraordinary lights, (which we have not room to inquire into) hath had this malignant effect upon the whole Jewish nation, that it hath confirmed them in a belief that most of the other superstitious ceremonies which they see practised in the Latin and Greek churches, such as the worship of images, praying to saints, reliques, pilgrimages, and a great number of others, were, like the mysteries above-mentioned, of heathenish extract; and, as such, were, with the utmost vehemence and zeal, cried down by the unanimous voices of all the Jews who assisted at that grand consultation, of which we have lately given an account<sup>s</sup>.

THE same ill success the great Picus de Mirandola, and other learned Christians, have likewise met with, who have had recourse to the Jewish Cabbala for proofs of those mysteries, as if the authority of the New Testament was not sufficient to support itself, and them, without the assistance of such precarious props. How much easier and effectual, if any thing can be so, against a people so strongly biassed by temporal views and expectations, to have proved to them the Divine Authority of the New Testament; which is in a great measure founded on that of the Old; and comes farther confirmed by the numberless miracles of its Divine Author and his disciples, as well as by the irrefragable evidence of his predictions; of which their long dispersion, and the ruins of their city and temple, are standing and unquestionable monuments. By this method (without the help of such lame auxiliaries as the precarious notions of a Pythagoras, Socrates, Plato, Hierocles, or of the Sibyline, and other heathen oracles, and much more of an enthusiastic Cabbala) they might have cut the controversy short, and proved the chief and fundamental point beyond all reply, That the Messiah was really come at the predicted time, and that the Christ acknowledged by Christians as our Redeemer, is that very Divine Deliverer, so promised and foretold, both in the law and the prophets.

BUT the most injudicious, as well as the most unlikely method made use of to convert them by the Greek and Latin churches, but especially by the latter, was the appealing to their own peculiar miracles; such as were done, or pretended to be wrought, by the intercession of their saints, by crucifixes, reliques, images, and other consecrated places and things; especially by their miraculous host, or consecrated wafer, of which we have given many instances through the course of this chapter; not considering that if they were ever so real, or even were they to see them with their own eyes, they would still retort to them, what the Egyptians did to Moses upon the like occasion, “Thou bringest coals to Newcastle, when thou pretendest to “work thy miracles in a country so plentifully stored with magicians:” for as we have shewn already more than once, there is scarcely a nation in the world that lays a greater claim to them, whether for number or greatness, than the Jewish (F), to counterbalance all that can be alleged against them from any other quarter. Should any one exact from them a greater regard to be paid to the authority of the church legends, than to their fabulous rabbies, they will, besides the obvious retortion one may justly expect to such a demand, immediately recur to that passage in Deuteronomy, wherein they are not only forbid expressly to be seduced by any miracle, how specious or apparently real soever, from the worship of the true God, but even to put that prophet, or worker of the miracle, to death; alleging, that God permits such things to be done in order to prove their faith and obedience<sup>t</sup>. And it is in consequence of this command that their Talmud, which acknowledges the miracles of Christ, justifies the

<sup>r</sup> See Anc. Hist. vol. i. p. 730.

<sup>s</sup> See before, p. 609, & seq.

<sup>t</sup> Ch. ix. 1, & seq.

(F) We have had occasion to mention a great number of them, pretended to have been wrought, if not by, yet in favour of, some of their great saints and eminent doctors, as a testimony from heaven of their exemplary sanctity, and of the profound regard that was due to their writings. Such was moreover that which they report to have been wrought at the school of their famed rabbi Joseph Karcs; not once or twice, but daily;

not in the dark, but in open day; not in a corner, but in the presence of a number of other learned rabbies, and of his scholars, who constantly heard a voice from heaven, explaining to them the deepest mysteries of their religion, and were so many authentic witnesses of the miracle; for which, and for his singular piety, and vast erudition, he was titled Mosheh Hador, a prodigy of the age (25).

(25) De hoc, vid. sup. p. 583. Vid. Et Yad, Khazakah, Shalshelet, R. Ganiz, Wolf, Bibl. Rabbin. sub voc. Joseph.

a repulse and severe treatment he met with from the Sanhedrin; and that the whole nation is taught to reject all such as false evidences, and as designed to allure them from the true worship of God to their own ruin.

We shall pass over several other methods which have been tried to convert them; such as the founding of seminaries for instructing clergymen how to handle a controversy against them, preaching weekly lectures against them, and obliging them to be present, under some penalties, and others of the like kind; all which either proved abortive, or served only to confirm them the more in their prejudices<sup>a</sup>. But upon the whole, we hope we have clearly shewn, that of all the obstacles which our Christian divines, of almost every church, have laid in the way to their conversion, that of their so stiffly denying the second advent of Christ, b and their universal restoration, in that glorious manner in which we have seen it described by Ezekiel, and confirmed by other prophecies and predictions both of the Old and New Testament, hath proved the most deterring and insurmountable to them; inasmuch as it not only deprives them of all those blessed prospects they are taught to expect from his future reign, but leads them to utter despair of ever receiving the least benefit from his coming, much less of ever seeing the accomplishment of those glorious promises, so solemnly made, and so often repeated, in the sacred writings. Instead of which, (if all expectations of his second coming, before the great day of judgment, must be excluded) their retrospection of all their past miseries serves only to make them look upon him as a most severe, and all their future ones, as a merciless and inexorable judge. This is, at least, the light they imagine all Christians c behold their whole nation in, and the sad and desperate condition, to which those that deny a second coming and reign of Christ, apparently doom them, that do not embrace his gospel: and can we wonder at their averiness to it, and using all possible means to discredit and oppose it, not only among themselves, but with all other nations? But is that indeed the doctrine of Christ and his apostles? And doth it really exclude all hopes, all probability, of a recall and restoration under him in any sense? Let those look to it, be they of what church or sect soever they will, who maintain so uncharitable and antisciptural a notion; and, by pretending to found it on the authority of the New Testament, have added one obstacle more to all the d disputed point set in a true light, may, among many others, consult the authors mentioned in the margin<sup>w</sup>. As for us, whose province and narrow limits exempt us from entering into the merits of that controversy, we think it sufficient to have pointed out the main causes of their unbelief, and the means by which they have, in spite of so many disadvantages and discouragements as have attended their long dispersion, been able to preserve amongst them so firm and general an expectation of a temporal Messiah. Difficulties and discouragements, we say, not only from the Christians and other nations, but much more from their own doubts and anxieties about that capital point, Whether he was still to come, or was already come.

FOR however confident of the former they may outwardly appear, when they converse with Christians, or strangers, (which plainly shews how glad they are to catch at a shadow e of hope, rather than live under the dismal apprehensions, which the contrary opinion, as held by the generality of Christian divines, must of course fill them with) yet there can be no greater proof of their extreme perplexity about it, than the debates and unhappy result of that grand assembly of theirs on the plain of Ageda in Hungary<sup>x</sup>, formerly mentioned; especially if we add to it, the strenuous, and hitherto fruitless pains they have been at, to discover the royal sceptre of Judah still subsisting in some part or other of the globe, as the only stay they have left to support their expectations. We lately took notice both of their triumph and disgrace, upon their hopes of having found it in so flourishing a state as the Abissinian empire; the result of which disappointment was, that since it could not, with all their laborious searches, be found in the old world, they had now no other way left, than to f send in quest of it in the new. They accordingly dispatched some of their own nation into those but lately discovered countries, with proper orders and directions for that purpose; but with as little success or satisfaction to the rest; and it was not till Cromwell's time, that they received some intelligence that any Israelites, much less any Jews, were settled there<sup>y</sup>. This at first came by a letter directed to the rabbi Menasse Ben Israel, from Aaron Levi, alias Montefinos, or Montefini, then travelling in some of those parts, and through the province of Quis, under the conduct of an Indian, as he thought him, but whom he afterwards found to be a Jew; and who assured him that there were vast numbers of them who lived concealed behind the long ridge of mountains called Las Cordilleras. He added, that his curiosity inducing him to pursue his journey farther towards them, he came at length to the banks before, p. 609, & seq.

<sup>a</sup> De his, vid. sup. p. 407. & seq. & alib. pass.

Judeos 1701. JURIEU's prophecies, vol. ii. MEDE in Apocalypf. restaur. of Israel, Lond. 1747.

<sup>y</sup> De hoc, vid. p. 624, & seq.

<sup>x</sup> See

of a river, where, upon a signal given by his guide, they perceived a great number of them <sup>a</sup> on the other side, and heard them pronounce these words distinctly in the Hebrew tongue : “ Hear, O Israel ; The LORD thy God is one LORD .” The farther account they gave of themselves was, that they were brought thither by a kind of a miraculous Providence, and had had frequent wars with the idolatrous natives, and as often overthrew them. They added, that they were the descendants of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, and of the tribe of Reuben ; and that the reason of the Indians being so often at war with them, was, that their magi, or priests, had revealed to them, that the God of Israel was the true and only God, and that his people would become masters of the whole world, about the latter end of it. Thus far the letter <sup>a</sup> ; wherein, however, there is not a word about the other tribes, much less of that of Judah ; which one might have expected would have been preferably mentioned before <sup>b</sup> that of Reuben, if the relation had been a forgery, either of Montesini, or of rabbi Menasse, as some learned men have suspected it <sup>b</sup> ; though others have taken some pains to vindicate and back it with probable conjectures <sup>c</sup>.

HOWEVER that be, the latter seems to have laid such stress upon it, that it induced him to publish his Esperanza de Israel, a book often quoted in this chapter ; wherein he not only attempts to prove the vast number and power of the Israelitish nation, from those that are found in America, but hath been at the pains to find out a new, and till then unthought of, route, to bring them out of Asia into that new part of the globe, by affirming, that these two were anciently joined, and made but one large continent ; but were parted asunder by a miraculous providence at the streights of Anian, after his people were got safe on the other <sup>c</sup> side, from which they retired farther into the inland and mountainous parts for their greater security. This was a strange way of extolling the glory of his nation : but as he was then soliciting the English parliament, who were all enthusiasts, for their re-establishment in this country, he might think that a proper plea enough to obtain their consent, and with that view dedicated his book to them : and we have seen already how well he succeeded, since he obtained not only their approbation and thanks, but a grant to his request.

MENASSE was not the only person who hath attempted to prove this early settlement of the Jews in America ; many others have done the same, though without following his route, or pretending to assert any of their own, much less tacking a miracle to it. And it must be owned, that one finds in most parts of that spacious continent so many apparent traces of <sup>d</sup> Judaism, as might incline one to believe them to have been some, if not the very first, inhabitants of it <sup>d</sup> : but when one weighs them on the other hand with the vast multitude of strange heathenish rites and superstitions, barbarous and inhuman customs, with which they are everywhere blended, even where one finds the plainest traces of Judaism, one is at a loss how to reconcile them with that notion. But as we shall have occasion to resume this subject in our history of that country, we shall enlarge no farther upon it, than observing, that such abominable degeneracy is far from being inconsistent with that bent which the Jewish nation ever shewed to it, from their first coming out of Egypt. Witness that strange instance of it which the brave Judas Maccabeus discovered among his slain troops, so long after their return from Babylon, and after they had smarted so severely for their old heathenish superstitions, and <sup>e</sup> of which the reader will find an account in their history <sup>e</sup>.

FROM all the above-mentioned excursions and fruitless searches after the Judaic sceptre and royalty, our readers cannot but be fully convinced of the vanity and perverseness of the Jewish writers and doctors, who have hitherto endeavoured to obscure the glaring evidence of a divine oracle, which all their united force of learning and sophistry could never repel, by substituting in lieu of it, a variety of pretended dynasties, in India, Tartary, Abissinia, and other parts of the world, equally uncertain and impertinent. For, not to mention the short duration of those boasted dynasties, whereas that of the Messiah was to last to the end of time, it is plain, even from their own confession, that none of them did or could belong to the tribe of Judah, of which the oracle there speaks, but at the best only to some other of the ten Israelitish tribes, <sup>f</sup> formerly led captive, and dispersed through the Assyrian empire ; though, in process of time, they had been so blended and confounded with each other, that they had lost the very memory of their origin and distinction ; and been supposed to have been of Israelitish extract, on account of their circumcision, and some other rites no less known and practised by the other sons of Abraham, by Keturah <sup>f</sup>, whose posterity therefore they might as probably be as that of Jaacob : though, even according to this last supposition, had any one, or even every one,

<sup>a</sup> Deuter. vi. 4.

<sup>a</sup> Vid. R. PETACHIAH, Pereg. printed ann. 1644.

<sup>b</sup> SPIZEL, Relevat.

Prelat. MONTESINI, BASNAGE, CALMET, & al.

<sup>c</sup> ACOSTA examp. vit. hum. l. i. c. 16, & al.

<sup>d</sup> De

his, vid. Sir WILLIAM PENN's Letter of the Present State of the Americ. Colon. p. 143, 150, & seq. ZARAT's Discovery of Peru, l. i. c. 10. ACOSTA, ubi supra. LAES orig. Gent. Americ. p. 83, & seq. & al. plur.

<sup>e</sup> 2 Maccab. xii. 39, & seq. vid. & Anc. Hist. vol. iv. p. 68, & seq. & alib. pass. See this vol. p. 479, & seq.

<sup>f</sup> Genesis xxv. pass.

a of the tribes settled itself into a monarchy even from the earliest times of their captivity, and their government continued in statu quo unto this day, nothing of all this could have affected or interfered with the prophecy above-mentioned, which was to be accomplished only in the tribe of Judah, and in the person of the Messiah, the sole heir, and last possessor, of the Jewish sceptre, whose reign, in every respect more glorious and extensive than that of any of his ancestors, was to continue till the end of the world, and to be distinguished from them all by such extraordinary blessings as we have been describing above.

But we have dwelt long enough on that subject, and shall only add, with regard to the tribe of Judah, to whom that sceptre was promised, that it seems to have been preserved by a particular Providence, together with that of Benjamin, which alone adhered to it in the b rupture of the two kingdoms of Judah and Israel <sup>2</sup>, from being removed into those distant and unknown countries at their last dispersion, into which the other ten had formerly been <sup>h</sup>, and to have suffered them to be scattered only through several parts of Europe, where they have, for the most part, continued ever since, some only excepted; who, being banished out of Spain, went and settled on the opposite shore along the coast of Barbary <sup>1</sup>, where we are well assured they were so far from being in a condition of reviving their old pretensions to the Judaic sceptre, that the far greater part of them perished through want and misery, and the survivors have continued in a sad state of slavery ever since.

THAT Europe, especially the southern part of it, was that part of the world into which those two tribes were sold for slaves by the Roman emperor, is indeed denied by the most c celebrated Jewish writers, particularly by those of the Talmud <sup>k</sup>, and the authors of the Beresbitb Rabbah, or large comment on Genesis <sup>1</sup>, and of the Sedar Holam <sup>m</sup>, who pretend that they are dispersed over the whole globe. Menasse Ben Israel affirms the same thing; but adds, that he sent the most considerable chiefs of that tribe captives into Spain <sup>n</sup>; and it is not unlikely that that monarch did it with the same view that he is said to have destroyed all he could find of the seed of David <sup>o</sup>; namely, to prevent their too great distance from Rome's encouraging them to reunite themselves into one government under some enterprising chief of their tribe; or to be nearer at hand to suppress it, if any such thing was attempted. However that be, whether confined to Europe, or dispersed through the world, we do not find that any Jewish writers of credit, or indeed any but the fabulous Benjamin, and one or d two other travellers of the same stamp, whom we have elsewhere sufficiently exploded <sup>p</sup>, have pretended that the Jewish sceptre or monarchy hath been any-where reclaimed, much less manifestly restored or continued. On the contrary, some of their more learned have in vain endeavoured to prove it sufficient to answer the design of the oracle, that it still subsisted under their chiefs of the captivity, and the heads of their most celebrated academies. Those of a more modern date, and of greater candour and impartiality, have freely confessed that it had long since ceased to subsist; even, says their great and learned Maimonides, ever since they were driven out of their land, they have lost their judiciary power of life and death <sup>q</sup>; for which he gives this remarkable reason, that they were forbid (by the Mosaic law) to exercise it anywhere out of it. What is still more worthy of our attention is, that this excellent Rabbi e flourished at the same time with the fabulous Benjamin above-mentioned; from which we may judge what credit he gave to his infamous legend of their Jewish kings, and their pretended extensive power and splendid court at Baghdad, and other fabulous dynasties of the Jewish nation, with which that author hath embellished his romance. For if their grand sanhedrim, in whom the supreme power was lodged, and to whom their very monarchs were subjected, even by the common consent of all the Jewish doctors, could not sit in judgment in any other place but in Jerusalem, as hath been formerly shewn, how could it be lawful for them to exercise that judiciary power out of Judea, and among foreign nations with whom they lived either in a state of captivity or tribute, or at best under the notion of strangers, and despicable exiles and vagabonds? What nation under the sun would be compassionate enough f to allow them such an extraordinary privilege? But we have sufficiently shewn, through the course of this chapter, how very opposite their condition hath been in every country and period since their dispersion, and shall only add one or two testimonies to that of Maimonides, from a great number of others of their later writers, who agree with him that this hath been their real state ever since that fatal æra. The learned David Kimchi, an account of whom and his works we have elsewhere given †, in his comment on the famed prophecy of Hosea, that the Jews should continue a long time without king or prince, without sacrifice, &c. gives

<sup>2</sup> 1 Kings, xii. pass. before, p. 576, & seq.

<sup>h</sup> 2 Kings, xvii. 5, & seq. See also Anc. Hist. vol. i. p. 462 (F).

<sup>1</sup> See

<sup>k</sup> Tractat. Sanhedrim ap. Elfenmeng. Endek. Indent. part ii. c. 10.

<sup>1</sup> Sect.

<sup>m</sup> ZUTTA, fol. 35. col. 2.

<sup>n</sup> ESPERANZ. D'ISRAEL, fol. 40. col. 2.

<sup>o</sup> JOSEPH. bell.

<sup>p</sup> See before, p. 537, & seq.

<sup>q</sup> Tract. BABA KAMA, ap. L'Emper. not. in eund.

† See before, p. 548, & seq.

this remarkable exposition of it *. These are the days of our exile and calamity, under which a we groan at this very time, having neither prince or king, but being in subjection to Gentile monarchs, and under the authority of their beathen potentates. Even the famed Isaac Charbonel, when in the height of his prosperity, and high favour with the kings of Spain and Portugal, reckoned it one of the three calamities that attended their exile, that they had now neither king nor kingdom, dominion, sceptre, nor judiciary power †. But we have dwelt long enough upon this subject, and have reason to fear, our readers by this time, are tired with following that unhappy nation through such a variety of countries, and so long a series of time, and will be glad at length to sit down, and take a nearer as well as more interesting view of those that were settled within our own country; of whom, though we have already given some account in the course of this chapter, we have yet some farther remarks to add with respect to their b state and condition in it, and the several laws which have been from time to time enacted for and against them since the conquest, as they have been traced and extracted out of antient records by our learned antiquary Selden, and since abridged by the reverend Samuel Purchas, author of the Pilgrims, who hath preserved to us that curious collection among his other works ‡. A summary review of the most material of which we hope they will not be displeased with, at a time in which our nation hath been so divided in their opinion about the passing and repealing the late act for their naturalization, and in which several of their apocalyptic friends among us, as well as their own doctors, expected to see some eminent prognostics, and fore-runners of their final deliverance, and long-wished-for restoration (H).

WE lately took notice of a strange expedient which the government took, both in this and c in a neighbouring kingdom, to assure themselves of the sincerity of their Jewish converts, by confiscating all their goods, and reducing them to live upon charity ¶; the consequence of which was, whether owing to their ill behaviour after their conversion, or want of compassion in the clergy and laity, that many of them were reduced to the lowest degree of want and misery, and became a public detrement to the rest of their nation from following their example, and daily lessened the number of new converts.

THE motives of this severe treatment our author hath not thought fit to acquaint us with; though we doubt not but they were hinted at in the preamble of those edicts or statutes which enforced it. But as we find by one of the first of those of that kind, mentioned by him, relating to their toleration, and stiled Statutum de Judaismo, it plainly appears, that, both d before and since the conquest, the Jews were held here in a servile condition, and had no property of their own, except by the king's permission; Judei, & omnia sua, regis sunt, &c. which frequently subjected them to great oppressions and hardships, from which those might be exempted who became Christians. It is not improbable that this might encourage great numbers of them to embrace Christianity, more for the sake of that than any real conviction, or abating one grain of their prejudice and inveteracy against it.

HOWEVER, with respect to those in England, it is plain, from Selden's own words, who had all those statutes before him, that this severe precaution became not in force against them till * Hosea, x. 4.

† Comment. in Isaiah, iii. 8.

‡ Relat. of the World, lib. ii. c. 10. §. 7.

¶ Page 637.

(H) By those prognostics are not meant those ten surprising ones which Buxtorf hath collected out of the Jewish books (27), and which are of so dire and threatening a nature, as if they thought the phials of the divine vengeance against their nation so far from being exhausted by their long and severe exile, that he still kept these in reserve against them, as the most terrible of all, to be poured upon them successively before he sent to them the promised deliverance. Our reader may see them at full length in the author himself, or more succinctly displayed in his English abridger, published an. 1734, in two volumes octavo; where he will likewise find an equal number of extraordinary blessings, which are there added to counterbalance them, and are to begin and accompany the whole reign of the Messiah. In both which he will meet with such a surprising fund of rabbinical invention, together with such an artful perverseness in distorting every even the most distant texts of the sacred writings, in proof of their own carnal reveries, as can only be accounted for by those more explicit ones, which declare them to be given up to a judicial blindness.

But, 2dly, neither do we mean by those prognostic signs of their conversion, what several zealous enthusiasts, Christians as well as Jews, have with more confidence than probability ventured to obtrude for such; as the downfall of the Othman and Roman empires, of the papal power, and other like vague conjectures, in which those have been found most erroneous that were ushered in with the greatest assurance (28).

The signs here meant by the maintainers of a final and universal restoration of the Jews, are such as are plainly hinted at in the gospel, as the sure fore-runners of Christ's second coming; viz. a general defection from the faith (29), an inundation of unbelief and immorality, bloody wars, and horrid devastations (30), fraud, treachery, and every kind of oppression and cruelty (31), earthquakes, famine, and other awakening judgments and events, which, with respect to time and other dignostics, are not however so explicitly particularized, as not to leave room for men of different persuasions to interpret them according to their different systems and prejudices.

(27) Buxt. tradit. Hebr. extr. ex lib. Abakort. Rachal. five pulvis aromat.
L'Abadie. Whiston, London, & al. (29) Luke xviii. 9, & seq. & alib. pass.
 iii. 8, & seq. (31) Ibid. vers. 22, & seq. Mark xiii. 5, & seq. & alib. pass.

(28) Vid. int. al. Jurieu
 (30) Matt. ii. 9.

a the 17th year of the reign of Henry III. and, consequently, not till a proper provision was made, and an edifice reared for the reception and maintenance of those converts, called, from them, Domus conversorum, (the same that is now called the Rolls); to the intent that they might live sub quadam honesta vivendi regula, & certum haberent, in tota vita sua, tutumque domicilium, refugium, & sufficiens sustentamentum, sine servili labore & fœnoris emolumento, as Matthew Paris expresses it.

THIS provision, however, proved but a cold encouragement to the generality of them; and the confinement to the rules and maintenance of the house, joined to their deprivation of all other property, did but little suit their wandering, mercantile, and avaritious temper; so that few but the idlest and poorest cared to accept of it; infomuch that, in the reign of Edward I. a new law was enacted in their favour, whereby one half of their effects was allotted to the maintenance of the house, and the other to themselves. This appears from the placid-ness of that monarch, wherein it is said that Jo. de S<sup>o</sup> Dionysio, custos domus conversorum, or master of the converts house, had a writ for the moiety of the goods of Beleaguer and Huccoth, two Jewish converts of Oxford; and the other half was allowed to them, &c.; and on this foot it seems to have remained till their total expulsion out of the kingdom, when the house above-mentioned was converted into a repository for the rolls, and hath continued so ever since. As to the unconverted Jews, we have already taken notice of the servile state and vassalage the statute de Judaismo laid them under to the king; which in the main was no other than what they were subjected to in all other Christian kingdoms. They were allowed their synagogues and burying-places, and the free use of their religion, laws, and customs, and such liberty of commerce as to enrich themselves by it, though most commonly by usury and extortion; which was the usual complaint raised against them by the people, and rose sometimes to such a height, as came little short of persecution; but which they had the address to avert by some large presents, or a good sum, either to the reigning monarch, or his prime ministers. They had one among them who held the office of Presbyteratus omnium Judeorum totius Angliæ, who was appointed over them by the king, as appears by the charter of king John (I); which office Mr. Selden takes to mean the chief priesthood of their synagogues, and not a mere secular eldership, of which he doth not find the least mention in the pleas of the exchequer. In this charter is likewise mentioned a former one granted to them by king Richard I. by which certain justices were appointed ad custodiam Judeorum, before whom pleas between themselves, or between them and others, were held, and matters adjudged secundum legem & consuetudinem Judaismi, as the entry often words it.

IN most towns of note were two Christians and two Jews, or only one of each, appointed as public notaries for all their deeds and contracts; and those notaries had one chest with several keys, for the safe keeping of such deeds; and these were called Chirographarii Christiani & Judei, of such and such a town, and in the statute de Judaismo, les bouches cyrografes. And it was by these chirographers that the Jewish deeds, contracts, &c. which are stiled Starra, from the Hebrew Shatar, were to be tried, as Solomon de Stanford agnovit by Starrum suum. If any doubt or dispute intervened on account of those Starra, the common course was to issue out a process to the sheriff of the county, or to the constables of the castles of great towns, to make proclamation on three of their subsequent sabbaths, summoning all Jews of this or that synagogue to appear at their exchequer, to account with such as had raised the said doubts or dispute. These proclamations and venire facias's were usually made or written in the Latin or Hebrew tongue, as appears from some recorded instances of that kind (K). In the like manner, says our author, did all other sheriffs and constables make their returns in Hebrew and Latin; both those tongues being then in use, not only in those Jewish deeds, the one on one side, and the other on the other, but likewise in records of law, as likewise of their venire facias, or summoning of sex probos & legales homines, & sex legales Judeos.

f WHAT form of swearing was prescribed to them at that time, our author could not find, among the many records he perused on that subject, but adds, that R. Moses Mikkotzi, who lived in Henry III.'s time, affirms, in his comment on the affirmative precepts, that the holding up of the roll of the Law or Pentateuch between their arms, was equivalent to the verbal calling to the God of Israel to witness to the truth of the given evidence; as that is esteemed amongst them the most sacred and authentic of all the books of the Old Testament.

(I) Johannes Rex omnibus fidelibus suis, & omnibus & Judeis & Anglis salutem. Scite nos concessisse, & presenti chartâ nostrâ charta confirmasse Jacobo Judeo de Londoniis presbytero, Judeorum presbyteratum omnium Judeorum totius Angliæ habend' & tenend' quamdiu vixerit, libere & honorifice & quiete & integre, ita ut nemo ei super hoc molestiam aliquam aut gravamen inferre præsumat. Quare, &c. &c. Datum apud Rothomagum 31 die Julii, anno regni nostri primo.

(K) Thus: An. 52 Henr. 3. præceptum est vice-comiti Essex quod clamare faceret per scholas Judeorum Colcestriæ, per duo vel tria sabbata, si aliquis Judeus aut Judea, aliquod debitum exigere poterit de Rogero filio Petri. And again: Et vice-comes mandavit tam litera Latinâ quam Hæbraica quo nullus Judeus nec Judea aliquod debitum exigit de prædicto Rogero, &c.

THE statute de Judaismo, as well as some others since enacted, obliged every one of them, a male or female, above seven years of age, to wear upon their upper garment a mark of distinction, whereby they might be known, not unlike that which had been enjoined them by the council of Lateran. This was afterwards ordered by the provincial council of Oxford, held under Stephen archbishop of Canterbury, an. 8<sup>o</sup> Henr. III. to consist of two pieces of cloth of a yellow or some other colour, different from their garment, of about two fingers breadth and four in length, sown upon the breast. They were moreover obliged to pay tythes and other taxes, and were forbid to build new synagogues. We have moreover seen them, through the course of this chapter, frequently fined heavily, and as often severely prosecuted, sometimes for real, but most commonly for pretended, high crimes and misdemeanors of a civil or religious nature. Of the former kind were their but too well known b extortions, usury, frauds in commerce, and such-like; in all which, and the like cases, the wealthy amongst them were often redressed and screened by an appeal to the king and council, backed by a good round sum. But it was far otherwise in those of a religious nature; such as the circumcising and crucifying of Christian children, for which many of them have been put to various and severe deaths; or for indignities offered by them to the holy wafer, to the cross, churches, clergy, &c. in all which cases they were excluded from appealing to the king's council; the cognizance of such belonging only, as was alleged by bishop Ralegh, to the church and synod. Hæc ad ecclesiam spectant, non ad regalem curiam, cum de circumcissione, & de fidei læsione, quæstio ventiletur. Notwithstanding all which severities, they became so obnoxious to the whole realm for their avarice and extortions, as well as for the many atrocious c indignities laid to their charge against Christ and his religion, that they were at once condemned to a perpetual banishment by Edward I. an. 1291, in the 19th year of his reign, their moveables only being allowed to them, or, as Walsingham affirms, only so much of them as would defray their passage. His example was followed soon after by Philip the Fair of France; and, a little above a century after, by Ferdinand, out of Spain and Portugal, as we have elsewhere shewn †; so that England was the first country of all Christendom out of which the Jews were totally banished, to the number, according to Mathew of Westminster, of 160,511. To this we may add, that even since their readmission into this realm, though they have behaved with much greater circumspection than it is likely they had done before their expulsion, and the spirit of prejudice and persecution had been greatly allayed by the d reformation; yet neither the one nor the other hath been able so totally to reconcile their nation to the bulk of this, as to acquiesce to their naturalization. And it was doubtless with this view of abating at least, if not of removing, this popular dislike to it, that the late famed Mr. Toland undertook to write a kind of apology for them, and attempted to prove, from arguments merely secular and lucrative, how much it might conduce to the interest of England to naturalize a people so industrious, so wholly given to, and so well experienced in, most branches of public commerce; especially as they were known to be so unconcerned, if not e averse to all civil as well as religious feuds and differences among us, that there could be no danger of their interfering either for or against any of them; and much less still of their rivaling our natives in any promotions in church or state. The small regard which that performance (which was published an. 1715, in 8vo) met with then, notwithstanding the credit which its author was in among a powerful set of men, and the general discontent and clamour raised against the late act in their favour, have sufficiently shewn how unacceptable all such attempts are to our nation, whether the general dislike be well or ill founded, which we shall not take upon us to discuss, but close up this Jewish history with a short abstract of that stupid and abominable romance of theirs, often quoted in this chapter, under the title of Theolodoth Jesu (L). A piece which, though fraught with such monstrous forgeries, and flagrant anachronisms,

† See before, p. 576, & seq.

(L) Or (as it runs more fully in the Hebrew, and in imitation of the beginning of St. Mathew's gospel) ספר תולדות ישו, Sepher Hatholodoth Jesu, The Book of the Generation of Jesus; though the author doth not, like our evangelist, attempt to mention any of his ancestors, but begins his fabulous account with the birth, and so goes on with the history of the life, actions, and death of his Jesu, in his own base and blasphemous way. The writer calls himself Jonathan, and pretends to have been an inhabitant of Jerusalem, and co-temporary with the person whose life he proposes to write, and to have been an eye-witness of several of his miracles.

There have appeared several Jewish books under the same title of Theolodoth Jesu, differing in sundry circumstances of the same history, and not without a manifest necessity. The two most considerable are this of the pretended Jonathan, and one published by the learned doctor Wagenfeil, in the second volume of his Tela ignea Satanæ, but whose author was so little acquainted with prophane history, that he hath been guilty of the most monstrous anachronisms, such as would of themselves sufficiently explode his performance, was it not moreover interspersed with the most malicious and absurd forgeries. And this it was which, in all probability, obliged the Jews to trump up a new one under the same title, in which the chronology and order of events doth more regularly follow

- <sup>a</sup> anachronisms, that some of the most moderate and candid among their rabbies are ashamed to authorize it, though not so to own it to be of Jewish extract, is yet one of the main engines the rest of them make use of to confirm their vulgar in their contempt and hatred of Christ and his religion, by pretending to be fully convinced of the truth of every part of the forgery; and representing the whole as an authentic and unquestionable history, compiled by an inhabitant of Jerusalem, and an eye-witness of every fact; which they may the more confidently do, as they are so well assured of the readiness of their people to embrace the most extravagant legends against Christianity, or its odious founder, and to shut their eyes against, or overlook, the most glaring and palpable inconsistencies, which might otherwise stagger their belief.
- <sup>b</sup> We come now to give our readers the promised extract of the two chief books we mentioned in the last note, as the two most considerable that bear the title of Tholedoth Jesu, or Generations of Jesus; in which we shall confine ourselves to the most material transactions, as they have extracted, mutilated, and burlesqued out of the gospel, and pass by a great number of other puerile and ridiculous incidents, with which they both have interspersed their blasphemous narratives; adding only now and then a marginal note of such remarks as will best enable our English readers to judge of the ignorance and stupidity, as well as malice and impiety, of each performance.
- We begin with the former; viz. that published by the learned Wagenfeil<sup>a</sup>, which begins with the birth of Christ, and, instead of an immaculate virgin mother, makes him the spurious offspring of a young married woman, but debauched, as we have formerly hinted, by one Pandera, or Panther<sup>b</sup>, whom he gives him for his father; and adds, that he fled immediately to Babylon, and left his paramour to shift for herself. She was accordingly brought to bed of a son, who is the subject of his narrative, and named him Jehoshuah at his circumcision. She sent him early to school; but he proved so insolent a boy, that he scrupled not to uncover his head before his betters, and even in the presence of the priests, contrary to Jewish custom, which looks upon it as a mark of disregard, and obliges the disciples to veil their faces before their superiors. This singular boldness induced them to make some further enquiries into his extract; which being found and condemned as spurious and defiled, he went thence into Galilee; where having staid some short time, he removed thence to Jerusalem, with a full design to penetrate into the most sacred place of the temple, and to steal from thence the unutterable name of God (M); a theft so dreaded by the Jews, that, to prevent its being ever committed, they had, by the help of some magical power, formed a couple of large lions, and placed them on the right and left side of that most holy place, who, by their dreadful roar (which was such, that whoever was bold enough to attempt it, lost at once his memory and senses) were to guard that miraculous depositum from sacrilegious hands. This however, instead of deterring the young son of Panther, only put him upon an expedient to escape the danger; which he did, by raising the skin of his thigh, and sliding the ineffable name between it and the flesh; and having passed the entrance unmolested, made the best of his way to Bethlehem, where he immediately raised a dead body, and healed a leper; the fame of which soon gathered a vast concourse of people unto him, who having seated him on an ass, led him in triumph to Jerusalem. The arrival of this strange cavalcade soon alarmed the whole convened priesthood, who unanimously agreed to present an address to queen Oloina, or Helena (N), who at that time reigned in Judea, jointly with her son Mombaze, al. Hyrcan; beseeching

<sup>a</sup> Tela ignea Satanæ, vol. ii.

<sup>b</sup> See before, p. 626.

low that of the evangelists, though, in other respects, fraught with the most flagrant and impious forgeries. This last was published an. 1705, by the celebrated doctor Huldrick, with critical notes, which are so many eminent proofs of his skill in oriental learning (32). From that time those two have been distinguished among the learned by the titles of Tholedoth Jesu of Wagenfeil, and of Huldrick.

(M) We have formerly took occasion to mention and explode the superstitious regard which the Jews shew to the name Jehovah above all others of the Deity; and what miraculous virtues they attribute to the true pronounciation of it (33); and shall here observe the impiety of supposing that it still subsisted in the hands of such a notorious villain, who surreptitiously stole it, with no other view than to delude mankind with the blackest and most hellish impostures.

As to the additional circumstances of placing two lions by magic art to guard the entrance of the holy place, and to scare every attempter out of his senses by their dreadful roar, and the method which his Jesus took to avoid it (34), they are too puerile and ridiculous to deserve any further confutation than they carry along with them.

(N) Our author hath here displayed his ignorance of history in several instances relating to fact and time; and we are very sure that there was no such reigning queen at that time in Judea; whoever he might mean by his Helena and her son Hyrcan. A late critic, the more to expose the absurdity of the anachronism, hath endeavoured to prove that he meant the mother of Constantine the Great (35), whom, says he, he styles queen of the whole universe; which title can only belong to an empress; and as the Jewish fabulist represents

(32) Basnag. hist. des Juifs, tom. v. c. 13. §. ii. & seq.

(34) Tholedoth Wagenf. ubi supra.

Mon. Hist. Vol. V.

(35) Le Bleyne dissert. in Jerem. xiii. p. 97.

(33) Ant. Hist. vol. i. p. 484. & seq. (T).

befeeching her to order Jesus to be apprehended and punished according to his desert. He <sup>a</sup> was accordingly brought before that princess; but, by means of some fresh miracles, which he wrought in her presence, he easily brought her to espouse his interest against the complaining priests; which obliged them to have recourse to some other means to stop the progress of this new miracle-monger. Whilst they were deliberating about it, in came to them one of the priests named Judas, and offered to do it effectually, and beat him at his own weapons, provided they would charge themselves with, or absolve him from, the guilt which he must incur in getting the divine unutterable name. They had no sooner complied with his proposal, but he made himself master of his master's secret immediately; after which followed a dreadful struggle between them; in which, by virtue of the sacred word, they both raised themselves to a great height in the air, from which Judas tried a good while in vain to give <sup>b</sup> him a terrible fall. At length, having bethought himself of an expedient, and having let fall some urine upon him, they both being defiled by it, came down upon the ground with a desperate force. Jesus, however, soon recovered himself from the fall, and ran to purify himself from his pollution in the river Jordan; by which means he was again in a capacity of working new wonders amongst his followers. Judas, the more effectually to be revenged on him, pretended to yield to him, and become one of his disciples, and, by that stratagem, easily dive into his inmost secrets, which he betrayed to the doctors and priests, particularly that of his having stolen the name of God out of the temple: upon which they ordered him to be apprehended, as he was entering into it, by some of their ministers and menials. Some <sup>c</sup> of his disciples were likewise seized; but the greater part took themselves to their heels, and fled into the high mountains of Judea. Jesus was accordingly brought before the sanhedrim, and condemned to be tied to a marble pillar belonging to the city, where he was severely whipped, and crowned with thorns; and, upon his complaining of thirst, was made to drink wine mixed with myrrh. The sanhedrim, not thinking that punishment equal to his crime, condemned him to be stoned to death; which was accordingly done: but when they came to hang him on a tree, they found, to their surprize, that the criminal, who foresaw what death he was to die, had, by virtue of the divine name, so enchanted all the trees, that they broke with the weight. Here Judas helped them again with a counter-charm; and having fetched a high cabbage-stalk out of his gardens, hanged his body on it fast and sure.

THEIR next fear was lest his disciples should steal it away, and pretend that he was risen from <sup>d</sup> the dead; against which Judas likewise found out a fresh expedient, by burying it privately in the chanel of a brook, after they had turned the course whilst the grave was digging and filling; after which they let the waters resume their course. They accordingly published it all over the country that he was risen; which was the more readily believed, as his body was no-where to be found; when Judas at once exploded the rumour, by producing it out of the place where he had interred him; upon which it was immediately fastened to a horse's tail, and dragged along to the very royal palace, where the queen, who had before owned her belief of his resurrection, knew not what to answer to this new discovery, and left his body to the mercy of the people, who tore his hair from his head (from which the monks have taken the custom of shaving their crowns) and to be insulted at their discretion. <sup>e</sup>

THIS ignominious treatment was soon followed by a total rupture of the Nazarenes (so he calls the Christians) and the Jews; the former of whom began to spread their doctrine far and near, chiefly by the ministry of twelve, who ran from kingdom to kingdom, preaching their master's fame and religion, with such surprising success, as could not but greatly alarm the Jewish doctors and wise men; who, after much consultation, made choice of one Simon Kipha to put a stop to their progress. This man, having first learned the miraculous name of Jehovah, immediately repaired to the metropolis of the Nazarenes (Rome); where having wrought such a number of miracles to convince them that he was an apostle sent by Jesus Christ, he easily engaged them to be wholly directed by him. He then advised them to oppose and ill-treat the Jews in every thing; to celebrate the festival of Jesus's death instead <sup>f</sup> her as a great favourer of the Christians, on account of the miracles which, he says, Christ had wrought before her. But as, on the one hand, we do not find that he gives her any such pompous title, but styles her only the wife of Janeus, who took the reins of government after his death; and, on the other, the monstrousness of such anachronisms is hardly to be supposed, even in a Jewish writer, it is generally believed that he meant Helena queen of Adiabene, who, Josephus tells us, came and dwelt a considerable time in Jerusalem, and proved a great benefactress to the inhabitants in the time of the famine which happened in Claudius's reign; and was not at that time a Christian, as Orosius affirms (36), though she became one afterwards, but a Jewish proselyte (37). But even this Helena did not exercise any regal authority in Judea, it being then become a Roman province; so that it is absurd to make the Jews address their complaints against Christ to her. Add to this, that it was long enough after his death that she came to settle in Jerusalem; since she lived long enough there to see the destruction of that metropolis under Titus.

(36) Histor. lib. vii. c. 6.

(37) Ant. lib. xx. c. 2. See also Ant. Hist. vol. iii. p. 849, & seq.

a of the passover, and the 40th day after, instead of their pentecost; all which they promised to comply with, upon condition that he consented to stay amongst them; to which he readily agreed. To this end they built a large tower, in which he shut himself up during the space of six years, at the end of which he died, having lived all that time upon bread and water only (O). Our author adds, that that tower was still to be seen at Rome, or at least a stone upon which he used to sit, and still bearing the name of Peter.

ELIJAH, or Elias, appeared soon after at Rome, and endeavoured to persuade the people of that city, that Simon was really an impostor, and that he had deceived them in pretending to have been sent from Jesus, for that himself was the person whom the Messiah had honoured with his commands; the first of which was to enjoin them to be circumcised, under the b penalty of being drowned; and the next, to observe the first instead of the seventh day as their sabbath. But whilst he was preaching these new orders to them, a stone fell upon his head and crushed him to death. Thus, concludes our author, may all the enemies of God perish. So far the first or elder book of the Tholedoth, published by Wagenfeil.

THE other, published by Huldrick, with his notes, hath adopted indeed the greater part of the other's forgeries, which we shall not, for that reason, repeat afresh, nor add any further remarks than upon those we have already; seeing the others are of so glaring and palpable a nature, that they hardly require any other confutation than the bare reading of them. What this second hath endeavoured chiefly to correct in his, is the monstrous anachronisms which his predecessor, and in general all the writers of his nation, have been more or less guilty of, in setting the c birth of Christ so far back (some of them above 300 centuries, as has been formerly shewn), beyond the Christian æra, not only in opposition to the sacred, but likewise to the concurrent testimony of prophane history. He accordingly, and judiciously, places the birth of Christ under the reign of Herod the Great, and tells us, that it was to that prince that the Jews preferred their complaint against the adulterous father of Jesus; and that, being highly provoked that such a criminal should have escaped his vengeance by his flight into Egypt, he went himself to Bethlehem †, and ordered all the children there to be massacred. And thus far, if we except the scandalous circumstances of Christ's mother, and the strange genealogy he gives us of her, and of her having been debauched into the sin of adultery, he hath followed more closely the evangelical narrative. But he is nevertheless guilty of a gross error in placing Christ's death d under the same reign, and pretending that that prince did not die till after he had condemned him to be stoned and hanged, seeing it was his death which hastened the return of the holy family from Egypt, and Christ did not suffer till the reign of Tiberius, and after Archelaus had been banished, and Judea left without any king; all which is no less evident, and beyond all dispute, even from prophane history.

ANOTHER blunder and anachronism, though in the opposite extreme, he is guilty of, is his making Christ to have been brought up at the feet of Joshuab, the son of Petachiah, a disciple of the great Akiba *; whereas, as we have formerly shewn, this last did not flourish till the reign of the emperor Adrian, 100 years after the death of Herod and of Jesus Christ † (P).

BUT

† Tholedoth, p. 12 & 20.

* Ibid. p. 119.

† See before, p. 491.

(O) It will hardly be needful to observe here, that our Jewish romancer hath taken this story from that of Simon Magus, mentioned in the Acts, and in our Ancient History, who was converted at Samaria, by Philip, after having for a long time bewitched that whole city with his sorceries (38). The scene is only removed from thence to Rome (or, as he calls it, the metropolis of the Christians, though they had not then, nor for many centuries after, any city that bore that title); this, we say, as well as some of the feats which he relates between Judas and his master, are fetched, by way of reprisal, out of the apocryphal Acts of St. Peter, and his pretended contest with Simon Magus, which several ancient fathers have adopted, and is to this effect: Simon being at Rome, by his magic tricks, in order to get himself acknowledged for the true Messiah, and, in confirmation of it, having attempted to ascend up into heaven, was got up a great way into the air, by the help of his demons, in a fiery chariot; the two apostles, St. Peter and St. Paul, who were there at the same time, by their joint prayers so effectually drove away those demons, that he got his death by the fall, not indeed upon the spot; but finding both his legs shattered by it, he caused himself to be conveyed to Brundum (a place supposed to be in some part of that city, since those fathers make him to have ended his life in it), and there, through shame and spite, threw himself headlong down from the top of the house, and expired on the pavement (39). One of these fathers adds, that the Gentiles would have put St. Peter to death for it, had he not, at the earnest request of the Christians, withdrawn himself out of the city, to escape their fury (40). Hence the reader may see whence this double story of the pretended Judas and Simon is taken and mangled by the Jewish writer of this forged narrative.

(P) We might here add, that he makes that celebrated Jewish doctor to take a journey to Nazareth, to inform himself more perfectly about the birth of Christ; and that, upon his promise of secrecy, confirmed by a solemn oath, his mother freely confessed to him, that that son of hers, who had so greatly distinguished himself at school above his school-fellows, was the off-spring of adultery. Upon hearing of which, he caused him to

(38) Acts viii. 9, & seq. Anc. Hist. vol. iv. p. 254, & seq. Hierosol. cathec. vi. Ambros. lib. iv. c. 9. Salust. Sewer. Isidor. Hispal. Theodoret. & al.

(39) De loc. vid. Arnob. lib. ii. Cyril.

(40) Ambros. sermon.

BUT what most palpably shews the stupidity and ignorance of this author, is the heap of a absurd circumstances which he has jumbled together concerning Herod and his son, who, he tells us, took up arms against the inhabitants of the desert of Judea, for defending Christ and his doctrine, and worshipping his and his mother's images. This obliged those idolaters to apply to the king of Kaisarea for assistance against Herod's son; who having assured that prince that there was no war between him and the Israelites, the inhabitants of Ai readily submitted to his father. Who this stupid writer can mean by the king of Kaisarea, and the inhabitants of Ai, the reader may see in the margin (Q). All we shall add here is, that they were become so powerful and insolent, according to him, as to come even up to Jerusalem, and stir up a sedition against Herod; till, for want of the expected assistance from the king of Kaisarea, they were obliged to lay down their arms and submit; whilst Simon, the promoter b of all this mischief, mounted his magical cloud, taking as many of his disciples into it as would or could get in, and hurried them away into their old desert, where he suddenly dropped them down, and dashed them in pieces with the fall. And thus ended, according to our author, this bloody contest between the disciples of Jesus and the Jews.

WE might here add another ridiculous circumstance concerning his supposed Herod; viz. that he was so cautious of delivering up Jesus to death, that he issued out an order over all the earth, that if any one was minded to undertake his defence, he should repair to the sanhedrin at Jerusalem, and demand to be heard. this is not unlike what the Thalmudists say in favour of that sanhedrin; that, to manifest the justice of their sentence against him, they ordered him to be publicly led through Jerusalem, during the space of forty days, with a herald proclaiming before him, that if any one would undertake to plead his cause, or prove his innocence, he had free liberty to do it. This is not quite so improbable as the other, because that court, though much abridged of its power by the Romans, could still try a criminal, and pronounce him guilty, though not put him to death without the concurrent sentence of the governor: whereas Herod was long since dead, and therefore that circumstance is manifestly false which is here related of him. c be apprehended at his return, and condemned him to have his head shaved, and washed with a certain liquor which should prevent all further growth of his hair. That finding himself despised and shunned on that account, he gained a few straggling disciples, whom he obliged to be likewise shorn, and to whom he expounded the law in a manner contrary to the Jewish traditions. He likewise mentions some of those disciples under the mutilated names of the apostles; and adds, that they being quickly known by their tonsure, Herod caused them to be seized; but that they all had the good luck to escape, except one who was called John, whom he ordered to be beheaded; whilst Jesus and his other disciples, being retired into a desert, began to teach them, That he was God, born of a virgin, who had conceived him by the Holy Ghost, and the true Redeemer; and that whoever believed on him, should obtain the bliss of the world to come. He maintained moreover, That the Mosaic law was to be abolished, because it had continued through 200 generations since the reign of David; which was the term that royal prophet had declared it should last (41). We shall not trouble our readers with a confutation of this spurious heap; he may, if he pleases, see it fully done by the authors quoted in the margin (42).

(Q) We must apprise him here, that this fabulist, who was probably a German Jew, and knew that those of the city of Worms had formerly maintained to one of the emperors, that they had strenuously opposed the putting of Christ to death; hath taken it in his head, from that pretended plea, to build a most ridiculous story, and to insert it in his narrative as a fact; viz. that Herod, before he would proceed to put him to death, had consulted the Jewish senate of that city about it; but that they had unanimously opined against it, and advised that monarch to content himself with confining and nourishing him during his life; but that their counsel was rejected, and Jesus condemned to be nailed to the tree. All which is not only contrary to his predecessor's account, which says positively, that he caused him to be seized by a posse of his armed men, who killed some of his disciples, and put the rest to flight; upon which the sanhedrin ordered him to be stoned to death, just before their feast of the passover; but absolutely improbable, considering the great distance between Jerusalem and the city of Worms in Germany, and the great unlikelihood there is that the sanhedrin of this latter should bear such great sway over that of the former at that time.

However, from the pretended war with those idolaters, and their application to the Kaisarean king for help and protection, one may justly conclude, that this writer lived somewhere in the neighbourhood of Worms, where seeing the images of Christ and his mother worshipped by the Christians of those parts, he took it into his head, that the primitive ones were guilty of the same idolatry, and might naturally apply to the German emperors for assistance to stop the persecution which Herod had raised against them on that account.

As for the inhabitants of Ai, said there to have submitted to Herod, they were according to him, a set of Jesus's disciples, who, to prevent his death, armed themselves against the Jews in the desert of that name, and not only killed 2000 of them, but kept all the passes to Jerusalem so closely shut up, that none dared to go thither at the usual festivals (43). All which, and many others of their hostilities against the Jewish nation and worship, was done in compliance to the advice, and by the direction, of Simon Kipha.

How inconsistent all this romantic stuff is, not only with the sacred but prophane history, needs hardly to be shewn; since we are well assured from both, that at that time Judea was not only without a king, but was likewise become a Roman province, and was also free from any wars under the peaceful reign of Tiberius. Neither were the primitive Christians at that time in a condition to raise such a bloody one against the Jews, if they had been ever so inclined to it (44).

(41) Psal. cv. 8. Tholedoth Huldrick, p. 43, & seq. tom. v. c. 15. §. ix.

(43) Tholedoth Huldrick, p. 96.

(42) Huldrick not. in loc. Basnage Hist. des Juifs,

(44) Huldrick notes. Basnage, ubi sup.

<sup>a</sup> We shall not need here to observe in how many other points this last author contradicts his predecessor in his relation of the death of Christ. First he makes him to have been condemned to death by Herod, and the other by the sanhedrin, against the consent of a fabulous queen named Helena, with the additional circumstances of his being tied to a pillar, scourged and crowned with thorns, which he makes no mention of. He next affirms, that he was nailed to a tree; whereas the other affirms, that he was stoned and hanged, and with this notable addition, on a monstrous cabbage-stalk, because no wood could bear his weight without breaking. The one mentions the bloody war which followed his death between his disciples and the Jews: the other only says, that the sanhedrin made choice of Simon Kipha to stop the progress of his doctrine; who, by virtue of the ineffable name, having transported himself to Rome, and convinced the Nazarenes (or Christians) by miracles, that he was sent by him, and by that means engaged them to be directed by him, absolutely forbade them to exercise any hostilities or ill offices against the Jews; and having soon after shut himself up in his tower, lived six years in it on bread and water, and then died. Even in those things in which they agree, in how many things do they run counter to all other history, both sacred and prophane? How many glaring anachronisms and other palpable inconsistencies have we had occasion to take notice of in these two short extracts; and how many more absurdities and puerilities might we have observed in each relation, had we followed them through every page? To say nothing of that monstrous as well as impious notion which runs through the whole, and is in a great measure the basis of each of their fabulous narratives; we mean the miraculous virtue ascribed to the right pronunciation of the word JEHOVAH, by what foul stratagems soever obtained; and which, however ill grounded, and derogatory to the Supreme Being, to whom that sacred name properly belongs, is nevertheless firmly believed by the bulk of the Jews. But we shall not repeat what we have formerly said against that senseless prejudice†; and hope we have sufficiently exposed the imposture of the two books above-mentioned, to convince our readers of the fatal blindness of the Jewish nation, as well as of the dishonesty of their guides; these, for having recourse to, and those for so readily swallowing, such abominable and diabolical forgeries, to keep alive their irreconcilable aversion to Christ and his religion.

<sup>c</sup> HAVING now gone through every material point relating to this interesting subject, we shall here, by way of conclusion, unite into one view, what, by reason of the circumstances of time and place, lieth scattered through this chapter, concerning the present doubtful and melancholy state of the Jewish nation, and the various artifices by which they have been kept up by their doctors from unbelief and utter despondency to this day, to the admiration not of Christians only, but all other countries were they are dispersed<sup>a</sup>.

<sup>d</sup> 1. THEY have in general, been kept steadfast in their hopes and full expectation of a general recall, under their Messiah, in spite of the poor elusory shifts which their rabbies have been driven to, not so much to account for, as to cast a thick veil over, those insurmountable difficulties which naturally arose from his surprising delay, so many centuries beyond the time prefixed by the sacred oracles, and agreed to by all the Jewish writers before Christ<sup>b</sup>. For, whilst one set of them, in conformity to the twofold character of a Messiah, the one a great sufferer, the other a glorious conqueror, acknowledge Jesus the son of Joseph to be the first, and Messiah the son of David to be the latter; and another set, equally learned and numerous, wholly exclude the suffering, and will admit of none but a glorious one, who is to be their great deliverer and restorer, but whose appearance is retarded thus strangely on account of their sins; into what perplexity must such a contrariety of opinions drive the bulk of their nation: and who shall direct them which to chuse, or assure them that either of them may be safely embraced? The former being so opposite to the prejudices they have imbibed against Jesus the son of Mary<sup>c</sup>, and the odious character which their Talmud and most other books give of him; the other no less vague, uncertain, and contested. One party stiffly denying his having ever yet appeared; the other maintaining that he was actually born about the time of their dispersion under Titus<sup>d</sup>; but widely differ about the place where, and the manner in which, he lies concealed from them, on account of their impiety; some of the Talmudists believing that he lies hid among the bulk of lepers, sick, and lame, at the gates of Rome<sup>e</sup>, answerable to the description given of him by Isaiah<sup>f</sup>, and impatiently waiting for the day of his glorious appearance; whilst others affirm him to be detained in Paradise, bound with women's hair (R).

† Anc. Hist. vol. i. p. 484, sub. not.

<sup>c</sup> Ibid. p. 626, & seq.

<sup>d</sup> Chap. liii. pass.

<sup>a</sup> See before, p. 479, & seq.

<sup>b</sup> Ibid. p. 481, & seq. sub. not.

<sup>e</sup> Vid. SOL. JARCHI, & BUXTORF Tiad. Hæbr.

<sup>f</sup> Vid. Tract. Sanhedr.

(R) Thus they expound that verse in the canticles: Thy head upon thee is like crimson, or Carmel, and the hair of thy head like purple strings, by which the king (Messiah) is kept bound in stately galleries, or, as others render it, in stately walk: the original word signifying properly a canal or aqueduct (1).

(1) Vid. Daw. Kimchi, Comm. in Cant. viii. 5. Vid. Mashev, & al. in loc.

So fruitful is the fancy of the rabbinical tribe, in their expositions and expedients, to keep up a the drooping expectations of their laity, as well as themselves in countenance, by backing every notion and resverie with the appearance of scriptural authority. By this they have given a terrible check to the over-curious of their nation, by the anathema they have pronounced against all farther enquiries after this important point; implying no less than the utter bursting or rotting both of the soul and body, or flesh and spirit <sup>e</sup>.

BUT if we would judge at once of their peculiar dexterity in this art, and the most complete stupidity and implicit credulity of their disciples, we must recur once more to the scriptural demonstration they have given us of that sumptuous banquet, with which the Messiah is to entertain them, after he has completed all his conquests. Here, to counterbalance the terror of that anathema by alluring promises, equally suited to their carnal genius, we shall find a <sup>b</sup> great number of places of the sacred writings wrested to such a shameful sense, as comes little short of burlesque, to inhance the wonders and magnificence of that fantastical feast. We have lately given a short sketch, upon another occasion <sup>h</sup>, of the stupendous animals which are reserved to glut its happy guests. But as these rather shew the extravagance of their depraved taste, than their so much boasted understanding of the scriptures, for which they value themselves above all other nations, it will not be improper to give some few instances, by way of conclusion, how happily they have displayed that valuable talent in the choice of their proofs, and the sense they have given to every text which they bring to back and illustrate every particular of that banquet (S).

<sup>e</sup> Vid. BUXTORF Tradit. Hæbr. ubi sup.

<sup>h</sup> P. 630 (Y).

(S) To begin with the Behemoth: They have, by a wrested parallel in the Psalms, which ours and all other versions rightly translate, The cattle upon a thousand hills, (2) swelled that animal to a mountainous bulk, not only to afford a plentiful feast for that numerous company, but to entertain it before-hand with a long and dreadful engagement with the Leviathan, till the contest is ended (neither side being either tired or worsted) by the keen sword of the Messiah; who having slain them both, shall commit their carcasses to the care of a sufficient number of able cooks, to roast and divide among the guests. And this previous fight they prove from these words of the Psalmist (3), There is that Behemoth and the great Leviathan, whom thou hast made to (not take, but) make sport in it. Their being slain by the Messiah is taken out of Isaiah (4), In that day the Lord shall, with his sore and strong sword, punish or slay, Leviathan, that crooked serpent.

The elegance of this feast is taken out of the same prophet (5), In this mountain shall the Lord of hosts make unto all people a feast of fat things, &c. And that there will be such a superfluity and redundancy of all fish, flesh, fowls, &c. that vast remains of them will be publicly sold in the markets of Jerusalem; they judiciously infer from that passage in Job, which we rightly translate interrogatively, but they positively, concerning the Leviathan (6), The companions shall make a banquet of him, and shall part him among the merchants. We omit several other thalmodic monstrosities, to speak of the desert and superexcellent wine which are to crown this noble feast, both which are said to be the produce and vintage of Paradise, and preserved there ever since Adam's fall against this time. For in this sense they understand the passages quoted in the margin (7). The conclusion of the feast, or, as we may call it, the cup of thanks, is too ridiculous, not to call it by a worse name, to be here mentioned, as well as the dimensions of the cup, which, from the numerical letters of the participle רַוְיָהּ, revajah, overflowing, joined to it, in the 23d Psalm, makes up the amount 221, infer that that will be the number of measures it is to contain.

(2) Psal. l. 10. civ. 25, 26.

(3) Pf. lxxiv. 13.

(4) Cb. xxvii. 1.

(5) Cb. xxv. 6.

(6) Job, xli. 6.

(7) Isai. xxvii. 2, 3. lxiv. 4. Pf. xxiii. 5. lxxv. 8. cxvi. 13.

B O O K XXI.

The history of Africa, and of all the principal nations and states which inhabit it.

C H A P. I.

A general description of Africa.

WE are now entering into a new part of the world, in most respects vastly different from that which we have gone through in the foregoing volumes ; and of which we may truly say, we are much better acquainted with its situation, extent, compass, limits, length, and breadth, and other external particulars, than we are with most of those which relate to its internal. For the first we are beholden chiefly to the later and more exact astronomical observations which have been made around all its coasts, as well as on some parts of the inland ; and the more accurate maps which have been since published from them, particularly those of the late Mons. D'Arville. The other is partly owing to the vast extent of it, the variety of its climes, inhabitants, or to the little commerce we have with the greatest part of the inland ; to which we may add, the extreme jealousy which the inhabitants have, not without good grounds, conceived against the Europeans, whom they look upon as altogether combined in a design of robbing them of their gold mines, which are, in a great measure, their only treasure, and the chief branch of that commerce by which they are supplied with such foreign commodities as their country is destitute of, more through their stupidity and negligence, than any defect in that, as will be more plainly shewn in the sequel ; and more particularly when we come to speak of the conquests of the Portuguese around all the African coasts, and of their harsh treatment of the inhabitants.

Africa very little known to us.

The extreme jealousy of the inhabitants not ill founded.

HENCE it is that, in the far greater part of it which remains still unconquered, all strangers, under what disguise or pretence soever, are interdicted the liberty of travelling thro', or making any discoveries or even enquiries about, their country ; and this even upon their coasts, especially the eastern ones, where, though they admit them to a free commerce with them, it is chiefly for their own conveniency : the exchange of goods is either transacted upon the water, or, at most, on shore ; from which if any of them are caught straggling ever so little towards the inland, they must expect to be immediately assassinated by a whole posse of the natives. The like precaution is also used towards them by those inland monarchs, who, for the sake of trade, permit them to travel into their dominions, which is done only on some navigable rivers, from which they are not allowed to land on either side, on pain of death, nor even to stop at any village or town upon its banks, excepting only such as are appointed markets, and out of which they must not venture to stir till their departure, under the same penalties. We shall not mention here the natural stubbornness, and almost invincible taciturnity, of its inhabitants, even of those who are carried slaves into other countries, with respect to such questions as are asked of them concerning that part of the country they were born and brought up in, and which neither caresses nor threats, kind or rough treatment, can make them break ; or if they do, it is rather to amuse one with evasions, than to give one the least hint either about their their religion, customs, government, trade, &c. And hence it is, that we have hitherto been able to gain only so imperfect a knowledge of the inland parts of this vast continent, notwithstanding the number of authors who have attempted to give us more ample accounts of it; but who, by their pretended histories, descriptions, relations, memoirs, voyages, observations, and other as pompous as voluminous works<sup>a</sup>, have rather helped to bewilder and benight the readers, through a country which is almost wholly enlightened by the vertical rays of the sun.

Stubborn silence of the African slaves.

African writers have taken too large a scope.

NOR is this so much to be wondered at, considering their extensive scope, and the scarcity of suitable materials, from the reasons above-mentioned: so that these authors have best succeeded in their accounts, who have confined themselves within the narrowest limits, and depended on their own observations rather than the credit of other relations. It is therefore on such authentic testimonies that we shall chiefly depend, when they can be had, and leave the numerous herd of African writers to follow one another, like so many sheep, and in many cases, on no better grounds than bare hearsay; unless, perhaps, whenever we meet with a proper occasion to expose their vanity, or confute their errors, from better authorities, especially in points of more than common importance.

Africa a large peninsula.

WHEN this vast continent, or, to style it more properly, this vast peninsula (A), was first distinguished with the title of a distinct or third part of the world, is not possible for us to guess<sup>b</sup>. Strabo knew so little of its extent, that he thought it much too inconsiderable to deserve that distinction<sup>c</sup>; which yet shews that it enjoyed it in his time, if it be not of much older and more authentic standing; concerning which the reader may see what hath been said of this threefold partition in our Ancient History<sup>d</sup>. However, Strabo might well speak of Africa as he did, seeing he knew of no more of it than the Romans had reduced under their power, which was scarcely a tenth part of it. Ptolemy, indeed, appears to have been much better acquainted with some other parts which were unknown to the Romans; yet by the division he hath made of it into 12 regions, one may plainly see, that he was still unacquainted with nearly one half of it<sup>e</sup>. If we come to the African and Arab geographers, we shall be still more surpris'd at their ignorance of their own country, and at their contracting it within a smaller compass than Ptolemy, by their inaccurate maps and descriptions; and, what is still more strange, by their striking all that lies between the Nile and the Red Sea from being a part of it, and making that river the boundary between Asia and Africa on that side<sup>f</sup>.

Greatly changed since Ptolemy.

Africans not well acquainted with it.

WHAT adds still to the difficulty of their geography, especially that of Mozzawdi and Berber, is the difference of names which they give to provinces, capes, gulphs, towns, &c. from those which we find in Ptolemy above-mentioned, as well as that of their longitude and latitude, which cast a great, and, in some measure, unavoidable obscurity on their cosmography, seeing they only make use of those new names which the Arabs gave them at their first coming into Africa, most probably with a view to obliterate the memory of the old inhabitants. To all which if we add the devastation of sundry provinces, the destruction of many antient cities, whose names and memory perished with them, and a great number of new ones, which have been built by those new comers, to say nothing of those much greater and dreadful ones, which happened in that part of the world under the tyranny of the Vandals, &c. of all which we shall give an account in its proper place; we shall have little cause to wonder at the obscurity and imperfection which still reigned in all the geographical descriptions of this part of the world, both with respect to its extent, true situation, coasts, and much more so of its spacious inland.

Leo Africanus knew not one half of it.

EVEN Leo Africanus, that learned Moor (B) and eminent African geographer, after all his studies, travels, and diligent researches, his application, and earnest desire to give the world a more

<sup>a</sup> See the numerous list of them in MORRERI's dictionary, sub voc. Afric. p. 178.

<sup>c</sup> Geography, lib. xvii. & alib. pass.

<sup>b</sup> See Anc. Hist. vol. vii.

<sup>d</sup> Anc. Hist. vol. i. p. 156, & seq.

<sup>e</sup> Geography. lib. iv. pass.

<sup>f</sup> Vide MARMOL Afric. lib. i. c. 3.

(A) As being every-where surrounded by the sea, excepting at the isthmus of Suez, which joins it to Asia, at the extreme northern verge of the Red Sea, and divides Egypt from Arabia Petrea. Which isthmus is not above 20 leagues in length, and is so called from the sea-port of that name, situate on a gulph at the south end of it, as will be further shewn in the sequel.

(B) He was a native of Granada, and one of those who were forced to flee into Barbary, under the reign of Ferdinand and Isabella. He at first settled at Fez, where he made himself master of the Arabic tongue, and had an opportunity of consulting all the African geographers who had written before him; after which, partly out of curiosity, and partly in a public character, under some of the African princes, he took occasion to travel through a great part of Africa, and to observe what was most curious and remarkable in it; by which means he was enabled to write the description of this country, which goes under his name. Having had, among other misfortunes, that of being taken by some pirates, near the coast of Tunis, he was soon after brought to Rome, and presented to pope Leo X. who, being apprised of his great skill in geography, and of his having compiled a curious description of Africa, caused him to be instructed in the Christian religion, and afterwards to be baptized by the name of John Leo; that pontif having settled a handsome pension on him, he staid long enough at Rome to become master of the Italian language, and to translate

- a a more perfect knowlege, and more ample and accurate description of this vast peninsula, than any who had wrote of it before him; and may be truly said, notwithstanding the succinctness and inequality of the performance to the vastness of the scope, to have, in many respects, greatly outdone them; yet, on the whole, to have gained but a maimed and imperfect knowlege of the far greater and most considerable part of it: at least the lame and truncated division which he, or rather his masters, give us of it into four parts only; viz. Barbary, Numidia, or Biledulgerid, Libya, and Nigritia, or, as it is commonly called, Negroland<sup>f</sup>, plainly proves that he excludes no less from it than the kingdom of Egypt, and the two Ethiopias, or, in other words, strikes out the biggest and most considerable part from the whole. These Marmol hath indeed added to the other four, and reckons them as the fifth and sixth parts
- b into which he divides the whole African continent; though these three last are so confusedly distinguished, that he seems to make a threefold Ethiopia; viz. the Higher, Lower, and a third, which he places above Egypt, and calls the kingdom of Newba, or Nubia; unless we suppose that he intended to include this last in his first or upper<sup>g</sup>.

FROM what hath been hitherto said, our readers may judge what imperfect knowlege the Europeans, not to say all other nations, the natives and other invaders not excluded, had of this rich and extensive continent, till the Portuguese, by their early and superior skill in, as well as by the noble encouragement they gave to, their navigation, were enabled not only to pursue their new discoveries around its western and eastern coasts, and penetrate even to the utmost verge of its northern ones along those of the Arabic or Red Sea, but by their conquests and settlements on the most convenient bays, harbours, and rivers, to open to themselves a way into the inland parts, as well as to fix their longitudes and latitudes by repeated observations, to that degree of accuracy and certainty, in which we now have them set down in our most correct African maps (C).

It must be owned, however, that there were maps which exhibited this third part of the world as surrounded by the sea, in the manner we have described it, long enough before the Portuguese completed their gradual circumnavigation; neither were they, in all likelihood, the first who undertook the like expedition with success, if what Herodotus says on a similar occasion may be relied on; viz. that Nekus, or, as the scripture calls him, Pharaoh Necho, king of Egypt, equipped some Phœnician ships on the Red Sea, which, sailing thence into the southern, or, as it is called, African ocean, returned back into Egypt by the Columns of Hercules<sup>h</sup>. It is true, that author, though in many cases over credulous, seems here quite on the other extreme; though the reason he gives for his disbelief (they affirming that they sailed round the Libyan or African coasts, with the sun on their right hand) be really a confirmation of the truth of their course, and of their having doubled the Cape of Good Hope. However, his mistrust of their report did not hinder his believing and affirming, in express terms, the continent of Africa to be a peninsula, joined only to Asia by a neck of land; which plainly shews that it was then the received notion they had of it; but whether founded on experience, or mere conjecture, or of how much longer standing, who can tell? However, with respect to the first question, it is not unlikely that the construction of the aforesaid old charts will give us some farther light; and as they are preserved as great curiosities in that kind, our readers will not be displeased with the account we shall now subjoin of them.

THE first and most considerable, as being above 200 years older than the first Portuguese expedition round the Cape, was compiled by that celebrated traveller, Marco Paulo, often mentioned in this work, and is preserved in the church of St. Michael di Murano, in the city of Venice<sup>i</sup>, and distinctly exhibits that southern cape, together with the coasts of Zinzibar, and the great island of Madagascar. The other was drawn up in the year 1306, by Marinus Sanutus, and published by Bongarsius<sup>k</sup>; but is rather such a deformed representation of that

<sup>f</sup> LEO AFRICANUS, l. i. c. 3.

<sup>g</sup> MARMOL Afric. l. i. c. 4.

<sup>h</sup> Melpomene, Eng. edit. p. 364.

<sup>i</sup> See the Giornat. di Lettere, an. 1686, p. 72. Geograph. reformada, p. 265.

<sup>k</sup> See his Gesta Dei,

per FRANCES, at the end.

late his African history out of the Arabic, in which he had wrote it, into Italian (1).

(C) We beg leave, however, to observe, that we do not here pretend to ascertain to the Portuguese the honour of having been the first discoverers of the western African coasts, or the first that ventured to sail beyond the cape Non, on the coast of Biledulgerid, so called from an old observation, that those who had so done had never come back (2); there are good grounds to believe that some other European nations, as the Spaniards, and more particularly the Normans, had not only penetrated much farther, but had some companies which had already their factories on the Niger, Cambia, Sierra Leona, and other rivers and ports, so early as the year 1366, if one may credit the dates of their charter (3), and that was long enough before Don Henriquez of Portugal sent his adventurers to those coasts.

All we pretend to insinuate here is, that it is to the Portuguese conquests and settlements around this peninsula, that we owe those astronomical observations, which have ascertained the true site, extent, and other, till then unknown, particulars relating to Africa.

(1) Florian Epist. ad Melchoir. Schet. Corvino. prefix. in Lat. vers. ejusdem Leon. Afric. histor. lib. i. c. 36. Leo Afric. lib. i. c. 2. Et alib.

(2) Marmol, (3) De his, vid. Labat, Relat. de l'Afric. Occident. tom. i. c. 2.

one and not in the other.

Whence they probably took them.

Asiatics trade with Africa.

How far southward.

The chanel of Madagascar too boisterous for their slight vessels.

Vasco de Gama first doubled the Cape of Good Hope.

African missionaries;

country, as sufficiently displays the ignorance and rudeness of those times. It exhibits Africa as a peninsula, on the east part of which the coasts of Zinzibar are expressly mentioned, together with a large island on the east of them, which seems to be same with Madagascar, but here nominated Pipis. The southern limits shew nothing like the Cape of Good Hope, but are described as rounding off with a circular line, with a dent in the middle, more resembling the posteriors of a man than any thing else. In other respects, it is so like that of Marco Paulo, that, but for that difference, one might have imagined that Sanutus had copied it from him. It is not easy to guess from whence those two maps were compiled; whether from certain reports of some Asiatics, or, more probably perhaps, of some Persians, who might have doubled that southern cape, long before any Europeans; but, from the rudeness and incorrectness of them, it not only appears that neither Sanutus nor Marco Paulo delineated them at their own experience, but likewise that those from whom we suppose them to have been copied, whether Persians or others (D), had but a very imperfect knowledge of those southern coasts. The Arabs and Persians were indeed much better acquainted with the eastern, with which they kept a constant commerce for gold, elephants teeth, and other African commodities; and Vasco de Gama, and his successors, at their arrival thither, found them very expert in navigation, and provided with compasses and other instruments, as well as with pretty good charts, both of that coast, and of the islands adjacent to it; by the help of which, and some of their expert pilots, he was enabled to sail up northwards to the streights of Babel Mandel<sup>1</sup>: but it seems plain to us, that this commerce reached no farther southward than to the farther end of the Zanguebarian coasts, and the islands adjacent to them; their slight trading vessels not being able to sail through the streights of Madagascar, by reason of the violent storms and dangerous currents which reign all the way through that chanel, and have proved fatal to an incredible number even of the stoutest European ships, as will be farther shewn in the sequel. From all that hath been said hitherto, the reader may see how little of the far greater part of southern Africa was known to any nation, either with regard to its true site, extent, coasts, rivers, bays, promontories, &c. before the close of the 15th century; when the Portuguese king Emanuel, spurred on by a desire of discovering a way into the East Indies by sea, appointed the famed Vasco de Gama admiral of that expedition, who was the first European that doubled the Cape of Good Hope, discovered, in his very first voyage, both the western and eastern coasts of it, and, by that means, gave an opportunity to his countrymen to make so many settlements on, and to establish such a commerce with, both sides, as hath helped them, and other Europeans since them, to that more perfect and satisfactory knowledge which we have of them.

WE are no less beholden to them for the far greatest share of what we know of the inland parts, and most considerable empires and kingdoms of it; particularly those of Habesh, or Abissinia, Monomotapa, Munoemugi, the eastern kingdoms; of Kongo, Angola, Metamba, Loango, &c. and others on the western; those of Sofala, Mozambico, Quiloa, Mombazo, Melinda, on the eastern coast; their various religions, government, laws, customs, products, commerce, and other particulars; for the greater part of which we are beholden to their missionaries, who have penetrated into those torrid and unwholesome climes, and amongst the most barbarous nations, with the utmost hazard, and through the greatest hardships and discouragements, to propagate the gospel amongst them: though it must be owned, that, in this last respect, Africa hath been much more neglected and left destitute than any other part of the world. The excessive heats, badness of diet, unwholesome waters, hardships in travelling, bad accommodations, dreadful distempers, and other disasters, which the first that were sent thither were forced to undergo, made such a deadly havock amongst them, that scarce

<sup>1</sup> See OSSORIO, l. ix. of the Portuguese conquests.

(D) We have had occasion to mention, in a former volume (4), a pretence of the antient Chinese to a high perfection in the art of navigation; and that they boast to have sailed so far as this famous cape, to which they gave the name of Za-tan-chan, or mountain of high waves; which answers well enough to the description which all navigators who have doubled it give us of it. And though this bold pretension hath met with little credit among the Europeans, and seems, indeed, very improbable, considering the present unfitness of their trading vessels for such a long and dangerous voyage (which unfitness may be owing to the laws by which their commerce hath been confined to much shorter ones; and they might, for aught that appears to the contrary, have built them in those days in a more suitable manner); yet thus much may be gathered from it, that they had some knowledge of that cape, however they came by it, before the arrival of the Europeans into China. Some of the nearer Asiatic traders to the eastern coasts of Africa might have been driven by stress of weather, or other accidents, near enough towards that cape, as to spread the notion and description of it among the Indian traders as far as China. So that it is not at all improbable, that Marco Paulo, who resided so long amongst them (5), might receive his knowledge and description of the African coasts either by the one or the other; and Sanutus, from some imperfect draught of this.

(4) See before, vol. iii. p. 596.

(5) Ibid. p. 516 & (F). vol. iv. p. 108, & seq.

a one in ten outlived the first six months ; and those that did, became so weak and attenuated by frequent relapses, that it was with the greatest difficulty they could go through their spiritual functions. All these discouragements brought such an ill report of that mission, as quite cooled the zeal of the most religious and mortified orders among them ; insomuch, that the court of Portugal, though it wanted neither zeal nor other motives for promoting so laudable a work, nor for frequent and earnest application from thence for fresh supplies of labourers in that ecclesiastical vineyard, and these backed with solemn promises of a plentiful vintage, could yet with great difficulty supply them with the twentieth part of their wants, even with all the assistance which the pope and society de propaganda fide could give.

Great mortality amongst them.

Great difficulty of supplying them with new ones.

b From that time the scarcity of missionaries visibly increased through all their conquests, settlements, and factories ; to the great decay of Christianity and morality ; and the vast numbers of proselytes, so much boasted of by the first preachers, dwindled into nothing. If any Capuchins, or other of the mendicant brotherhood, (for we do not find any of the Jesuitical society amongst them) offered themselves volunteers for that mission, they were commonly men of no parts or learning, and remarkable only for their pious zeal, which made them so intent upon the conversion of the natives, that they neglected every other useful care or concern, even that of their health and lives, which were the sooner at an end on that very account : to say nothing of the frequent mortifications they met with from the scandalous and immoral lives of their lay countrymen, and the vast obstacle they proved to their success. This is the melancholy account which those good fathers give us of the almost total decay of Christianity in all the Portuguese settlements (E) in Africa, and which (as we shall have occasion to give frequent instances of through the course of this history of its several kingdoms and states) we shall now close with that which one of that fraternity hath not scrupled to prefix to his late relation of the western part of that continent<sup>m</sup>, that our readers may be able to judge of the true state of that mission.

Main cause of the decay of Christianity.

c " THIS point," says he, " hath been so much neglected, that we need not be surprised if God hath withheld his blessing from men who had paid so little regard to his worship. And I believe I am not mistaken, when I attribute the cause of all their disorders, and the ruin of so many successive companies, to their general as well as criminal negligence in this matter. For so far have they been from endeavouring to spread the light of the gospel through a vast continent, inhabited by such a variety of nations, immersed in the darkest mists of the grossest idolatry and diabolical superstitions, they have scarcely thought it worth their care to keep chaplains and preachers in their various settlements ; and those which they have amongst them, are, for the most part, persons without credit or authority from their bishops or principals, and who pay neither regard nor obedience to them ; most of them without learning, and whose conduct is the most unfit to procure them either confidence or regard from those whom Providence hath committed to their care."

The great neglect of the Portuguese censured.

d BUT how great soever their neglect may have been here of the concerns of religion, which were yet cried up as the main motives of their spreading their conquests in this as well as in other parts of the globe ; they must stand acquitted to all the world of having been guilty of the same indolence with regard to their secular affairs ; and it must be owned in their favour, that the many useful observations and discoveries they have made from time to time, and communicated to the public, both with regard to the African coasts, and of as many parts of the inland as they have been able to penetrate into, having given a much truer idea, and more ample knowledge of them than we could, in all likelihood, have gained without them. Having thus far paid our due acknowledgements to them, we may now proceed in order.

Their care of their secular affairs of great use to the public.

<sup>m</sup> LABAT, preface to his Relat. de l'Afrique occidentale. 1727. p. x. & seq. vide & GAVARRI, in Congo & Angola. PIGAFET. & al.

(E) Our readers will probably think it a strange paradox, that the excessive heats of Africa should be so much more fatal to the Portuguese missionaries than to the laity, who are dispersed and settled there in almost every climate, carry on their traffick both by land and water, from place to place, are exposed to the same inclemencies of the air, the same fatigues, difficulties, and dangers, in travelling, and, what is still worse, live more irregularly, and indulge in every kind of debauchery ; yet, after taking a little care at their first coming, to season themselves to the climates allotted to them, do, for the most part, live long and healthy, or at least exempt from that quick and destructive mortality which carries off their priests and monks. But whatever be the cause, it is plain, that there have been but few, if any, of them sent from Portugal into any part of Africa, except only where they are masters, or at least strong enough to keep the natives in awe ; and those rather under the character of chaplains to their conquests and settlements, than as missionaries ; their function being confined to the service of those churches and chapels which were built for the use of their countrymen, and those few converts that live among them. It is therefore much more likely that the suppression of that mission was owing to the implacable hatred which the natives have conceived against them and their religion, which makes every attempt to convert them not only impracticable, but to the highest degree dangerous, than to the excessive heat and unwholesomeness of the country, air, or aliments.

S E C T. I.

The topographical description of Africa.

Africa described.

A large peninsula.

Its figure.

Extent in longitude and latitude.

Situation under the torrid zone.

Why supposed uninhabitable by the ancients; or only with strange fabulous creatures.

The contrary proved.

Why some parts thinly peopled.

Not wholly on account of its hot climate.

WE have already hinted that this large continent is encompassed all round by the sea, <sup>a</sup> excepting the isthmus, or narrow neck of land, at Suez, which is computed to be about 70 miles in length, and divides the Mediterranean from the Red Sea, whilst it joins the continent of Asia to that of Africa, which is from thence styled a peninsula, and by far the largest in the world. Geographers have been pleased to compare the figure it makes on the maps, some to a heart, others to an irregular pyramid inverted, whose basis, which faces the north, and extends itself from the mouth of the Nile to the streight of Gibraltar, is washed by the Mediterranean, which is its boundary on that side. Part of its eastern side is bounded by the Red Sea, and all the rest by the eastern and western oceans, ending in one point at the Cape of Good Hope. Others again to a triangle or a bow, whose string reaches from Cape Vert, or from Sierra Leona to that of Good Hope, and on the middle of which is the little island <sup>b</sup> of St. Thomas. Its utmost extent from north to south, on both sides of the equinoxial, which is taken from the Cape Bona, in the Mediterranean, which lies under the thirty-fifth degree of north latitude, to that of Good Hope, under the thirty-fifth and a half south, and contains seventy degrees and a half, or 1400 geometrical leagues, or of 20 to a degree. Its extent from east to west is taken from Cape Vert, to that of Guarda Fui, situate on the utmost verge of the streights of Babel Mandel, contains seventy-five degrees, which make an extent of 1500 leagues from east to west. Hence it appears that two thirds, or very near it, of Africa lie under the torrid zone, and is divided across by the equinoxial line, into two parts; of which, however, the northern is by far the most extensive of the two, as well as the most exposed to the vertical rays of the sun, which, being reverberated by the soil, which is, for the most <sup>c</sup> part, naturally sandy, occasion such excessive heat and sultry atmosphere, especially in the inland parts, as is scarcely supportable by any but the natives. And hence the notion of the ancients, both Greeks and Romans, that they were wholly uninhabited <sup>n</sup>; or, if any of them thought them otherwise, they colonied them with such fabulous and monstrous creatures, as they imagined the most suitable to the notions they had of these scorching fiery regions: witness the Gymphasantes of Mela, the Pygmies, Cunocephali, Sciapodes, Blemmies, and others of the like fabulous nature, with the Troglodytes, Ichthyophagi, Elephantophagi, Spermatophagi, Cynomolgi, and a number of others no less fabulous, inhabiting the maritime parts of Ethiopia, the coasts of the Red Sea, the Mediterranean Sea, and other African regions, of whom we have spoken in our antient history <sup>o</sup>; but as for the inland, they thought them destitute of human <sup>d</sup> inhabitants.

COMMERCE, navigation, and a farther insight into these last, have since convinced the world of the contrary; and that if these regions are more thinly peopled than others, it is not so much owing to excessive heat as to the barrenness of the soil, the scarcity and badness of the water in some, or the noisome fogs arising from their lakes and large rivers, ponds, and stagnated waters, many of which, as we shall see in the sequel, are, by the negligence of the natives, so strangely choaked up and covered with weeds, briars, and even boughs of trees, that they have neither sun nor wind enough to purify the air about them; whilst others, which are dried up during the summer season, send up and infect it with still more pestilential steams, which seldom fail of causing mortal diseases among the hardiest natives, and help to thin those coun- <sup>e</sup>tries of their inhabitants. To all these we may add the excessive rains which most parts of this country are subject to, and which fall down in such abundance, and extraordinary fierceness, at certain seasons of the year, that they frequently sweep away houses, trees, men, cattle, and all they meet in their way, from the high lands, and cause most prodigious inundations in the low; where being, after a long stagnation, gradually exhaled by the heat of the sun, they leave the air infected with such noisome damps, and pestilent steams, as seldom fail of being followed by the same pernicious effects. So that, upon the whole, the scarcity of inhabitants plainly appears to be rather owing to other concurring circumstances, than to the excessive heat they labour under.

BESIDES, so far is that notion of the ancients, that the climes nearest the equinoxial were the <sup>f</sup> hottest and most uninhabitable, from being verified, that reason and experience jointly help to explode it. For as, on the one hand, those regions which lie most under it enjoy a more equal length of days and nights than those which lie nearer the tropics, and are consequently a exposed to a proportionably longer time to the vertical sun, and a shorter one of the cooling shades, dews, and winds of the night; so, on the other, it is found, by experience, that some of the former, as Negroland, Guiney, and some others, are not only the most inhabited, but produce the best and stoutest men and women, as will be farther seen in the description of their country.

<sup>n</sup> HERODOTUS, STRABO, PLINY, PTOLEMY, & al. plur.

<sup>o</sup> Anc. Hist. vol. vii. p. 183, & seq.

WE have formerly endeavoured to give our readers the best account we could of some names<sup>p</sup>, from which they may judge how vague and uncertain all such etymons are: nevertheless, as some of them are curious in such kind of matters, we shall add, for their satisfaction, all that were there omitted. The Greeks in particular, have given it the greatest variety of names, besides that of Libya, which is now but a province of it; such as Olympia, b Hesperia, Coripha, Ortygia, Ethiopia, Cyrene, Caryphe, Ophiusa, Cria, Ammonidis, Oria, and such like<sup>q</sup>, whilst the Romans contented themselves with those of Libya and Africa, though properly only the names of the provinces now so called. These they derived from no better fountain than from Libya, the fabulous daughter of Jupiter, and Afer, the son of Her- cules. Josephus fetches it from Aphar, or Ophar, a grandson of Abraham by his second wife Keturah, who was reported to have entered Libya with a strong army, and to have given his name to it after he had achieved the conquest of it<sup>r</sup>. Another author tells us, on the authority of an antient Arabic author, that the natives call it Ifriki, from a king of that name, who, being driven out of his kingdom in Arabia Felix, retired into some part of Africa, which took its name from him, and which strangers corrupted by changing the first letter into an c A. Some authors pretend to derive it from the Hebrew Aphar, which signifies dust, and is expressive enough of great part of its dry and barren soil; whilst others, running into the other extreme, derive it from the Arabic Feruch, an ear of corn, on account of the great plenty which is produced in the kingdom of Egypt, and along the coast of Barbary<sup>s</sup>, or at least, so far as reaches from the desert of Barca to the Egyptian frontiers, which is that which Abu'lfeda<sup>t</sup> makes his third, or eastern division, and calls Afrika. The last we shall name is that of Leo Africanus, who derives the word Ifrichia, or Iphrichia, from the Arabic Faraca, implying a division, as it is parted by the river Nile, and from Europe by the Mediterranean<sup>u</sup>.

How this continent was antiently divided by the Greeks and Romans, so far as it was known d to them, we have shewn in a former part<sup>x</sup>. Its various changes and fluctuations have since given birth to a fresh variety of division, as authors Arab, Moorish, and others, became better acquainted with it, but with which we shall not take up our reader's time, seeing they were all maimed and imperfect, as hath been hinted above, for want of a more perfect and extensive knowlege of it and of its real limits; insomuch, that Leo Africanus, who still flourished in an. 1526, that is, long after the Portuguese had sailed round all its coasts, is fallen into the same error with the Arabs, in making the Nile one of its boundaries, and reducing all the rest within the compass of Barbary, Numidia, or Biledulgerid, Libya, and Nigritia<sup>y</sup>. Setting, therefore, aside that variety of divisions, which our modern geographers<sup>z</sup> have excogitated, and which would rather confound than inform or delight our readers, we shall confine our-e selves to that which seems to us the most natural, easy, and succinct, and consequently the most suitable to such an extensive work.

AFRICA, therefore, may most conveniently be divided into four parts.

1. THE country of the whites, comprehending Egypt, Barbary, Numidia, or Biledulgerid, and Zaara, or the desert. How most easily divided.

2. THAT of the blacks, comprehending Nigritia, Guiney, and Nubia.

3. ETHIOPIA, including all the rest of the continent, and which is most commonly divided into Upper and Lower Ethiopia. The former of which comprehends the vast empire of Abissinia, with the several states on the coast of the Red Sea, which have been since dismem-
 f bered from it; and the latter, the kingdoms of Kongo, Angola, Loango, and Caffraria, along the western, or Atlantic; and those of Monomotapa, Sofala, and along the coasts of Zanguebar and Ajan, on the eastern or Indian ocean; together with the inland kingdoms of Munoemugi, Manica, Chicova, Moca, &c. and the various nations of Gallas and Zangues, dispersed through Africa anterior, of all which we shall speak in their proper places.

4. THE islands which lie around Africa, as well in the Mediterranean and Red Sea, as on the eastern and western coasts.

<sup>p</sup> Anc. Hist. vol. vii. p. 177, & seq.

<sup>q</sup> PTOLEMY'S Geograph. l. i. c. 2.

<sup>r</sup> JOSEPHUS'S Antiq.

l. i. c. 10.

<sup>s</sup> MARMOL Afric. l. i. c. 1. LEO AFRICANUS, l. i. c. 1.

<sup>t</sup> BOCHART Phaleg.

<sup>u</sup> Ex trad. GAGNER. Vide & SHAW'S Travels, p. 5.

<sup>x</sup> LEO AFRICANUS; l. i. c. 1.

<sup>y</sup> Anc.

Hist. vol. vi. p. 270, & seq. vol. vii. pass.

<sup>z</sup> LEO AFRICANUS, ubi supra, c. 3 & 4.

<sup>z</sup> LUYTZ

Introduit. ad Geograph. SANSON, DE L'ISLE, BAUDRAND, LA MARTINIERE, & al.

THE inhabitants of all this vast continent, though distinguished under a variety of denominations, according to their different situations, extracts, tribes, and governments, are nevertheless commonly included in that twofold distinction or Africans and Arabs, or else of whites and blacks; and this is the most common difference which geographers and other African writers make between that vast variety of nations which inhabit the African continent, upon a probable supposition that, if there were any of the antient inhabitants still in being, they have been long since blended with them. Nevertheless, to avoid as much as possible all confusion, it will be necessary to assign the different parts and cantons they are settled in, as well as their different extracts, occupations, way of living, manners, and other particulars relating to them (F).

The genius and temper of the Africans in general.

AND first, with respect to the former, or native Africans, who are by much the more numerous, one might reasonably expect to meet with, in such a vast extensive tract of land, and so great a variety of climates, nations, and governments, a proportionable diversity of inhabitants, in regard to their qualifications both of body and mind, strength, corpulency, agility, industry, and dexterity on the one hand, and ingenuity, learning, arts, and sciences, on the other. Our readers, therefore, will doubtless be much surprised to find, on the contrary, a general uniformity run through all those various regions and people; so that, if any difference be found between any of them, it is only in the degrees of the same qualities, and, what is more strange still, those of the worst kind; it being a common known proverb, that all people on the globe have some good as well as ill qualities, except the Africans. That this is rather owing to their bad education, and the tyranny of their governments, than to their country, is plain from the great personages it hath formerly produced, of various kinds; such as St. Cyprian, Augustine, Tertullian, among the clergy; the Hanno's, Hannibals, Asdrubals, among the heroes; Terence among the poets, and a vast number of others we need not mention, any more than their antient industry and application in cultivating their lands, commerce, horses, caravans, and useful arts: whereas they are now every-where degenerated into a brutish, ignorant, idle, treacherous, thievish, mistrustful, and superstitious, people, even in those empires and states where one might expect to find them more polished, humane, docile, and industrious; of which degeneracy their very marabouts give the following original, as a palliative.

How their marabouts account for their lazy and thievish temper.

NOAH was no sooner dead, than his three sons, the first of whom was white, the second tawny, and the third black, agreed upon dividing his possessions between them, which consisted of gold, silver, precious stones, ivory, silk, woollen and linnen cloths, horses, camels, dromedaries, large and small cattle, variety of arms and household stuff, grain, and other eatables, with, among others, tobacco and pipes. The greater part of the day being spent in sorting all these various stores, they were obliged to adjourn the division of them till the next morning; and, having supped, and taken a friendly pipe together, went to rest, each in his own tent. The white brother, after a few hours sleep, got up, and having seized on the gold, silver, precious stones, and others of the most valuable goods, loaded the best horses with them, and rode away to the country where his white posterity have been settled ever since.

THE Moor or tawny awaking soon after, and with the same design, was surprised to find that his brother had been before-hand with him, and hastened to secure the rest of the horses, camels, and oxen; and having loaded them with the best carpets, cloths, and other remaining goods, drove away to another part of the world, leaving only a few coarse cloths, cotton, pipes and tobacco, some millet, rice, and other things of still less value. When the black, or the third brother, who was the laziest of the three, came next morning to the place,

(F) The white Africans, according to Leo Africanus, are divided into five nations or tribes: viz. the Zanbaghians, Musnudans, the Zenetæ, and Gumeranians (6). Marmol calls the first of them Zinbagians and Mucamudins (7). The Musnudans are seated, according to the former, on the east and south of Mount Atlas, from Hea to the river Servi, and extend themselves along the plains of the four provinces of Hea, Suz, Guzula, and Morocco.

The Gumeranians possess the mountains of Mauritania, the streight of Errif, which begins at that of Gibraltar, and extends itself eastward to the frontiers of the kingdom of Tremecen; and these two tribes have their distinct settlements, whilst the other three are intermixed and dispersed through most parts of Africa, though not without knowing, and often quarrelling with, one another.

The Zanbaghians do likewise inhabit the deserts of Libya, from which, says Leo, it plainly appears, that they formerly dwelt in tents, and in the plains; and that they had their own governors, or chiefs, who protected and governed them, and employed themselves in all kinds of arts that were necessary to social life, and, among others, in that of feeding their numerous herds, whilst those who lived in towns were taken up with the cultivation of their lands, or in some other manufactures.

These five nations, or tribes, are divided into 600 families in the geneological table which Rachû, or, as Marmol calls him, Ebn Al Rakik (8), hath given of them. Of the other sort of Africans we shall speak more fully in its proper place.

(6) Afric. lib. i. c. 3. & seq.

(7) Ibid. lib. i. c. 24.

Ramusio, Viagii, Davity, Dapper, & al. supra citat.

(8) Marmol, ubi supra, vide &

a he was still more astonished ; and seeing neither brothers, nor any of the valuable commodities, easily judged that they had tricked him of them, without any possibility of reaching the one, or recovering the other. In this most affecting situation, he takes his pipe in his mouth, and sits down to ponder on the most effectual means of retrieving his loss, and being revenged on his two perfidious brothers. But none other could he think of but patience, and watching all opportunities of making reprisals upon them, and, by all means, and at all hazards, to lay hold and carry off all he could lay hands on of what belonged to them, in exchange for that share of his patrimony which they had deprived and cheated him of. This practice, they say, is what he not only followed himself, as long as he lived, but what he enjoined all his descendants to do, to the end of the world, and with which they have carefully complied ever b since <sup>a</sup>.

But it is not their marabouts alone that have characterised them in that disadvantageous manner, neither is this description applicable to the modern Africans only ; for we find the antient ones no less severely treated by the Greeks and Romans, who have represented them under the most odious and despicable character, as proud, lazy, treacherous, thievish, hot, and addicted to all kinds of lusts, and most ready to promote them in others, as pimps, panders, incestuous, brutish, and savage, cruel and revengeful, devourers of human flesh, and quaffers of human blood, inconstant, base, treacherous, and cowardly ; fond of and addicted to all sorts of superstition and witchcraft ; and, in a word, to every vice that came in their way, or within their reach <sup>b</sup>. One of them, who knew them better than any other stranger, hath summed up their infamous character in the most lively colours, in these few words <sup>c</sup>. It is hardly possible to find in any African any quality but what is of the bad kind : they are inhuman, drunkards, deceitful, extremely covetous, and perfidious to the highest degree. We need not add to these their impurities and blasphemies, because in these they outdo all other nations, Africa being known to have been ever burning with innumerable impurities ; insomuch that one would rather take it for a volcano of the most impure flames, than for an habitation of human creatures. And with respect to this last vice, St. Austin, who was a native of that country, scruples not to confess, that it is as impossible to be an African and not lascivious, as it is to be born in Africa and not be an African. Notwithstanding their having been so frequently and severely chastised for their vices, not only by the cursed yoke of several barbarous nations, under which they have been doomed to groan, but what is still a heavier punishment by far, by the unhappy changes they have suffered in their religion ; a misfortune of all others the most affecting to the soul.

Their infamous character by the Romans, &c.

Many enormous vices ;

acknowledged by Austin.

Thus much shall suffice for the general character of the native Africans, deferring a farther confirmation of it till we come to give a particular account of every kingdom and state in that vast continent, and wherein our readers will find sufficient proofs to convince them that it is so far from being either unjust or exaggerated, with regard to the far greater part of them, that, in many instances, they deserve, if possible, a much more odious one ; they being in many parts so utterly void of all humanity, and even natural affection, that parents will sell their wives and children, and vice versa, for slaves into the American colonies (a condition much more dreaded by them than the most cruel death) even for so small a matter as a gallon or two of brandy, of which they are fond to excess, or for some few glass beads, or other taudry European trinkets, to adorn their bodies on some public occasions, as a public assembly, a festival, wedding, and the like.

Void of all natural affection.

We have taken notice of another distinction made by African writers ; viz. between the white and black natives ; a difference which hath exercised the greatest wits of this and past ages to account for in a natural way, but concerning which we shall refer our readers to what we have said of it in our Ancient History <sup>d</sup>, and only offer some farther remarks on the curious subject, which will not, we hope, be displeasing to our readers, and will at once explode the two celebrated hypotheses of Riolan <sup>e</sup>, and of the French academy ; the first of whom affirmed the blackness of the Negroes to be not in the skin, but in the epidermis ; and the latter, that it lieth neither in the skin nor in the epidermis, but in a certain reticulum, consisting of particles extremely soft and fine, which surrounds the whole body between the skin and epidermis.

Here, then, it must be observed, in the first place, that the children of the Negroes come out white from their mother's womb, like ours, and have no blackness at all, except about their privities, and a small black circle about their nails, next to the flesh ; that of the rest of their bodies being contracted gradually after the birth, in twenty-four hours by some, and by others in a week, more or less.

Some remarks on their black complexion.

<sup>a</sup> LAERT. Relat. d'Afrique. vol. ii. c. 14. p. 269, & seq.

LUCAN, l. iv. VIRGIL. Æneid, l. viii. SERV. in eundem, & al. plur.

<sup>d</sup> Ancient History, vol. i. p. 47 & 120 (**).

<sup>b</sup> See Ancient History, vol. vii. pass.

<sup>c</sup> SALVIAN. de provid.

<sup>e</sup> Vide RIOLAN opuscul. epidermia, c. 4.

Grow white when sick ;
turn black when dead.

2. THAT the Negroes, how black soever whilst in health, are no sooner attacked with any sickness, but they grow gradually more pale and whitish, according to the nature and degree of the distemper, even to the total discharge of their blackness ; and, in some cases, acquiring wanness, like that of a maid who languishes under the green sickness<sup>f</sup>.

3. THAT if their disease reduce them to ever so great a paleness, yet they reassume their full original blackness as soon as they are dead.

4. IF any of them chance to receive some hurt in their sugar manufactures, such as a burn or scald, whatever part happens to be so hurt becomes white, notwithstanding their being thoroughly cured of it, and both the skin and the epidermis totally restored.

To this let us add, 5. That all the Negroes in general, both those of Africa, and those who have lived ever so long a time in America, have the soles of their feet of a different colour from the rest of their body, that is, of an almost white ; so that neither the epidermis nor the reticulum, if any such things be, do extend to that part. These observations, which are very obvious to every one that is conversant among that black generation, and require neither depth of thought nor skill in anatomy to make, are yet sufficient to convince one of the vanity of those two systems above-mentioned ; and that the true cause of this peculiar blackness of their bodies is still as much unknown to us, as that of the swarthiness of their minds we have lately been describing : and will still be more evidently shewn under the next article.

Their religion idolatry of the worst kind

Horrid superstitions.

THE African natives have been, from the very beginning, addicted to the old idolatry, magic, witchcraft, and other superstitious rites and customs of the antient Egyptians<sup>g</sup>, from whom they are rightly supposed to have received them, and have, for the most part, retained them to this day. They worshipped the sun, moon, and planets, the fire, which they kept continually burning, a great variety of living creatures, down to the lowest insects and vermin, both of land and sea, as well as a multitude of inanimate ones, such as rivers, lakes, mountains, trees, plants, &c. to all which they pay a kind of worship, as well as to a still inferior sort of imaginary deities or spirits, of which even their priests can give but a lame account ; though they make them, as well as all the others mentioned before, to enter into all the concerns of life, as health, sickness, life, death, good or ill success, auguries, charms, ordeals of several kinds for the absolving of the innocent, or discovering the guilty ; in all which the stupid vulgar are abused by those impudent charlatans, with most barefaced villainies and horrid cruelties ; of all which we shall meet with frequent and pregnant instances, through the course of this history.

Cassers have no religion.

The Gallas, Agaus, and others dispersed through Africa.

The impious Imbii.

War against the Deity.

THERE is still, if possible, a worse kind of heathenism spread through this vast continent, to wit, through the large tract of Cassraria, or country of Cassers, which extends itself through the inland part, from the equinoxial line, quite to the Cape of Good Hope ; and whose inhabitants are but one remove from brutes ; who live, like them, without religion or laws, void of reason, humanity, and industry, and subsist altogether upon plunder and hunting. Much of the same wild nature are the Gallas and Agaus, who are dispersed through most parts of Africa, under different names, though, in all likelihood, all of the same extract, and all following the same inhuman trade of plundering, rapine, and putting all to fire and sword where-ever they come<sup>h</sup>. But the most dreadful of all are the Imbii, a generation of impious and barbarous monsters, who are situate pretty near the country of the Hottentots, but spread themselves far and wide on both sides, as well as towards the north. These not only declare themselves at war with all mankind, but with heaven itself ; against which they shoot their impotent arrows, accompanied with the most horrid curses, and other expressions of hatred and defiance. They moreover eat the flesh of their slaves and prisoners of war ; the latter of whom they commonly roast alive, and by a slow fire, whilst they strive to drown their dreadful outcries, by dances, music, and execrable shouts of joy<sup>i</sup>.

Many relics of Judaism thro'
Africa.

Jews once settled there independent.

ON the other hand, we find here such antient relics of Judaism, not only in the large empire of Habassin or Abissinia (whither the famed queen of Sheba is said to have introduced that religion, after her return from her grand visit to king Solomon<sup>j</sup>), but in many other parts of Africa, though perhaps formerly subject to that crown, but since dismembered from it, and sunk in other respects into the grossest idolatry, as seems to confirm that report, founded on an antient Abissinian record, of which we shall speak in its proper place, which makes express mention of it. Besides these, which are still in a great measure retained by the Abissinian church, though converted (as is also affirmed in the above-mentioned record) to Christianity, so early as the eunuch or high treasurer of queen Candace<sup>k</sup> planted it in that empire, there have been great numbers of Jews settled in those parts, some of whom composed a a kind of republic independent from those monarchs, and observed all the rites of the Mosaic law.

<sup>f</sup> LABAT Relat. d'Afrique. vol. ii. c. 15.      <sup>g</sup> De his, vide Anc. Hist. vol. i. p. 203, & seq.      <sup>h</sup> De his, vide LINSCHOT, JARRIC, PIGAFET, DAVITY, DAPPER, TELLEZ, BERMUDEZ, LOBO, & al. mult.
* Idem ibid. & PURCHAS Relat. lib. vii. c. 8, §. ii.      <sup>i</sup> 1 Kings, c. x.      <sup>k</sup> Acts, viii. 26, & seq.

Among those vast herds of them which are dispersed through this great continent, these have been since dislodged from their high, and almost inaccessible, mountains, for their frequent ill offices to those princes, and siding with their revolted subjects, and have been brought into due subjection, and laid under tribute to them. Since which time they have lived dispersed in several provinces of that empire, and have made but an inconsiderable figure in it. Dispersed. There are who call themselves originary Jews, of the posterity of Abraham, who pretend to have formerly come in colonies, and to have settled themselves in Egypt, Abissinia, and along the Niger; and these last are more numerous and considerable than the two former<sup>1</sup>. But those who came and are here still in the greatest number, are such as refuted themselves in these parts, either after the destruction of Jerusalem, and the dispersion of the Jewish nation by Titus Vespasian, mentioned in a former chapter<sup>m</sup>; or who fled from other persecutions, under the Romans, Persians, Saracens, and since under the Christians; as out of Italy, an. 1342; Spain and Portugal, an. 1462, & seq.; and out of the Low Countries, an. 1350; France, 1403; and England, 1422. All these go differently habited, as well as divided among themselves. They distinguished themselves by their several nations and tribes; have their separate synagogues; but are not allowed any power or authority in the government of this country, except what they exercise amongst themselves; and, though many of them become extremely rich and opulent, yet they are every-where despised and hated; not so much indeed for their religion, as for their foul and knavish practices in every branch of commerce they are concerned in, and adulterating, counterfeiting, and debasing every commodity that passes through their hands.

THE next religion in Africa is the Christian, which was planted there, according to the Abissinian accounts from the earliest times, by the eunuch of queen Candace, lately mentioned. Christians in Africa persecuted by the heretics. However that be, there is no doubt of its having been preached there very soon, but it was miserably torn by the factious heretics of those days, the Donatists, Manichees, Arians, Pelagians, &c. especially under the reigns of Dioclesian and Julian the apostate, notwithstanding the great privileges which Constantine the Great had granted to the orthodox clergy, to protect them from their insults<sup>n</sup>: but here Christianity met with such an ungrateful soil, that its blessed seed was quickly over-run and choaked up with the rankest weeds; and all the African Christians, of whatever denomination, whether natives or foreigners, are equally infected with the general depravity of the country. The church of Abissinia was soon infected with the Abissinian Eutychian heresy, and over-run with the grossest superstitions, as we shall see in its proper place. Those parts which are subject to the kings of Portugal and Spain, and have received their faith from the missionaries of the church of Rome, as the kingdoms of Kongo, Angola, Loango, on the western, and of Sofala, Melinda, and others, on the eastern coast, acknowledge, indeed, the church of Rome for their mother; but shew little else of its religion than its most superstitious rites and tenets; which they so shamefully stain with vices and immoralities of all kinds, that they are rather a discredit than an honour to the gospel of Christ. church infected by Eutychius. Roman Catholics given to the grossest superstitions.

BESIDES them, we meet with a variety of other Christians dispersed through Africa; such as Greeks, Armenians, Maronites, Georgians, Thomists, or Christians of St. Thomas; most of whom have their own patriarchs; and the rest, as well as that of Abissinia, are subject to that of Alexandria. As for those protestant nations who have their fleets and settlements not only along the Barbary coast, as far as the streights of Gibraltar, but likewise from thence along the western coasts, as far as Cape Vert, and that of Good Hope, such as the English, Hollanders, Danes, &c. we need not say more of them under this article, except that they content themselves with the private exercise of their own particular religions, each in their respective factories and settlements; in some of which they have chaplains for that purpose, though not in all. Other Christians sects in Africa.

BUT that which hath made the greatest and quickest progress through Africa, is the Mohammedan; a religion so nicely suited to the depravity of the natives, as the reader may recollect by the full display we have made of it in the life of its first founder*, that it did not need the help of the sword to make it spread itself far and near; and so far we may venture to say it hath found so kind a soil, as to strike a deep root where-ever it hath been sown; and one would hardly imagine that it could greatly degenerate by being transplanted thither from Arabia. It hath, nevertheless, fared otherwise; whether through the ignorance of those who first introduced it, or, which is much more likely, through the depravity of those who received it from them, who are naturally averse to all restraint, it hath dwindled into a Mohammedanism brought into Africa. And much defaced and maimed.

<sup>1</sup> GRAMMAY Afriq. illustrat. LEO AFRICANUS, l. i & ii. & seq. & alib. pass.

<sup>m</sup> See before, p. 485, & seq. p. 572. 575.

<sup>n</sup> See Anc. Hist. vol. vi. p. 251, & seq.

* See before, vol. i. p. 14, & seq.

downright carnal one, and appears, almost every-where, so effectually stript of those austerities with which its founder had decorated it, as the abstaining from wine, swine, and some other sorts of flesh, fasts and long lents, frequent prayers, ablutions, and many other injunctions of the like nature, that one would hardly imagine, nor would a staunch Moslem acknowledge it to be the same, disfigured as it is moreover by the many heathenish superstitions with which it is blended, and which are more tenaciously observed than any precepts of the Koran. Thus, among the Negroes, they have neither mosques, nor observe any day of the week as a day of rest; nor indeed any of the Mohammedan festivals, except that of Biram, which is a kind of passover, after their Ramadan, or lent<sup>m</sup>; which last they keep merely as introductory to the other, but without any strictness<sup>n</sup>. Much after the same manner shall we find Mohammedism mutilated and disfigured in most places in Africa, where it hath been introduced, and even in those which are tributary to, or subject to the dominions of, the Grand Signor; such as the states of Barbary, and some of his other conquests in Egypt and along the Red Sea; of all which, and other parts of the African dominions, we shall have occasion to speak more fully in the course of this book. In the mean time, though we have given formerly a full account of the various sects of Mohammedans, amounting in all to 72<sup>o</sup>; yet, as they are commonly distinguished under two chief heads; viz. the Lashari, which are spread over this continent, as well as over Syria and Turkey; and the Imams, which flourish in Persia and Khorasan; it will not be improper here to give our reader a short account of the marabouts, or saints, of the former, and their tenets, so far as relates to this country of Africa we are upon; which will be a farther confirmation of the general depravity of their votaries, which we have been speaking of. These saints, or rather cheats, are very numerous, and highly regarded all over Africa, especially among the Mohammedan Moors and Arabs, on account of their extraordinary way of living; and by the rest, out of fear of a superior power they arrogate to themselves, of hurting and punishing, more or less severely, every one who hath the misfortune to fall under their displeasure or dislike. Insomuch, that this insolent fraternity is become everywhere as dreaded, as it is numerous and powerful.

Mixed with Paganism.

Three sorts of Marabouts.

The tenets and scandalous morals of the first.

THERE are three classes, or orders; the first of them dispersed about in cities, towns, and villages, both in the maritime and inland parts: the second is of the wandering kind, without any settled habitations; and the third affect to live in the thickest forests, and rocky and barren deserts. They all pretend to great mortifications and austerities, the last especially; but all of them are wicked and debauched to the most shameful degree, both in their principles and morals. They first affirm, that a man may, by dint of fasting and abstinence from meat, attain the nature of an angel; the heart, by such duties, becoming so cleansed and pure from all evil infection, that it can sin no more, though ever so willing to do so: but they teach, at the same time, that this supreme degree of happiness cannot be attained, but by the help of 50 sciences, which are so many steps by which one must ascend to it. Nevertheless they imagine that God doth not impute to them the sins they commit before they have gained the first twenty degrees. They live at first in the most strict austerity, and macerate themselves with grievous fastings, but afterwards give themselves up to every kind of festivity, and all degrees of drunkenness and debauchery. One of their learned, named Eseb-ravardi Sitira Varden, hath described their austerities in four books; whilst another, named Ibu'lfared, hath displayed the whole of their religion in a beautiful poetic piece, full of wit and humour, and seemingly designed to inspire one with love. Al'fagari, another ingenious author, hath written a comment upon it, wherein he hath collected all the rules of that sect, and discovered the various steps which lead to that pretended happiness. The verse of that piece runs in such a sweet and harmonious strain, and elegant style, that those of this sect rehearse or sing no other at their public feasts; there not having risen one poet for upwards of 300 years that hath equalled him, or hath enriched their language like Ibu'lfared.

THE tenets of this sect are chiefly those that follow; that the heavens, fixed stars, and elements, are all holy, or have something of the deity in them; so that no law or religion can be erroneous; and every one is at liberty to worship that object to which he finds his heart is most inclined. They pretend that all knowledge concerning the deity was infused into the first man, whom they call El Chot, and who had been elected by God, and made equal to him in knowledge. That after his death the elders, or chiefs of the sect, chose one from among their number of forty, who being also dead, they chose a new one, but from among 765.

Their mad
freaks.

THESE wretched sectaries are, by the rules of their order, bound to wander to and fro, incognito, covered only with old tatters; so that they might be taken for madmen, void of

<sup>m</sup> De his, vide supra, vol. i. p. 48, & seq.

<sup>n</sup> LABAT, & al. supra citat. seq. vide & LEO AFRICANUS, GRAMMAY, MARMOL, l. ii. c. 1. & seq. & al.

<sup>o</sup> Ubi supra, p. 133, &

- a reason and common sense, rather than a set of marabouts, or saints. They run wild, and almost naked, all over Africa; and will even offer violence to modest women that come in their way, with as little reserve or shame, as a wild beast would on one of its kind. They are more numerous still in Egypt and the on coasts of Barbary. One of these brutish fellows, Leo Africanus says, he saw at Alcair, or Grand Kairo, seize upon a matron-like woman, just coming out of the bagnio in one of the market-places of that city, callad Bain-Al-Kasraim, and ravished her, in full sight of a croud of people; who immediately all ran after her, and strove to kiss or touch some of her garments; imagining that they had, by that filthy act, contracted some extraordinary degree of holiness; crying out that the adulterer was a person of great merit, and had committed no crime in what he did, but only in outward appearance; whilst the woman's husband saw himself obliged to suppress all appearance of resentment, and even to acknowledge the favour done to his spouse, by a magnificent banquet, and some handsome presents.

An instance of their brutish incontinence, and of the people's folly.

- THESE vermin swarm no less in Nigritia; where the poor Negroes stand in great fear of their killing power (G), though they hate them in their hearts. They have whole towns and villages along the Niger, or Senega, and form a kind of republic among themselves; and there, as we are further informed, they have a fine large city called Consoon, all built with stone, and covered with tiles, and inhabited by some of the richest merchants in that country; which place is looked upon as the capital of the marabout crew in this part of Africa <sup>p</sup>. The same author adds, that they were so insolent as to persuade a petty prince in that neighbourhood to send a haughty message to the chief commissary of the French, threatening him and his whole garrison with a speedy and dreadful vengeance, by the infallible help of their conjuring power, for refusing to pay a certain custom. But that wise gentleman soon suppressed their insolence, by letting them know that he had artillery and fire-arms about him, which were proof against all their enchantments <sup>q</sup>.

- THE second class of marabouts is that of the cabbalists, as they affect to be called. These abstain from meats, and have a peculiar diet. They fast much and often, according to the various seasons of the year. They wear small square tablets, engraven with strange sorts of characters, or cyphers; and pretend to have daily intercourse with angels, who teach them the knowledge of all things. A celebrated doctor of theirs, named Beni, was the first instituter of all their rules, the compiler of their prayers, and contriver of all their tablets. Those institutes are divided into eight parts; the first they stile Al Omba Ennonorita, or the demonstration of light, containing their prayers and fast days. The second, Seme Al Meharif, the sun of sciences, treats of their tablets, their usefulness, and manner of using them. The third, Lefma Al Chufne, in which is a table of the 99 virtues which they conceive to be comprehended in the name of God. The other five have also their peculiar names, and treat of particular subjects relating to their way of living, which need not be dwelt longer upon †.

The second class described.

- THE third sort of marabouts are called Sunnakites, and live an ascetic life, in woods and deserts, and affect to shun the company of men. They live only upon herbs and vegetables; but retain a mixture of heathenish superstitions and idolatry. They also use circumcision, but do not administer it to any till they have attained the 30th year of their age, and yet baptize in the name of the living God. So that their religion appears to be a strange compound of Paganism, Judaism, and Christianity; and may, in all probability, be the mongrel spawn of the antient Therapeutes, described by Philo, and of whom we have given an ample account in our Ancient History <sup>r</sup>, as being become so celebrated in Egypt, Libya, and other parts of Africa, for their recluseness from human society; and austere way of living, that they have been challenged both by Jews and Christians for their own <sup>s</sup>. And thus much may suffice concerning the three African sorts of marabouts; we shall only add with regard to the first class; viz. that they are an excellent safeguard to travellers against thieves and plunderers; whether Negroes, Moors, or Arabs, that infest the roads of that great continent; so the safest way to go from any part to another, is to allure one of those fellows to go with you, and you are sure to travel unmolested from all other rogues and vagabonds; there being none of them, or of any other class, that will dare to offer any insult or incivility to the greatest stranger under such protection.

Third sort described.

Probably the offspring of the antient Therapeutes.

<sup>p</sup> LABAT Afric. ubi supra, vol. iii. c. 11. p. 338.

GRAMMAY, MARMOL, DAPPER, & al.

<sup>q</sup> Idem ibid. p. 334, & seq. vide] & LEO AFRICANUS, <sup>r</sup> Anc. Hist. vol. iv. p. 170, & seq.

† LABAT, ibid. & al.

<sup>s</sup> ibid. p. 173, & seq. LEO AFRICAN. MARMOL, GRAMMAY, DAPPER, & al.

(G) These poor senseless wretches are prepossessed with such a strong notion that those impudent cheats can dispatch them out of this life in two or three days, and at the same time so afraid of being hurried out of it, at so short a warning, that there is hardly any thing they will not do or part with to avoid their dreaded displeasure (9).

(9) Labat, ubi supra, p. 335.

Africa barren of arts and sciences.

FROM what we have lately said of this class, their pretended intercourse with angels, and a the pompous titles of DEMONSTRATION OF LIGHT, SUN OF SCIENCES, &c. which they give to the several parts of their institutes above-mentioned, our readers may probably be apt to conclude, that they are possessed with the knowledge of heavenly as well as sublunary things, whatever darkness may be spread over the rest of the African nation; whereas in fact, and if we may judge from their best productions in arts and sciences, or from the universal agreement of all that have been conversant amongst them, there is not a more ignorant set of wretches in all that continent; if we except the vulgar, whom they only excel in the art of cheating, and the number and variety of ways they invent to elude and domineer over them: so that it would be as vain and absurd to seek for figs and dates growing in Greenland, as for arts and sciences flourishing among the Africans. If any of them have gained any tincture of b either, it hath been from the Arabs that live amongst them, of whom we shall speak in its proper place; and even that so inconsiderable, that it is scarcely to be discerned. Even those most necessary ones, in so great a variety of hot and unhealthy climes, physic, surgery, and pharmacy, are so little understood, except amongst the Europeans who are settled there, that their only recourse in all disorders and emergencies of that kind, is to their quacks; who, instead of proper remedies, pretend to cure them only by their charms; but commonly cheat them out of their money and lives.

Ignorance of surgery, pharmacy, &c.
Charms used instead of physic; even in Abissinia.

EVEN that once potent, and still so rich and extensive, empire of Abissinia, where Christianity had been so long planted (though afterwards infected with Nestorianism) and been professed during such a number of centuries, some of both clergy and laity appear, as well by their c writings as practice, to have long since laid under the thickest darkness of ignorance and superstition, and to have been equally negligent of every branch of the liberal arts and sciences. And it is no longer than the year 1698, that the then emperor was glad to venture his life into the hands of a wandering French surgeon, sent to him by M. Maillet, the French consul at Grand Kairo; his whole empire not affording one physician or apothecary to cure him of so slight a disorder as an intermitting fever<sup>t</sup>. Neither are they more skilful in points of surgery, wherein they hardly know any other manual operation than that of cauterising, and that in a most butcherly and cruel manner, and as frequently in improper as in proper cases.

Handicrafts and manufactures in a pitiful plight.

IF we next take a cursory view of their manufactures and mechanic arts, in which we might suppose necessity and gain, if not emulation, might have spurred them on to receive d what helps they could from the many Europeans who are settled amongst them, we shall find the spirit of indolence running through them all, even the most necessary of them.

BUT they are naturally too proud and indolent to learn industry from a parcel of indigent despicable strangers, whom extreme poverty and want forces to abandon their native country, and wander to the utmost parts of the globe, through all difficulties and dangers, to get a wretched livelihood. For this is the real notion they conceive of them and their commerce, and, of course, look upon them as people designed by heaven for their drudgery and service, and to import all that is valuable and delightful from other countries, into that happy one: and so satisfied are they with their lot, though ever so unhealthy and barren, and themselves ever so miserable, that, whenever they chance to converse with strangers, one of the e principal questions they ask them is, whether they ever saw, or think there is, a finer country, or a happier people, than theirs†. Those rich golden mines, with which the whole country abounds, and which yield their precious ore without the hundredth part of the labour and danger of those of Mexico and Peru, they lying no deeper than five or six feet from the surface of the ground, and requiring no other utensils than a pick-ax and spade; to say nothing of those vast quantities which are washed down by their prodigious rains, and large rapid rivers, and need no farther trouble than to be sifted and washed from the mud; these, we say, are what they look upon as such an inexhaustible treasure, as sets them above all anxious care and laborious industry, as long as that single commodity, so highly prized and coveted by Europeans and Asiatics, is sufficient to procure them, without the trouble of f fetching, whatever those countries produce, for their conveniency or delight. As for any thing else, they think their soil can easily supply a sufficiency of it, without any other labour than what they can turn over to their wives and slaves; whilst they enjoy the fruits of it in ease and comfort; that is, in smoking in fresco, if that can be had, telling of stories, singing and dancing, and all such indolent amusements; of which if they sometimes deprive themselves, it is only for the more manly diversions of hunting or fishing. As for handicraft trades, agriculture, household business, as fetching water, wood, and other necessaries, planting, sowing, gathering in, and preparing food for their families, they are naturally so averse to them, that nothing but the most pinching want can drive any of them to it; they being reckoned so much beneath them, as to be only fit for their women and slaves. And so inhuman and void of g

Instances of their stupidity
and indolence.

Hard state of the women.

<sup>t</sup> PONCET v. age en Abissinie.

† CAVAZZI apud Latat, PIGAFET CORGO, GRAMMAY, & al. plur.

a all natural affection are they, that they can see these poor female drudges sinking under their work, and under a scorching sun, scratching the ground, with no better a tool than a flat kind of mattock or pick-ax, to sow millet, maize, or some grain or roots, for the support of the family, and, perhaps, with a sucking child hanging by a swaddling band on her back, and without any other refreshment from morning to night than a little meal diluted with water<sup>u</sup>. They cause them daily to sweat and slave at a wooden pestle and mortar (H), to grind their maize and millet, instead of a hand-mill, or other more proper convenience<sup>w</sup>. Way of pounding their maize.

IF we look into those few manufactures and handicrafts that are amongst them, we shall find them carried on with the same rude and tedious stupidity. To give one or two instances of it : first, in their weaving manufacture. The weaver hath neither shuttle, nor any of those appurtenances which belong to a loom. This last consists only of two smooth and short beams, laid on the ground, and fastened together by a third which goes across them. On these he fastens the threads of the woof, and between every other of them he carefully conducts that of the warp, till he is gone through the whole breadth of it, which is seldom above a yard ; and so continues the same painful task forward and backward, till he hath, not without a great deal of patience, brought it to a full end, which seldom exceeds two yards. From which it is plain that one of our weavers, with his proper tools, could dispatch more in one day than these can do in a month ; and though they have in many parts, Europeans settled among them, yet could they never prevail upon them to fall into a more expeditious method, by a proper improvement of their looms. What is, however, surprising, is that they can make shift to turn out some pretty cloths, striped with divers colours, and beautiful enough to the eye ; and after the same method they weave likewise great variety of mats of different colours, and curious enough to be sent into Arabia, Persia, and India <sup>x</sup>.

IN their earthen manufacture they know nothing of the use of a wheel ; instead of which they use a kind of molds made of the rind of calabashes, cut into several shapes. In the inside of these they spread their clay with their hands, till they have brought it to a certain degree of thinness, and even with the rim ; which is not only a difficult but often precarious work ; neither have they the use of kilns to burn their vessels, but cover them with straw, and set it on fire, which gives them a black colour, without gloss or varnish ; yet with these poor helps they can produce a great variety of vessels, as dishes, platters, pots, pitchers, pipkins, &c. of all sizes, for their use<sup>y</sup>. Earthenware.

WE might go on in the same strain, in describing their masonry, carpentry, their manufactures of iron, copper, of their various weapons of war, and musical instruments, &c. thro' all which runs the same rudeness, and want of genius and industry ; but as these differ, more or less, according to the vast variety of nations which inhabit this spacious continent, whatever we think worth mentioning, relating to those particulars, will be best deferred till we come to the respective histories of such kingdoms and people. In the mean time, it will not be improper to remind our readers, that what we have said of the indolence and want of genius and industry of the native Africans, extends no farther than to those who inhabit the inland parts ; those who live on the coasts and maritime parts, having been long since allured to a more active and laborious life, as well as civilized in their manners, by their frequent commerce with the Europeans and other strangers. And here emulation and the prospect of gain, have helped so far to divest them of their high opinion and conceit of themselves and country, that they have not disdained to accept of all the helps they could get from foreigners, nor even to be more than ordinary curious in finding out all the most considerable improvements they had made in all trades and manufactures, in order to make them as much as possible their own. But here, though their success hath so well answered their expectations in every respect, that one might think it would have stirred up the rest to have followed their example, seeing it plainly shewed that their indolence and stupidity was more owing to a national repugnance than to want of capacity, yet it hath had a quite contrary effect upon them ; and, instead of a laudable emulation, hath produced an entailed and irreconcilable hatred, contempt, and mistrust between them, without abating one grain of the averseness to labour in the one, or adding one of emulation in the other towards any farther degrees of improvement than those which they found ready made to their hands. Other trades equally rude.

<sup>u</sup> Vide int. al. CAVAZ. apud Labat, vol. i. c. 8. p. 119, & seq.
 ibid. vol. ii. p. 64, & seq. & al. supra citat.

<sup>w</sup> Idem ibid. p. 442, & seq.

<sup>x</sup> Idem

<sup>y</sup> CAVAZ. & al. ubi sup.

(H) Which last is no other than a large stump of some hard wood, about three feet high, and cut, by dint of labour and patience, and with the help of one single iron tool, not unlike a chissel, about the depth of two feet ; and which tool serves also to shape both pestle and mortar, on the outside, so as to appear neat, and fit for the service they are designed for.

THIS is the main disposition of the Moors in general ; and there are but few kingdoms or states in Africa that afford an exception to that character, except where they have been either brought under a foreign yoke, whether of the Spaniards, Portuguese, and other Europeans, the weight and galling of it hath driven them into an unwelcome activity, or where their princes, out of regard to their own interest, as well as complaisance to those less severe companies who are settled among them, such as the English, French, &c. have stirred them up to industry, by more humane motives and proper encouragements. For, where these are wanting, or the natives find themselves over-reached, or oppressed by their factors or their underlings, as is but too frequently done, by enlarging the usual weights and measures of the commodities sold, or the stated value of the things exchanged, they commonly resent it to a high degree, if we may believe their half-countryman Leo<sup>a</sup>, engrave every injury done to them on marble, never to be forgiven, nor sufficiently retaliated by all possible ill offices, cheating, and treachery, in their power, as we shall see under the next article.

But are often over-reached by the Europeans.

Their vindictive temper.

The commerce of Africa.

Gum arabic how far superior to that of Africa.

The frequent food of the Negroes.

The tree and its flower, seed, &c. described.

THE commerce of this part of the world was but inconsiderable before the coming of the Europeans thither, it being chiefly carried on by and with the Arabs, Persians, Armenians, and Mokammedans, and mostly confined to the eastern coasts, and those of the Red Sea ; but since that time the former, Italians, French, English, Dutch, &c. as well as the Spaniards and Portuguese, have settled their several factories in divers parts of it ; the latter, by their early conquests and settlements, have carried off by far the greatest share of it, as will be seen in the sequel. This commerce consists chiefly in gold, slaves, morphil, or ivory, variety of odoriferous gums, as myrrh, frankincense, besides a prodigious quantity of that which is known by the name of gum arabic, because first brought hither from Arabia, and said to be much preferable to that of Africa ; though, if we may believe Father Labat, they are the very same, and all the difference between the former and the latter is merely accidental, and principally owing to the vast decay of its traffick in Arabia, ever since the French company hath exported such vast quantities of it from the Senega into Europe, from which the Provençals, and others who imported that of Arabia, have taken the advantage of picking out only the best for export, that is, that which is most transparent, clear, in the largest lumps, and freest from dross, in order to keep up its old reputation and excessive price ; whilst the Senega company, who have a more abundant vent for it all over Europe, send it hither unpicked, and just as the Moors bring it to the factories<sup>a</sup>. And as they purchase it from them for mere trifles, so they afford it a vast deal cheaper than the others can theirs. We shall not here enter into a detail of the various uses it is of to Europeans, nor of the many medicinal and other virtues which are attributed to it, which have made them so eager to get settlements along that river, merely for the sake of its gainful traffick. One particular use we cannot forbear taking notice of, which the Moors, and especially the Negroes, make of it, because we know of no other author but the last quoted who hath mentioned it ; viz. that it is their chief food when they travel, and at other times too ; and that not through pinching hunger, but choice. They cranch it in their mouths with as much pleasure as a boy does a sugar-plumb<sup>b</sup>. It eats, however, more pleasantly when diluted a little in water, or other more palatable liquor, by reason of its natural insipidity ; but in either way it is reckoned a wholesome nourishment.

THE tree on which it grows, like that of Arabia, is small, bushy, and thorny, and its leaves long and narrow. The blossoms consist of five small white leaves, which form a kind of cup, filled with stamina of the same colour, which inclose the pod in which the seeds are contained. These are small, round, and hard, and of a blackish colour, and serve to propagate the species. The tree yields its gum either by natural transpiration, or by incision, twice a year, between the two tropics. There are whole forests of them in many parts of Africa, especially along the south side of the Niger or Senega, where some tribes of Moors and Arabs inhabit, the former in villages, and the latter in tents, who gather and bring it to the European factories, as well as to other interlopers, of which there are great numbers, as well as on that of Gambia, who will run any risk for that gainful commodity<sup>c</sup>.

HERE, probably, the reader will be glad to know in what the great profit of this commerce consists, and what exchange is given to the natives in barter for this useful drug ; to which end we shall here subjoin a tarif of it, as it was formerly agreed on between the Dutch company of Arguin and the Moors, when they were masters of that factory on the Niger (I). But

<sup>a</sup> AFRICAN. l. i. in fin. c. ult. <sup>b</sup> Relat. d'Afrique. vol. i. c. 19. <sup>c</sup> Idem ibid. vide & DAPPER, DAVITY, LINSCHOT. & al.

<sup>b</sup> Idem ibid. MARMOL & al.

(I) That is, some time before the year 1724, when they were driven out of it by the French, under the command of Mons. Salvert, the same who had taken it about three years before, but in whose absence it had been

- a But we must observe that the gum is not vended by weight, but by a cubicular measure, which, according to agreement, was to contain 220 lb. weight, but which both they, as well as other Europeans, have taken all opportunities that offered to enlarge, as well as to lessen the weight or measure of whatever they give them in exchange, to the great dislike and mortification of the Moors, who would much more gladly see themselves the sole engrossers of all such laudable customs, than be forced to submit, as they often are, to those which the factors practise against them. However that be, the tariff, if duly executed, was to proceed in the manner and proportion which the reader will find in the margin (K). The interlopers, who traded thither under the protection of the Dutch governor of Arguin, or Portrendik, to whom they paid a valuable consideration for it, seem likewise to have had their particular tariff with the Moors, and we are told that the Kandar, or square measure they bought the gum by, at the last of these ports, contained 700 lb. weight of it; but whether they procured this enlargement by an equivalent, or, which is more probable, by some foul practice or stratagem, by which those ignorant people might be easily over-reached, for want of knowing, or, perhaps, being able to comprehend the true value of every inch added to the original cubic, our author doth not tell us; but gives us, in general, reason enough to believe, that they are hardly more honest in their dealings than the factors and their underlings <sup>a</sup>.
- BESIDES the rate of goods mentioned in the last note, for every Kandar of gum the traders in it are obliged to make considerable presents to the chiefs of the Moors for the liberty of the commerce. These commonly amount to 2400 Spanish piasters, either in specie, or one half in goods, ad valorem, consisting in blue linen; in which exchange those chiefs seldom fail of extorting much more than an equivalent, and, instead of 7200, make them pay 9975 livres, besides a farther donative of other goods, introduced of late years, to the value of upwards of 2870 livres. To these if we add the interpreter's salary, at the rate of half of a piaster per day, during the 100 days which the fair or exchange lasts, and the wages of the laprots, or Moorish porters, carriers, and others, who help to load and unload, at the rate of a quarter of a piaster per day, for the 100 days above-mentioned, the total of which four articles amounts to 14,469 livres and 15 pence; and joined to the before-mentioned articles, the whole amount for 700,000 lb. weight of gum will only be 40,044 livres French, exclusive of the charge of the vessel <sup>c</sup>. And thus much will serve to give our readers a notion of that gainful commerce, notwithstanding the extortions of the Moorish chiefs.
- OTHER factories and countries differ in their customs and tariffs, both with respect to this branch, and those of gold dust, slaves, amber, and other drugs, woods, &c. which will be better seen when we come to give the history of each particular country or state. All that needs be added here, under this head, with respect to the peculiar advantage of the African traffick, is, that it promotes a vast consumption and vent of our European commodities and manufactures, as those of silk, woollen, linen, and dying, those of iron and copper, wrought into a variety of utensils, as pots, basons, pans, &c. axes, cutlasses, scymitars, guns, pistols, and other fire-arms (L) and warlike weapons, and amunition, as also knives, scissars, razors, and other cutlery, needles, pins, ribands, rings, ear-rings, bracelets, little bells, and other pedlary ornaments for the women, and amongst them small looking-glasses of the ordinary sort, beads, bugles, and other such trinkets, of all sorts, sizes, and colours, besides a multitude of other knick-knacks, of all which the Moors as well as Arabs are excessively fond, and greedily exchange for their more valuable ones; to say nothing of brandy and other distilled liquors,

The exchange of it here made.

Presents made to the chiefs.

Other salaries and charges.

Total amount.

Other factories in other places.

Commodities exported from Europe.

<sup>a</sup> LABAT, ubi supra, in finem, c. 19.

<sup>c</sup> Idem ibid.

been retaken. An account of this siege, and of this last surrender, the reader may see in the author above-quoted (1).

(K) Every such cubicular measure, called by them Kandar, and containing full 220 lb. weight of gum, was to bring back in exchange, either a Spanish piaster, a piece valued at about 4 s. 6 d. sterling, or an equivalent in goods at the rate following; viz.

Twelve padlocks.
Two ounces of coral.
Four copper basons.
Half a yard of fine cloth.
Three quarters of a yard of common cloth.
Two bars of iron flatted.
Three ells of bays.
Six yards and a quarter of linen cloth, either blue, striped, or chequered.

Where, by the way, we must observe the ells were of the Dutch kind, and frequently so shortened into the bargain, as to be hardly equal to half of an English yard (2).

(L) The Dutch are justly censured for having been some of the first who supplied the Africans with, and taught them the use of, them; and it were to be wished they had been the only Europeans who did, and still continue to do so. However, the excessive heats, damps, and fogs of that country usually rust and spoil them in so little time, and there is such a scarcity of artists capable of mending them, that they become quickly unfit for use, and are thrown aside and neglected, and their old ones come again into vogue. This is the case in most countries of Africa, especially between the two tropics; which occasions the demand for them to be much less than it would be if they knew better how to preserve them.

(1) Labat, ubi supra, c. 19. p. 223, & seq. c. 19. p. 345, & seq.

(2) De hac, vide Labat Relat. d'Afric. vol. i. ad fin.

to which they have such an irresistible liking, that they will even part with one of their children, that is, sell him for a slave, to purchase a gallon or two of that pernicious commodity <sup>f</sup>.

The distinction between the Moors and Arabs.

WE have now gone through the most general heads relating to the natives of Africa, to whom we have frequently, after other African writers, given the name of Moors, as reckoning them, if not certainly, yet with great probability, to be the descendants of those who formerly inhabited the two Mauritanias, of whom we have given a full account in a former part of this work <sup>g</sup>; in order to distinguish them from the Arabs or Saracens, who over-ran the eastern parts of Africa, about the middle of the 7th century, and spread their conquests, like a torrent, to the farthest parts of its western coasts, and have been, ever since, so blended with them both

Much blended together.

there and on the eastern side, and intermixed so many of their customs and manner of living, according as either of them got the mastery over the other, that they are not easily to be distinguished, though they themselves know each other perfectly well. And hence it is, that some of the latter forsook their wandering life, and settled in towns and villages; whilst the former exchanged their settled habitations for a wandering life, and have continued in the same to this day. Hence it is likewise, that many of our African writers make no other difference between Arabs and Moors, but that which results from their origin and new African habitations, supposing them to be both of Saracenic extract; whilst the original Africans are confounded and lost between the two names. To this we may add, that by the word Maur, or Maure, is commonly understood by them, of late, not an African, but a professor of Mohammedism; and that to turn Maure, is to turn Mohammedan (M), whatever it might have meant before. It is true, indeed, that these Arabs were the people who first introduced

How distinguished by authors.

Maure, a term used to signify a Mohammedan.

Berberes on and about the two Atlas's.

Mohammedism into this country; but it would be absurd to suppose that they could extirpate all the old inhabitants, if they had all been determined to oppose it, which is very improbable. And it would then be more reasonable to think, that a great number of them would have naturally endeavoured, easy as it was for them, to save themselves by flight, and find a safe retreat among the vast ridges of almost inaccessible mountains, which extend themselves through several parts of that vast country. And this it is which hath made some authors suppose that the Berberes, now settled on and about the Greater and Lesser Atlas, were some of those native fugitives; though nothing can be concluded about them with any certainty <sup>h</sup>.

BUT be that how it will, we are pretty sure that the Africans did not receive either Mohammed's Koran, or the manners and customs of his followers, but by mere force; and it cannot be supposed to have been a small one, which could cause so great and extensive a change, even to the very language, among such a variety of nations; and this not in Africa alone, but in Syria, Palestine, Mesopotamia, and other parts of Asia, where Mohammedism had taken root; we mean the Arabic, as the only natural tongue of the three Arabias, but since spread through all those regions, as well as through Tripoli, Tunis, Algiers, Egypt, Morocco, and other vast tracts which lie between the Nile and the Niger, and even to the coasts of Abex and Ajan, &c. in all which, though it is not spoken with the same purity, but is, in many of them, disfigured by a variety of dialects, it is yet easily distinguished under all those disguises, and everywhere preserved more or less pure among all that vast multitude of nations and people; so that it is justly esteemed the most extensive tongue in the whole world <sup>i</sup>. But what hath contributed most to its preservation, is the Koran's being written in that one only, which is therefore become the learned tongue of all the Mohammedans, and that in which that book is to be read to the people, and expounded by their doctors to those who do not understand the sense of it.

Arabic tongue spread through Africa and Asia.

Arab marabouts ignorant, and great hypocrites.

BUT here it must be owned, that those doctors, in most parts of Africa, are much more ignorant of their religion than those in Arabia, Syria, and other parts of Asia. We have already spoken of them under the name of marabouts, they being the chief teachers and preachers, as well among the Mohammedan Moors and Negroes, as among the Arabs, and are, for the most part, neither more learned, sincere, nor honest than they, making the like great shew and pretence of sanctity, mortification, and devotion, scarce ever beginning or ending a period in their preaching without the name of God and Mohammed; but in their hearts are treacherous, tyrannical, ambitious, cruel, and vindictive. They display a great zeal for making proselytes among the Negroes; and having once prevailed upon them to

<sup>f</sup> Vide LEO AFRICANUS, GRAMMAY, SANUT. MARMOL, & al. <sup>g</sup> See Anc. Hist. vol. vii. p. 139, & seq. p. 192, & seq. & p. 241, & seq. <sup>h</sup> De his, conf. auct. supra citat. DAPPER, LABAT, & al. <sup>i</sup> De hac, vide GRAMMAY, JARRIC, LEO AFRICANUS, MARMOL, DAVITY, DAPPER, & al. mult.

(M) It is accordingly reported of Muley Ismael, the bloody king of Morocco, that when two run-away Christian slaves were brought before him, he stretched his lance against them, and cried Maure; that is, turn Mohammedan. Upon which one of them immediately answered, Maure, Sidy, that is, I will turn, my lord. The other, on the contrary, opened his breast to him, and said, Strike, Sir, I am a Christian. Upon which, the king threw down his lance, saying, That dog of a Christian wants me to save him from going into hell, (alluding to a belief, which is very rife among his subjects, that those who die by his hand go directly to heaven) and rode away.

a be circumcised, and taught them a few prayers and legal ceremonies out of the Koran (not without a great many superstitious ones of their own, and foreign to their law), they think they have done enough for them, and leave them to shift for themselves. One would be apt however to imagine, they have some secret means to fix them in their faith, seeing it rarely happens, we are told, that any of that nation, light and inconstant as they are, ever change that religion for another, after they have been once circumcised<sup>k</sup>.

WE have given, in a former part of this work, a full account of the modern Arabs, their Arabs their extract, tribes, government, laws, chiefs, wars, manners, and way of life<sup>l</sup>; from which it extract and appears, in all these respects, excepting that of religion, they have never deviated from the primitive practices of their progenitor, during the long space of near four thousand years, according to the celebrated prediction of the angel to his mother<sup>m</sup>. Those that invaded and settled themselves in this country of Africa, being descended from them, and brought up in the same way, have not proved altogether so tenacious of it as they; but some part of them have been prevailed upon, whether out of necessity or choice, to degenerate from it more or less; so that they appear since as divided into three classes, between whom there hath not subsisted, since that difference, either commerce or friendship; but, on the contrary, such a settled hatred Why hateful and contempt for each other, as hath quite erased all the relics of their antient consanguinity. to each other.

THE first of these classes is of those who have wholly abandoned their old wandering life, and settled themselves in towns and villages, where they apply themselves to traffick, and some sorts of manufactures or handicrafts. But these are the least numerous, and the most Town Arabs despised, of the three. Among them are some who apply themselves to learning, and frequent the courts of princes; on which account, it is likely, the whole tribe or class is branded with the name of Hadaran, or courtiers, and looked upon by the rest with the utmost contempt, as the most degenerate from the nobility of their ancestors; especially on account of their frequent intermarriages with the Africans<sup>n</sup>. why despised.

THE second class is that of those who have fixed habitations, and employ themselves in agriculture, and breeding of camels, horses, and cattle of all sorts, and in large quantities. These are likewise despised as bastards and spurious, unworthy of the name of Arabs. Among these we may reckon those who live between Numidia and Libya, who are wild and brutish, as well as more stout and martial, yet carry on a great traffick into Negroland, of Barbary horses and camels of their own rearing, and are excessive fond of hunting wild asses, ostriches, and other wild creatures<sup>o</sup>.

BUT the most considerable class, and, in their own reckoning, the only one that deserves that name, is that of those who live in deserts and tents, and in a state of freedom, scorning all subjection to any but their own Cheyks, or chiefs of their tribes or families. This is a privilege they claim as granted to their progenitor by God himself, and descended from him to his numerous posterity. No wonder, therefore, they have been always so jealous of it, that, as we have fully proved in another part of this work<sup>q</sup>, they have never been subdued to this day, by any potentate or conqueror, though many considerable and strenuous attempts have been made by several emperors and other powerful princes, not only to subdue, but even to Wandering Arabs the most dignified. extirpate them, on account of their continual robberies, depredations, and plundering way of life; for which they were the more hated as well as dreaded by the rest of the world, as they claimed a divine charter for it, as derived to them from Ishmael<sup>r</sup>, who was accordingly turned out of his father's house, without portion or other inheritance, than that of his sword and bow, and the spoils of other nations. Justly, therefore, were such professed robbers (for even the holy scripture gives them that infamous title) (N) every-where detested as a nuisance to mankind. Live wholly upon plunder. Styled robbers by the prophets.

THIS is one main motive of their chusing to live in tents, and to change their habitations; for should they venture to shut themselves up in towns, they know but too well what risk they would run continually of being surpris'd, and how dreadful the consequence would be to them and their families, if they fell into strange hands, who never gave quarter to those that fell into theirs. So that their life is a life of constant fear and dread: they must be ever

<sup>k</sup> LABAT, ubi sup. vol. i. c. 20. xvi. 10. & seq. to Anc. Hist. p. 261—291.

<sup>l</sup> Ancient History, vol. vii. p. 244, & seq.

<sup>m</sup> MARMOL Afric. lib. i. c. 27.

<sup>n</sup> Genesis, xvi. 12.

<sup>o</sup> Id. ibid. DAPPER, & al.

<sup>p</sup> Genesis,

<sup>q</sup> Additions

(N) God, by the mouth of one of his prophets, compares the idolatrous inhabitants of Jerusalem to an Arabian, waiting in the wilderness, watching for his spoil (4). The Septuagint, whether out of regard to those descendants from Ishmael, the son of Abraham by Hagar, or on account of the similitude of the word, have turned the name Harabi into that of a crow, and the vulgate Latin hath omitted that allusion, and translated the word, Latro, a thief, or highway robber; but neither of them are agreeable to the Hebrew import, which is, that of one of these Arabs we are now speaking of, who all make a profession of living altogether upon, and must be of course ever watching for, fresh plunder.

Their tents and habitations fitted for their frequent motions.

upon the watch, and ready to take the alarm, whether it be to fall foul on some new booty, or to avoid some threatening danger; and, if the latter, they must make all possible dispatch to decamp, and go in search of some new shelter for themselves, their wives, children, cattle, and all their other wealth and lumber, all which they must take with them; and, for that purpose, are provided with camels and other beasts of burden. And this likewise obliges them frequently to shift their camps, in quest of fresh pasture; without which it would be impossible for their numerous herds, and even for themselves, to subsist, because their milk is the main part of their sustenance<sup>a</sup>. These frequent decampments oblige them moreover to have their tents made as light as possible; and these were of two sorts, the one made of camels and goats hair, which it is the business of the women to card, spin, and weave, and which they do with such exquisite niceness, that, light as they are, they are proof against the heaviest rains, which fall, in most parts of Africa, very heavy and violent, during some certain seasons. The other sort are rather a portable kind of huts, made of the bark of trees, or of some proper woods, and so contrived as to be quickly set up or taken down, and laid on a camel's back. Both sorts are of a round form, and end in a cone, under which is placed the chimney, which serves them also instead of windows, to let the air and light in, there being no other way for them to come in at but that and the door, which is so low, that one must stoop quite double to go in and out; and both that and the chimney must be close stopped in the time of the great rains, or in excessive cold weather, which they have at some seasons of the year, even where they lie between the two tropics, as we have already seen<sup>b</sup> †, and shall have further occasion to shew in the sequel.

Oblong tents.

Those who live in towns and villages, and are more at their ease, have their tents and habitations much more convenient and spacious. These are of an oblong oval figure, and supported in the center by one, two, or three standing posts, on which the whole fabric depends. They are made larger or smaller according to the number of people in the family, and divided into several apartments only by carpets, which may be drawn close or open at pleasure. Some have besides lesser tents or huts for the women and children, especially when the family is large.

Figure on the outside and inside.

THE pillars which support the whole are about ten feet high, and three or four inches in diameter, and full of hooks, on which they hang their clothes, arms, saddles, baskets, and other lumber: as for the rest of their household furniture it is pretty much of the same homely nature with that of the African Moors, lately described*. They lie horizontally on the bare floor, or on a mat, or at best a carpet or skin, without pillow, mattresses, or other covering than their hayks, which they wear about them. Those who are married, have each a corner or nook of the tent cantoned off; whilst the rest lie in any other part, whether middle or sides, they can find. So that upon the whole, these tents, on the outside, resemble much the figure of a ship turned upside down, and in the inside a lumber-room, wherein men, women, children, horses, &c. are all stowed together promiscuously, in the manner we have described<sup>c</sup>.

*Slavish employments of
the women.*

THE women have not only the sole care and management of these houses, and of the rest of the family affairs, but descend likewise to most slavish employments, much after the same manner as those of the Moors. They grind, bake, brew, and dress all the victuals for the household; they fetch wood and water for their service, and milk the cattle: they do not indeed dig, sow, and reap, like the Moorish wives, because these Arabs neither allow of it, nor stay long enough in one place to reap the benefit of it; but, instead of it, they take the whole care of their husbands horses, except that of mounting them; they feed, curry, and comb, bridle and saddle them, ready for them. The huts or tents are kept as mean within as they appear without; the Arabs affecting the utmost plainness in their furniture of them, so they be neat and clean. Their hearths are in the middle of the tent, round which they sit, eat, drink, and smok in the day, and lie and sleep at nights, and upon no better beds than mats, or at best the furs of wild beasts which they kill in hunting. The rest of their furniture is chiefly that of the kitchen, and consists in some few pots, pans, dishes, plates, a wooden pestle and mortar, to pound their maize, and portable ovens to bake in<sup>d</sup>. If they are extravagant in any thing it is in their own dress, and that of their women, the sumpter and ornaments of their horses and weapons; on all which they bestow the greatest cost they can afford, in gold, silver, and precious stones, according to their rank and wealth.

Dress and ornaments of the women.

THEIR women, above all, are fond of adorning themselves about the head, neck, arms, and legs, with gold chains, pearls, beads of several rich materials, and, where these cannot be had, with those of coral, chrystal, bugles, and other trinkets, of a more ordinary nature; the greatest part of which are the product of their plundering trade, or at best of their commerce<sup>e</sup>.

<sup>a</sup> MARMOL, LEO AFRICANUS, GRAMMAY, DAVITY, DAPPER, OGILVY, LA CROIX, LABAT, LINSCHOT.
& al. plur. † Vid. p. 656. * See before, p. 665, & seq. <sup>b</sup> SHAW'S Travels, p. 291.
& seq. & al. sup. citat. † Id. ibid.

- a with other Africans; in which these seldom part with any gold, but get as much as they can from them, and bestow the greatest part of it in rings, ear-rings, collars, bracelets, and other ornaments for their wives and daughters". All the three classes of Arabs have one good quality with regard to their wives; viz. that, excepting the slavish work they lay upon them, they are, in all other respects, very fond and obliging to them. Even those we style of the wandering kind, in spite of their natural fierceness, are most obliging to, and tender of them; and it is seldom known that they treat them ill, except they give them some cause of jealousy; and even in this case the husband needs not use any other severity than to send her to her parents or relations, who will not fail, if she be guilty, to revenge the affront done to him and her family with poison, a dagger, or some other speedy death; the dread of which makes them b so exceedingly reserved and cautious of giving the least umbrage, that instances of that kind are seldom heard of amongst them. This is the more extraordinary, considering the heat of their country, which is so apt to kindle such a spirit of jealousy in the men, and that of intrigue and wantonness in the women, as is commonly attended with the worst and most dreadful consequences, of which we shall have occasion to give pregnant examples among the Turks and Moors, and even in much more moderate climates; whilst those of either class of the Arabs are here every where free from such family disorders, and their wives extolled for their conjugal loyalty, prudence, and reserved behaviour.

Husbands kind and obliging to them. Breach of faith how punished.

- THESE never appear abroad without their veils, which are large enough to cover their faces and hands; and stir not out, unless when the cares or affairs of the family oblige them to it. c And such is the reservedness of the men, that they always turn aside whenever they meet with any in their way; which is an effectual means to prevent jealousies and quarrels between the husbands; who, on their part, seem so combined in this respect against all accidents of this kind, that if any of them should be observed to cast the least indecent glance upon any of that sex, he must expect nothing but to be publicly exposed, if not severely punished for it by her relations. Their houses or tents, in which the women live, are interdicted to all men except their husbands; and if any of these are so poor as not to have a separate tent or hut for their wives, they will sooner be contented to receive their visitors, or transact any business without, in the open air, than suffer them to come in, unless it be a parent, or very near relation w.

Reservedness of the women.

No men admitted into their tents.

- d AND hence it is that we do not meet with any author of credit who pretends to tell us whether they are handsome or homely; yet, if one may guess of them by the men and boys, who are generally well shaped and featured, though the former scarcely exceed the middle size, one may reasonably suppose their females to be no less agreeable in proportion, though both sexes are of a very swarthy complexion, and the men probably more so than the women, being commonly more exposed than they to the burning rays of the sun x.

Complexion swarthy, shape, features, &c.

- NEXT to their wives the Arabs set the greatest value on, and have shewn a more than ordinary fondness for, their horses, or, to speak more truly, of their mares, which they greatly prefer to their horses, not only on account of their milk, which is part of their meat and drink, but much more on account of their colts, which are in such high request, that they sell e them for very considerable sums. Add to this, that their mares are found to be more lively, gentle, tractable, and sure footed. These they admit into their tents, and suffer them and their colts to lie promiscuously with their wives and children, either loose, or at most with their colts tied by one leg to some of the tent posts; whilst the old ones, when lain down, commonly serve for a bolster or pillow for their master's children, without any accident or danger. In return for this singular gentleness, their masters take great delight in loading them with caresses and sweet kisses, of which those creatures seem excessively fond, as well as other marks of their love, and even seek them out, when at liberty, and court them for fresh instances of it y.

Fondness for their mares.

Let them lie in their tents with their wives and children.

- THEY are very nice and careful in the choice and preservation of their breed, and no less exact in keeping the genealogy of their horses than their own; for it is that principally which f raises the value of them, especially when the owner can make it appear that any of them is fleet enough to beat an ostrich in a race. They are in general neither very high nor fat, but are well shaped and sleek, and are easily kept so. They are never shod; their common food is grass half dried, and a quantity of large millet; and, in the spring, they are put to grass for a month, during which they are never mounted.

Keep their genealogies.

Their food.

THE usual dress of the men is a kind of shirt next to the skin, and a large pair of drawers, long enough to cover their ankles, the shirt hanging over the drawers about two inches above the knees. Over this the richer sort wear a kind of short jacket, which they call kaftan, with long and narrow sleeves, and without hooks or buttons, but which lappeth over their breast, and is girt with a broad sash, which goes several times round their body. This kaftan is commonly of some fine cloth or serge; and sometimes, though rarely, of silk; but among

Dress of the men of rank.

x SHAW'S Travels, & al. sup. cit.

y Id. ibid.

z LABAT, & al. sup. citat.

w MARMOL, LEO AFRICAN. GRAMMAY, & al. sup. citat.

the meaner sort, of a blue or black cotton cloth: as for the poorer sort, they wear neither kaftan a nor shirt, but cover their bodies with an ordinary linen cloth, over their drawers. As they have not the use of belts, they commonly wear one or two cutlasses stuck in between the girdle and the kaftan, and in the same manner they wear their scymitars; but this last is only worn in time of need. Their girdles, which are long and wide, are either of silk or cotton, and knit in a kind of net-work by the women, or of some soft thin kind of leather, curiously embroidered by them. They hang besides, to their girdles, their purses and handkerchiefs; the former of which serve instead of pockets, wherein they put their pipes, tobacco, and other necessary things; the latter serves them likewise instead of towels to wipe their hands, faces, and blow their noses in; upon which account the politer sort chuse to have two, and the rest content themselves with having them made longer than broad, and allot each part of it to its respective b use. The use of stockings is hardly known in Africa, except among the Europeans; and, instead of shoes, they wear a kind of socks of fine red Morocco leather, which reach up to the ankle; and some of the better sort have a kind of flat pumps over them, of the same leather and colour, when they go abroad; and when they ride they slip on a thin pair of boots of the same manufacture: but the common people usually go bare-legged and bare-headed; and in some parts of Africa, as in Abissinia, none but the emperor himself, or those who are privileged to it by him, are allowed to wear any thing over their heads. But it is otherwise with the Arabs, especially those of the wandering class, who live at large, and whose Cheyks, or chiefs, and other distinguished officers, adorn their heads with red caps, incircled by several rounds of fine white cotton, in the fashion of a turban. These moreover wear over their e kaftans a sayk, or wide furtout, without sleeves, of white woollen cloth or serge, closely woven and napped, but with a long cape or capuchin, at the end of which is fastened behind a pretty long tuft or tassel, and is designed to be clapped over the turban in rainy or bad weather. When they are on horseback, they carry their weapons before them, across the saddle-bow, and only hold their zagay, or short lance, in their hand.

Turban and other ornaments.

Dress of the women of rank.

THEIR women wear long drawers, and shifts over them, with wide sleeves next their skin. These, among the Moors, are made of linen, but the Arabs seldom wear any but woollen, made in the form of a gauze of various colours, and the wide sleeves without any fold at the wrist. Those of the maidens are made of needle-work, striped with linen or silk, like those which the king's daughters among the Jews are said to have worn*. But when the women d are at home in private, they commonly throw off their sayks and drawers, and in their stead, only bind a towel about their loins and middle. Some Dowars, (or, as they are vulgarly called, hords) of Arabs, observe a superstitious custom; which is, that every bridegroom and bride are to put on one of those shifts above described, on the day of their nuptials, which are not to be pulled off, or washed, as long as they last†. Their kaftan is girt to their bodies with a sash or girdle, like that of the men, but commonly richer, and of greater variety of colours or embroidery; and, instead of a sayk, they wear a large mantle or robe, of a rich azure hue, which comes down to their feet. Their heads and hands, we observed before, are covered with a veil (O), their ears, neck, and breast, arms, wrists, and almost every finger, down quite to their very ankles, are adorned with rings of gold, silver, coral, ivory, amber, and other e materials. Among some of them, the rings that surround their ankles are embellished with little silver or brass bells, like those we put about the neck of a squirrel or lap-dog; and their feet are covered with the same red Morocco socks, or pumps, as those of the men‡. This must, however, be understood only of the women of the higher sort; for as to those of

* 2 Sam. xiii. 18.

† SHAW'S Travels, p. 293.

‡ DAPPER, LABAT, SHAW, & al. ubi sup.

(O) These veils are, in several parts of Africa, so contrived as to cover the whole head and shoulders behind, and to come down below the waist before, but have two small holes made opposite to the eyes, and serve those modest females to see their way as they go along; but, if they meet with any men in their way, they immediately turn their faces to the contrary side, that even that small portion of their face may be kept from their sight. It is not, therefore, a little surprising, that they should be so ambitious of such gaudy ornaments, and even of painting their faces, hands, arms, &c. to be seen only by their husbands and family. We are, indeed, told, that this practice of painting their faces and bodies is only in vogue among those of the lower rank, and perhaps to supply the want of more costly ornaments, which are out of their power to purchase. But it is likewise confessed, that those of higher classes are not above making use of some art to add to their natural charms.

Accordingly, we are told that they commonly make use of a certain paste, made up of pigeons dung, mixed with a quantity of saffron, and some other ingredients, to brighten the dulness of their swarthy complexions; as likewise of some sort of fucus to enliven the blackness of their hair and eye-brows. To this some will add a small round, triangular, or other figure, by way of contrast, which they paint between the eye-brows, or in some other parts of their forehead or cheeks, or that of an olive leaf upon each knee; and all this in order to render themselves more agreeable to their husbands, who, it seems, are as fond of those additional kinds of finery, as their poets are in commending and celebrating them in their panegyrical works (6).

- a meaner rank, they have nothing better to cover their bodies than a piece of cloth, which they wrap about their breast, and goes no lower than their knees, leaving the rest quite bare. As And of the meaner sort. for their ornaments, they are of the lowest value, consisting chiefly of fishes teeth, pieces of coral or glass, which serve them instead of pearls and diamonds, to adorn their hair with, over which they wear a veil, to cover their face and necks. To supply the want of more Paint their faces, &c. costly finery, which they know the men to be delighted with, they use a kind of paste mentioned in the last note, to mark not only their foreheads, cheeks, and chin, but their thighs and lower belly, with variety of figures; but as that sort of paint must be renewed every two or three days, those who cannot afford either time or cost for it, have a way of sinking those marks into the skin, by punctation, which renders them indelible<sup>2</sup>. Their diet is generally Their diet,
- b mean; their bread is either of millet, maize, or rice, made into cakes, either baked on the hearth, or fried in a pan. We have described their mortars, in which the women grind their grain into meal, by dint of labour; but some of the better sort have mills, made of two stones, one over the other, and turned either by hand, or, perhaps, by an ass; and their bread is made fresh every day, and brought hot to them.

THEIR drink is commonly water; but they brew likewise a kind of small liquor from rice, or millet of a coarser kind, mixed with some mares or camels milk a little soured; and from the same mixture they distil likewise, in some parts of Africa, a sort of strong spirit, not indeed with such stills as are in use with us, but with a clumsy sort, made either of earth, or of the rind of calabashes, but yet strong enough to intoxicate; though this the strict Moham-

c medans abstain from, as forbidden by their law. They eat fish and flesh of several kinds, but never of both sorts at one meal, nor in any large quantity: and this, most probably, is the reason why they are so healthy, strong, and lively, and free from chronic diseases, and generally live to 70 or 80 years. The greatest treat a man can give them, when they come into a town or village, is a quantity of oil and vinegar beaten together, and a hot cake dipped in it.

THEY are no less hospitable in their own habitations to strangers who come to them, and treat them in the best manner they can, and with singular courtesy; which is so much the easier for them to do, as their manner is as plain as their fare; for, from the greatest Cheyk to the lowest person, they use no other ceremony than washing their hands, after which they set themselves cross-legged around a mat, or, at best, a low table, upon which the dishes are placed, which, whether boiled or roasted, or of rice, or other spoon meat, are easily parted asunder with their hands, and without the help of knife or fork, whilst every one hath his handkerchief tied to his girdle to wipe his mouth and hands. Hospitality.

BUT as the Arabian people are dispersed through such a great variety of climates and soils, so their circumstances and way of living must greatly differ; and in some parts, as in the district of Barca, in Numidia, and Libya, they are so excessive poor, through the barrenness of the ground, that they have little else but dates, and some sorts of venison, to live upon, and are often obliged to sell their children to procure the necessaries of life. Yet even these do not abate one ace of their pride and high conceit of themselves, or from thinking themselves the noblest and happiest people under the sun, in spite of all their misery. Nor doth this hinder them from being more brave and courageous than the African natives, as likewise more active and industrious than they, in breeding vast quantities of cattle, especially barbs, Traffick of the Arabs. in which they traffick with the negroes. They likewise are much given to hunting various wild beasts, of which also they make a considerable gain. Some of them, even in those barren parts, addict themselves to the study of natural philosophy, rhetoric, and poetry; which last philosophy, poetry, &c. consists, like ours, in rhyme and numbers, smooth and agreeable enough; and their compositions of this kind chiefly run on the subject of their warlike exploits, their various chases, amours, and such-like subjects, which they set to suitable tunes, and sing or dance to the sound of their lutes, viols, drums, and other instruments<sup>a</sup>; the reader may see a specimen of their music and musical instruments in the author last quoted<sup>b</sup>. Songs and dances.

BUT neither this, nor physic, nor philosophy, arithmetic, &c. do any of the Arabs teach as a science. They have, indeed, persons who pretend to them, and, by their practice, seem, at least, to suppose some skill in nature or the mathematics; but all this is gained only by experience, habit, or custom, assisted by strength of memory and quick invention, which few of them want so much as they do application and encouragement to cultivate and improve them. With respect to such branches of the mathematics, such at least as relate to navigation, the Arabians who trade from the Arabias to the coasts of Abex, Ajan, and Zanguebar, were indeed found, from the first times of the Europeans doubling the Cape of Good Hope, to have had quadrants, compasses, astrolabes, and other helps, the inventions of former ages, by which they can steer along these coasts as well as to the Persic Gulph, and even to some parts of India, Study no branch of learning as a science.

<sup>2</sup> DAPPER, LABAT, SHAW, & al. ubi sup. Travel, & Miscellan. Observat. p. 268, & seq.

<sup>a</sup> MARMOL, ubi sup. lib. i. c. 32. DAPPER, SHAW'S

<sup>b</sup> Idem. ibid. p. 71, & seq.

and were reckoned some of the expertest pilots on these seas ; but as for those who live within the African coasts, and seldom traffick farther than from one kingdom to another, or at most to some of the islands adjacent, they are quite ignorant of them, and only steer from place to place by a kind of rote, which they can only gain by long practice <sup>c</sup>. Even physick, a science so well understood by many of their celebrated countrymen, and so necessary in a country so unhealthy in many places, and into which they came as strangers, is still more neglected among them than among the native Moors. It must be owned, that their being Mohammedans, and great sticklers for predestination, might inspire them with a contempt of it, seeing there is, according to them, no possible means of averting the divine will, which dispenses sickness and health, life and death, by an irreversible decree. This is, indeed, the doctrine of the Koran, and the practice of the ignorant bulk of the Turks, but from which the wiser part have, of late, much receded ; and accordingly we find a receipt against the plague recommended by Sidy Mohammed Zeroke, one of their most celebrated marabouts, and prefaced with these remarkable words : “ The lives of us all are in the hands of God, and when it is written we must die. However, it hath pleased him to save many persons from the plague, by taking, every morning while the infection rages, one pill or two of the following composition ; viz. of myrrh two parts, saffron one part, of aloes two parts, of syrup of myrtle berries q. s. <sup>d</sup>.”

Their great superstitions, engrossed by their cheating
marabouts.

BUT, with regard to the Mohammedans in Africa, whether Arabs or Moors, we have already observed, that they are so far from being strict observers of their law, that what their marabouts have introduced of it hither, is, in many respects, so maimed and defaced, and so blended with superstitious trash, that a true Mohammedan hardly deigns to own it to be that of his prophet <sup>e</sup>. Accordingly we find them place more confidence in their pretended wizards, conjurers, witches, charms, and other such senseless fooleries, in all sorts of distempers, whether by way of prevention or cure, than on any the most rational and experienced means ; to say nothing of their saints or marabouts, some of whom set up for great miracle-mongers, a privilege denied to their prophet ; and others for infallible diviners and divers into futurity ; but all of them alike arrant cheats, and so openly and impudently, so that one cannot enough wonder at the stupidity of the people, whom nothing can divert from having recourse to them in all exigencies of that or almost any other kind, though so often cheated, and always sure to be fleeced by them <sup>f</sup> ; for whether they succeed or not, kill or cure, they always make sure of their pay before-hand, and of some plausible evasion to stop their votaries mouths, let matters turn out as they will (P).

Some of the Arabs use physic, &c.

Their remedies for the rheumatism, gout,
&c.

HOWEVER, all the Arabs are not so far bewitched by their marabouts, but many of the wiser sort, especially in Barbary, and other parts of Africa, where they converse much with Europeans, have been excited to use such proper means as physick affords, instead of their superstitious and senseless charms ; and have adapted a kind of regular course of pharmacy for diseases, and surgery for wounds, sores, &c. In the first they deal chiefly in vegetables, and in the latter in outward applications, such as cataplasms, as hot as the patient can bear ; and, in some cases, as rheumatic or gouty pains, cauterising by red-hot needles ; but know little of phlebotomy, vomiting, purging, cupping, and other branches of physick and surgery. The cautery above-mentioned is made by seven punctures with a burning needle, on the parts affected, which must be repeated according to the strength of the patient, or stubbornness of the disease. A decoction of ground pine is their remedy against a fever, and a drachm or two of the root of birthwort against flatulent distempers ; the stone and gravel are effectually cured by the powdered root of arisarum ; and the bloody flux by the like quantity of the root of bookoka, dried in an oven, and powdered. They give little else in the small-pox than five or

<sup>c</sup> SHAW, MARMOL, DAPPER, & al.

<sup>f</sup> SHAW, ubi sup. DAPPER, & al. sup. citat.

<sup>d</sup> Id. ubi sup. p. 266.

<sup>e</sup> See before, p. 661, & seq.

(P) To give our readers one instance for all of this stupid superstition, and the methods by which those Charlatans cheat them out of their goods, if not of their lives ; they have filled their heads with a notion, that most diseases, or rather disasters which happen to them, are owing to some offence committed against the Jenoone (a sort of creature which the Mohammedans place between the angels and devils), and cannot, therefore, be removed without previously appeasing them by some proper sacrifice, such as that of a ram, sheep, goat, cock, or such other creature, as those jugglers are pleased to prescribe.

The method of doing this is likewise various ; sometimes the carcase is to be buried under ground ; sometimes the patient is to drink a draught of the blood, or to burn or scatter the feathers abroad, and the like, according to the nature of the distemper or disaster, the sex, quality, and circumstances, of the person, &c. or, to speak more justly, according to the pleasure of the cheating marabout, or circumstances of the patient (7). This notion so far prevails over most parts of Africa, and the marabouts, and other pretenders to this kind of witchcraft, are so powerful, that it is no wonder the people have every-where recourse to them, rather than to the use of proper remedies, except where a more intimate commerce with the Europeans hath experimentally convinced some of these ignorant people of the knavery and vanity of the one, and the efficacy of the other (8).

(7) Shaw's Travels, p. 306.

(8) Vid. Marmol. Afr. Davity, Labat, & al. sup. citat.

a six grains of alkermes, to force out the pustules, keeping the patient warm; and only use fresh butter to hinder the skin from pitting.

THEY have likewise introduced the inoculation of it among them, though in a much ruder way than that which we have elsewhere described to be in use among the Chinese<sup>h</sup>; for here the person receives the infection at a small wound made in the fleshy part of the hand, between the thumb and the forefinger, by means of two or three pustules taken from some infected friend, who is desired to exchange them with him for the like number of comfits, or other such trifles. But the zealous Mohammedans are great enemies to all sorts of inoculations of that distemper; and not only cry it down as an impious tempting of Providence, but tell a great number of frightful stories to deter the people from that practice.

b THEIR method of curing wounds received from sword or gun-shot is no less singular than painful, yet is affirmed to be attended with success; viz. by pouring melted butter into them boiling hot. As for bruises, swellings, inflammations, and other ailments of that kind, they commonly assuage them with the leaves of the Opuntia, or prickly pear, roasted in embers about a quarter of an hour, and applied to the part affected as hot as it can be borne. This application is likewise reckoned very proper to suppurate and mature boils, plague-sores, and other such tumours; and hath been likewise successfully used in the gout. In slight wounds, bruises, or inflammations, either to assuage them, or to harden and consolidate the parts, some use the powdered leaves of Albennab, made up into a pultice with warm water, which applied to the place, tinges the skin of a deep orange colour, which continues for some months; and what is still more surprising, impregnates the blood with it, so as, in one night, to give the urine a saffron hue. And thus much may suffice for the physic and surgery of the African Arabs<sup>i</sup>.

We have elsewhere observed that two out of the three classes are addicted to traffick of several kinds; from which one might reasonably conclude, that both numerical and algebraic arithmetic must flourish, whatever arts might be neglected, among them, seeing their ancestors are known to have furnished us with the characters of the former, and to have been the inventors of the latter, and both of them are so useful and necessary in commerce; and yet we do not find, amongst those who carry on the greatest share and variety of it, one in twenty thousand that understands even the first operations of either. However, they have, it seems, acquired such dexterity in addition and subtraction of large sums by dint of memory, that they have fallen into a kind of method of numeration, no less sure and expeditious than singular, which is by putting their hands into each other's sleeve, and touching each other with this or that finger, or with this or that particular point of it, each of them denoting a determinate sum or number; and in this way will transact affairs of the greatest consequence or value, without speaking a word on either side, or letting the bye-standers into the secret. Some of them, we are told, pretend, to such a profound skill in the combination of numbers, that they can compose charms by them to answer any desired end; but as we have no faith in such things, we think them not worth dwelling longer upon<sup>k</sup>. All the Arabs in Africa, whether they live in wandering camps or in towns and villages, whether free or tributary to some of the emperors or princes, are divided into tribes, or rather families, distinguished by the name of dowars; improperly termed by some, hords, hoards, adowards, &c. every one of which has its particular chief, or Cheyk; which word implies no more than an elder, doctor, or teacher; some of whom are so by election, and others hereditary. The Cheyk's tent is always known by its situation in the center of the dowar, and he by his shirt and other garments, which are commonly longer and finer than those of the rest, and his office is to rule over, judge, and take care of the peace and prosperity of his little commonality. These inferior Cheyks are subject to a higher, styled either Cheyk-el-kibbeer, or great lord or elder, or else Emeer, or prince, who hath a number of dowars, more or less, under him, according to the numerousness of the tribe over which he presides. These are they who command all the rest, order their expeditions, decampments, their rewards and punishments, decide their greater controversies, whether about the division of their plunder, or disputes amongst them. And those who are under tribute to any power, as under the kings of Morocco, the Dey of Algiers, or other princes, are they who are to levy it over their vassals, and have it ready against the time in which it becomes due. This part of their office is commonly one of the most difficult, because they are usually taxed so heavily that they cannot force their inferior dowars to raise it, without using some severities against them; and these are attended with great feuds and quarrels, and often end in blows and heart-burnings. And, on the other hand, if the tribute is not ready when the officers come for it, who are always escorted with a little flying army, the whole tribe undergoes a severe military execution; and perhaps the Cheyk Emeer is put in irons, and detained close prisoner, till all is paid, with interest; to avoid which extremities, they are often forced to abandon their habitations, and remove to some new ones, far enough out of the reach of their tyrannic masters; whilst the Scenite or wandering Arabs are not only free from such tributary exactions, but often oblige their neighbouring princes to buy their friendship by considerable yearly pensions<sup>1</sup>.

<sup>h</sup> See vol. iv. p. 651, & seq. & al.

<sup>i</sup> SHAW, ubi sup. p. 264. vid. & MARMOL, Afric. DAPPER, LABAT, & al. <sup>k</sup> De his, vid. SHAW, ubi sup. p. 267, & seq. & al. uti sup.

Their weapons and way of fighting.

THESE Cheyks go commonly armed with a short pike, or else with a javelin, which they hold in their hand; and are so expert at darting them, that they seldom if ever miss their mark, though riding on full gallop, and will kill a man at 50, or hit the middle of a plate at 40 paces distance. They also wear a cutlass hanging on the left arm, above their elbow, instead of a scymitar, and a quiver of arrows before them: and as they are expert at all sorts of military feats, so they are no less careful that all those under them be inured not only to the same exercises, but that they likewise train up their horses to them; so that the agility and address of the one, and the docility and fleetness of the other, whether at these exercises, or in attacking or retiring from an enemy, are justly admired by all the Europeans who have been eye-witnesses of them. Their pikes are commonly between 40 and 50 spans in length, well steeled at both ends, and these they couch upon their left arm, and wound at a good distance by the motion of their bodies; but the most dangerous blow is that which they strike whilst they retire, and when least aware of it. The best sort of those pikes are not made of ash or beech wood, but of the reol, a sort of wood very black and heavy, which is fetched from Libya, and is the most esteemed for its weight. Those who make use of these pikes are seldom seen to wear a shield, and despise the other defensatives of helmets and coats of mail, as cumbersome to their horses, and as a hindrance to their agility, and their frequent turning about. For the same reason they make no use of fire-arms, knowing neither how to use them on horseback, nor how to keep them in order, or from growing rusty and useless; and being themselves excessively fearful of the fire they make with them. This hath obliged some of their wiser Cheyks to procure musqueteers to intermix with them, in order to familiarize them to that way of fighting. But as we have elsewhere hinted<sup>m</sup>, they grew so soon out of order, that they readily exchanged them for their old weapons: and it is far from improbable that their wives, who usually go with them in their wars (and, as is pretended, in order to inspire them with the greater courage, though in reality to attend them in the meanest offices) and other casualties (Q), were equally, if not more, terrified with the strange effects of those arms, than their husbands, and might prove more forward in spoiling than in preserving them, in order to discourage the farther use of them. However that be, they are to be found but among few of their tribes, and they are returned to their old way of fighting, which is to fall on their enemies on all sides; and, if attacked the first, or find one side stronger than another, to disperse themselves to avoid their first volley, and then return to the charge with incredible celerity and fury; and it is in those feigned retreats, that they make the greatest execution against them who are unacquainted with their ways. Upon the whole, provided there be no fire-arms used against them, they plunge themselves in and out of their squadrons with equal swiftness and intrepidity. Therefore when they engaged Christians, or any other enemy who knew the use of them, they chiefly aimed at wounding or killing their horses, as well knowing that their armour was proof against their weapons. But since that hath been in a great measure left off, and they have been more inured to guns and muskets, they have here also resumed their old way of fighting, and practise it with good success. Upon the whole, they are so inured to this warlike trade from their infancy, that they look upon it as their chiefest bliss, and pursue it with a kind of natural intrepidity and bravery; and are so far persuaded that Providence ordained it for them, that they never begin an expedition or an attack, nor indeed any other of their daily employments, without repeating, with great seri-

Manner of wounding.

Fear of firearms.

Their wives go with them to war.

Old way of fighting the Christians.

<sup>1</sup> De his, vid. auct. sup. citat. Travels, & al. sup. citat.

<sup>m</sup> See before, p. 667, & (L). LABAT, Relat. d'Afrique. SHAW'S

(Q) It may not be a little surprising that these plundering tribes should chuse to incumber themselves with their numerous families upon such occasions, which adds so much to all their other lumber, and must greatly retard the speed of their excursions; but it must be considered that their females are so perfectly well inured to this trade, as to take the most slavish part upon themselves, and make every thing easy for their husbands to mount and ride away; they dress and saddle their horses, lade the camels with their tents and utensils, and especially with the large panniers, which carry their children and themselves. These are large enough for them to sit or lie in conveniently, and so compact and closely covered as to keep them from heat, wind, and rain. Those who abound in slaves have no farther business than to direct them to the drudgery, and the rest readily submit themselves to it, as having no place of safety but in their camps. Custom hath inured them, and use perfected them in it; and a constant practice of so many thousand years hath enabled them to find out the most expeditious ways to pursue a life which they so firmly believe was decreed for them by Providence, that they stigmatize and abhor all those of their seed, who exchange it for a more civil one, as so many renegadoes and apostates (9).

(9) See Genesis xvi. 12, & seq. Anc. Hist. vol. vii. p. 244, & seq. Additions to the Anc. Hist. p. 261, & seq. & auct. sup. citat.

<sup>a</sup> ousness and reverence, the words Bish-Millab, In the name of God; nor conclude any, especially if successfully, without crying out, in the same devout tone, Almandi'llah, God be praised <sup>k</sup>.

NEXT to their warlike expeditions, their chief and most delightful occupation is hunting Chief divers- and racing, at both which they are no less expert and inured, having little or no relish for sions. domestic affairs. and being rarely known to converse with their wives or children, but placing their chief satisfaction in being on horseback, and at a distance from home; so that whenever they are deprived of any of these excursions or pastimes abroad, the time goes sluggishly on with them, and is spent in smoking their pipes, or reposing themselves under some neighbouring shade, and entertaining themselves with the idle chat of their own exploits. What <sup>b</sup> we have said, however, concerning their averseness to family cares, doth not set them above some of them, which we should reckon of the menial kind, though indeed much fitter for them than for their wives; in which cases they are no longer esteemed disgraceful. Thus the haughtiest Cheyk, or prince, will no more scruple to go and fetch a lamb from the flock, to kill, skin, and dress it fit for the kitchen, than his princess doth to fetch firing and other necessities to cook it up for him.

WHEN they agree upon the hunting of the lion, the whole dower or district is summoned to appear; who forming themselves into a circle, inclose a space of three or four Hunting the lion. miles in compass, according to the quality of the ground, or number of the people, some on foot and some on horseback. The business of the former is to advance first, and into the <sup>c</sup> thickets, with their hounds and spears to rouse the game; whilst the horsemen, keeping at some distance behind, are ready to charge upon the first sally of the wild beast. In this manner they proceed, and still contract their circle, till they either come to close all together, or meet with something to prevent them from it. This sport frequently affords variety of pastime, from the different kinds of animals which are contained within that circle; so that they are often in chace after hares, jackalls, hyenas, and others of the wild kind. As to the lion that is roused up with them, it is, we are told, the nature of that fierce animal, on such occasions, to seize on the nearest person, and hold him fast till he is either cut in pieces, or shot to death <sup>l</sup>.

ANOTHER of their pastimes is hawking; the country not only affording great plenty of Hawking. that kind of game, but likewise variety of hawks and falcons, which they breed up to that sport in their own peculiar way; for they do not there make use of dogs to spring the game, but of a piece of oblong canvass stretched out upon two reeds, in the shape of a door, behind which they conceal themselves from it, and walk through the several brakes and avenues to the place where they expect to find it. The canvass is either spotted or painted in the figure of a leopard, and a little below the top is one or more holes, through which the sportsman sees what passes before him; at the approach of which the woodcock, partridge, and other gregarious birds, will, though at ever so great a distance before, covey together; whilst the quail and other kinds which go not in flocks, will only stand still and stare, and are easily shot. Others have a more laborious method of catching partridges in great numbers; Manner of killing partridges. <sup>e</sup> for observing, that the oftner and more hastily they are sprung, the more weary and languid they grow, they swiftly rush upon and knock them down with their zervaties, or short truncheons <sup>m</sup> (R).

ANOTHER of their pastimes is, for one dower to go in a body to visit another, or one Arab to visit another. In these cases they still use many of the antient ceremonies and compliments which we read were in use among the antient patriarchs; such as bringing of water Manner of visiting and entertaining each other. to wash their feet, giving each other the Shalom, or peace <sup>n</sup>, to entertain their guests in the best manner they can, and to stand and wait upon, instead of sitting down at table with them; and to enquire after the welfare of each other's families, and every individual belonging to them <sup>o</sup>. But in this last particular the Arabs exceed them in courtesy, so far that they <sup>f</sup> will not disdain to enquire after the welfare of their servants, domestic animals, flocks, herds, poultry, &c. whether their dogs are watchful of their charge, keep away the foxes from their hen-roosts, give notice of the approach of lions and other ravenous beasts; whether their cats still wage a faithful war against mice, rats, serpents, and other vermin, &c. and

<sup>k</sup> SHAW, ubi sup. & al. sup. citat.
ibid.

<sup>l</sup> Ibid. ubi sup. p. 299, & al. sup. citat.
<sup>n</sup> De his, vid. Genesis xviii 4, & seq. xix. 2. xxiv. 32. xliii. 27, & seq. & alib. pass.

<sup>m</sup> SHAW,
<sup>o</sup> 2 Samuel

(R) These short sticks are commonly used by those Arabs who are either ignorant of the use of fire-arms, or are not able to purchase them. They are bound round at each end with iron, and inlaid with pewter or brass, and serve alike either for these kind of sports; or instead of an offensive weapon, like the Σκηπτρα of the antients (10).

(10) Shaw's Travels, p. 303. sub not. 2.

many more of the like nature : and at parting express the same good wishes for the welfare of them all. a

Their marriages.

Their wives bought.

How conducted to their new home

Their reception and office there.

THEIR marriages differ but little from those of the Moors, already described<sup>p</sup>; and are little else than a downright bargain between the father of the future bride and her future husband. They consist chiefly in paying so many camels, horses, sheep, and cows, which make up the main part of their wealth, by the latter to the former. As soon as that is concluded, the young man is allowed to visit his future bride, in her own separate tent, where she is ready to receive him, in the best apparel and ornaments she can afford. Here her father discloses the matter to her; and, among other inducements, acquaints her with the number of cattle he hath engaged to pay for the possession of her; to which he makes answer, that a prudent and virtuous wife can never be too dearly bought. Among some of them he is not even permitted to see her till he hath paid the full price; so that he is obliged to rely on the report which his mother or some female relation makes of her. If she doth not answer his expectations, he may indeed divorce her; but he must then forfeit all that he hath paid for her purchase, which still falls heavier upon the purchaser; but, at the same time, shews that the parents know much better than we in Europe how to set a true value upon their daughters, instead of parting with such vast sums as we do to get rid of them. This is likewise a relic of the antient patriarchal way of marrying; which they farther imitate in making of presents both to the bride, and to some of her near relations, if not of jewels and costly ornaments, yet of such as their circumstances will admit of, over and above the stipulated price. After these articles have been thus far performed, the bride still continues some time with her father, where she receives the congratulations and good wishes of her female friends; after which she is conducted by them to her new spouse, either on horseback, or in a sedan, carried between two camels, with loud acclamations and songs. There she is received in by his female relations, in the same joyful strain and good wishes. Upon her alighting, a stick is put into her hand, which she sticks as deep into the ground as she can, in token, that, as it cannot be removed without some hand to pluck it up, so she will not abandon her husband, unless he divorce her from him. From thence she is immediately hurried away to the herds, where she is set to milk some of the camels or cows, dress some of the horses, or perform some other branches of family duty, before she is admitted into her tent. When she hath performed all these first essays, she is introduced into it, and there received by her spouse in the best and kindest manner, and doth not stir out of it, nor uncover her face before any but him, till the first month is over; after which she enters into the family business, like the rest of the good Arabian wives<sup>q</sup>. b

WE omit several other trifling ceremonies of a superstitious nature, which are more or less numerous and various among them, in several parts of Africa, according as they retain more or less of their antient heathenism, or have imbibed new ones by being blended with the natives of the country, especially the idolatrous part of it. And for the same reason we shall pass over that variety of other no less impertinent ones which are used more less at their funerals, as charms, and other senseless witcheries, which are used not only after their deaths, but during their sickness, by their marabouts and other pretended conjurers; and only take notice of such as are in use among the more serious and strict Mohammedans; and these are but few. First of all, when any one Arab dies, all the women who inhabit that tent or hut alarm the whole dower with their loud outcries and lamentations, and are quickly joined in the same hideous chorus by the rest of the females belonging to it. All this while those of near kin to the deceased are busying themselves within with washing the body, and dressing it in a decent manner; and others sing the praises of the defunct in so mournful a tone, and with such floods of tears, as if they were most sensibly affected with the loss. To behold the whole ceremony of howling, weeping, clapping of hands, beating of breasts, tearing of hair, haggard looks, contortions of the body, &c. one would be apt to imagine that the whole female dower was plunged into the deepest grief; yet is all this meer custom and grimace, to which they are so inured from their childhood, that they can, with the greatest ease, pass from acting the deepest scenes of mourning to one of the greatest jollity and mirth. From which some judicious persons have been induced to conclude, that the bloody custom of obliging the wives of the deceased to follow their husbands into the other world (which is still in vogue in some of the inland parts of Africa, as well as in India, but hath been in a great measure abolished by the Mahammedans, where-ever they have been settled) had its birth, and was intended to turn the mock-farce of a sham mourning into a real one. As to the men, even the nearest relations to the deceased, whatever their inward grief may be, they are above expressing it in any other way than a grave and composed behaviour; and in this silent guise they follow the corpse to some neighbouring eminence, where, having dug a grave, c

Funeral obsequies.

Mourning of the women;

a mere sham.

<sup>p</sup> See before, p. 665, & seq.

<sup>q</sup> LEO, GRAMMAY, DAPPER, LAEAT, & al.

a they deposit it, and cover it with earth; after which they rear a heap of stones over it, which serves at once for a monument, and a defence from carnivorous beasts<sup>r</sup>.

Thus much may suffice with respect to the wandering Arabs; all that need be added is, Why they have no mosks. that though they are almost all Mohammedans, yet they have not, that we can find, any mosks through all this vast continent; and indeed, considering their frequent removing from place to place, it would be very inconvenient for them to have any portable ones large enough to serve the whole dower; and they think their own tents and concomitant lumber incumbent-rance sufficient to dispense them from it. For which reason they content themselves with saying their prayers in their tents, after having first washed themselves as usual, where water can be had, or, where that fails, rubbed themselves all over with sand or dust. This shews, how-<sup>Not careful of their religious duties.</sup> ever, their zeal and sincerity in performing those duties of their religion in the best way they can, rather than omit them for want of water or a mosk. The case, however, is otherwise with the two other classes, already spoken of, who live in towns and villages, and want neither the one nor the other, and are employed either in trade or commerce, or follow agriculture and breeding of cattle; for these, especially the latter, who are commonly seated along the rivers for the sake of commerce as well as pasturage, have every where their synagogues, and opportunity of vacating on their religious duties. And yet it is a question whether these or the other class, which may be more properly stiled merchants, are so zealous observers of their law as those of the wandering kind, who live mostly on rapine. It is true, indeed, that the mercantile class is no less given to motion, though on different errands, and travels as much from one kingdom to another, in quest of gain, as the other doth after plunder. Their favourite traffick is that of gold; of which they are the more greedy, as the natives do not suffer them to settle where there are any mines of that precious metal; and as the Europeans, with whom they traffick, are very careful not to bring any to them; for which reason they are content to undertake the longest and most difficult, as well as dangerous, voyages into the kingdoms of Tambut, Galaam, Gago, &c. where it is found in great plenty, and exchanged with the inhabitants for cloaths, trinkets, iron and brass tools and utensils, and other commodities of small value. They scruple not to carry it off by main force, where they are strong enough, and even the very owners themselves, and sell them for slaves. So that, in the main, their intentions on this kind of traffick are not one jot honefter than those of their wandering brethren, d for they are equally ready to trade or plunder, as occasion offers; and are as arrant Arabs as they. If there be any difference between them, it is only this, that the one is of a more martial and fierce disposition, the other more sordid and greedy after gain, and will submit to the lowest arts, or undergo the greatest fatigues and dangers, to procure it.

To give our readers one instance for all of this last species, we need but subjoin here a short specimen of this one branch of traffick, which they carry on with the kingdoms above-men-<sup>Difficulties attending the Arabian caravans.</sup> tioned, and of the hazards and difficulties which attend the performance of that long journey. 1st. It is computed to be between 6 and 700 leagues long, and those leagues far from being of the shortest. 2<sup>dly</sup>. It lies through a vast sandy desert, from the moveableness of the sand stiled also the sandy sea, near 200 leagues in length, and in which no water is to be found, e except in two places, and in very deep wells, very often choaked up with sand; which being, with great difficulty and labour dug out, the water at the bottom comes up so brackish, and so unpleasant and unwholsome, that nothing but mere necessity, and the unavoidable danger of perishing through excessive thirst, can make it go down; even their very camels, the only beast of burthen that is fit for such journies, are satiated with it before they have drank half their fill (S). 3<sup>dly</sup>. These wells are very difficult to be found, and, if missed or passed over, a number

<sup>r</sup> Idem ibid.

(S) These useful creatures (which the Africans stile the riches of heaven, for so Marmol tells us their name imports, and, one may add, the riches of Africa, since they reckon a man's wealth by the number of camels he is master of) seem designed by Providence for the use of these hot and dry climates, and are not only adapted by nature, but inured by art, both to bear the greatest burthens, heats, and fatigues, but that which is the greatest of all, hunger and thirst. We shall shew, in the sequel of this African history, by what arts they are trained up from colts to this useful yet miserable drudgery; inasmuch that they will go a whole fortnight, some say three weeks, or a month, or even longer, with a burden of 600 lb. weight on their backs, without a drop of water, or any other sustenance than a few coarse dates given to them once in three or four days.

In this part of Africa, where they are bred in great plenty, and bought at a moderate price, the Arabs are so inhuman to them, as to deny them their necessary allowance, even where it can be easily had, out of mere covetousness; not caring what they make them suffer during their journey, nor how soon they drop down dead with hunger and labour, so it be not before they have got to their journey's end. Neither are they over-solicitous if any doth so, as it often happens; in which case they only divide his burthen among five or six of his companions. So that by that time they reach the place to which they are bound, they are so emaciated and unfit for further service, that nobody will give any thing for them; and all the recompence they have for their gainful service, is to be turned off to starve and rot above ground. There is still one useful excellency which this creature is endued with by nature, a number of people must be dispatched backward and forward, as well as to the right and left, to find them out, or the whole caravan must inevitably perish. To avoid which, they are obliged to steer by the compass, as is done at sea, and with much greater caution, and be provided with expert land pilots, who are well acquainted with that route.

Danger from tempests and quicksands.

BUT the most dreadful of all dangers, is the frequent tempests with which this sandy sea is equally agitated as the ocean, and are occasioned by vehement winds, which raise and whirl the sand to such a height and length, as often overwhelms a whole caravan, and buries them alive beyond all possible recovery. To avoid which, the Arabs take care to chuse the most gentle seasons, and such as long experience hath taught are least liable to these furious whirlwinds; that is, a month before and after the two solstices; but never venture at those of the two equinoxes, when these winds are observed to rage most.

Places where they trade.

THOSE rich and opulent kingdoms above-mentioned have been hitherto unknown, not only to the Europeans, but in a great measure also to the Africans, or to any but the Arabians, who are too sordid and reserved in matters of self-interest to give the least intelligence either about them, or the way that leads to them. One thing we may be sure of is, that the traffick with them must be very considerable, to answer such a long and fatiguing voyage, and the vast risks and dangers of it. Accordingly we are told, that they bring away great quantities of gold, besides ivory of the whitest kind, bezoar, civet, and a great number of slaves, whom they load homeward with those commodities, instead of their camels, which they leave behind to starve at large. In exchange for those valuables, they carry thither vast quantities of salt, which those kingdoms very much want, besides cloaths, and a great variety of trinkets, which they traffick for with the Europeans. And we are farther told, that the Arabs settled along the southern coasts, carry on much the same gainful trade with the inland kingdoms on that side; the inhabitants of them being either too proud or indolent to stir out of their country on any such errand, as long as they can have those European commodities brought to them from other parts of Africa (T). What we have been speaking of concerning the above-mentioned caravan, relates indeed chiefly to the Arabians settled in Barbary and Morocco; but we shall find them every-where over all Africa equally immersed in the mercantile way, and travelling far and near in it to enrich themselves by the same fraudulent artifices, sticking at nothing that brings them gain; and, like the rest of their brethren, scorning to procure it by fair, if they can any how do it by foul means. In one thing, however, they are very scrupulous, that though they drive such a large commerce in slaves, yet they will never part with any of them to the Europeans. Their reason for it is, that they look upon them as infidels, to whom, they think, it would be the greatest cruelty to sell a Mohammedan, though at ever so high a price. This scruple, which is so detrimental to that branch of the African traffick, all the merchants in that kind of commodity have often tried all their wit and address to cure them of, but all hitherto in vain.

Nature and gaintubels of their traffick.

Indolence of the people.

* LABAT, ubi sup. LEO, MARMOL, GRAMMAY, DAPPER, & al. plur.

nature, in order to enable it to go so long without drinking; namely, a kind of reservoir, which contains all the water which he drinks, and dispenses it so gradually, and by small quantities, to the other parts of the body, as to keep it still fresh and active, yet so as not to be exhausted, as it is in other creatures, in less than 12 or 15 days. But this likewise proves often the cause of its death; for when their Arabian masters find themselves in great want of it, they make no scruple to butcher them to come at it, and quench their thirst with what is left of it (10).

(T) It will not be thought, we hope, an unseasonable digression to observe here, that it was with a view to that advantageous trade that our English company settled at first on the river Gambia, not doubting but it had such a communication with the Niger or Senega, as would open them a way to some of those golden countries. The project, how well concerted soever, proved impracticable on several accounts, which we shall barely hint. One was the excessive heats which reigned all the way, as well as the vast number of trees which grew on both sides of the river, and so stagnated the air, that there was no possibility of living in it, and their men died so fast that they were forced to abandon the enterprize.

The next was the bloody opposition they met with from the Moors on both sides of that river, who were stirred up to it by some Portuguese mulattos, settled all that way amongst them, and dreaded the detriment which this new project, if successful, would occasion to their own trade. So that the English were continually exposed to the shots of the enemy, who lay in covert ambush, on both sides; and had no sooner made their discharge, than they fall flat on their bellies, to avoid the fire of their musquetry.

But the greatest obstacle of all was that of the river itself, and the impossibility of rowing against its rapid stream, or of making their way through some shallows, where it was quite choaked up with rushes, flags, and other such insurmountable impediments. All which forced them back again to their small island of St. James on that river, and content themselves with what traffick they could obtain there from the negroes, who brought to them thither gold dust, elephants teeth, slaves, hides, gums, and other commodities of less value; or with what themselves fetch from a place called Baracotta, which lieth a little higher up the same river, and where the Mandingo negroes barter much the same merchandizes with them (11).

(10) Marmol, Dapper, Labat, & al. sup. citat. Linjchot. Labat, & al. sup. citat.

(11) Id. ibid. vid. & Hackluyt, Leo Africanus, & al.

a THERE is yet another branch ; viz. that of ivory, which these Arabs abstain from, out of Elphants, a superstitious notion, instilled into them by their pharisaical marabouts, that the touch of any <sup>which is spared</sup> part of that dead animal causes a legal defilement. On which account they never attempt to <sup>by the Arabs.</sup> kill them, but let them range at liberty in numerous droves, without molesting them ; unless, as they frequently are apt to do, they break into their sown fields, before they have got in their harvest ; and even then content themselves with driving them out with lighted straw, which frights them away, without doing them any other harm. This notion, ridiculous as it is, prevents the great destruction which would otherwise be made of that noble animal, and the exportation of so great a quantity of their teeth, as well as of the African slaves. But this is all abundantly made up by the negroes, Moors, and other natives, who, being less scrupulous

b in such matters, destroy myriads of the former in a year, and live partly on their flesh, and make no conscience to sell their countrymen, and even relations, to the Christians, though they look upon that state as the most dreadful and miserable that can happen to them in this life ; it being a common notion deeply rooted amongst them, that the Europeans buy them to fatten and feast on, and afterwards burn their bones, and make charms and other witcheries with them, in order to procure larger yearly supplies of them *.

HAVING now given an account of what is most worthy notice with relation to the African <sup>Africa famed</sup> natives, as well as Arabs, we shall next take a short review of the various kinds of animals <sup>for wild</sup> which this country produces, beyond any of the other three parts of the world, it being, from <sup>beasts.</sup> the remotest times, famed on account of its dry and sandy soil, and scarcity of water, and c for nourishing a much greater quantity and variety of animals of the monstrous kind, than any other in the world. We shall, however, be readily excused by our readers from entering into an enquiry how far the causes Pliny and other naturalists have assigned for such unnatural births will stand the test of reason and experience, as well as from examining whether the half of what we read concerning them be really fact or not ; such enquiries, how useful and curious soever, would carry us beyond our stated bounds, and are more properly the business of naturalists. Ours, therefore, shall be chiefly to give a succinct account of the animal productions of the country, which are peculiar to it, or have any thing remarkable above those of other parts of the world : and herein, to avoid needless repetitions, we shall

d confine ourselves to a general account of them in this place, and defer the farther description of such, as either for their curiosity deserve, or for their strangeness require, a particular one, to those countries in which they either most abound or excel. And the same method we shall observe with relation to mountains, rivers, lakes, and other particulars of this large continent.

WE begin with their tame quadrupeds, of which there is a great abundance, not only of <sup>Tame beasts.</sup> those which are to be found in Europe and Asia, and in much more numerous herds, but in many parts of Africa likewise, much larger, stronger, fatter, and better relished, than ours, particularly the bulls, oxen, cows, sheep, goats, and deer. Their horses are indeed smaller, but <sup>Their horses</sup> finely shaped, fleet, and of variety of beautiful colours. Some authors have questioned <sup>excellent.</sup> whether these last were natives of Africa, or only brought thither since the coming of the e Arabs into these parts. These are indeed the best breeders and expertest masters in breaking and riding of them ; but from the great multitudes and variety that run wild in many parts of the country, where those Arabs have not yet penetrated, one would be apt to conclude, that the natives had them long before that time ; though those of the Arabs, especially the barbs, are by far the finest and most esteemed, not by them only, but by strangers of every country. They exceed in swiftness all other creatures, except the dant, or as the Arabs call it, lant, a wild beast, of which we shall speak in the sequel ; and some even this ; and when they do, the owners hardly know how to set a sufficient value upon them.

THE camel, though not peculiar to Africa, is one of the most useful and necessary animals <sup>Camels, their</sup> in it, not only on account of the great loads it is able to carry above other beasts of burden, <sup>usefulness.</sup> but for its singular tractableness, patience, and abstinence, being brought up to travel some months together, through the hottest sands and barren deserts, with their heavy burthens, and with so small a sustenance of either food or water, as no other living creature can do. Without their help, their vast commerce, which is carried on from one place to another in large caravans, must soon be at an end ; without them, the wild Arabs would neither be able to remove their families, habitations, and lumber, so frequently, or so far as they commonly do ; and many other branches of their service would the natives of those hot climates be deprived of in peace, as well as in war ; for in this respect we have elsewhere seen them trained up so as to supply the want even of artillery *. We shall not take up our readers time with the description of this most useful animal, as its shape and size are sufficiently known from other works of this nature ; and we shall have so frequent occasion to speak of its singular use u See before, p. 69, & seq.

* De hoc, vide CAVAZ. Congo, lib. ii. p. 54, & seq. & al. sup. citat. PIGAFET, & al. ubi sup.

* LEO AFRICANUS, MARMOL,

x Ibid. vol. ii. p. 660.

and laborious services through the course of this African history, not only as a beast of burden, <sup>a</sup> but on account of their milk, which yields an excellent drink, and of their flesh, which is the chief food of the natives, especially of the Arabs <sup>1</sup>. They are commonly long-lived, some say as far as to 100 years, if not abused, as they too frequently are by their inhuman owners <sup>2</sup>. Other curious, though less momentous, particulars relating to them, the reader may see in the margin (U).

Dromedaries,
used for swiftness.

THE dromedary, a smaller and slimmer species of camel, is no less useful a creature for its swiftness, than the other for its carriage, and is commonly used for expedition; they being affirmed to travel forty leagues per day, for ten days together, with the smallest pittance of barley and water; on all which accounts it is called by that name, and chiefly used for speedy travelling. It hath, moreover, a back suited for that purpose; that is, one, and some two, <sup>b</sup> bunches of soft long hair, which are a kind of natural saddle for the rider, and its legs of a proper length for clearing a good deal of ground in a little time. It hath no hoofs on its feet, but a broad foot, fenced by a thick skin, which becomes harder with travelling, and renders that animal the more sure-footed. Their common height is between seven or eight feet from the bottom of the fore feet to the crown of the head. Their skin is sleek, and hair smooth; they can bear hunger, thirst, and long fatigues; and, when they come to the water, which they commonly take care to trouble with their feet, they take in such plenty of it, as will serve them eight, ten, or more days; and if we may believe some authors, to quench the thirst of their riders in case of necessity (X).

Horses.

Fine breed of
barbs.

THE next useful and profitable kind of animals, is that of their horses, with which several <sup>c</sup> parts of Africa abound, and which the Arabs, in particular, breed in vast numbers. They are commonly distinguished amongst us by the name of Barbs, because first brought into Europe from the coasts of Barbary. They are originally natives of Arabia; though beautiful and fleet, strong and serviceable, yet were left to run wild in the woods in numerous droves, till the Arabs first broke them to the bit, and, among other countries in their neighbourhood, stocked the greatest part of this with them, where they have been in great esteem both for their beauty and usefulness ever since, whether for riding, hunting, warring, or coursing, but chiefly for their fleetness in the two last; insomuch, that Xenophon tells his Cyrus, that, when any of these coursers was arrived to such a height as to be able to out-run the dant, or <sup>d</sup> lant, or to overtake an ostrich, he was usually sold for 1000 gold ducats, or bartered for 100 common camels; the experiment of which was usually tried at their races or public markets. One method among the rest which the Arabs use to bring them to that extraordinary pitch of swiftness is, by feeding them morning and evening with camels milk, and that only in such a quantity as will give strength and agility to their limbs, without incumbering them with a superfluous weight of flesh. They likewise send them into pasture, as soon as the grass is full grown, and leave them there about two months, during which time they never get upon their backs <sup>2</sup>. What wild horses there are in Africa are of too fleet a nature to be caught in the common hunting way. These, therefore, which however are not very

Wild horses.

<sup>1</sup> De his, vide LEO AFRICANUS, lib. ix. MARMOL Afrig. lib. i. c. 14 & 23. DAVITY, DAPPER, LABAT, & al. <sup>2</sup> Ibid. ubi sup. <sup>3</sup> LEO AFRICANUS, MARMOL, RAMUS. DAPPER, LABAT, & al.

(U) It is allowed that the camels of Africa are by far preferable and more useful than those of Asia, on many accounts, as their largeness, strength, and particularly their being able to travel forty, fifty, or even sixty days with little, or even without food. They are likewise very tractable and submissive under the burden, but vindictive when ill used, and will watch an opportunity of repaying the injury with an unexpected kick or grievous bite.

The method the natives take to rear them up to that slavish service is no less singular. As soon as the colt is foaled, they take him reeking warm from the dam, and lay him flat, with his fore feet bent under his belly, upon a carpet, and wrap him up close in it, adding gradually some weight upon his back; by which means he is easily reared up to receive his burden, in that posture, by touching his knees with a stick. In order to inure them to hunger and thirst, they at first keep them from sucking a whole day, then two, three, and so on to eight or ten days, and practise the same method when weaned, by keeping them from their usual food and drink, and teaching them to receive a daily increase of weight upon their backs, and resting under it upon their bellies, till they become fit for business, that is, for carrying heavy burdens through long journeys, and barren burning sands, with the smallest, and sometimes without any, sustenance; and to carry a burden of 600, 700, and some even to 1000 and 1200 weight (12).

No less singular is the method by which they breed them up likewise for diversion, and teach them to dance to the sound of the tabor or pipe, by bringing them, whilst young colts, into a kind of stove, made hot for the purpose, where the floor burning their feet, they skip and dance about, now on one foot, now on another, then on their knees; all this while the tabor or pipe playing some tune; by which means they are gradually inured, when they hear the same instrument play, on the cold ground, to dance to the tune it plays, and observe the cadence of it with surprising exactness and agility (13).

(X) This is done, we are told, by opening a hole in their paunch, which is composed of four ventricles, and at the bottom of each are about twenty inlets into so many partitions, which extend themselves still farther, like so many bags, and serve as a reservoir in which they carry this their watry provision.

(12) Idem ibid. Davity, Ramusio, Dapper, & al. mult.

(13) Leo Afr. lib. ix. & al. ubi sup.

a numerous, the wild Arabs have a way of catching alive by gins and traps laid in the sand, into which they drive them out of the woods, not so much with a view of breaking them for use, as to feast upon their flesh, which they esteem a delicious bit, especially when young and plump; by which means they prevent their multiplying too fast upon them, and devouring the pasture, which should serve for their own cattle<sup>b</sup>.

OTHER domestic animals, such as bulls and cows, asses, sheep, goats, &c. are here also in great plenty and variety, but need not be dwelt upon; we shall only observe, that their larger kind is much smaller, and their small much larger than ours in proportion. One large kind of cows they have, especially in Egypt, without any hair, with long tails trailing on the ground, and necks spotted and streaked with various colours. Their sheep are large, and one sort of them have those long and fleshy tails, which, as we have taken notice of in some parts of Asia, weigh between 20 and 30 pounds. That which they call Adin-naim is of the bigness of a common ass, and with long ears hanging down. The males are without horns, but the females have them of various sizes and shapes. These are much esteemed by the Libyans on account of the plenty of milk they give, of which they make their cheese and butter, and common drink. Their wool, though short, is good and serviceable. Both males and females are exceeding tame and gentle, and some of them strong enough to carry a man on their backs. Among their great variety of goats, they have that kind which breeds the true bezoar, or, according to other authors, the musk; but they disagree so much in their description, that we may justly call both in question. But whether fact or no, the creatures which bear both the one and the other are of the wild, and not of the tame and domestic, kind we are now upon; and to which we shall only add, that among these there are many that run wild in the woods and deserts. There are wild bulls and cows, horses and asses, goats, &c. down to the very dog kind, of which there is a sort of as dangerous and destructive a nature as any of the wolf, tiger, or leopard kind, as we shall see in our progress through this part of the globe. It is with the same view that we omit some others of the same tame kind, which, though of no less curious a nature than those we have spoken of, yet being peculiar to certain parts and kingdoms of it, may be more properly mentioned in our description of their native soil.

d We come now to speak of those of the wild, voracious, and destructive kinds, of which this country produces a still larger quantity, and greater variety. At the head of these we may justly place the Elephant, that noble and excellent creature, which, in our course through the Asiatic history, we have had so frequent occasion to celebrate, as much for its surprising qualities of sense, docility, courage, and usefulness, as for its superior strength and size, above all other quadrupeds<sup>c</sup>; but in every part of this vast country, and variety of nations, is found to be as wild, ferocious, and destructive, as any of the savage kind: none of the African inhabitants, whether Arabs, natives, or strangers, having so much as attempted to tame and render them as serviceable as the Chinese and other polite Indian nations have done, instead of letting them continue such a dreadful and devouring nuisance where-ever they are. Infomuch that, if we except some few that are brought up tame in the empire of Abissinia, and that rather out of curiosity and grandeur than use, whilst they leave all the rest to range and ravage their lands and harvests, they are there and every-where dreaded, and treated as the most dangerous and destructive of the whole savage species; and no wonder, considering how much the greatest part of these Africans naturally partake of, and many of them even exceed those animals in their ferocity, and can hardly look upon them in any other light than as reciprocal objects of their prey, nor be intent on any thing else than destroying them, and making all possible reprisals on them, for their horrid devastations, by feeding on their flesh, and making a traffick of their spoils; so that myriads of them are yearly destroyed within that vast continent, even by the confession of the inhabitants; which is farther confirmed by the immense quantities of ivory which are yearly exported into India and Europe, from all the African coasts, as we shall have occasion to shew in our progress through them. So that this noble creature, so justly admired for its excellent qualities in the eastern parts of the world, is only remarkable in this for its savage and mischievous nature, and the vast slaughter which is made of them, where-ever they herd; unless we add, that they are here much larger, taller, and stronger than those of India<sup>d</sup>; and those of Abissinia, Kongo, and the Cape of Good Hope, are the biggest in all Africa (Y).

WE

<sup>b</sup> Idem ibid. <sup>c</sup> See before, vol. ii. p. 545, 546. vol. iii. p. 267, 713, & alib. pass. <sup>d</sup> De his, vide LEO AFRICANUS, lib. ix. MARMOL, lib. i. c. 23. RAMUS, vol. i. pass. PURCHAS, DAVITY, DAPPER, & al. plur.

(Y) We have added Kongo to the two other countries, known some of them the breadth of whose hoof measured seven spans, or three feet and eight inches; so on the authority of F. CAVAZZI, who resided a considerable time in those parts, and tells us, that he had that if the rest of the body bore a due proportion to it, it

WE shall not trouble our readers with a farther description of this noble animal, which is by this time so well known, by one way or other, to most Europeans; but conclude our account of them with two remarks, the one concerning their ferocity, and the other concerning their slow and unwieldy motion; viz. 1st. That whatever devastation they may make in sown lands, upon fruits, &c. for the sake of their sustenance, yet they never fall foul on men or women, but will let them pass quietly by them, unless they be first exasperated by some violent abuse or wound given, or attack made upon them; in which case dreadful and almost unavoidable is the fate of those who have provoked their resentment. For, 2dly, the vast bulk and unwieldiness of their bodies and limbs is so far from being an obstruction to their swiftness on such occasions, that the best runner of them of all would hardly escape being overtaken and crushed to death under their feet. The only way they have to prevent it is to tire them by their frequent winding from the right to the left, and from the left to the right; by which frequent winding those creatures soon become too weary, and are forced to quit their pursuit <sup>a</sup>.

Their ferocity when provoked.

How avoided.

Elephants hunted.

Their sagacity and approach to human reason.

Rhinoceros described.

Various accounts given of them.

Their tongue a dangerous weapon.

THE hunting of the elephant is reckoned a noble sport all over Africa<sup>f</sup>, and differs in almost every country, but is generally performed with a numerous posse, and loud and horrid shouts of the people. The most common and least dangerous way of catching them is by driving them into deep holes, made for that purpose in the earth, and covered with straw and leaves; and when the beast is fallen into it, they pierce him all over with their sagays and other missile weapons with incredible fury. His flesh yields a plentiful feast, equal to six large oxen; and, among the rest of his spoils, the hair of his tail bears a considerable price, and is curiously woven into collars, bracelets, and other ornaments, the purchase and wear of only the noble and wealthy. We omit many other singularities concerning this noble animal, mentioned by antient and modern authors, relating to their stupendous strength, wonderful sagacity, retentive memory, surprising gratitude and resentment, their privacy and veredundity in coition above all other animals of the wild and tame kind, and others of the like nature, which, we think, we have neither an equal warrant to vouch for, nor sufficient evidence to contradict. One thing may be safely affirmed in general, that they surpass all the other tribes, and display the nearest approaches to rationality <sup>c</sup>.

THE Rhinoceros, so called from its large horn on its nose, is likewise a native of Africa; and though inferior in bulk to the elephant, yet exceeds him in the beauty and comeliness of his shape and skin; which last is strangely variegated with speckles in tufts of black and grey. His back looks as if adorned with a natural saddle, and his sides and ribs swell out as if imbossed, quite down to his belly, with folding panes. The skin of his back is so hard that a lance will scarcely pierce it, and his hide so deeply furrowed, as if armed with scales, as commonly reported and represented by painters. His snout resembles that of a boar, on the top of which grows his horn, which is of a lighter or darker brown, or even black, according to his age, as doth also the length and weight of it, which, when full grown, measures about four feet from the root, and ascends with an upright curve, and weighs commonly between 5 and 600 pounds. His body is of the size of a middling elephant, but his legs are much shorter; his tail long like that of an ox, and his ears upright like those of the horse. We shall not enter into a more particular detail of this noble creature: its natural enmity to, and terrible fights with, the elephant, and other of its exploits, of which Aristotle, Dio, Pliny, and other antients, and after them many moderns, have given us a variety of accounts, which would prove a hard task to reconcile. However that be, that there are such huge and strange animals, found not only in Abissinia, the country of the Hottentots, and other parts of Africa, where we shall say something farther about them, but likewise in several parts of the East Indies, there is no room to doubt; though by their being so seldom seen in either by our Europeans, one may conclude either that they are as scarce as the elephants are numerous, or else, more probably perhaps, they chiefly harbour in deserts and unfrequented places, where living upon such diet as thistles, docks, and such-like coarse fare, which is their common nourishment, their tongue and palate acquires such a strange roughness, that they will, we are told, not only excoriate but excarnify a man or beast to the bone in a short time, by the mere licking of them <sup>d</sup>.

<sup>c</sup> MARMOL, lib. i. c. 23.

<sup>f</sup> LABAT ex Cavaz, lib. i. c. 9. MARMOL, DAPPER, PIGAFET, & al. De his, vide LEO AFRIC. RAMUS. DAPPER, & al sup. citat.

<sup>d</sup> DAPPER, OGILBY, & F. LE COMPTE.

it must exceed all that we read of those Colossian quadrupeds (14). He adds, that some of them breed a kind of bezoar in their ventricle, not inferior to the genuine. Dapper tells us much the same, in his general description of the African animals; but says, it grows in the head of the animal (15). Which of the two is right, or whether either, is out of our power to determine.

(14) Hist. of Kongo, lib. i. c. 9.

(15) Conf. Cavaz. & Dapper, ubi sup.

a MUCH more reason have we to doubt of the twentieth part of the physical virtues which the superstitious natives, as well as the Portuguese and others, attribute to almost every part of this animal, from the tip of the horn to the calcined bones and hoofs. Mr. D'Herbelot tells us, on the authority of the famed Sharif Al Edrisi, that this creature is chiefly found in the isle of Rami, on the Indian Sea, about three days sailing from that of Serendib, from which the Indian kings are furnished with its wonderful horn to drink out of; it having the singular virtue of sweating at the approach of any kind of poison whatever. He adds, that the horn being split in two in the middle, represents the profile or out-lines of a man, as drawn with chalk; and some of them also those of birds<sup>1</sup>. To the description we have given above, Al Edrisi adds, that the rhinoceros hath a bunch under his belly, like that which the camel hath on his back; and Father Le Compte, that its hoofs are cloven, its feet thick, and as if entangled within so many boots; to which he adds, that the hinder part of his head is also covered with a kind of cowl, like that of our women's capuchins, on which account the Portuguese have given it the name of The Indian Monk.

WE meet with sundry other particulars and descriptions of this noble creature among writers both antient and modern, which our scanty limits will not permit us to expatiate upon, as well as a great variety of creatures, which are distinguished by the name of rhinoceros, monoceros, licorn, &c. The reader will find what is most worthy notice about them in the margin (Z); and all that we shall add to what hath been said above, is, that the Septuagint, Vulgate, and generality of antient versions and fathers, as well as a great number of our modern interpreters, having taken the Rhem, so celebrated in the books of Job, Psalms, and other sacred ones of the Old Testament<sup>k</sup>, to mean the rhinoceros or unicorn we are speaking of, hath induced our modern travellers to make a more diligent search after it; and where-ever they have met with any quadruped with one single horn, have taken it for granted that it was the Rhem of the Hebrews, or Rim of the Arabs, without enquiring too curiously how far it answered the scriptural account of it in other respects, by which means all the several species, mentioned in the last note, have been supposed by various authors to be the unicorn there spoken of; and described it just as they found it either in Asia or Africa, how different soever in other particulars from the accounts given us by Moses and the Psalmist, which represent it as a large, savage, cruel, and untractable creature, fierce, strong, and maleficent; on all which accounts, the generality of modern critics differ from the common opinion, and think that the Rhem means neither the rhinoceros nor unicorn, but some other savage creature, though they are far enough from agreeing in the choice of a proper one to substitute in their stead<sup>l</sup>. However that be, there is a manifest difference between the African and Indian rhinoceros, the former being without scales, and the latter being covered with them; the one having but one horn on its nose, and the other having one there, a second on its forehead, and a third on its back.

THE next in rank and size is the garaffa, called by the Arabs Zarafa, and by Pliny and other antients camelopard, from its beautiful spots like the leopard. It is about the height of

<sup>1</sup> Biblioth. orient. sub voc. Kerkedan. 9, & seq. & al.

<sup>k</sup> Numb. xxiv. 8. Deut. xxxiii. 17. Psal. xxii. 21. Job xxxix.

<sup>l</sup> Vide BOCHART animal. sacr. part v. l. iii. c. 27.

(Z) We read of another kind of rhinoceros, or unicorn, in Africa, of the bigness of a colt of two years old, and much of the same shape, whose horn, which grows out of its forehead, is said to be about six feet long, straight and taper, and of exceeding whiteness and smoothness like the finest polished ivory. But what increases its value is its pretended virtue to expel all kinds of poisons; inasmuch, that the creature always dips it in water before it ventures to drink. On which account the rest of the wild kind watch the time when it comes to a spring or a river, that they may have the benefit of drinking after it. The misfortune is, that the creature, as some authors tell us (16), is so shy, as well as swift-footed, that it gets quite out of sight before one can have sufficient time to view it, and much more to wound it with either bullet or arrow. Notwithstanding which, Father Cavazzi tells us, that they are often killed, and their flesh is good to eat, except in rutting time. He calls it Capalanca, and says it is of the size of a mule, and the skin spotted with white and red (17), but what is still worse, is, that those who pretend to have seen, and carefully viewed them, describe their bulk, shape, colour, and texture of their skin, length, turn, and shape of their horns, heads, legs, hoofs, mouth, tail, hair, &c. in so many different ways, that one would be induced to believe, either that those writers had conspired to amuse and impose upon mankind, or, which is indeed more probable, as well as candid, that there must be a greater variety of those one-horned animals than we think, tho' all called by the same, or by equivalent names, as indeed there are, if we may believe the learned Del Campo, who hath distinguished no less than seven species of them, some of which have the single horn on their nose, others on their foreheads, others on the crown of their heads (18); one species like the rhinoceros above described; others more like to horses, mules, bulls, asses, colts, goats, &c. We read moreover of another species in the kingdom of Kongo, called Abada, of the bigness of a large horse, but with a head like that of a stag, and with one horn on its nose, and another on its forehead, and both highly esteemed by the inhabitants for the many virtues ascribed to them (19).

(16) Marmol Afric. lib. i. c. 23. Dapper, Lobo's Abissinia ap. Le Grand, p. 69, 71, & 229, & al. (17) Labat's Kongo, lib. i. c. 9. Vide Sir John Chardin's Travels. Vincent Le Blanc's Survey. Purchas Pilgr. & Relat. of the World. Jch. Gabriel Lewis de Barthem. Diction. of Arts and Sciences, & al. plur. (18) Comment. in Pliny, lib. viii. c. 21, 11, & 48. Calmet Dict. de la Bible, sub voc. Licorn & Rhinocer. (19) Cavazzi apud Labat Kongo, lib. i. c. 9.

a camel, but much more slender and finely shaped. Its hind legs are considerably shorter than its fore legs, which gives the creature a majestic forehead, especially as its neck rises commonly about six feet or more about the nape, in an almost upright ascent, and ends in a beautiful small head like that of a deer, or antelope, with two ears short and upright; the skin of its breast is smooth and sleek, the hair mixed of black and white, its tail long and slender, its gait and pace slow and even, excepting when frightened or pursued, and then very fleet and nimble. They commonly resort in woods and desert places, shun the sight of men, and herding with other animals. They are in great numbers in Nubia and Abissinia, where they have several ways of catching them when young, and bring them up tame. One great inconvenience, however, attends their erect front, and length of their fore legs; that they cannot, without great difficulty and wide striding, bring their heads down low enough to graze on the ground, but browse for the most part on boughs and leaves of trees. The same difficulty they find to come at shallow water<sup>m</sup>. Bellonius adds, that he saw two of them at Grand Kairo, which had two horns on the top of their foreheads, about six inches long, and another like a button, about two inches, growing out of the middle of it<sup>n</sup>.

Other kinds of wild beasts
why omitted.

OTHER beasts of the wild and ferocious kind, such as lions, tigers, leopards, panthers, wolves, foxes, buffaloes, wild boars, elks, stags, roebucks, wild goats, and monkeys, are to be found in great plenty and variety through most parts of Africa, and, for the most part, exceed those of Asia and Europe in size, strength, and fierceness; but as they are all or most of them so well known to most readers, we shall not take up their time with needless descriptions of them, but content ourselves with mentioning what particularities any of them have worthy notice, and that only in those kingdoms and provinces which are most remarkable for, or most infested by, any species of them, and close this article with the dante, which we have already mentioned on account of its extreme fleetness above all other quadrupeds.

The dante, its swift.

THE dante, lante, or, as others write it, ampte, is of the size of a buffalo, or wild bull, but much slenderer, its legs longer, and more fit for running. It is naturally very wild, and exceedingly shy, and being likewise very swift of foot, it is very difficult to catch or overtake him, excepting in the summer season, when the burning sand so parches and shrivels his hoofs, that it quite disables him from running. At all other times they sweep the ground with such incredible speed, that no other creature can keep pace with them, except some well-trained Barbary horses, as we lately hinted. Their hide is so thick and tough, that the sharpest steel weapon cannot pierce it. Its hoofs are black and tough, its horns of the same colour, but shorter and more sleek than those of the buffalo, and the rest of its body is white. Their snout and ears resemble those of a cow, and their long slim tails hang down, like that of the camelopard, to their heels<sup>o</sup>. Bellonius describes much such another creature, which he calls a cow, and differs only from the lante, in that its skin was of a fine bright yellow instead of white, and its hair smooth and sleek, as if it had been curried by a careful hand. This is the animal which Aristotle affirmed to have blood without veins; and others have ascribed to it various other singularities, which have perhaps no better foundation. But its singular swiftness above all foot couriers, the ostrich excepted, is what it is chiefly famed for by all who have wrote of it. We might indeed have added here the so much admired and celebrated zebra, or zecora, called by the antients Asinus Silvestris, or the wild ass, and by the Portuguese, Burro do Matta, which, for the whiteness, smoothness, and blackness of its skin, the beauty and regularity of its stripes, as well as the fineness of its shape and limbs, excels all the other quadrupeds, either of the wild or tame kind; but shall, for the reason above alleged, reserve the farther description to the next volume, in which we shall give the history of Abissinia, the country which most abounds with them, and from which their skins were first brought, neatly stuffed, into Europe, and are no small ornament in every public and princely museum.

The beautiful
zebra.

The ostrich described.

Its surprising
fleetness.

WE come now to the next or volatile kind, and begin with the noble ostrich, by far the largest and strongest of all; and though unable, by reason of its bulk and weight, as well as from the paucity and unaptness of its feathers, to raise itself to any height from the surface of the earth, is yet endued with such strength in its wings and legs, as to scorn the courser and its rider<sup>p</sup>, and is an over-match for the swiftest Barbs. They are commonly found in great numbers in the dry barren deserts of Africa, but especially in the empires of Abissinia, Monomotapa, Morocco, Biledulgerid, &c. where they lay their eggs in the hot sands, and leave them to be hatched by the sun, and by the next female which chances to light upon, and after having set some time upon them, leaves them to the next comer; every nest consisting of 10 or 12, and sometimes 16 or 18, eggs, being indifferently reared up by any other female that lights upon them, as if they were their own. On which account the inimitable author of the book last quoted, introduces the Almighty as charging them with cruelty and want of natural affection<sup>g</sup>.

<sup>m</sup> LEO, l. ix. MARMOL, l. i. c. 23. LUDOLPH, l. ii. c. 10. DAPPER, CAVAZZI, RAMUSIO, & al. mult.
<sup>n</sup> Comment. in PLINY, ubi supra, DAPPER, & al. <sup>o</sup> LEO AFR. MARMOL. <sup>p</sup> Job xxxix. 18.

- a for their offspring, and leaving them to be trod to death by wild beasts * (A). But whatever danger they may be exposed to whilst in the shell, Providence hath given them strength and speed sufficient to avoid it as soon as they get out of it, when they immediately rove about for their food, and with such swiftness as not to be easily caught; and, when full-grown, can out-run the fleetest horses; insomuch, that we are told by Xenophon, that Cyrus, having met with a large drove of them near the Euphrates, sent some of the best horses he had in his army after them, without being able to catch a single one. Some add, that, when closely pursued, they will, in their flight, take up stones, and throw them backwards with their feet, with extraordinary force and agility. Their wings, which are very short, in proportion to the rest of their limbs, are of no other use in their running than to beat and spur their heavy bodies forward, by striking them against their knees. They are exceeding tall, some antients say above the height of a man on horseback †. But the generality of them rarely exceeds seven feet and a half from the head to the ground. The common notion is that they digest iron, copper, and other metals, stones, and other things equally hard; and the truth is, that such things have been found in their maw, but probably for the same end as other inferior birds swallow small pebbles or grains of sand (B); not for food, but to assist the attrition of it. Their flesh, which is forbid by the Mosaic law ‡, if the Septuagint and Vulgate versions are right, is said to be offensive both to the taste and smell, and of a viscous nature, yet is commonly eaten by the Africans and Arabs, especially in Numidia; but they are much sonder of the young ones, which they catch as soon as hatched, and breed up for food, by letting them rove about in droves, till they are fat enough to be killed and salted for use. The Arabs have likewise a way, before they cut off their heads, to tie a string or tape about their necks, a little below it, by which a kind of oily grease is gathered about the ligature, and is esteemed among them not only as a pleasant condiment to be mixed with their food, instead of oil or butter, but likewise as a sovereign ointment against bruises, aches, sprains, and such-like disorders. Our authors add, that the ostrich hath neither taste, smell, hearing, nor memory; which, if true, will farther account for the strange stupidity which is commonly attributed to them, that they will, in time of danger, endeavour to hide their heads in the sand, among weeds and brambles, and think themselves in safety, though the rest of the body lies open to their pursuers § (C). We are even told, that they will suffer themselves to be approached and caught by a man covered with an ostrich's skin, and who can imitate some of their motions †. We shall not trouble our readers with a description of their feathers, which are so well known, and are such an ornament to the heads of our martial beaux, as well as formerly to beds and rooms of state. All that we shall say of them is, that their natural colour is a mixture of white and black in the males, with an additional mixture of grey in the females. As for that beautiful variety of red, crimson, blue, yellow, &c. in which they are brought over to us, they are the effects of art, and chiefly known and used among the Arabs, who buy them of the natives in their natural, and dye them for foreign sale in that variety of colours, in which we see them. Some of their eggs are made into drinking cups, and other table and household ornaments; and if we may believe Pierius, some make them into caps, which they think no small ornament to their heads.
- e Those that are laid by the old ones are commonly the largest, and the others are so in proportion: they are all good to eat, and even those which are broken in the laying, which is a common case, occasioned by the stupidity of the creature, prove a nourishment to the young ones, who greedily feed on the multitudes of worms and other insects which are either bred in, or croud into them †.

Their wings not for flight.

Their flesh forbid by Moses, but eaten by the Africans.

Their stupidity.

* Ibid. vers. 14, & seq. vide & Lament. iv. 3.

Deut. xiv.

† CLAUDIAN in Eutrop. in Appian, & al.

‡ LEQ, MARMOL, CAVAZZI, DAPPER, & al. supra citat.

§ Vide PLINY Natur. Hist. l. x.

¶ Levit. xi.

† PLINY, ubi supra. STRABO, l. xvi. & al.

(A) This notion, however, of the antients, is now much questioned by the generality of our learned moderns; and Mr. Vanſleb, among others, assures us (20), that it is owing to their bulk and weight, which would not fail of quashing them, if they were to lie upon them; but adds, that both male and female stand by and watch them by turns, and hatch them, as it were, with their eyes; though should either man or beast drive them off to any distance, they would not be able to find the nest again; and this, in all probability, hath given birth to the vulgar notion of their forgetfulness and cruelty.

(B) Some authors tell us that they live upon, and pick them up at random, and digest them, even to red hot iron (21). And we are told of one which was dissected before the royal academy of Paris, in whose maw were found about seventy French liards (or farthings), a great number of them half corroded, and some very nearly wasted by the acrimony of the stomach, and their constant friction one against the other (22).

(C) Thus elegantly expressed by Claudian:

Stat lumine clauso
Ridendum revoluta caput; creditque latere,
Quæ non ipsa videt.

(20) Relation of Egypt, p. 103.

(21) Leo Afric. lib. ix. Marmol, lib. i. c. 23. See also his French trans.

lator D'Ablandcourt, Ramusio Collect. viag. vol. i. p. 58 (C), 72 (F), 94 (C), & seq.

(22) Vide Calmet Diction.

Other birds.

EAGLES, vultures, hawks, hems, pelicans, and other birds of the venatile kind, are here in such numbers and variety, that it would require a volume barely to describe them. a

A bird with one horn.

THE most remarkable amongst them is the eagle, of which they have seven sorts, most differing from ours, not only in bigness (some of them being near as large and others larger than the ostrich last described †), but in colour, shape, and other particulars, not worth mentioning. Among those of the strange and monstrous kind, they have one which hath a horn on its head, which runs parallel, and near the same length, with its bill, on which account they give it the name also of rhinoceros. In other respects it resembles the stork or crane, and is a bird of prey. There is another of a lesser size, with two horns, to which the Europeans, we suppose, have given the name of Devil. The last we shall mention is that which the natives b call the four-winged bird; not that it hath really so many, but because there is a kind of additional one which grows at the end of each of its pinions, which leaves a kind of chasm between, so that, when it spreads them abroad, they look so much like a double wing, that any man might easily take it for four wings. It is a bird of prey, and of the bigness of a large turkey-cock, well shaped in body, with a fine tuft on its head, a large hooked bill, and its feet armed with strong claws. What is most singular in this creature, we are told *, is, that it stirs not out for its prey but in the night, or dusk of the evening, and yet finds provision enough to keep itself, contrary to other birds of prey, fat and full of flesh; but is at the same time so shy and strong-winged, that it is with great difficulty that the expertest marksman can come near enough to have a fair shoot at it. c

Another with two, called the Devil.

A bird with four wings.

Parrots, &amp;c.

AFRICA would yield us a still more extensive field, were we to enter into a detail, or even a bare enumeration of those of the tame kind, as cocks, hens, turkeys, swans, geese, ducks, doves, pigeons, &c. or of those which are made so by art, as parrots, makaws, cokatoes, singing ones of the finest shape, notes, and diversity of colours *. Among the vast variety of those of the talkative kind, we are told that the green are the easiest taught to speak and sing distinctly, and a greater number of words and notes, though their voices are commonly less sweet than those of the grey, white, and variegated kind; among these last some are of a very large size, with tails two or three feet in length, and for the beautiful mixture and variety of colours, scarcely inferior to those of the peacock. Others again, though no less beautiful, hardly exceed the bigness of our sparrows, and are so gentle, docile, and melodious, that the women, especially of quality, hardly think themselves sufficiently adorned, unless they have one of them perching upon their fore-finger. Those of the game and esculent kind are no less numerous and various, and even of those which are most commonly reckoned peculiar to colder climates, to the no small wonder of the Portuguese and other Europeans; and, by their own confession, not inferior in taste and goodness to those of Europe †. d

Game fine tasted and numerous.

Winged quadrupeds and serpents.

Fast large serpents, dreadful and destructive.

WE may have occasion, in our circuit through this vast spacious continent, and variety of nations, countries, and climates, to mention some of the most remarkable ones of all those kinds, as we come to those parts which are most frequented by them. We likewise read of others of the monstrous kind, such as dragons, griffins, and other winged animals, as bats of a very large size and make, flying squirrels, flying serpents, fishes, and others of the like e uncommon species, of which we have no need to speak in a work of this extent. Some of them, worthy of notice, we have spoken of in our Ancient History, particularly the flying serpent, and the bird which lives upon and destroys them †. Others are either too fabulous or inconsiderable to deserve more than a bare mention. We have there likewise taken notice of two destructive animals of the amphibious kind; viz. the crocodile and sea-horse, which infest most parts of Africa, as far as the Cape of Good Hope, as well as Egypt, and those which lie in the neighbourhood of the Nile ‡, and may have occasion to mention some of those parts which are most infested by that monstrous vermin. It swarms no less with the most dreadful variety of serpents, some of them of such prodigious length and bulk, as would hardly be credited, were it not vouched by such numbers of eye-witnesses, as well as backed by parallel instances in the history of other countries, as well ancient f as modern, so subtil and dangerous, as to infest the roads by lurking among the thorns and briars, grass, &c. or even climbing on trees, and lying perdu, in order to fall on every prey that comes in their way, whether men or beasts, and swallowing them up alive. Others will take their opportunity of sliding into holes and corners of the houses, in the night-time, in order to seize on some of the family, or any domestic animal: one kind is said to kill with their eyes like the basilisk; others by their poisonous breath and stench; a third, by their bite or sting, or even the touch, which is of so venomous

† DAPPER, & al. supra citat.

* LABAT Relat. d'Afrique. vol. iii. p. 360. &amp; seq. vide &amp; DAPPER, &amp; al.

supra citat.

* LEO AFRIC. MARMOL, RAMUS. &amp; al.

† Idem ibid.

‡ Ancient History,

vol. i. p. 182, 532, 925 (S). See also Modern History, vol. iii. p. 504.

‡ Ancient History, vol. i. p. 180.

‡ Vide int. al. Ancient History, vol. iv. p. 663. vol. v. p. 309. vol. vi. p. 805, & (S). p. 837, & (T).

- a a nature, that the inhabitants know of no other way of saving the life, than by the immediate amputation of the limb infected <sup>a</sup> (D). The bite and touch mortal.
- BESIDES those of that monstrous size, they have multitudes and a great variety of others, of various shapes, colours, and qualities, and all of them venomous, though not to an equal degree. The viper in particular, is one of the smallest of the creeping kind, and beautifully spotted and chequered from head to tail, but its bite is not in the least mortiferous and incurable amongst them. The misfortune is, that most of the Africans in general, whether Christians, Mohammedans, or Heathens, retain still a strange relic of their old heathenish superstition, and think it most dangerous, and some of them a very horrid crime, to destroy any of them; so that being left alone to live and range, they multiply to such a degree, that the paths, hedges, fields, and the very grass, swarm with them, and travellers can hardly move a step without running a great danger of their lives, especially as they generally go barefooted and barelegged. But besides those of the serpent kind, there are multitudes of other insects of the same poisonous nature, which haunt their roads, fields and their very houses, some of the flying, others of the reptile kind; of this latter sort are the scorpions, whose sting is reckoned incurable, and in many parts causes immediate death, and destroys myriads of people in a year <sup>b</sup>: and some of this species, but of a larger size, have also wings, both in Africa and some parts of India, and are of course so much the more dangerous and destructive. Besides these, there is a variety of others of a smaller size, very prejudicial, some to the eyes, others to other parts of the body, especially to the fingers and toes, where they leave either the poison of their sting, or one or more of their eggs under the nails, which turn into worms, and must be extracted with exceeding care, by a skilful hand, because, being very slender, they are apt to break in the drawing out; and if ever so small a part be left behind, it will have the same effect of causing the most excruciating pains, and ending in a gangrene and death. These, and others of the like kind, are common all over Africa, and are bred in their stagnated waters, in lakes, pools, and marshy grounds, which are overflowed by the violent rains of one season, and dried up by the excessive heats of another; so that there is scarce a kingdom or district which is not infected by some of that pernicious vermin in one shape or another. There is one species of them called dubb, which in shape and nature resembles the tarantula, but is much larger than those which breed in Italy, and some other parts of Europe, and of course more pernicious; for if they can pierce with their sting the double leathern sole of a peasant's shoe, with what force must those penetrate the naked foot of an African, especially since they are commonly, as we are told, of the length of a man's arm, and about four inches in diameter, and so strong, that, if they get the fore part of their body into a hole, though the rest thereof be out, the strength of a man cannot draw them out, but by making the orifice wider. Like others of the serpentine kind, it will move its limbs several days after the head is taken off, and its body cut into several pieces. Some add that it never drinks any thing, but expires as soon as any water is put into its mouth. This creature the Libyans and other Africans, where these vermin swarm, make no scruple to broil and eat, and account them a pleasant food <sup>c</sup>. The dubb, like a tarantula.
- d THE camelion, or camelian, or little lion, so called because he preys upon other little, as the great one doth upon large animals, is a reptile, which swarms likewise all over Africa. It resembles the common lizard, but his head is more erect, and not unlike that of a ram, abating the horns. His tail is about a span long, and his feet like those of a monkey, by which he can not only walk swiftly, though awkwardly, but climb and fasten on the smallest branches of a tree, or hang upon them by its tail in pursuit of its prey, which is neither the air, wind, or rays of the sun, as the antients and the common notion and proverb describe, but real insects, either of the flying or reptile kind, which he catches into his wide mouth, by the help of a Its real food.

<sup>a</sup> LEO AFRIC. MARMOL, DAPPER, LABAT, & al. supra citat. & al. DAPPER, LABAT, & al.

<sup>b</sup> RAMUSIO, ubi supra, p. 9 (A), 75 (D).

<sup>c</sup> RAMUSIO, DAPPER, DAVITY, PIGAFET, PURCHAS, & al. vide & MARMOL, l. i. c. 23.

(D) Of this deadly nature are those monstrous and unwieldy ones, bulky and gross about the middle, and lessening gradually towards the head and tail, which infect Mount Atlas, Biledulgerid, Zaara, and other parts of Africa (21). They are not only watchful after their prey, but nimble in seizing and holding it, by twisting themselves about it; but after they have once devoured it, whether it be a man, sheep, hog, stag, cow, or other large creature, the weight so oppresses their stomach, that they can hardly move, much less defend themselves, till eased of part of their load, which is not till after several days, their digestion being very slow, perspiration very small, if any, and their other evacuations but seldom and small (22).

These are reckoned the most dangerous and destructive on all these accounts, but much more, because not only the least bite of their teeth, but the very touch of any part of them, is attended with a gradual corruption of the flesh, which, we are told, dissolves on the bones like soap in warm water, with exquisite pain, as well as horror, to the unhappy person, and is sure to end in death.

(21) See Ramus. Viag. edit. 3. part viii. p. 94. Dapper, Davity, Ludolph Ethiop. lib. i. c. 12, & c. Ramusio, ubi sup.

(22) Ra-

tongue about three or four inches long, which he shoots out of a kind of scabbard or case, with a wonderful nimbleness, without ever missing his aim, and swallows them as fast as caught. For this reason they mostly frequent woods, hedges, and places where the verdure draws those insects. He never drinks; nor hath he either bladder or urinary passage. His skin is smooth, and of a greyish colour, whatever hath been said to the contrary, and retains that hue after his death (E). That on his back is hard and scaly, and somewhat prickly along the middle of it. The eyes are round and piercing, though without eye-lids; and he can turn them to any two contrary objects, so as to look with one upwards and with the other downwards, with the one forward and with the other backward, and both continually intent on its prey, which is generally flies, worms, caterpillars, maggots, grasshoppers, and such kind of insects, which his glutinous tongue lays such sure hold on, that they cannot disengage themselves from it. But besides those insects, we are told that they have found in its maw the seeds of limons, citrons, and other fruits, maniok's meal, and the seeds of many esculent herbs, so that they want not variety of food of a more solid substance than that of the air or the sun's rays<sup>f</sup>. The Africans look upon it as a dangerous animal, on account of its pernicious flaver; and so ominous, that, if they see or meet with any of them, they conclude from thence, that either some of their absent friends are dead, or that some of their present ones will shortly die, or some other disaster will happen to themselves<sup>g</sup>.

THE next and most dreadful of all the African insects are their pismires, of which they have such a variety, and such innumerable swarms, that they destroy not only the fruits of the ground, but even men and beasts, in so little a time as one single night, and would, without all doubt, prove more fatally destructive to the inhabitants, were they not so happily destroyed by a proportionable number of monkeys, who greedily ferret and devour them. But of these, and some other grievous plagues, which the far greater part of this vast continent is afflicted with, particularly that most horrid and pernicious one of locusts, which seldom fail a year of laying waste some of its provinces, we shall defer all farther mention till the next volume, where we shall have a large field to display their dreadful devastations in.

AMONG all the monstrous kinds which Africa hath been remarkable for producing, in the greatest number and variety, but which we think, with the generality of the learned, are not worth mentioning, and much less confuting, we shall confine ourselves to the description of that curious and celebrated one, if yet it may indeed be properly ranked amongst that class, which the Greeks called Monocephalus, on account of its having a head like a dog, though, in other respects, resembling a monkey or baboon, but much larger and stronger than they (F). But what

<sup>e</sup> LEO AFRIC. MARMOL, RAMUS. DAPPER, LA CROIX, & al. plur.
<sup>g</sup> DAPPER, & al. ubi sup.

<sup>f</sup> CAVAZZI Kongo, l. i. c. 9.

(E) The common notion is, that the eyes, head, body, and tail of this animal change alike their colour according to that of the nearest object, excepting only the white and red (23). But the learned Pancirolos Romanus, in his anatomy of it, assures us, that it is altogether of a grey or ash colour, and that, whatever change is observed in it is not caused by the proximity of any object, but by the motion of its heart, caused either by heat, cold, or the inward motion of its blood, of which it hath but a small quantity in its veins, any more than flesh upon its bones. From this others have imagined, that this change of colour was rather owing to the transparency of its flat and emaciated body, through which the objects on the other side easily transmitted their various colours (24).

The fabulous Arabs, ever fond of the marvellous, relate other wonders of this little animal, which no one else could ever find out. In particular they tell us, that he bears such an antipathy to the whole serpentine species, that where-ever he sees any of them, he immediately gets on some tree, shrub, or other eminence, if it be to be had, and places himself perpendicularly over its head, and emits a poisonous kind of froth, or saliva, out of its mouth, which no sooner reaches any part of its head than it deprives it of life (25).

(F) We would not here be understood as if we absolutely rejected all that hath been written by antients and moderns on this head, but only that we think it a topic too uncertain and vague to be debated in a work of this extensive nature. That there have been, and will be whilst the word endures, a variety of births and productions, which are commonly called monstrous, is what will hardly be denied by any sober man; though hitherto not sufficiently accounted for to satisfy the curious and inquisitive.

Another observation we would offer on this subject is, that many living creatures may be wrongfully ranked amongst that class, merely because such objects are not frequent, and seen perhaps but by one of a sort; whereas were they more closely enquired into, they would be numerous enough to compose a distinct species. Of this kind we take those pongas, or gigantic apes, mentioned by Purchas (26), on the authority of Andrew Battel, which, in every respect but their feet, and gigantic size and bulk, resemble the human, and in that one only, unless we add their extreme ferocity, resemble the monkey kind. Their face, head, hands, and ears are without hair, and like those of a man; their eyes hollow, and overhung with large eye-brows; the body covered with hair, though not thick, and of a dunny colour; their legs the same, but without calves; and carry their hands on the nape of their neck, when they walk on the ground. They sleep upon trees, and build shelters against rain, and live chiefly upon such fruits as they find in the woods, and eat no flesh. They are so shy and nimble, that the natives cannot catch them; and so strong when caught, that ten men cannot hold them; and yet so stupid, that, though they take great delight to come and warm themselves at the fires which

(23) Pliny, Solinus, ubi supra, c. 33. Theophrast. de animal & al. mult.
Marmol, l. i. c. 23. Ramusio, vol. i. p. 94. Davity, Dapper, La Croix Relat. de l'Afrique lib. i. c. 6. sect. 2. Purchas
Relat. l. vi. c. 1. §. 3.

(25) Ubi supra.

(24) Bellon. Leo Africanus, l. ix.
(26) Purchas Relat. lib. vi. c. 3. §. 6.

a what they are chiefly remarkable for is, their being observed to piss twelve times a day, and as many in the night, at equal distances of time, in the time of the equinox<sup>a</sup>; from which, we are told, the Egyptian priests took the first hint of their Clepsydra, or water-glasses, which were made to run just one hour; if not of dividing the natural day into twenty four equal parts (which was only divided before into day and night watches, of two or three hours each), and which, we are told, were invented by Ctesiphon of Alexandria; but were afterwards exchanged for the more sure and commodious sand-glasses; in memory of which they used to have the figure of that animal painted or carved on their hour-glasses<sup>i</sup>.

Gave rise to
to the water hour-glass.

AFRICA being surrounded almost by the sea, and parted only from the Asiatic continent by the narrow isthmus of Suez, as hath been already observed, and abounding within with such numbers of large lakes and considerable rivers, must of course be supposed to afford the greatest plenty and variety both of salt and fresh water fish. The misfortune, with relation to this last is, that not only those lakes and large reservoirs of water, in the heat of the summer season, are either in part or wholly dried up, which not only destroy the fish that live in it, but infect the air with their stench; and even those which retain water enough to keep theirs alive, communicate the same infection to them, and these to the poorer sort of the natives, whom necessity obliges to feed upon them. Even many of their noble and large rivers are so choaked up, through the shameful indolence of the people, with trees on both sides, which meeting in their branches together, exclude them both from the rays of the sun, and the benefit of the winds and fresh air, for a great number of leagues together; so that here also what fish is able to live in them is no less pernicious and unwholesome to those that eat it<sup>k</sup>. We may add another plague which attends the fresh water kind; viz. the vast multitudes of crocodiles, sea-horses, and other such amphibious animals, which prey upon and make a terrible havock amongst them. This doth not, however, hinder their having it in such plenty, as to make it, in many parts, the common food; and some sorts of them, dried in the sun, serve them instead of bread, as we shall see in the course of this African part.

Great plenty and variety of fish.

In many parts unfit to eat.

THE coasts, however, it may well be supposed, are supplied with a still greater plenty and variety, and drive a large commerce in them both on the eastern and western side; and this last, besides some pearl fisheries, which we shall have occasion to mention in a more proper place, and that of the zimbis, a small shell-fish, the shell of which is the only current coin, both which bring in a considerable revenue to the owners. The Portuguese have not only set up many others for large and small fish, but have taught the natives, till then too proud and indolent for such a kind of slavery, to follow their example, and make the most of those advantages which their situation, and the neighbouring ocean, so liberally throw in their way<sup>l</sup>.

OF all that vast variety of fishes which are caught along that prodigious compass, and which it would be endless to enumerate (as well as the various ways which those maritime nations make use of to carry on their several fisheries, of the principal of which we shall give an account in their proper place and turn) we shall confine ourselves here to one or two of the most curious, as peculiar to this western coast, and carried on by strangers as well as natives; viz. that of the Tuberone, as the Spaniards call it, and the Italians more properly Pescocane, or dog-fish, from its resemblance to the land one, but most commonly known in the American seas by the name of Rekin, or Reguen. This voracious creature is of such a size and length (some of them being above twenty-five feet in length, and four in diameter) is withal so bold and strong, and its huge mouth armed both above and below with a treble row of such sharp teeth, some round, some flat, and others triangular, each row closely clasping into each other, with an almost irresistible force, as to be able, with one stroke, to bite off the thigh, or even the body, of a man or horse, that it might, in all probability, long enough ago have devoured the greater part of the watry tribes, if Providence had not put a kind of bar to its devouring appetite, by the difficulty which its unwieldy body, and the disposition of his mouth, give him to come at and swallow its prey (G).

The Rekin, or sea-dog, described.
Horrid voraciousness.

It

<sup>a</sup> FLORUS, PLINY, & al. supra.

<sup>i</sup> Vide KERCHER mechanic Egypt.

<sup>k</sup> DAVITY, DAPPER, & al. ubi

<sup>l</sup> LEO AFRICANUS, MARMOL, LINSCHOT. DAPPER, LABAT, PICAFET, & alib.

travellers are obliged to kindle in woods and deserts, in order to keep off wild beasts, serpents, and other hurtful creatures, as soon as those travellers are gone far enough out of their sight; yet none of them have sense enough to supply those embers with fresh fuel, but go away as soon as they find the fire gone out.

Had any of these pongas been caught and brought into Europe, it would have been stiled a monster, as one of the same kind actually was, which some sailors found drowned and cast upon some of those coasts (26); yet it is plain from their going in such vast droves, and killing and carrying off with them so many Negroes, that they are no other than a gigantic species of the ape kind, by all the particulars mentioned above, more resembling human creatures, than any of the rest.

(G) One impediment, we are told, is its mouth being placed about a foot or more below its snout; so that its fierceness after its prey rather contributes to drive

It is chiefly on this account that both the Africans and Europeans, who frequent this coast, are so eager, and undergo such fatigues and dangers, to destroy it, and not for any reprisals they can make upon him, unless it be that of his skin; for as to the flesh, it is mostly so tough, harsh, ill flavoured, and hard of digestion, that none but the Moors, and some famished Spaniards will venture to eat it, and of that only which grows upon the extremity of the ribs down to the belly. The Moors, who are commonly excellent swimmers, and pretend that they are in no danger from them whilst in the water, but only when they attempt either to get into their boats, or go to land, have but one common method of destroying them; viz. by getting under them, when they see them intent after some prey, and ripping their bellies open with their sharp weapons. And as they swarm not only along the whole coast, but venture pretty far up the large rivers, in pursuit of their prey, which they follow with such eagerness and speed, as sometimes to launch their whole body on the shore, they seldom miss a year without making a horrid slaughter among them where-ever they meet with them. But the more polite Europeans, who make it one of their chief diversions to catch them by the hook and line, are content, for the sake of the sport it yields, to undergo the greatest danger which attends it<sup>m</sup>.

How destroyed
by the natives.

How caught by the Europeans.

Their struggles to get loose.

THEIR method is to provide some of the strongest and sharpest hooks, well charged with flesh, stale, and well besmeared with lard, or other greasy stuff; this they fasten to a strong iron chain, of six or eight feet in length, and that to a stout rope, long enough for the purpose, and fling it into the sea. The greedy creature, if hungry, soon shortens the best part of their sport, by eagerly swallowing it; but, if otherwise, will considerably lengthen it, by its frequent attempts and nibbling at it, off and on, sometimes by swimming at some distance around it, again and again, as if doubtful and afraid to venture, till at length its ravenous appetite is so far excited, that it can no longer resist the tempting bait, but, at one pull, gets it into its maw. But no sooner is it made sensible of its point, by a gentle pluck of the rope, than it begins to shew the most extravagant motions, and attempts to disengage itself from it, first by endeavouring to bite the chain, and next to gnaw the cord, to which it is fastened, asunder. Finding this ineffectual, he next strives to spew it out, and sometimes by such violent straining, as if to turn his stomach inside out, to get rid of it; at other times by beating itself against the ship, till its strength is quite exhausted, when they begin to draw him nearer to them, and get his head above water, and, by the help of a rope fastened about it, they, with a slip knot, draw him high enough to twist its lower parts with it, and, at length, get him into the ship, and then on to the shore, in order to dispatch it.

The young ones
a delicious dish.

The Manati, or hand-fish,
scribed.

Its vast bulk.

WE are farther told that the females are still more fierce and dangerous, especially in the season of spawning, and when they have young ones, which, it seems, they carry about them in some proper fold or partition of their ventricle; so that when any of them are caught and killed, the first thing these sportsmen go about is to search after their brood, if any they have, which they esteem a most delicious morsel, though not till having previously kept them in some vessel, filled with salt water, and shifted it three or four times, till their inside is thoroughly cleansed; without which precaution their flesh would prove dangerous, and occasion some dreadful disorders; and the same would ensue if it was not thoroughly dressed<sup>n</sup> (H).

THE next rare fish of the Africans we propose to mention here, is that of the Manati, as the Spaniards call it, on account of its having seemingly two hands, with which it carries its young ones close to its breast. The French call it Lamentine; probably on account of some mournful noise it makes when in distress or danger; but its most proper name might perhaps be that of the sea-cow, from its resemblance, in some respects, to the land one. It is of an extra-

<sup>m</sup> De hoc, vide LABAT Afric. occident. vol. i. p. 348, & seq. CAVAZZI, Descript. Kongo, l. i. c. 10. p. 282, & seq. <sup>n</sup> Ibid. ubi supra.

it farther from it; and therefore, in order to catch it more readily, he is forced to turn himself (not upon his back, as some have absurdly affirmed, which would rather add to than remove the impediment, but, as we are assured by eye-witnesses) on its side, and by the motion of its jaws and fins to draw and ingulph it in its wide mouth.

Another impediment attending its speed after it, is the stiffness and unpliableness of its vertebræ, which makes him tack and turn about with greater difficulty, and gives a seasonable time to his prey to escape. To this we may add a third; viz. that his extreme eagerness makes him swallow every thing that comes in his way, without distinction. He is commonly seen swimming about and after the sailing ships, and watching to catch every thing that is either thrown out, or falls from them, whether men, beasts, bales, and bundles of woollen or linen, even to wooden and iron tools; all which he indifferently swallows down with equal greediness; for such have been found in its maw; not indeed digested, as some have imagined, but only corroded more or less, according to their nature, and the time they have lain in it. So that, in fact, he is frequently the dupe of his voracious appetite; and, whilst he is taken up in devouring an imaginary nourishment, he loses that which would yield him a real one (27).

(H). One more particularity our author adds, on what authority we cannot tell, concerning this voracious animal; viz. that the brain of it, being dried, becomes as hard as a stone, and being scraped, and given to a woman in labour, is, by the English, esteemed an effectual remedy to ease and accelerate it (28).

(27) Labat Relat. de l'Afric. occident. tom. i. p. 348; CAVAZZI apud eund. Descript. of Kongo, lib. i. c. 10. b. 192. lib. v. p. 282, & seq. (28) Labat, ubi supra, in finem tom. i.

- a ordinary size and clumsy shape, its length about eighteen, and its diameter between four and five feet. Its body is almost round from the head to the navel, but grows gradually flatter from that to the end of its tail. It hath a large head, wide mouth, and thick lips, covered with some straggling long hairs above and below. Its eyes are small and dim, and its sight weak, which is amply compensated by the exquisiteness of its hearing and smelling, and is alarmed at the least distant noise, whether at land or sea, being exceedingly fearful, as are most other animals, which, like it, are destitute of all defence, except the two fins, like hands, with which it carries its young (I). Those fins, which hang about two or three inches above their paps, and spread themselves wider downwards, the length five or six, being hollow, and parted by a kind of cartilage, like that of other fishes, can be of no use to them out of the water, much less
- b to drag such a vast heavy body along the ground.

THE Africans are very expert at, as well as greedy of, catching this fish. The cramp-hooks with which they strike him, and other such large creatures, are of iron, and about seven or eight inches long, the point very sharp, and the other end hath a hole or ring, through which they run a string, of the length of ten or twelve fathoms, at the end of which they fasten a piece of wood, which floats on the water. The rest is performed much after the same manner as that of the whale, except that the Moors endeavour to come near enough to strike it a second time, in order to hasten the effusion of its blood; and as soon as it is dead, they either take it up into their canoes, or tie it to them with a rope, and tow it to the shore.

- c THE flesh of it is of an exquisite taste, superior to the Mediterranean ton, or our English Fine flesh, and sturgeon, especially from about the middle of the ribs down to the belly; but the most delicious bit of all is the udder, next to the sucking ones it carries under its fins. It hath moreover along the back a long streak of fat, not unlike hog's lard, and about five inches thick, which being melted with the rest of its panch, yields an excellent kind of butter, which is not subject to grow rancid. Its skin is thick, and tough enough to be tanned, and some of the poorer sort sole their shoes with it untanned. As the female hath but two dugs to suckle, and two fins
- d to carry its young, which are commonly a male and a female, one would be apt to judge they can bring forth no more than two at a time; and indeed they are never caught with a greater number (and these no longer than till they are able to live without her milk and shift for themselves), and consequently that they cannot multiply very fast; and yet, when we consider the vast slaughter that is made of them by the Moors, and the much greater numbers that are devoured by the rekins, crocodiles, sea-horses, and other large fishes of prey, which are ever in pursuit after them, one cannot but suppose, at least, that they supply that destruction by their frequent pregnancy, and that they must of course bring forth at least ten or twelve times in a year: but about this we can offer nothing but bare conjecture ° (K).

- THERE are several pearl fisheries both on the eastern and western coasts, especially about the former, the most considerable of which lie round some small islands, over against the kingdom of Sofala; the misfortune is, they have not there the sense to expose the shell-fish to the warmth of the sun, in order to make them open, as they do in those of India; but, instead of that, lay them upon the coals, by which strange method those pearls which they catch, both small and great, contract a dull kind of redness, which robs them of their natural orient lustre, as well as of their value, and the poor fishermen of their gain, considering the small share of it which the proprietors of those fisheries allow them, and the great pains they are at, not to say the risk they run, in diving and groping for them. This slavish work is performed by the women as well as the men; both being equally expert and excellent swimmers and divers, are obliged to plunge ten or twenty, and in some greatly above that number of fathoms into the sea, by the help of a weight fastened to their legs or feet, with a bag hanging about their necks, into

° LABAT, ubi supra, p. 338.

(I) This absurd notion of their being real hands hath been a little improved by our travellers, who have not scrupled to suppose the creature to have arms and legs also. The painters and engravers have not failed to confirm it by their descriptions; from all which it hath been naturally raised to the dignity of those amphibious ones which indifferently range on land and water. Whereas, if we may believe those who have seen numbers of them in the Niger, Gambia, and other African rivers, and assure us that they have no other excrescences than those two fins above-mentioned, which are of no other use to them than to carry their young, and apply them to the breast, will easily conceive the absurdity of such fiction, especially when compared with the monstrous load of body which they must be supposed to drag after them on the ground, which is usually between 1400 and

1500 lb. weight. So far are they from it, that, whenever the waters happen to fail them in those creeks and shallows, into which they frequently go for pasture, they are inevitably lost, being altogether unable to move forward or backward, but are either dispatched by the people, or perish above ground (29).

(K) We are told that there are commonly found three or four white stones in the head of this creature, to which the natives attribute some singular virtues, when pulverized, and taken in some liquid vehicle, and, among others, that they are a gentle emetic, and an effectual remedy against all nephretic disorders and aches; that they cure the stone in the reins and bladder. Their bones, calcined, are likewise used by them against the piles, and all kinds of hæmorrhages (30).

(29) Labat Relat. d'Afrique. vol. i. p. 339, & seq.

(30) Labat, ubi supra, p. 342.

which they put the oysters, or other pearl fish, which they catch by groping; but are forced frequently to give the signal to those in the boats above, by the pull of a string, to be hoisted up to fetch breath and have the benefit of the fresh air. In the like manner they catch every other shell-fish, either for food or ornament, particularly the zimbis, which pass for current money amongst them, and some other sorts, which are esteemed either for their beauty, or some superstitious virtues which they attribute to them <sup>p</sup>.

Ambergrise. BOTH the eastern and western coasts abound with ambergrise, and make a considerable commerce of it with the Europeans and other nations; the misfortune is, that, though it be found in great quantities, and pieces of considerable weight and bigness, particularly along most of the eastern side, and especially on the coasts of Sofala and Mosambico, whose natives despised it, as being, in their opinion, nothing better than the excrements of the whale, cast upon their coasts by the winds and waves <sup>q</sup>; yet no sooner came they to be apprised of the high price it bore in other countries, than their avarice inspired them with a strange jealousy; so that, not daring to trust one another in carrying on this advantageous traffick, they took it into their heads to break those huge masses of it, which they found, into small pieces, that every one of them might have his share, and be able to carry it to market: and well they may be so diffident of one another, who know themselves to be all cheats alike. Nor need we wonder they should be so stupidly ignorant of its value, till taught by the Europeans, seeing the more polite Japanese entertained the same contemptuous notion of it, as we have shewn in a former volume, till the arrival of the Portuguese amongst them <sup>r</sup>. But of this we meet with some other instances in the course of this African history, and shall only add, that, if the natives here could be prevailed upon to bring it to sale in the same lumps they find them thrown up, they might, in all probability, exceed in bigness those vast pieces we have had occasion to mention in the volume last quoted <sup>s</sup>.

The two chief sorts described. WE need not here tell our readers that there are two kinds of it, and both found in great plenty on this continent, the one of a greyish ash colour, which hath a most exquisite and delicious fragrancy, and bears by far the largest price; the other of a brown and darkish hue, hard, and without any scent, unless heated by friction, and then strong, and rather offensive than pleasant (L). But the most precious and valuable is the former, which, next to diamonds, pearls, and gold-dust, is reckoned the richest commodity that belongs to the African commerce, and is thrown by the sea in large quantities along the eastern coasts, especially after violent storms, and more particularly upon those small islands which lie contiguous to the great one of Madagascar, and the coasts of Quiloa, Sofala, and Mosambico, though very little of it is to be found on this side the Cape of Good Hope. Various are the ways which the natives, both here and in India, have fallen upon to search after this precious drug (after they became apprised of its high value), and which, as we have seen in a former volume, they did in some places make no other use of than to caulk their canoes <sup>t</sup>.

The first the most valuable by far. WHETHER it lie on, or is covered under, the sand, they find it here by turning out droves of hogs, which are excessively fond of it, and greedily devour as well as commonly discover it at vast distances by the scent. Others by the flights of birds of all sorts, which flock to it on the same account, it being greedily sought for, as a delicious food, by the whole volatile kind. Others, especially on the coasts of Mosambico and Madagascar, discover it by means of a large fish, which is very fond of it, but dies upon the eating of it, and is seen on its back <sup>e</sup>.

<sup>p</sup> RAMUS. PIGAFET, DAPPER, & al. ubi sup.
LABAT, CAVAZ, vol. v. p. 316, & seq.
vol. iv. p. 269, sub not.

<sup>q</sup> RAMUS. Viagii, vol. i. p. 313 (C) (D), 3d edit.
<sup>r</sup> See vol. iv. p. 23, & 45.
<sup>s</sup> Ibid. ubi sup.
<sup>t</sup> See

(L) This last, which hath the quality, when heated, of drawing straws, and other light matters to it, is, on that account, called by the Persians and Arabs, Karabee. The Latins called it Succinum; and being so well known for that and its other qualities among us, we need say little more of it, except that when it is of a whitish or yellow colour, it is called Lucetrum, on account of the vast quantity of fiery sparks it emits with a loud crackling noise, when rubbed hard with a coarse cloth: and when of a darker hue, they give it the name of Pissasphaltum, on account of its resemblance to the Arabian mummy (31).

Its being chiefly found on the sea coasts, hath quite exploded the common notion, that the Succinum was the gum of some resinous trees; and the vast quantities which are commonly found on the coasts of Prussia, of which we have given an account in our Antient History (32), have induced some of our learned moderns to dive deeper for it, and to suppose it to be formed at least in some of the deep caverns of the earth, and being thence conveyed, by subterraneous passages, into the sea, is there washed and completed in that form and quality in which it is thrown up by its waves, and gathered in several parts of the globe. But here the great difficulty will be, how to reconcile this supposition with those quantities, which, we are told, are found in several inland parts, especially of Africa, at a vast distance from any sea (33): but this is a task, which, could it be performed with any tolerable clearness, which we much question, would carry us beyond our limits, and which we shall turn over to the patrons of that hypothesis.

(31) Labat Relat. de l'Afrique. vol. i. p. 310, & seq. vid. & Ramus. voc. sup. cit. Dapper, Davity, & al.
(32) Vol. vii. p. [410], & seq.
(33) Labat, & al. sup. citat.

a swimming on the water". Where-ever any of these, or any other of their prognostics are perceived, the people immediately flock in shoals, and scramble for and divide it amongst them; no argument having been hitherto able to prevail upon them to take up and send it to market whole as they find it, though conscious that it would greatly advance its price; the fear of being defrauded either of part of the drug, or of its price, making them overlook that advantage, and still go on in their old way *.

Natives distrust of each other.

WE come now to a still more valuable commodity, with which this part of the world abounds, and not only yields it in greater plenty, but with much less labour, than any other. We mean their gold-dust, which, in most places, lies so near the surface of the earth, that they need but scratch five or six feet deep to come at it, instead of that immense labour and danger with which that precious metal must be extracted out of the bowels of the earth, in most of those of India and America. The misfortune is, that the Portuguese, Dutch, and other Europeans, upon their first discovery of the African coasts, betrayed such an insurmountable eagerness after it, and fell into such a variety of indirect, base, and violent means of procuring and extorting it from the simple and unsuspecting natives, as could hardly fail of spreading such an universal alarm and irradicable jealousy amongst them, that nothing less would quench the insatiable thirst of their new guests after it, than the effectual possession of all their mines. The consequence of which hath been, that the inlanders, Caffers and Hottentots, have, ever since, looked upon all Europeans as equally combined to deprive them of their natural right to a treasure, which, of itself, is sufficient to procure to them all that is valuable, curious, or useful, in the other three parts of the globe, without being obliged to stir out of their own. Nor need any one wonder at this prejudice being so universally, as well as deeply, rooted in their minds, that considers what conquests and extensive settlements they have made around the whole eastern and western coasts, how far, in some, they have carried them into the inland, or with what a high and tyrannic sway they made, and have ever since maintained; those acquisitions †; much less reason will they have to be surpris'd at those wise and necessary precautions they have every-where been forced to take, both to put a stop to their further progress, and frustrate all their future attempts upon their liberties or properties, by not only excluding every stranger from penetrating into the inland, but by even massacring every one they catch attempting it; and by concealing from them, with their utmost industry, the places where any of their mines lie. But whether they have any or no, or by a stiff denial of those they have, they even carry their precaution so far, as to pretend to be utter strangers to those nations with whom they traffick for it, and pretend that it is either brought to them from far distant and unknown countries, over wild, desolate, and barren deserts, and dreadful mountains, inaccessible to any other Africans; or that it is washed down from their high mountains, by the vehement torrents of their rapid rivers, and with great labour and danger gathered up by the poor inhabitants of the low-lands, whilst the source of the one and other are equally unknown to, and inaccessible by, them. By these and the like pretences; they endeavour to amuse those merchants who come to traffick with them for it, in order to divert or deter the rest from all future attempts after a shorter way of coming at it; and they have proved so successful in it, that even the Portuguese, who have been settled so long and so far and wide amongst them, have been frequently disappointed in their search after those mines, and proved the dupes of those African princes with whom they were in the strictest alliance, in spite of all their artful politics and superior strength both on the eastern and western coasts. And the Dutch at the Cape of Good Hope have had the mortification to see those of their nation all massacred by their nearest allies among the Hottentots, who were sent in search of those countries where they trafficked for their gold, as will be further seen in the course of this history. So that, upon the whole, we may safely affirm, notwithstanding all the boasted discoveries of the Portuguese, French, &c. on this vast continent, their extensive settlements, and vast commerce, and, above all, the indefatigable pains they have taken to elude the wise precautions of the natives in this particular, the far greater part of those rich mines remain still unknown to the Europeans. The same may be said also of their extent, nature, and richness, seeing in most inland places the natives content themselves with digging up such a quantity of that metal every year, as will serve their district to send to market, and exchange for cloths, iron tools, and such other commodities as they shall want in that year; after which the mine is covered up again, and it is made death for any one to open it till the next season ‡.

Rich mines of gold.

Easily wrought.

Africans jealous of all Europeans.

WE shall therefore defer all further detail on that subject, till we come to mention such remarkable ones as fall in our way, in every kingdom or state through which our route lies. The same method we shall, for brevity sake, observe with respect to their other mines, whether * Serapion. ap. LABAT, vol. i. p. 319, & al.

LEO AFRIC. FIGAFET, CAVAZ, LABAT, & al. sup. citat.
DAPPER, LABAT, & al. sup. cit.

† Ibidem ibid.

‡ De his vide OSSOR. MARMOL,

LOPEZ, FIGAFET, RAMUS. DAVITY, of silver, copper, or other metals, minerals and other fossils; confining ourselves to such a curious and considerable ones as we shall meet in our way.

The most considerable mountains. Great and Lesser Atlas.

Mountains of the Sun and Moon.

Lakes and rivers.

Nile.

Niger or Sanaga, its vast traffick with the Europeans.

THE continent of Africa is intersected by a great variety of very considerable mountains, some famed for the vast length and excessive extent of their ridges, and branchings on each side. Of this kind are the Greater and Lesser Atlas, well known and celebrated by the ancients; the former of which stretches itself out above a thousand leagues from east to west, that is, from that of Jubal Moyes, and the coast of Mazra, about 100 leagues short of Alexandria, quite to the Atlantic ocean westward, to which it gives its name; and though in its course (in which it divides Barbary from the Biledulgerid) it be here and there interrupted by considerable chasms, yet still continues on in a direct western course to the Atlantic coast, whence it appears, at a distance off at sea, as raising itself from its sandy floor, quite up above the clouds, where it seems, according to the fable, to support the skies <sup>a</sup> (M). We defer speaking of its spacious woods, excellent verdure, fertility, rivers which spring from it, inhabitants, and other particulars, till we come to the history of Morocco. The other, or Lesser Atlas, called also Lant, but more particularly by the inhabitants Errif, is another high ridge of mountains, extending along the Mediterranean, from the streights of Gibraltar to the city of Bona, on the same coast, where we shall find a farther occasion to speak of it. Others are famed for their prodigious height, such as those called The Mountains of the Sun and Moon; the Sierra Leona, or Mountain of Lions, in Guiney, so called from the vast numbers of those fierce creatures which range at large on them. The Mountains of Chrystal, near the famed lake of Zaflan, so called from their mines of that beautiful mineral; of Salt-petre, on the like account; and these stretch themselves a great way eastward from the kingdom of Kongo. The Pico franco, a kind of branch of the Atlas, which extends itself through the middle of Caf-fraria, and through some part of the country of the Hottentots. The Table Mountain, at the Cape of Good Hope, so called from its square figure. Lastly, and to name no more here, the famed mountain of Ambara, in the empire of Abissinia, at the top of which all the princes of the royal blood were formerly confined, till called down to the crown. Of all which, and many others equally remarkable, we shall have occasion to speak more fully in the sequel of this African history.

HERE are some considerable lakes, and a much greater number of rivers which spring from, or discharge themselves into, them. The two most considerable of those lakes are those of Zaire, or Zambra, out of which spring the two great rivers of Coanja and Lelunda (N), and that of Dembea, through which the famed Nile runs across without mixing its waters with it; of both which we shall give a fuller account in their proper places, as we shall also of those and the principal rivers of this extensive continent; and shall here only subjoin the names of the most considerable, reserving, for brevity sake, the farther description of them till we come to speak of those countries which they either fertilize by their streams, or enrich by their commerce.

OF all those, the Nile hath from time immemorial, and upon many valuable accounts, obtained the first rank both among the antients and moderns. But as we have given an ample account of its spring head, course, windings, rivers it receives, and other particulars relating to it, in a former part of this work <sup>b</sup>, we shall refer our readers to it, and only add some curious remarks to what we have said of it when we come to the modern history of Egypt.

THE Niger, more commonly known by the name of Sanaga, Senegal, or Zanagal, is usually allowed the second rank. Many authors have supposed it to have been only a branch, or at least to have sprung from the same source with the Nile; and the Arabs themselves give it the name of The Nile of the Nigritians, from a fancied conformity of its waters, and its regular overflowings, and species of animals pretended to be peculiar to those two rivers; all which the reader will find abundantly confuted by the account we have elsewhere given, both of the river, its spring-head, and course, in our antient history of Nigritia <sup>c</sup>. However, as it hath been the scene of a vast and gainful commerce with that whole country, ever since the

<sup>a</sup> Vide auct. citat.

<sup>b</sup> See Anc. Hist. vol. i. p. 177. vol. vii. p. 187, & seq.

<sup>c</sup> Ibid. vol. vii. p. 164.

(M) This famous ridge, which the natives named Ayduacal, and, by way of emphasis, The High Mountains, and the Spaniards Montes Claros, whether on account of the height, or, which is more probable, from the clearness and whiteness of its summits, which appear at all times covered with snow, receives a variety of other names through the countries which it crosses, and resumes its own again at its other end (39).

(N) This lake Linschot and some other writers suppose to be the Triton, or famed Palus Tritonis, of the antients, from which flowed the no less celebrated river of that name; of both which we have already taken notice in our Ancient History (40), where the reader will see that supposition confuted, and how much nearer the source of that was to the sea than to the lake above-mentioned; and the lake itself described, with its thoroughfare for caravans.

(39) De hoc, vid Leo Afric. Marmol, Diego de Torres Ortel, Davity, Dapper, & alib. plur. Anc. Hist. vol. vi. p. 670, & seq.

(40) See

Normans

- a Normans first discovered and made some considerable settlements upon it, which the French have ever since been improving, engrossing, in a great measure, the whole traffick, which, we have good grounds to hope, will be soon wholly wrenched out of their hands by our superior naval forces, we shall think ourselves obliged to give our readers a more full account of it, as well as of its navigation, the various branches of trade that are carried on upon it, and other rivers that fall into it, the different nations of Negroes concerned in it, and the several rules and methods of exchanging their commodities with the Europeans. All which will be more properly displayed in a subsequent volume, when the course of this African history brings us regularly to the coasts of Negroeland, emphatically stiled the Golden Coast, as the Niger or Sanaga is, on account of its rich commerce, and the many navigable rivers it receives in its course, emphatically called Rio Grande, or the Great River <sup>d</sup>.

3. THE next in rank and course, in coasting southward, is the Rio del Rey, or King's River, Rio del Rey. called also Rio dos Comerones, or Crab River, and runs through that part of Negroeland which the Spaniards call Alta Terra d'Ambofi, and whose mouth lies about six leagues off the cape of that name. Others of less note on the same coast are those of Monoca, Borba, Rio del Campo, Othe s of less note ; their traffick. — de S. Beneto, and S. Juan, which last hath its entrance obstructed by a sandy bar. About twenty-two leagues farther south is the river of Gaba or Gabon, under the equator ; and about 46 minutes north the celebrated cape called Lopez Gonzalvez <sup>e</sup>. These rivers, inconsiderable Fondness of the natives for European trinkets and liquors. as they may appear, in comparison of some of those of the first rank, abound with villages and some towns on each side, whose inhabitants carry on a gainful traffick with Europe, and exchange many of their valuable commodities, as gums, elephants teeth, slaves, civet, bezoar, and gold dust, for European trinkets, as glass beads, bugles, or at best, some iron and brass tools, and frequently for brandy and other spirituous and pernicious liquors, for which they seem to have taken such an eager liking, that they will part even with their children and relations for a small quantity of them. But omitting those of lesser note, both on this and the eastern coast, which carry on much the same traffick, we shall confine ourselves to the most considerable ones, as they come in course, and make one general remark upon them ; viz. that, though our geographers and African writers are, for the most part, very sanguine in ascertaining their spring-heads, long-winded courses, &c. yet there are but very few that are navigable so high, by reason of their frequent cataracts, sands, flats, rocks, woods, and other clogs, as Courses and Springs of rivers not known. d to give one an opportunity of penetrating so far ; and as to the natives, they are too indolent and incurious, on the one hand, to trouble themselves after such searches, and by far too shy and incommunicative on the other, to impart any thing they know of them to strangers, unless it be with a view to deter them from all attempts of that kind, or deluding them upon some dangerous and desperate one, which would effectually discourage them, as they have actually done, as often as they have found a proper opportunity for it. Sailing southward The Zaire. from the river and cape de Gonzalvo, lately mentioned, the first great river we meet with is the famed Zaire, which divides the kingdom of Loango from that of Kongo, and is pretended, though without any certainty, to flow from the lake of its name, otherwise called Zembra <sup>f</sup>, and whose course becomes so rapid by the long tract of ground it passes through, its many cataracts, and especially by the several large rivers it receives into its bosom, that it is affirmed to run threescore, some say fourscore miles into the sea, before it begins to contract any of its saltnefs <sup>g</sup>. Its inundations are so vehement, that it carries all before it on both sides ; it breeds likewise vast numbers of crocodiles and sea-horses, and of a prodigious size ; which shews how far these creatures are from being peculiar to the Nile and Niger <sup>h</sup>. Other particulars relating to it will be taken notice of in the history of Kongo. Others of note running through this kingdom are the Selunda, Ambrisi, Loze, Onza, and Encocoque Matari, which last comes down with a rapid course, but hath its entrance stopped by a large bank of sand, so that no trading vessels can sail into it ; nor dare the inhabitants venture to sail on it but in slight canoes, and flat-bottom'd boats. The last we shall name belonging to this kingdom is the Danda, a very deep and large river, and navigable about 20 or 25 leagues, and carries vessels of 100 tons ; but is, like the Zaire, much infested with sea-horses and crocodiles <sup>i</sup>. It gives name to the province situate along its banks, as will be shewn in the sequel <sup>k</sup>.

THE next in course and rank is the Coanza, or Quansa, which divides the kingdom of Angola on the south from those of Kongo and Metamba on the north and north-east, and will be described more fully in the history of that kingdom, as by far the most considerable of it, both for its largeness and its commerce, though no less remarkable for its rapidity and dangerous navigation <sup>l</sup>.

<sup>d</sup> De hac, vide & DE BARROS, SANUT. RAMUS. LINSCHOT. DAVITY, DAPPER, LABAT, & al. plur.

<sup>e</sup> DAPPER, & al. sup. citat. <sup>f</sup> OD. LOPEZ Senegal, his Translation. HARTWELL in Kongo. LINSCHOT. BATTEL, apud Purchas Relat. lib. vii. c. 9. §. 2. & al. sup. citat. <sup>g</sup> See PURCHAS, ubi sup. & al.

<sup>h</sup> BATTEL, ap. Purchas, ubi sup. & alib. plur. <sup>i</sup> LA CROIX Afric. DAVITY, DAPPER, BATTEL, ubi sup. & al. <sup>k</sup> Vide LABAT ex CAVAZZI, vol. i. c. 6. <sup>l</sup> Id. ibid. vol. iv. p. 21, & seq.

Rio de las Vaccas, or Cows River.
The Catonbella.

IN the kingdom of Benguela is the famed river called by the Portuguese, Rio de las Vaccas,<sup>a</sup> or Cows River, from the vast herds which are bred along its banks, and bought by the Euro-peans, and receives another no less remarkable called Catonbella, composed of three large streams united into one, and of a saltish nature, and along whose banks the natives dig large chanel to receive its briny liquor, which is afterwards condensed into a good salt. There is likewise a good commerce carried on upon these rivers, especially the first<sup>m</sup>, as will be seen in its proper place. On the south side of Capo Negro, and almost under the tropic of Capricorn, is the mouth of the river Bembarougua, Bravagul, Coari, and some others which descend from the kingdom of Matamair, or Climbeba, and a few more along the Cafrarian, or, as they are rightly stiled, the desert coast, so seldom frequented by the Europeans, that we know very little of them till we come to that of the elephants, in the Hottentot country, of which,<sup>b</sup> and others belonging to that large tract, we shall speak more fully in its course, and shall only add here, that in this, as well as in all the inland countries on each side the eastern and western coast, there is a great number of other rivers, some of them very considerable, which spring from the high mountains of the Sun, Chrystal, &c. which, after a long course, and much winding, discharge themselves into some of the lakes, or are absorbed into some of the quick sands; some of the most remarkable of them we shall take notice of in the sequel, as they come in our way<sup>n</sup>.

Other rivers
on the coast and inland.

Those along the eastern side.

Rio del S.
Santo.

HAVING sailed round the Cape of Good Hope, and steering northward along the eastern coast, beyond that of the Hottentots, the first river of note one meets with is, that of the Holy Ghost, or Rio del Spirito Santo, which, after a long course eastward, discharges itself into the famed bay of the same name, and called by the Portuguese and Spaniards, Baya de las Aguas, on account of the goodness of its waters, and divides the Hottentot coast and country from the kingdom of Inbanban. Its course, which is very considerable, and almost directly southward, is through the kingdom of Manica, a country inhabited by a tribe of barbarous Jagas, of whom we shall speak in the sequel, and whose king, or chief, is called Cbicanga, where it is only known by the name of that kingdom, this of Rio del Santo Spirito being first given to it by the Portuguese. Its mouth and bay are likewise called by others Rio & Baya de S. Lorenzo, from its being situate over-against the southernmost verge of the great isle of St. Laurence, or Madagascar, under the 26th degree of south latitude, and about two degrees and a half south of the Cape Corientes, according to M. D'Anville. The largeness and convenience of this bay, as well as the excellence of its situation and waters, make it a place of great commerce and resort (O), and the Portuguese have a fort on one of the north capes of its mouth<sup>o</sup>.

The Inbanba.

Other rivers.

THE next in course is the river Inbanba, which runs through the kingdom of that name, and whose mouth lies about one degree north of the Cape Corientes, and directly under the tropic of Capricorn, according to the most recent observations<sup>p</sup>. North of that is the Sofala, or Cefala, which gives name to that rich kingdom, and bounds it on the south, as the Cuama, or Guama, doth on the north, both which will be spoken of in their proper place, as the most considerable on this coast; and on the same account we shall defer speaking of those few remaining ones of note on this eastern coast, which are only those of Quiloo, Mombaso, Zebea, Ampasa, Cuavo, Kilmanci, or Quilmanci, Jubo, Magadoxa, not to mention some few others, of inferior note, along the barren ones of Zanguebar and Ajan, much less a still greater number of celebrated ones in the kingdoms of Morocco, Fez, Algiers, Tunis, Tripoli, Biledulgerid, Numidia, &c. which can be no-where so properly described as in the history of those countries which they either enrich by their gainful navigation, or fertilize by their bounteous streams.

<sup>m</sup> LINSCHOT. SANUT. DAPPER, & al.
ibid.

<sup>p</sup> See D'ANVILLE's map.

<sup>n</sup> De his, vide RAMUS. DAPPER, & al. sup. citat.

<sup>o</sup> Idem

(O) This famed river, which is said to spring out of the lake of Geyamo, and to have been at first called Rio dos Lagos by the Portuguese, is also affirmed to divide its stream into two branches, after it has continued its course through the kingdom of Manica; and that the northern one is that which hath been since called Cuama, or Guama, from a fort of that name, built by the Turks, at the mouth of it, of which we shall speak in its proper place; after which separation the southern one, which still retains the old name of Manica, receives three considerable ones in its course; viz. 1. The Nagaa, so called by the inhabitants; but by the Portu- guese, St. Christopher, because discovered on that saint's festival. The second is called Lorenzo, from the pilot of that name; and both are said to flow from the Mountains of the Moon, in the province of Toroa. The third, called by the natives Arroa, or Arroe, is affirmed to come down from the northern mountains of Monomotapa, where the golden mines lie, and whence it brings down a considerable quantity of that precious metal, which is carefully gathered up at proper seasons by the inhabitants on both sides, and thence carried to market at the Bay de las Aguas (33), and exchanged for European commodities, as will be seen in the sequel.

(33) De his, vide Dapper, La Croix, Davity, & al. sup. citat.

S E C T. II.

Of the first discovery and sailing round the African Coasts by the Portuguese, and their first settlements on them.

- <sup>a</sup> WE have now gone through the topography and natural history of this vast continent, so far as was necessary to open to our readers such a general prospect of the whole, as might serve as a map, whereby to direct our gradual course through that vast number and variety of nations, kingdoms, and states, which compose it, so regularly as may best avoid confusion on the one hand, as well as a very needless repetition on the other; to facilitate which, it will be very proper to begin this section with a succinct account of the first motives, and gradual steps, of this arduous and dangerous attempt, without, however, entering into a needless enquiry how far the pretended navigations of the Egyptians, Phœnicians, Carthaginians, or other antient nations, round this large peninsula, may have contributed to encourage the Portuguese to resume and compleat it in the successful manner they have done, concerning
- <sup>b</sup> which much-controverted points, we shall refer our readers to what hath been said upon it in our Antient History <sup>a</sup>. Neither is it our intention here to ascertain the glory of the discoverers of, and settlers on, the western coast, beyond the streights of Gibraltar, in prejudice to the Genoese, Venetians, and other European nations, especially the Normans, who lay a claim to it of a much older date, which we have not failed to apprise our readers of at the very threshold of this chapter <sup>b</sup>, to avoid all suspicion of partiality.
- Whatever commerce any of them may have carried on along the Guiney coast, none that we can find ever pretend to have sailed so far on it as the Cape Verd, much less have they attempted to cross the equinoxial line, with a view of sailing round the Cape, in order to open an easier way into the East-Indies, which was the main if not the sole prospect which Don
- <sup>c</sup> Henriquez, the infanto of Portugal, and most sanguine promoter of this expedition had in view, as the most effectual means, if it succeeded, to promote a more extensive and gainful commerce with those opulent nations, than could be obtained by that of the Red Sea. He was a good astronomer, and had read, and listened with the greatest attention to every thing that had been written, or could be said, in favour of that project, as well as all that had been urged against it by the more cool and cautious of its opposers, whether courtiers, traders, or mariners. But, upon the whole, so many difficulties and determents were started by these last, from the length and expensiveness of such a voyage, the dangers of a boisterous ocean, and the uncertainty, or rather the small probability of success, besides the extreme jealousy such an enterprize, if it succeeded, would be apt to create amongst the European powers, and much more with the Othman Porte, then in possession of the Red Sea, as would have quickly quashed all the hopeful prospects of its most sanguine promoters, had not that wise and pious prince backed it with a nobler and more laudable motive than that of worldly gain, and such a one as could not fail not only of recommending it to all the devotees of his nation, but engage the pope and his whole conclave, as well as all the clergy and zealots of his church, to applaud and promote it. This was no less a one than that of enlarging far and near the kingdom of Christ, and bringing millions of souls into it, which were then the unhappy captives of Satan, and were miserably involved either in the carnal errors of Mohammedism, or in the deepest mists of gross idolatry. So that he had no sooner declared this to be the main spring and design of his intended expedition, than he saw with pleasure the mouths of its
- <sup>e</sup> most strenuous opposers effectually stopped, and his zeal cried up every-where to the skies; insomuch that some of his new-gained partisans scrupled not to affirm, that nothing less than a divine inspiration had put that glorious project into his head and heart, which consequently could not fail of a suitable success <sup>c</sup>, under so pious a conductor. They were, however, mistaken in their hopes; that prince being taken off by death, before he had gone further than making the necessary preparations for the desired expedition; which his successors moreover found themselves obliged to set aside for a considerable time, on account of some wars and other avocations which took up their whole attention; and it was not revived till the reign of king Emanuel, some years after the union of the two crowns of Spain and Portugal, by his marriage with the Spanish infanta.
- <sup>f</sup> This prince, no less politic than successful, easily comprehended the vast importance of this enterprize, and the glory as well as the advantage which the discovery of an easier passage into India would be to his crown; nor was he without hopes, from his former good fortune,

Coasts of Africa when, by whom, and on what account discovered.

Portuguese expedition promoted by Don Henriquez.

His views in it.

His death.

King Emanuel pursues the African expedition.

<sup>a</sup> Vid. int. al. vol. vii. p. 121, & alib. pass. vid. & ODARO. LOPEZ, SANUT. LINSCH. RAMUS. & al. plur.

<sup>b</sup> See before, p. 653. sub not. (C). vide LABAT, Relat. d'Afrique. vol. i. c. i.

<sup>c</sup> MARMOL, lib. i. c. 36.

OSSORIO conquests of the Portuguese, lib. i. & al. mult.

Religion his avowed motive.

Ambition his real one.

Vasco de Gama made admiral.

of making some considerable conquests both there and on the African coasts. To palliate, as well as to recommend both which to the public, he not only professed the same laudable zeal for the propagation of the gospel in those parts, that Don Henriquez had done, but added to it that of utterly extirpating Mohammedism, which had spread itself far and wide among those remote nations, and had over-run great part of Africa, and the vast and potent Christian empire of Abissinia. This was a most politic and effectual way to give to all his future expeditions, and exploits in either, the face and merit of a religious war, however oppositely carried on against the laws of nations, and the most received rules of justice and equity, as many of them will doubtless appear to every impartial reader, even from the very relations given us of them by his most dignified subjects and panegyrist<sup>a</sup>. And by these he will the more easily be enabled to discover whether of the two motives had the greatest influence, ambition and conquest, or the conversion of the Africans and Indians; and will, at once, account for that irreconcilable abhorrence they have ever since retained to the very name of Praguay, or Portuguese: but to proceed:

EMANUEL, encouraged by these promising prospects, as well as by the success which Don Henriquez had met with in his first attempts, who had, before his death, discovered and reduced several islands on that western coast (A), and penetrated above 70 leagues beyond the famed Cape Non, formerly mentioned, lost no time to revive so noble a design; and his intention of pursuing it were no sooner known, than he saw himself furnished with a more than sufficient number of the most expert commanders and ablest sailors, ready to receive his instructions and commands, and embark in that meritorious enterprize.

We shall not here so far anticipate on the history of Portugal, as to enter into a detail of the preparations which were made for this grand expedition, but only relate the success of it so far as regards this African coast, the command of which was given to the celebrated Vasco de Gama, a gentleman every way qualified for such an arduous and hazardous enterprize, and who accordingly prepared for the voyage, having previously obtained of the king permission to take his brother Paul with him, a man of no less conduct and resolution; and having received his majesty's last instructions, went on board, attended with throngs of his

<sup>a</sup> De his, vide GOMEZ JAQUEZ Hist. of Portug. & BARROS's Decads. Bp. OSSOR. LEO, MARMOL, & al.

(A) The first person whom that prince had sent upon this discovery was called Johan Gonzales, who was cast by stress of weather upon a desert island, which he caused to be colonied, and called Puerto Santo, or Holy Haven, and gave the government of it to Bartholomeu Perez Tritto, who found in it a very healthy air, a fruitful soil, and excellent watering. After this, Gonzales, in company with Tristan Vaz, sailed in quest of a much larger one which they had descried, and called Madeira, on account of its vast mountains, covered with timber trees. On their return, they obtained the joint government of it; one part, since called Fonchal, fell to John Gonzales, and the other, called Madraco, to Tristan Vaz. Three years after, that is, an. 1423, Gil Yagnez, another of the infant's commanders, discovered the cape Bajadore, and returned thither on the year following, in company with Alonzo Gonzales Baldada; and, having doubled that cape, came to the Angra dos Ruivos, or Bay of Roches. On the next year they proceeded farther to another bay, where they sent two of their cavaliers to land, to make what discoveries they could. These met with about a score of armed Moors, whom they briskly attacked, in hopes of carrying off some of them to their ship to gain intelligence from; but were so bravely repulsed, that they were forced to betake themselves to their ship, one of them having received a wound, on which account they gave that bay the name of Agra dos Cavalleros.

This was the last expedition that was made by Don Henriquez; after which the design was set aside on account of his death; and king Edward his successor, being an infant, and other obstructions happening to the design, it was suspended till the year 1440, or rather 1441, when Don Henriquez sent again two fresh vessels, under the command of Antonio Gonzales and Nugnes Tristan, one of whom sailed as far as Cape Blanco, and the other to Cabo Cavallero, on account of a skirmish he had at land with some Moors, one of whom he took prisoner, and brought him to Lisbon.

This success encouraged some Algarvan adventurers to beg leave to try their fortune on the same coast, in six caravals, commanded by Lancelot, a domestic of that prince, who, on the year following, sent thither a man of war, under the command of Vincent de Lagos, with one Ludovic Cadamosto, a Venetian gentleman, from whose journal our author hath extracted the account of this expedition, which concluded in the discovery of the river of Senaga, and the island of Arguin, upon which last the prince ordered a fort to be erected; the other says it was not done till the reign of king Alphonso. Two years after, that is, an. 1445, Vincent de Lagos, and his Venetian, discovered the isles of Cape Verd, and gave the name of Bona Vista to the first. Don Henriquez died on this year, on the third of November, but they went on still with their discoveries, the first of which was the river Rha Sunne, called Caramanca, the Golden River, the Rio Grande, and the Rio del Nuguez Trisiran, in all which they met with some opposition from the Moors, and were obliged to kill many of them in their own defence, if one may allow them so mild a term; and on the same year 1446, another of his captains, named Alvares Hernandez, having discovered the Cape Mosto, and sailed above 100 leagues beyond the Cape Verd, made a descent upon the coast, and being opposed by the lord of that province, killed him with his own hand. They all returned to Portugal on the same year, where they found king Alphonso V. so taken up with his war in Barbary, that he had no time to pursue the discovery of the African coasts during his whole reign; so nothing was done of that kind, if we except the discovery of the Azores, about an. 1447, as appears by a grant of his to the inhabitants of that of St. Michael, and the old project of sailing round Africa set aside, till that of his successor, as will be seen in the sequel. Thus much we thought necessary to say concerning the first formers and encouragers of that grand project, and the encouragement which these first attempts gave to king Emanuel to pursue it with all possible vigour, till he saw it happily completed (1).

(1) De his, vide Orl. Lopez. Juan de Barros, Gomez Jaquez, Marmol, lib. i. c. 36. Dapper, Ossor. & al. plur. relations a relations and friends, all in tears, and expressing as deep a grief as if they had accompanied him to his grave, or rather to his execution ; such was the dreadful idea they had of this hazardous enterprize ; infomuch, that he could not refrain from shedding some reciprocal streams at parting from them. Grief of his friends at parting with him.

He went on board with his brother, and, among other proper materials and conveniencies for his grand design, was provided with ten malefactors, who had been condemned to die, but were pardoned, on condition they submitted to go along with him, and to be left in any place where he should think fit, there to make the best observations they could on the country, inhabitants, &c. against his return, and to give him an account of them.

b His little fleet consisted only of four ships, his commission being only to make discoveries, and not conquests, in those parts he was sailing to. Vasco had the flag ship ; Paul was captain of the second ; Nicholas Calo the third, and Gonzales Nunez the fourth. All four together set sail from Lisbon, on the 9th day of July 1497, and steered their course for the Canaries, and thence to the island of St. Jago, lying under the 14th degree of south latitude. Whence steering directly south-east, being terribly harrassed by continual storms during near three months, they came at last in sight of some land ; and Calo having luckily fallen on the mouth of a river of fresh water, which they began to be in want of, they all made towards it for a fresh supply, and found it abound likewise with sea-calves. Here they were accosted by some of the natives, whom they presented with clothes, small looking-glasses, and other European trinkets : in return for which they brought them some of their provisions and commodities, and continued doing so with great chearfulness and confidence, though only by signs. Arrive on the coast.
c At last one of the Portuguese having, by his imprudence, given them a false alarm, drove them away in a panic into their woods ; from whence returning with their arms, a dreadful scuffle ensued, in which Vasco received a wound in his foot with one of their weapons (B), whilst he and some of his officers were on shore, and busied in taking the altitude of the sun, which obliged them to retire to their ships. They gave the bay, as usual, the name of St. Helen, and that of St. Jago to the river, it being on the festival of these two saints that they had discovered them. and exchange some presents with the natives.
Has a scuffle with some of them.

THIS, however, was but a small scantling, in comparison of what Vasco and his men underwent in their course towards the Cape, where they had not only much more boisterous storms to encounter, but, which added to the horror as well as danger, a dreadful darkness, which reigns in these parts at that season of the year. He met with a still more dangerous, though more secret, enemy, in the baseness of his dastardly men, who, wholly unacquainted with those boisterous seas, having, in vain, endeavoured by the most pathetic entreaties, which their fears and despair could inspire them with, to divert him from pursuing his course, at the imminent danger of his and their lives, had at length formed a conspiracy against him. But, happily for him, his brother Paul being informed of it, found means to prevent its taking effect ; soon after which the wind and weather taking a different turn, he, to their real surprize and joy, doubled the Cape on the 20th of November following. The farther they proceeded on this new coast, the more they were enlivened and invited by the verdant and fruitful prospects of it, and the vast multitudes of men and variety of cattle which they descried upon it ; the men in particular, appearing by their garb and gestures, hair and complexion, very like those they had seen at St. Helen's bay <sup>e</sup>. These were the Hottentots, till then unknown and undiscovered by the Europeans, and of whom we shall give a fuller account in the sequel of this book. Vast difficulty in doubling the Cape.
A conspiracy is formed against him, but is defeated.
Their joy and success after it.

THEY now chearfully continued their course northward, and came to a new bay, which they called the bay of St. Blas, in the innermost part of which was an island, in which they took in a fresh provision of water. The inland appeared to them very fertile, abounding with large elephants and oxen ; the latter of which the inhabitants made use of instead of horses, by clapping pack-saddles on their backs. On the 8th of December they were again alarmed with a sudden storm, which drove them out of sight of the land, but which was quickly over ; and they, having regained the coast, kept steering near the shore, till the 10th of January, when they descried a small island, at about 230 miles from their last watering-place, whose tall trees and agreeable verdure, intermixed with a variety of cattle, invited them, as the sea was then calm, and of sufficient depth, to approach nearer to it. He came accordingly to anchor near it, and observed the natives to be tall, stately, and of a graceful appearance, and had more gaiety in their dress than any he had yet seen ; they wore bracelets on their arms, Came to the cape of St. Blas.
Grateful discoveries on the land.

<sup>f</sup> LOPEZ, SANUT. LINSCHOT. RAMUSIO, MARMOL, DAPPER, OSSORIO, & al. mult. <sup>e</sup> Idem ibid.

(B) These, it seems, were no other than long spears, whirled round, and thrown with equal dexterity and headed with a sharp piece of horn ; but which being strength, wound as deep as the sharpest javelin (2).

Some of the natives come on board, whom he elegantly entertains.

Others come on board, whom he treats well, and from whom he receives some useful informations.

His narrow escape from Mosambico.

brazen helmets on their heads, and broad swords hanging by their sides with ivory handles, and scabbards not unneatly made. All these fair prospects induced him to send one of his men, well versed in languages, on shore, with presents and compliments to the chief, or king; who returned highly satisfied with the reception he had met with, and brought back with him such presents and refreshments as that country afforded. And here he thought proper to leave two of those exiles with them, which we lately mentioned, to give him what intelligence they could get of that coast and country<sup>b</sup>. He was no less pleased at the next place he came to, which was the mouth of a large river, whose banks on each side were covered with fruit trees, and which they descried on the 5th of January in the evening, and waited impatiently for the return of day-light to have a fuller view of it. Accordingly on the next morning they were agreeably surpris'd, not only with its charming prospect, but with the number of natives which approached their ship in their small boats, and with an air of peace and friendship. Gama failed not to express his delight by the kind reception he gave them, and the elegant manner in which he entertained some of their principal men on board his ship. The misfortune was, that they had no other way of conversing but by signs, and he wanted to receive some information concerning his route to the East-Indies. At last one amongst them, by the help of some broken Arabic, made shift to give him to understand, that, in a country a little farther up that coast, from which he was but lately come, he would find some ships of the same bulk and make as his were. This was a welcome piece of news to the Portuguese: Gama made them some handsome presents, and sent them back, cloathed in silk. He caused a cross, with the arms of Portugal under it, to be erected on that coast, and called that river Rio de bon Signial, or River of good Omen. Gama, though impatient to sail in search of this wished-for country, was obliged to stay to refit his little navy, and give his sick men some further respite, and did not sail till the 24th of February; nor did they meet with any thing worth notice till the first of March, when Calo, the captain of the third ship, gave him a signal that he had discovered four islands at a small distance from each other, and seven vessels in full sail from one of them, and bearing towards him, as knowing him, by his flag, to be the admiral. They came up accordingly, and upon their approach, gave a great shout, and hailed him in the Arabic tongue, and, as they came up to him, began to play on flutes and other kinds of musical instruments. The men were of a blackish complexion, like those they had seen, but of a genteeler make, and courteously congratulated him in Arabic on his arrival in those parts. Gama returned their compliments with his usual politeness, and, having invited some of them on board his ship, gave them a very elegant entertainment, during which he ordered some of his men, who understood Arabic, to enquire of them what that island was from which they came, and what was the best course for him to sail to India. To the first they answered, that the island was called Mosambico; that it was subject to the king of Quiloa, who kept a governor in it, whom he invested with great authority: that one part of it was inhabited by Saracens, and that it was one of the greatest marts upon that coast, for ships that sailed thither from Arabia, Persia, and India. They told him moreover, that he had passed by a rich country called Sofala, which abounded with mines of gold. To his other question they answered, that he must steer his course to Calicut, and told him that he might easily get expert pilots that would conduct him thither; and acquainted him how distant it was from that island. All which was joyfully and thankfully received by the admiral and his Portuguese, who now began to hope to see shortly all their fatigues and dangers crowned with success.

We shall find a more proper place to speak of these islands, and other kingdoms and states along this coast, in the sequel of our history<sup>1</sup>. All this while these Arabs, who were all zealous Mohammedans, had no suspicion of his being a Christian, much less a Portuguese, but took him and his company for trading Moors from Barbary; and finding him, by the reception he gave them, and the valuable presents he made to them, to be a man of a greater generosity than any they had ever met with among the whole Moorish nation, were willing to encourage it in their turn, by giving him the best directions they could, and flattering him with the most promising prospect of success. He found them not only the more communicative on that account, but, to his great surprize, more expert sailors, and better furnished with all kinds of maritime instruments than he expected; and they parted extremely satisfied with each other.

WHETHER these Arabs were sent by the governor of that island to enquire who they were, we are not told; but at their return they gave him such an account of the generous reception they had met with, as quickly induced him to pay them a speedy visit in person; which he accordingly did on the next day, in great pomp, and with a brilliant attendance, and was received on board with a suitable magnificence. But here, unfortunately for Gama, the governor, who was no less zealous a Mohammedan, quickly perceived, by some questions he put to him about it, and his illusory answers, that he was a Praguay, or at least a Christian, and, a from that moment, resolved to destroy him and his fleet. We shall give a fuller account of this adventure in the history of that island; the result of which was, that Gama, with great difficulty, escaped, and made all the sail he could northwards towards Quiloa, according to the intelligence he had gained from his Arabic guests; but meeting with a contrary wind, was driven back to an island they had sailed by in their flight from Mosambico. This, however, proved a fortunate repulse; for he there met with another Arabian going to Mecca, whom he took on board with him, finding him an expert pilot, and well acquainted with that coast, and, by his assistance, and that of another experienced mariner, whom his brother Paul had carried off in the late scuffle at Mosambico, set sail again for Quiloa, with his other two ships, (the fourth he had brought with him being only a store ship, and now exhausted, he had

<sup>b</sup> Iidem ibid.

<sup>1</sup> LOPEZ, LINSCHOT. MARMOL, & al. sup. citat.

b caused to be burnt some time before); but, though he had a fair wind, could not possibly make that port, which was supposed to be owing to some error or mis-reckoning, but much more likely, as the sequel will shew, to the knavery of the pilot which his brother had forced away from Mosambico, and so steered directly for Mombaso, which he told him was much the fitter place for him, for the reception of sick men, it being, he told him, chiefly inhabited by Christians; so that Gama, whether persuaded or necessitated, was forced to follow his advice, a great number of his men being grievously afflicted with variety of distempers, and several others were already dead of them. Accordingly, he was no sooner come within sight of the town, than he received the kindest and most pressing invitations from the king to come to an anchor, and to come on shore with his men, in order to fix such an advantageous commerce

c with him, as would save him the trouble of a longer and more hazardous voyage as that to India, to which they understood he was bound. They likewise extolled the goodness of their country, fertility of their soil, healthiness of their air, and, above all, the high notions which their king had conceived of the Portuguese admiral, and of his nation; all which was no other than a deep-laid plot, to which if he had given way, it must have ended in his inevitable ruin, as will be seen in its proper place. But here his good fortune saved him once more, and an accident, which prevented his ship from proceeding farther towards the harbour, and obliged him to make a signal to the rest to weigh anchor, gave the conscious pilot a sudden suspicion that their design was discovered: to avoid the fatal consequences of which, he immediately jumped over-board, and swam to the shore with all the speed he could, and gained it without

d any opposition, in spite of all Gama's endeavours to have him stopped, and brought back to him, by those in the adjacent boats. From all which it plainly appeared that the Mombasan king, having been apprised of what had happened at Mosambico, had laid this plot to get him into his hands, and put a final stop to all his farther discoveries<sup>k</sup>.

As soon, therefore, as Gama could get clear of that dangerous bay, which took him up about two days more; during which that prince, vexed to see his scheme defeated, made several fruitless attempts to get his cables cut from his anchors in the dead of night; he resumed his course northwards towards Melinda, and, in his way, took a Saracen vessel, fourteen of whose men he detained prisoners, to supply his want of hands, and dismissed the rest. One of them, who bore a more promising appearance than the rest, he carefully examined,

e and found him a man very fit for his purpose, and very likely to be of great use to him in the prosecution of his voyage, and him he resolved to keep, and shew a particular regard to. Nothing remarkable happened to them in their way to Melinda, where they happily arrived on Easter day. Here fortune stood again his friend, and the lucky juncture which had preceded his arrival, procured him a better reception than what he had met with at Mosambico or Mombaso, or indeed, than he had reason to hope for, as well from his former treatment as from the Saracen capture he had lately made; and which, if known there, must create no small jealousy both to the king and kingdom. The Saracen lately mentioned, perceiving his uneasiness, offered to go on shore and sound the king and court, and give them to understand that the four vessels which came into that port were bound for India, and that the admiral,

f who was a Christian, having near finished his business, would quickly set sail, in order to pursue his voyage<sup>l</sup>. We shall anticipate here the history of that kingdom, so far only as to tell our reader that the proposal was accepted by Gama, and that he executed his commission with such success, and gave so advantageous an account of those strangers, that the king, who was advanced in years, and too weak in body to go in person to pay a visit to the admiral, sent his presumptive son and heir, with a magnificent retinue, to pay him his compliments, and to invite him to come on shore; which being declined by him, as inconsistent with his commission from the king of Portugal, he contented himself with coming nearer in his long-boat, and taking a view of that metropolis and its excellent situation; and after many mutual assurances of friendship, presents, and other civilities, and being furnished by the young prince

g with an able pilot, and other necessaries, he set sail for Calicut, on the 22d of April, not without having made him a previous promise to take Melinda in his way, upon his return from

<sup>k</sup> Iidem ibid.<sup>l</sup> Iidem ibid.

Departure for India.

India. They resumed their course northwards accordingly, highly satisfied with their success, a and continued that rout till they had crossed the line, and began again to have a view of the polar star; when veering eastwards towards that desired island, the Melindan pilot, being well acquainted with it, assured them that they were come in sight of it.

It is time now to take our leave of him for a while, and leave him to pursue his voyage into a new part of the world, the description and history of which we have before related, and where his success laid the foundation for those vast conquests and opulent settlements, which his countrymen have since made in so many parts of it, as the reader may see in the full and ample account we have endeavoured to give of it in a preceding volume <sup>m</sup>. Whilst those discoveries which he made around the African coasts ended, as we have seen, soon after his departure from Melinda; of which, however, he took such care to dispatch a particular detail b to the court of Portugal, as filled it with inexpressible joy. King Emanuel in particular conceived such great hopes of succeeding in this grand design from this happy beginning, that he lost no time, nor spared any cost, to pursue it with all possible vigour and speed, and a suitable number of vessels and able commanders, with orders to follow the track of their predecessor, to revisit every African place he had come to, and by no means to pass by the governor of Mosambico and king of Mombaso, without giving them some tokens of the Portuguese resentment. They were, in the last place, to complete the discovery of the western coast, and to double the cape of Guardafuy, in order to penetrate as far as they could beyond the straits of Babel Mandel, into the Red Sea; for that they were not now sent merely to make discoveries, but settlements, alliances, and conquests, as opportunity offered, where-ever they c came; and to take every proper measure to enlarge the Portuguese dominions, spread their fame, enlarge their commerce, and propagate the Christian faith all over the whole world. How wonderfully and successfully these extensive orders were executed in the East Indies, we have seen in the history of those countries, more particularly in the volume last quoted; and how exactly and faithfully they were followed in the continent of Africa, will be likewise seen in the subsequent volume. All this while the king was no less diligent in sending other vessels, to carry on the same designed discoveries along the western coasts, from the river Senaga and the Gold Coast southwards, quite to Cape Negro and beyond, almost to that of Good Hope, which Bartholomew Dias is said to have doubled, but to have been frightened by the violent storms and dark weather from proceeding farther. On this coast they likewise made considerable settlements, particularly in the kingdoms of Kongo, Angola, and Benguela, of which d we shall likewise speak in a proper place.

Gama makes new discoveries on his return.

In the mean time Vasco de Gama being returned from his Indian expedition, and remembering that he had left a great part of the eastern coast unvisited, resolved to resume his course as much higher to the northward as he conveniently could, in order to complete his discovery of it. The first place he came to was the city of Magadoxa, capital of the kingdom of that name, lying about two degrees north of the equinoxial line, on the coasts of Ajan; which place, being inhabited, as he was informed, by Mohammedan Arabs, he caused to be bombarded, and its walls to be destroyed, as well as the ships that were in the harbour. From thence he hastened to re-visit the good old king of Melinda, according to his former promise, where he e only staid to take on board an ambassador from that monarch to the court of Portugal; and hence he set sail five days after, being afraid of losing the season for doubling the Cape of Good Hope, and happily arrived at Lisbon, in the beginning of May 1499, and met with a gracious reception from the king and court, having but 55 men left of the 148 that set out with him, and they so dreadfully emaciated and worn out with sickness and fatigue, that their relations could hardly know them. Thus ended this celebrated expedition, and the discovery of the greatest part of the African coast, which was soon after gradually completed by the famed Pedro Alvarez, Cabral, the great Albuquerque, and others of his successors, of which we shall speak in the sequel.

Arrives at Lisbon.

<sup>m</sup> See before, vol. iv. p. 107. & seq.

C H A P. II.

The Modern History of Africa, and of the various nations under whose government it hath been, since the expulsion of the Romans by the Vandals.

- <sup>a</sup> OUR readers, we doubt not, will easily perceive, by the title of this chapter, the subject of it is not to extend itself to the whole African continent, much less to give a particular detail of that vast variety of governments into which it is divided, each of which, at least as far as they are known to us, will be more properly seen and described under their proper heads, in the prosecution of this twenty-first book; but is confined only to that part of it which had been conquered by the Romans, and that so far only as is necessary to connect its modern with the antient part, in such a manner as that there may be no chasm left between them, or any thing omitted that is worthy our reader's notice; for though we did not conclude the antient African history with the coming of the Vandals and expulsion of the Romans, but continued our account of the bloody wars they waged against each other; yet, as most of those hostilities consisted chiefly in the invasion and ravaging of the former dominions and conquests, all which were carried far enough from those of the latter<sup>a</sup>, the most material transactions relating to their settlements and new erected monarchy in this part of the world were there omitted, as foreign to the Roman, and more properly belonging to this African history. However, as in the former, we have been under a necessity, in order to keep the thread of it, to anticipate some occurrences which were more nearly related to this latter, so, in the prosecution of this, whenever there is a necessity of repeating any thing that hath been formerly said, we shall take care to do it in as few words as the subject will admit of, without being maimed, and direct our readers, by proper references, to the places where they may find them at full length.
- <sup>c</sup> THE occasion of this Vandalic expedition, and of their founding this new monarchy, we have elsewhere shewn<sup>b</sup>. Genferic, or, as Jornandes and other Latin authors write his name, Gizericus<sup>c</sup>, a warlike prince of that nation, had scarce succeeded his brother Gunderic in the kingdom of Galicia, when he was invited into this part of Africa, by the then revolted count Bonifacio; and, attracted by his advantageous offers, and more perhaps by his own ambitious views, readily agreed to sail over to them*; and, having provided himself with a sufficient number of transports, for himself and his Vandals, amounting, according to some, to 80,000, but according to others, only to 24,000 (A), ordered them all, men, women, and children, on board, and sailed over the streights of Gadez, now Gibraltar, with them, and soon after landed on the coasts of Barbary, in the month of May.
- <sup>d</sup> IN the mean time Bonifacio, whom necessity and self-preservation alone had engaged in this revolt, as the only means left to defend himself against the black intrigues of the treacherous Ætius, having made his innocence appear at the imperial court, and being re-admitted into favour, was as much grieved at his arrival as he had been anxious and pressing for it, and left no means, offers, nor splendid promises untried, to prevail upon him to sail back with his Vandals into Spain; but had the mortification to find his proposals rejected with the utmost disdain, and to see him resolutely bent upon settling himself and his barbarians in that part of the world, and not only to lay the foundation of his new kingdom, but lead thence his victorious arms into the heart of Italy. We have elsewhere shewn how successful he proved in all his expeditions, and what horrid plunder and ravages he committed, not only there, in Sicily, and other parts of the empire, but even in Rome itself<sup>d</sup>.
- <sup>e</sup> THE foundation of this Vandalic monarchy proved no less, if not rather more fatal an epocha to the Africans of those parts; for however small the difference may be in other respects between a Roman and Vandalian yoke, the Arian heresy, which that prince not only introduced, but propagated with a more barbarian zeal than he did in his other conquests, failed not to turn it, in a little while, into a scene of the most dreadful and inhuman outrages and persecutions

The design of this chapter.

To what part of Africa confined.

The Vandal kingdom, when, and by whom founded. Genferic invited into Africa, 428.

Sails thither with his army.

His vast success against the Romans.

Founds a monarchy in Barbary.

<sup>a</sup> See Anc. Hist. vol. vi. p. 481, & seq. reb. Getic. c. 33.

<sup>b</sup> Ibid. & vol. vii. p. 527, & seq.

<sup>c</sup> JORNAND. de

* See Anc. Hist. vol. vi. p. 481, & seq. vol. vii. p. 532, & seq. <sup>d</sup> Ibid. vol. vi. p. 501, & seq. vol. vii. p. 533, & seq. JORNAND. ubi sup. VICTOR. Uticenf. de Perfec. Vand. PROCOF. de Bello Vandal. & al. plur.

(A) This may probably enough account for that difference of numbers which we find in the historians of those times; and the lesser might, in all likelihood, be that of his fighting men, and the largest that of their numerous train of women and children, with which those northern nations were wont to incumber themselves, as well as with a great deal of other useless lumber, in all such expeditions, which required besides an additional one of servants or slaves, and beasts of burthen; according to which supposition the total of 80,000 will just bear a near proportion to that of 24,000.

Hatred against the orthodox Africans,

instigated by the idolatrous Moors.

Resolution and success against the Romans.

Destroys all the noble Roman works.

King Gen-seric's character.

A full testimony of his horrid cruelties to the orthodox.

against the orthodox, and especially the clergy, of whatever rank or distinction, either for learn-<sup>a</sup> ing or piety; or, to speak more properly, these proved the greatest objects of his cruelty, not only on account of the noble and laudable defence they made against him, as an invader, a barbarian, a heretic, and apostate, but much more so on account of the numerous conversions they had made among the idolatrous Moors; for by this time the unconverted Africans, especially their priests and princes, a set of ignorant and superstitious idolaters, had, on that account, taken such effectual means to exasperate him against the Romans in general, and more particularly against the clergy, by their loud complaints and bitter invectives against both, as well as by the readiness they expressed to join forces with and assist him against them, that he was easily determined to set about the total extirpation both of the one and of the other, out of all his conquered dominions. And the better to assure them of his resolution, and to<sup>b</sup> attach them to his interest, he declared to them, that they should be from thenceforth the executioners of his resentment on all orthodox recusants, and their pastors, whilst himself pursued his successes against the shattered remains of their forces, till he had extirpated the very name and memory of them out of Africa. Here fortune so far favoured his designs, that he quickly saw the country quite rid of them, and himself at full liberty to turn his whole resentment against the African church and clergy, as well as against all the standing monuments of the late Roman prowess, committing the most cruel outrages and devastations in all these countries where they had seated themselves, not only upon the prisoners that fell into his hands, but against the poor innocent inhabitants. These were soon after followed by the utter<sup>c</sup> demolition and destruction of all the stately structures, both public and private, and all other valuable and sumptuous works, which those proud conquerors were wont to rear where-ever they extended their dominions, as trophies and monuments of their power and grandeur.
Among which, those they had left in this part of the world were in nothing inferior either for number or magnificence, as may be easily judged by the many ruins and sad remains which are still to be seen, and of which we have given an account in our Antient History, of this once celebrated part of the Roman dominions<sup>e</sup>. So that whatever monuments these had been at so immense care and charge to erect, to eternize their own glory, those haughty barbarians were no less lavish of their time and labour to demolish and obliterate, and reduce into ruinous heaps, to be so many lasting trophies of their own.

GENSERIC, or, as Jornandes and other cotemporary authors write it, Gizeric, is repre-<sup>d</sup> sented by them as a prince of as impenetrable a reach, as immeasurable ambition; and no less inhuman to his nearest blood, whenever it stood in competition with either<sup>f</sup>. Neither was he less intrepid and immovable than successful in his designs: witness his victories and conquests over the Romans, and the singular disregard he shewed to the emperor Leo's menaces and complaints, for which he had given so many just occasions, and more particularly by his repeated ravages on the islands of Peloponnesus, which, with other instances of his hurtful stratagems, and breach of faith with them, having been fully displayed in our Antient History<sup>g</sup>, we need only repeat here as historical facts of consequence, as no inconsiderable proofs, or concurring testimonies, of what we are now going to relate concerning his inhuman treatment of so many venerable and learned bishops, clergy, and laymen, on the mere account of their steady<sup>e</sup> adherence to the Nicene faith. It will at least convince an impartial reader, that what we have here abstracted from the consentient report of so many credible historians of those times, with respect to the dreadful indignities and persecutions which those pious sufferers were made to undergo, during a great part of his reign, are so perfectly consistent with all his other actions, as well as with his ambitious and bloody character, that they may be justly acquitted from the charge of having exaggerated them, though we cannot so easily absolve them from that fault with regard to what they relate of unparalleled constancy, and extatic joys, which those pious martyrs expressed under them; much less about the surprising miracles which some of them tell us accompanied and decorated their exile and inhuman treatment.

HAVING thus far prefaced the occurrences of this part of his reign, which (as all the other<sup>f</sup> remarkable particulars of it were transacted far enough out of his new African dominions, and are foreign to this section), are the only ones we have left to relate concerning it, we shall beg leave to remind our readers, that even this part of it, however interesting it may appear to some of them, being more properly the subject of a martyrology, or an ecclesiastical history, we may justly dispense with expatiating farther upon it than is consistent with our original plan.
Instead, therefore, of leading the reader through a complicated variety of the most dreadful scenes of furious zeal and barbarity on the one hand, and undeserved sufferings and misery on the other, we hope it will be thought sufficient, if we confine our account to a short

<sup>e</sup> See int. al. vol. vii. ubi supra, vid. & SHAW, POCOCK, NORDEN, & al.
p. 481. vid. & JORNANDES, c. 33, & seq. PROCOP. CEDREN. IDAT. & al. plur.
p. 508, & seq. vol. vii. p. 537. & seq. & auct. sup. citat.

<sup>f</sup> See Anc. Hist. vol. vi.
<sup>g</sup> Anc. Hist. vol. vi.

a abstract or summary of that famed persecution, without entering farther into the particulars of it than is barely necessary to give them a general idea of the whole *.

How long it was after Genferic's landing on this coast, before the effects of his rage against the orthodox broke out in that public manner, and to that amazing heat, our authors are not agreed; but probably, not till he had obliged the Romans to cede to him all his conquests in that part by a treaty formerly mentioned †: though the strenuous and universal opposition he met with from some of their clergy, joined to the malicious instigations of the idolatrous Moors, lately mentioned, may be supposed to have inspired him with such a resolution long before; and, in the mean while, to have pushed him on to treat all those of the church that fell into his hands with the severest marks of his hatred and resentment. But being now arrived at his height of glory and conquest, his arms dreaded by the Romans, and no other power left to controul him, he quickly gave a full scope to his ambition and revenge, by a general proscription of all the orthodox, by shutting up all their churches, seizing the fairest of them for the service of his Arians, converting others to secular and even viler uses, and demolishing others, especially such as were built after the Roman taste, and rebuilding them, or others elsewhere, after the Gothic way. He not only deprived the bishops and all ecclesiastics, both secular and regular, of their dignities and revenues, and plundered their cathedrals, monasteries, chapels, &c. of their sacred ornaments and utensils, without distinction, but ordered their sacred books, as well as those which belonged to the church, their missals, breviaries, homilies, &c. to be seized and burnt; which violences being strenuously opposed by the good Valerianus, a venerable bishop of eighty years of age, he was immediately stripped of his dignities, and all that he had, and banished, naked and destitute, out of his dominions. In the like manner, and on the same account, he condemned many of their most dignified owners for zeal, learning, and piety, to an exile far more dreadful than death, and aggravated with every circumstance of horror and cruelty; whilst the rest of them, with their helpless flocks, were turned out of all, and left to wander about, dispersed and destitute of all comfort; so that those whose zeal, learning, or merit, had prompted his fury to accelerate their martyrdom, though by the most excruciating and ignominious deaths, as many of them had been, in the height of his fury and jealousy, were esteemed to have shared by far the milder doom. The places which were pitched upon for their banishment, and the scenes of their sufferings, were some of the most barren and horrid deserts of Barbary, some of which we shall have occasion to mention in the sequel of this book, and such as belonged to the idolatrous Moorish princes lately spoken of.

The guards who were to conduct them thither, were the subjects of those chiefs, now either in alliance with, or tributary to, the Vandalic king, and their most embittered enemies next to him; and who, from their innate hatred to them, as well as to recommend themselves the more to his favour, made them undergo alike the most cruel fatigues, and intolerable indignities and miseries, during a long and painful route through wild, rocky, and unfrequented ways, sufficient of themselves to make them experience the most insupportable miseries under such a merciless escort. Not only the sick, blind, lame, and maimed, but even the superannuated, and worn out with extreme old age and infirmities, many of them scarcely able to stand on their feet, were yet forced, by dint of blows and other inhuman treatment, to crawl along with the rest, until they sunk or expired under their load of misery; which whenever any of them did, as was the case of many hundreds, their relentless guards were, we are told, ordered to tie their hands and feet, and leave them thus exposed to the beasts and birds of prey, with which those parts greatly swarm, and to pursue their march with the rest § (B).

We leave it to our readers to judge how small a number of this numerous, and for the most part invalid company, must be supposed to have reached their doleful exile under all these disadvantages, and, to most of them, insurmountable difficulties, as well as the extreme misery of those who were unfortunate enough to outlive them, only to be turned over to greater dangers and sufferings, and such as none but those, who either by experience or read-

* De his, vide JORNAND, c. 33. PROCOPIUS de Bello Vandal. VICTOR Utiensis. CEDREN. & al. † Anc. Hist. vol. vii. p. 533, & seq. CEDREN. LASIUS, GRAMMAY, MARMOL, & al. plur. § Idem ibid.

(B) The generality of authors who have written upon this subject affirm, that this inhuman order was given by the king to their no less barbarous conductors. Some of them even add, that he ordered them to tie all that could not walk by the feet, and to drag them along through thorny and rocky ways, till first their clothes, next their skins, and, last of all, their flesh, were torn off from their bones. Nevertheless, when we consider that they could hardly be known to them but by the treatment they meet with from the Moors, and we find no instance of any such atrocious cruelty during his reign, but rather of his relenting, both with respect to the orthodox and to the Romans, as we shall see in the sequel, we rather think that, if any such orders were given, it must be by his son and successor, who proved by far the worst and most implacable enemy to both.

ing are thoroughly acquainted with the nature of those wild and inhospitable deserts, and their still wilder and more destructive inhabitants, can possibly conceive <sup>a</sup>.

BUT here, in the midst of all the preparations for this dismal tragedy, an occurrence happened, which not only suspended the execution of it, during the short remainder of his reign, but seemed to promise no less than that it would be wholly set aside, and that the king began indeed to relent of his innate barbarity. Zeno, now raised to the imperial throne, had been forced to clap up a peace with Genferic, by which he renounced all claim to his African conquests, and yielded them wholly to him and his descendants *; but being now more afraid of his arms than ever, on account of a strict alliance he had since made with the warlike Odoacer, had thought fit, by way of precaution, to send an embassy to him to confirm the former peace.

Severus sent ambassador to him.
Renews the peace with him.

THE person appointed for this commission was named Severus, a senator no less esteemed for his uprightness and generosity, than admired for his politeness and address; with whose singular prudence and behaviour Genferic was so highly pleased, that he readily complied with all his proposals; and being now well advanced in years, and desirous, on that account, to leave his son and successor Huneric, in the quiet possession of his new-founded kingdom, gladly embraced that opportunity of confirming his former treaties with him; and hence it is presumed that the politic Severus found means, by his frequent conferences with him, gradually to soften his pre-conceived aversion against the orthodox, and to retract, at least in some measure, those bloody orders he had given for their total extirpation, as well as from his utter averfeness against releasing his Roman prisoners. <sup>b</sup>

Becomes more favourable to the orthodox.

ACCORDINGLY we are told, as a confirmation of the former, that, a little before his death, he restored the orthodox church of Carthage to its antient rights, recalled all her clergy, whom he had before banished, and its bishop Valerianus among the rest, and restored to them their ancient privileges and revenues <sup>1</sup>: from which it is probably inferred, that, if he had lived longer, he would, in all likelihood, have done the same by many more, if not all, the catholic clergy, instead of prosecuting his bloody designs against them. They think it even more than probable that it must have been one of the chief articles stipulated on the ratification of the peace, which that emperor could not well dispense insisting upon, nor his ambassador fail of obtaining, as he was, by that time, in such high favour and esteem with the king and his court. To all which we can only answer, that, if this had been the real case, or if Severus, <sup>c</sup> <sup>d</sup> afraid at such a juncture to press that point too strenuously, had contented himself with inspiring him with more favourable intentions towards them, one might expect that he would have recalled his bloody orders against them by his last will, as he did there leave such directions to his sons to secure the peaceful and regular succession to his kingdom, or have declared his intention some other way. Whereas it plainly appears, by the dreadful manner in which they were executed by his immediate successor, either that he never did countermand them, or if he did, that his son was so far from paying any regard to it, that he persecuted them with greater fury and cruelty than even his father had done; as we shall quickly see under his reign.

Releases the Roman captives.

As to what regards the other particulars, his generous release of the Roman prisoners at Severus's request, and so contrary to his former treatment of them, and which is here urged as an argument that the Roman ambassador had, by his politeness and address, inspired that prince with quite other sentiments and resolutions, with respect to his own nation, and the orthodox church, it cannot be disallowed to carry some weight, though not quite so much, if we duly consider the circumstances that attended, or perhaps gave birth to, so generous a compliance. Severus, after having refused, with a singular and disinterested modesty, the rich presents which that monarch would have heaped upon him, had artfully closed his denial with a hint, That the only one he could make him, worthy the acceptance of a Roman ambassador, was the release of those Romans whom he kept prisoners in his dominions. There was therefore no other way left for Genferic to prevent his being outdone in politeness and generosity, but <sup>e</sup> <sup>f</sup> that of complying with so laudable a request, or even granting him more than he desired of him, as he accordingly did, by the immediate discharge of all that were in his own or his family's possession, without any ransom, and permitting him to redeem all the rest <sup>k</sup>.

IT is therefore very improbable that the authors, who have transmitted two circumstances so honourable to him as this release of the Roman captives, and that of the restoration of the church of Carthage, should have neglected mentioning that of his good intentions to the rest of the orthodox, if any such had been in his mind, towards this last period of his life. And much more so still, if this had been the case, that he should have omitted leaving such proper directions either in his last will, or by some other way, to prevent his successors putting his a former cruel orders in execution against them ; or if he had, that the same writers should have forgot to take particular notice of it. Whereas, on the contrary, there is not only no mention or hint in their writings of any such change, but all that they have recorded concerning that last will of his above-mentioned, is merely about settling the succession amongst his descendants in such regular order, that is, solely according to eldership, as might best preserve the peace and prosperity of his new kingdom, and most effectually prevent, as he there words it, those disputes and intestine wars between them, which have proved so fatal and destructive to other monarchies and states <sup>1</sup>.

<sup>a</sup> PROCOPIUS VICTOR, & al. sup. citat. sup. citat.

* See Anc. Hist. vol. vi. p. 513. vol. vii. p. 539. & auct. <sup>1</sup> VICTOR Utiq. Perseq. Vand. p. 16. & al. sup. citat. <sup>2</sup> See Anc. Hist. vol. vii. p. 539. & auct. ib. cit.

ACCORDINGLY we are told that his four next successors proved such religious observers of his injunction, that they all enjoyed it in their turns, without either quarrels or contentions from within, or opposition from without, till an. 433, when being disregarded by the then usurper, who seized on it by treason, it gave an opportunity to the Romans to drive him and the rest of his Vandals out of Africa, as will be seen in the sequel. Genferic, however, doth not, upon the whole, seem to have paid so great a regard to the peace so lately concluded with the emperor ; but we read of a fresh breach of it almost as soon as the ambassador had left his court. Those authors have not indeed given us the particulars of it, but only tell us that, meeting with a stout repulse, he was forced to retire to Carthage, extremely mortified and enraged at his defeat, and died there soon after. There is nothing in all this transaction (though His death: omitted by other writers, as well as the occasion of it, probably for the same reason) that is inconsistent with that prince's character, who could seize on that metropolis by the vilest treachery, and be so frequently guilty of the breach of the most solemn treaties *.

HOWEVER that be, Genferic did not long outlive that last peace, but died after a long and successful reign of sixty years, and with him all the hopes which the orthodox had conceived from their short-lived reprieve, and the peace concluded with the Romans. He was succeeded by his eldest son Huneric, or, as some authors write him, Ungaricus, and Hungarichus ; a prince who not only inherited all his father's barbarian fierceness and hatred against the orthodox, but greatly outdid him in both ; and in his short reign of less than eight years, exercised greater cruelties against the African church, than he had in his of sixty. He had been sent hostage to Constantinople in his father's time, had moreover married the princess Eudocia, the daughter of the emperor Valentinian, whom his father had brought prisoner from Rome, and by whom he had a son and successor ; yet neither were able to abate his extreme hatred either against the orthodox or the Romans. He had besides her another wife, the daughter of Theodoric king of Wallia ; but this last, upon some slight suspicion or surmise that she designed to poison him, he sent shamefully back to her father, with both her nostrils slit <sup>m</sup>.

HUNERIC was not long in possession of the throne before he revived the persecution which had been suspended by his father, and with much greater fury than he had ever done. We have already taken notice of the various artifices which the idolatrous Moors made use of to instigate the one ; and the unparalleled sufferings which they caused those illustrious sufferers to undergo, [as they were appointed the chief managers and conductors of that horrid tragedy] do not permit us to doubt of their being equally zealous and industrious in spurring on and exasperating the other to the execution of it. Accordingly those unhappy victims were no sooner ordered to be delivered into their merciless hands, but one might see them brought from all parts of his dominions, bound in chains, to the two places of rendezvous, to the number of 4966, consisting of the most eminent bishops and clergy, as well monks of sundry orders and ranks, and some of the most distinguished among the laity, thence to be escorted or dragged by them in two bands to the horrid barren deserts assigned for the place of their exile. They were accordingly escorted at first to the two cities of Sicca and Laris (C), where the relentless Moors, instigated by their superstitious and inveterate priests, were ready to give them a suitable reception and entertainment, till the whole complement of their victims were arrived, and with them an order from court for their doleful march. For we are told that they were thrown, without distinction, into dismal dungeons, where, like Jeremiah the prophet, they sunk into the mire knee deep <sup>n</sup>, and were stifled with stench and want of air and room, being squeezed together in such numbers, that they had not space enough to lie down. Horrid confinement and misery.

<sup>1</sup> JORNANDES, & al. ubi sup. * Anc. Hist. vol. vi. p. 483, & seq. vol. vii. p. 536, & seq. <sup>m</sup> MARIAN Hist. Hispan. l. v. c. 3. VICTOR, PROCOP. & al. sup. citat. <sup>n</sup> Jerem. xxxviii. 6. & seq. De his, vide JORNANDES, PROCOP. VICTOR, & al. sup. citat.

(C) These were, according to the acts of the council, or Carthaginian conference, two episcopal cities, the former placed by some in Africa propria, and by others in Nubia, and one Martinus is, in the acts above-mentioned, styled Episcopus Sciaccensis. The situation of the other is still less known, only the same acts mention the Episcopus Larissensis as an assistant at that grand conference (2). But it is probable that both bishopricks had been sequestered, and their prelates deprived, if not banished, during the late reign and persecution, with many others of the same rank and merit, which we have taken notice of a little higher.

Surprising constancy. Their food and other fare was of the same kind with their lodging; and even the patience and contentment they expressed under such harsh treatment, especially every act of religion, and every sign of joy they shewed, for suffering in so glorious a cause, gave fresh occasion for their relentless persecutors to exercise the greater acts of inhumanity; so that great numbers of them expired under the extreme misery and inhuman usage of their keepers, though a much greater number, we are told, surmounted all these grievous hardships, and lived to exhibit a still more surprising scene of intrepidity and constancy, under a new and greater load of woe.

Distracted at parting from their flocks. Dreadful treatment from their Moorish guides. Huneric's strange death. 484. THE day of their release from the dreadful confinement being come, and all things ready for their march, these noble sufferers made their first appearance in the broad day-light before a vast and mixed multitude of friends and foes, and in such a strange and gloomy guise on the one hand, but with calm and joyful deportment on the other, as could not fail of exciting in the beholders a suitable variety of passions at both. Not only their cloaths (such as had any) but their bodies, and their very faces, were covered and incrustated with the mire and filth of the dungeon, their persons so emaciated, and limbs so enfeebled, that they could scarcely crawl or stand, yet hurried forward by dint of blows, whilst many of their distracted flocks met them with lighted candles, and strove, in vain, by their tears and earnest intreaties, to retard them only so long as either the baptizing of a few children, to confess, or perform some other part of their sacred functions towards some of their sick or dying friends; in requital for which they met with no other comfort than the sighs and tears, or perhaps the last and parting blessing, of their disconsolate and helpless pastors; and even these they were forced to purchase at the expence of the most severe scoffs and drubbings from their conductors. We have already taken notice of the bloody order which those had, or pretended to have, received from the king, with respect to such of their prisoners, who, either through age or other infirmities, were unable to go forward; and we doubt not but there were many of these among them, especially after such a grievous confinement; much less need we question the readiness of those butcherly Moors to put them in execution from their first setting out, if but to strike the rest with the greater dread. Yet were all these scenes of horror so far from working any such effect, that, instead of the groans and outcries which one might have expected from them, nothing was heard amongst them, if we may believe the many historians who have transmitted the account of their sufferings, but the loud singing of psalms and hymns, and the general voice of joy and exultation. What is the most miraculous of all is, that they continued their joyful songs, even after their barbarous guides, in order to prevent it, had ordered their tongues to be plucked out by the roots. Among those glorious martyrs who suffered under this reign, was the venerable Letus, bishop of Leptis, and some other dignified ecclesiastics. How many more became such among those exiles, either through the fatigues of the journey, or during their melancholy abode in those dreadful deserts, we are not told. However, it was not long before the Divine Providence was pleased to put a stop to it, by the sudden and exemplary death of their persecutor, who, after a short and bloody reign of a few months above seven years, was taken off in the same strange manner as the heresiarch Arius was (D), whose errors he had been so zealous to propagate through all his African dominions, and for the sake of which he had not only raised such a persecution as we have been describing, but had moreover laid waste so many monasteries of men and women, and bestowed their revenues, and even the very persons of both sexes indifferently, on those bloody Moors, who had been the promoters and executioners of his cruelties against the orthodox church. We do not read of any war he had with the Romans during his short reign; and it is probable he was so taken up with his domestic persecutions, and the propagation of his Arian heresy, that he had neither time nor inclination to break the peace lately concluded with them by his father; whilst the empire was at that time in so distracted and weakened a condition, that he was in no apprehension of meeting with any opposition from that quarter.

° PROCOPIUS, VICTOR. & al. ubi supra.

p Idem ibid.

(D) It is related of Arius, that he expired in a common jakes of the city, and that his bowels and all his entrails came out (3); and the same is also related of Huneric, with this addition, that his flesh had been some time rotting upon his bones, and crawling with worms, so that he looked more like a dead carcase than a living man (4). Others add, that, being possessed by the devil, whom he had glutted with the blood of so many martyrs, he tore his flesh off with his own teeth, and ended his wretched life in the most excruciating, though justly deserved, torments (5). All which disasters the learned Aldrette allows to have concurred in dispatching such a bloody tyrant out of the world (6).

Here the reader will be apt to suppose, that the zeal and resentment of the orthodox had thrown the two last, at least, into the scale, to render his memory the more odious to the world; and yet, when he comes to consider the sudden and surprising change, which his death brought on under the following reign, he will, perhaps, be induced to think, that nothing less could have occasioned it, than some such dreadful and exemplary judgment on that insatuated and unhappy prince.

(3) Jornand. Isidor. Hist. Vandal. Victor Uticens. & al. de Gest. Franc. c. 3.

(4) Antiquitates da Spania, lib. iv. c. 23. ad finem, vide & Grammay Hist. illustrat. lib. iii. Roder. Toletan. de Reb. Hispan. c. 15.

(5) Idem ibid.

(6) Greg. Turon. de Grammay Hist.

Krant. Hist. Vandal, p. 24, & al.

a HUNERIC, though he had a son named Hilderic, by the princess Eudocia, as hath been already hinted, was not succeeded by him, but by a grandson of Genferic named Gutamund, or Guntamund; who, we are told by Isidore and Procopius, was the son of Genson, Genferic's eldest son, and so probably preferred to Hilderic, in conformity to his grandfather's will.

Gutamund,
3<sup>d</sup> king of the African Vandals.

THIS prince, who had been brought up in the Arian heresy, with the rest of that monarch's family, did accordingly stain the beginning of his reign, if we may believe Isidore and Procopius<sup>a</sup>, by exercising many cruelties against the catholics; but had no sooner got the quiet possession of the crown, whether touched with a generous sense of the many and dreadful calamities which his uncle's furious and untimely zeal had brought upon them, or, which is more probable, whether deterred by the awakening circumstances which attended his death, than he immediately resolved to put an effectual end to the still raging persecution, and to recall as many of those noble sufferers as had out-lived the fatigues and miseries of their exile, and to restore them to their churches and flocks, and to a full and free exercise of their religion<sup>b</sup>.

Recalls the orthodox from banishment.
486.

He began accordingly with the venerable Eugenius, the late worthy metropolitan of Carthage, a prelate of consummate wisdom and piety, as the fittest person to advise and assist him in his charitable design; and these two joined their councils and authorities with such success, that the African clergy, both secular and regular, were almost every-where restored to their pristine seats, functions, and privileges, and the African church seemed to have wholly recovered its antient splendor; when on a sudden all was eclipsed again, by the unexpected death of their pious monarch; who died in the twelfth year of his reign, and was succeeded by his brother<sup>c</sup> Thrasamund, a prince of quite opposite principles and temper; who quickly undid all that he had done, and renewed the persecution against the orthodox, with as great zeal and fury as his uncle had done. He immediately ordered all the orthodox churches to be shut up, the monasteries to be sequestered, together with all their revenues, as well as those of the secular clergy. He carried his resentment so far against the latter, on account of their loud cen-

Restores the African church to its pristine state.

His death.

sures and complaints, that he banished an incredible number of them, some amongst the idolatrous Moors, and others into some of his grandfather's conquered dominions in Europe; and among them were no less than 120 bishops, whom he delegated to the island of Sardinia. At the head of these was the learned Fulgentius, by nation an African, and a prelate of great merit and piety. All of them, having been before-hand stripped of every thing, must unavoid-

Thrasamund,
4th king of the Vandals, revives the persecution
against them.

d ably have perished through want and misery, had not the then pope Symachus taken them into his care and protection; and partly out of his own purse, and partly by the assistance of other generous Christians, secured to them a comfortable maintenance during their exile<sup>d</sup>. By this time the Arians were got up to the summit of power and insolence, no one daring to oppose, or even open their mouths against them, without danger of incurring their zealous patron's highest resentment; whilst the poor orthodox clergy, being destitute of their old pastors, were easily led, either by fear or love, to comply, at least outwardly, with their new guides (E); so that Thrasamund had now little or nothing to fear, either from within or without, with regard to the effectual precautions he had taken to guard his dominions from being again infected or over-run with what he called the Roman heresy. He had time and opportunity

120 bishops
banished.

His measures to establish Arianism.

e enough to enlarge them, and to reduce many of the Moorish princes under him; the rest were either tributary, or firmly attached to him against the only common enemy that could oppose his measures, and who were at that time in no condition to attempt it, any more than the Ostrogoths and Visigoths of Spain and Italy; whose hands were then taken up with their intestine wars. It was upon this occasion that he gave so kind a reception to Gaselic, the son of Alaric, by a concubine, whom the revolted Visigoths had chosen for their king in the minority of Almaric, but had been forced to fly and take refuge at his court, and gave him all proper assistance to recover his kingdom; not perhaps so much out of compassion or good-will to him, as to suppress the growing power of Theodora, his brother-in-law, and king of the Ostrogoths; and who, by assuming the protectorship of Almaric, had it much in his power f to make himself master of his kingdom also. But of this we have already spoken in a former

<sup>a</sup> ISIDORE, ubi supra. PROCOPIUS Histor. Vandal. l. ii.

<sup>b</sup> VICT. PROCOPIUS, & al. ubi supra.

<sup>c</sup> Idem ibid.

<sup>d</sup> VICT. Uticens. & al. supra citat.

(E) So says Isidore, and others after him; whereas Procopius, who extols him as the wisest and most magnanimous of all his predecessors, assures us, that he never inflicted any penalties, nor used any harsh methods towards them; but, on the contrary, tried all the gentlest means, by gifts, favours, promotions, and all other methods of benevolence and generosity, to allure them to his Arianism (7).

We find likewise some considerable difference in these and other authors concerning the number of his exiles, especially of the episcopal order; the least of which is that of 120, which we have mentioned in the text above out of Isidore, whilst others make it amount to near double the number (8).

(7) Bell. Vandal, c. 3.
ubi supra, & al. plur.

(8) Eaza Bell. Vand. vide & Roderic. Toletan. Vazai chronic. Grammay, part *, to which we shall refer our readers. There was however a person whom he seemed a to be apprehensive of, and that one of his own family ; but whether justly or wrongfully, is not easy to determine. This was prince Hilderic, the grandson of Genferic, by the princess Eudocia ; who was to succeed him in course to the Vandalic throne. To ward off therefore all danger of change from that side, he obliged him to engage himself, by the most solemn oaths, not to make any change in the religion or government he had been all this while taking the properest measures to establish upon the most solid foundation, and by no means to be prevailed upon to take the least step in favour of the orthodox, or to recall any of the banished clergy. Thrasamund having thus barred, as he imagined, all avenues to sinister adventures, finished his reign in quiet, and died after a reign of 26, others say 27 years and four months, in the city of Carthage, the royal residence of his predecessors, ever since Genferic b had treacherously got it into his possession †.

Make his successor swear to follow them.

Dies.

Hilderic, 5th king of the Vandals. A. D. 524.

His zeal for the orthodox.

His too hasty manifesto in their favour.

Defeated by Gilimer, the 6th and last king of the Vandals.

HILDERIC, who had taken that solemn oath against the orthodox with no other view than to quiet Thrasamund's suspicion about him, and to prevent his taking any measures to deprive him of the succession, whilst he was in his heart resolved to recall all the surviving exiles, and to restore them to their former dignities and functions, was not a little puzzled at his first coming to the crown, how to act consistently with his pious resolutions, without incurring the guilt as well as the brand of perjury, and at the same time exasperating the powerful and vindictive Arians. The constraint and unlawfulness of the oath might, indeed, quiet his conscience, and absolve him for the breach of it ; but then he had every thing to fear from the strenuous and desperate opposition of his enemies, as well as from the wretched and helpless c state to which the orthodox were by that time reduced. These considerations obliged him to proceed with the utmost caution and secrecy, and to suspend every overt act which might awaken the jealousy of the one, or the expectations of the other, till he had firmly settled himself on the throne, and was in a condition to curb the power and insolence of his foes, and to inspirit his desponding friends in his and their own defence.

This was prudently resolved, and not more so than the present state of his kingdom absolutely required. The misfortune was, that his zeal, whether excited by the solicitations of his mother, who was a most zealous orthodox, or by the sufferings and complaints of the exiled clergy, hurried him away too soon from his wise precautions into an open declaration of his designs, before he had sufficiently secured himself against the oppositions of the Arian partisans. This was d by a manifesto, which he caused to be published in the most solemn and grand manner, both in the metropolis and other parts of his dominions ; in which he not only condemned, but disannulled and repealed, all the acts and edicts of his predecessors, and especially of the late Thrasamund, either against the orthodox, or in favour of Arianism ; recalled all those who had been banished by him, and restored them to their antient churches, functions, and privileges, of which they had been deprived by him ‡.

Our readers will easily imagine what surprize and indignation such an unexpected edict must have raised among the whole Arian body, and what bitter reflexions and invectives they vented against the author of it. But this was far from being the worst effect of their resentment, which quickly broke out into an open rebellion ; at the head whereof was one of the e princes of the blood, named Gilimer, or, as others write him, Gildimer, a zealous stickler for Arianism, and no less inveterate an enemy to Hilderic, not only on account of his friendship for the orthodox, but of his softness and indolence ; which made him neglect the care of his realm, and command of his army, and commit the whole management of both to a favourite relation named Almer, and by some Achilles ; who, for that very reason, was no less hateful to him. It was, therefore, natural for a man of Gilimer's ambitious and enterprising spirit to imagine that it would be no difficult matter to have him deposed, or wrench the crown from him by force.

Accordingly, we are told by some historians, he found means to ingratiate himself with his Vandals, so as to procure his deposition in the 7th year of his reign, and himself to be f appointed his successor. Whilst others tell us, that he obtained the crown by force of arms, and that he pursued his treason to such a desperate fury, as quickly brought the contest to a decisive battle ; in which that unfortunate king was defeated, taken prisoner, and deprived at once of his crown and liberty, by that successful rebel, in the eighth year of his reign.

The orthodox persecuted.

This proved a fatal blow to the orthodox. Gilimer, immediately after his victory, seized upon the throne, and caused himself to be crowned at Carthage, ordered the unhappy Hilderic and all his sons to be closely imprisoned, and kept under a strong guard, and exercised the most cruel tyrannies, not only on the recalled exiles, but upon many of the orthodox Vandals, who had been induced to leave Spain, and to come and settle in that part of Africa, during g a the late reign. The churches were again shut up, the clergy proscribed, and stripped of their benefices and revenues ; all the former edicts in their favour repealed and cancelled, and new ones issued out in favour of Arianism, and the African church reduced to its lowest ebb ; and but too probably (as seems rightly observed by the writers of this long Vandalic usurpation and tyranny) as a just punishment for the degeneracy and corruption of morals, which, to the dishonour of Christianity, reigned among their clergy, as well as laity ; who, though strict and zealous in their belief, continued still downright Moors and heathens in their practice †.

* Anc. Hist. vol. vii. p. 644. & seq. PROCOR. VICT. & al. supra citat.

† PROCOR. VICT. & al. ubi supra.

‡ Id. ibid.

But, be that as it will, Gilimer's triumph over it proved a deserved but short-lived one ; and, to the inexpressible joy of the orthodox, as well as the mortification of the Arians, was soon after followed by the total overthrow of the Vandalic power, and expulsion of that nation out of Africa. Justinian sends a powerful army against him under Belisarius.

b The arbitrary sway with which he tyrannized over his subjects, and the horrid oppressions and cruelties, confiscations and banishments, which made the most signal part of his reign, joined to the loud complaints of the exiled clergy, and the strenuous sollicitation of the good old bishop Lætus, who had been proscribed and martyred ever since the reign of Huneric (but is said to have appeared to Justinian the Roman emperor, and to have determined him to undertake this expedition, by a promise that he should certainly recover Africa from the barbarian Vandals) prevailed upon him, notwithstanding the Persian and other wars he had then upon his hands, to send a powerful fleet and army thither, under the conduct of the brave and successful general Belisarius ; who was for that end recalled from Persia, and appointed commander of that important expedition. We are, indeed, told, that he tried by fair means and friendly embassies to make him release these noble captives out of their unjust imprisonment ; but the only effect they had upon him, was to cause them to be more closely confined, and to order the hated Amer, who was of that number, to be deprived of his eyes. To complete all, and to shew how little he valued his friendship, or feared his resentment, he at the same time had equipped a squadron against him, which seized on the city of Tripoly, and the island of Sardinia. Than which, if true, we need not seek for a more cogent motive to determine that emperor to send such an armament and so great a general against him ; who, had he been apprised of the wretched condition he was reduced to by that time, would most likely have judged a smaller force sufficient to drive him out of his kingdom, and the Vandals out of Africa.

d ALL this while the Vandalic tyrant, was so taken up with his pleasures on the one hand, and his persecutions on the other, that he knew little or nothing of these preparations, unless we suppose that a blind fatality was pushing him on to his ruin ; for when he was, at length, apprised of them, instead of taking the properest precautions against them, he fell upon such measures as paved his way to it, and to the enemy's success, and was hastening his own fate by the most horrid tyrannies and bloodshed, sparing neither friends nor foes, nor even his own relations, upon the least surmise or jealousy conceived against them ; so that he was now become odious and detested by all his subjects ; and much more so, when, upon his hearing of the approach of Belisarius, he caused the unhappy Hilderic and all his children, his brother Evaragenes, and others of his near relations, whom he had kept in close confinement from the time he gave him that fatal overthrow we have lately mentioned, to be butchered. Invaded by him.

e Vast numbers of his Vandals, who had embraced the orthodox faith during the recall of the catholic bishops, had likewise dispersed themselves into other parts of Africa, to avoid the like fate, and were ready to join the Roman forces at their arrival ; whilst the far greater part of even his Arians had by this time conceived such an abhorrence against him, on account of his tyrannical government and horrid cruelties, that they had neither heart nor will to fight in his defence.

f THIS was the sad condition he had brought himself to, when Belisarius appeared upon the Carthaginian coasts ; and Gilimer knew too well what an enemy he had to encounter, not to make some preparations against him ; which, however, happily proved abortive, as the event, so disgraceful and fatal to him, and so glorious and advantageous to his vanquisher, plainly shewed.

OUR narrow limits will not permit us to enter into a detail of this war, of which the reader may see a full account in Procopius, who was an eye-witness, and hath described it at length in two books ; as well as in the other authors quoted in the margin *. It will be sufficient to say, that Gilimer committed the management of it to his two brothers, Gundimer and Gelamund ; who accordingly attacked the Romans at the head of a numerous force ; and, after a stout and bloody conflict on both sides, were defeated and slain, and their army totally routed. Gilimer, grown desperate at the news of it, sallied out at the head of his corps of reserve, with full purpose to renew the attack with the utmost vigour and fury ; but by his own indiscre-

Gilimer's two brothers defeated and slain.

He sallies out against the enemy :

† See before, p. 659, & seq. * JORNAN. ubi supra, c. 56. VICT. Uticens. l. iii. ad finem. CÉDREN. LAZ. MARIAN. de Reb. Hisp. l. v. c. 8. VAZZÆI Chronic. sub ann. 526. ISIDORE Chronic. ad finem. L. MARI. & al. plur.

tion or ill fate, lost the fairest opportunity of retrieving his affairs, and overcoming the a enemy.

but loses the opportunity of defeating them.

Totally defeated and put to flight by Belisarius.

FOR no sooner did they perceive Gilimer, at the head of a fresh army, hastening after them, than they betook themselves to flight; at the sight of which the rest of that corps betook themselves to their heels; so that the greatest part of the Greek army were quite dispersed, and so far routed, that, had Gilimer followed them close, he would inevitably have cut them all in pieces, secured their navy and his own metropolis, and prevented all the disasters and misfortunes that fell upon him afterwards. Instead of which, stumbling unfortunately on the body of one of his slain brothers, the sight of it made him lose all thoughts about the enemy; and, instead of pursuing them, he spent part of his time in idle lamentations over him, and part in interring his corpse with suitable pomp and dignity; which gave Belisarius all the time he could b wish to rally his run-aways, and fall upon him. For whilst that general was, with another corps, in the heat of his pursuit after the fugitive Vandals, news was brought to him of the disorder into which the approach of Gilimer had thrown the rest of his army. He made all the dispatch he could to get them rallied; and, after a proper reprimand, led them on against him with fresh vigour, and found him so unprepared to make suitable head against them, that they easily gained a new and total victory over him †. Gilimer, now seeing his affairs grown quite desperate, and no means left to rally his troops, betook himself to flight; but was, some months after, reduced by famine to surrender himself to the Roman general.

Belisarius's policy and moderation.

AFTER these two signal victories, and the Vandalic tyrant in his hands, the Roman general found no great difficulty to drive the rest of that once-powerful nation out of Africa, there c being now none of the royal blood left, under whose standard they might again rejoin, and oppose his progress any longer. He had, moreover, taken care, from his very first landing, to secure to himself the affections both of the Africans and Vandals that came over to him; the one by an express decree to his troops, not to commit any outrages or plunders among them, under the severest penalties; and the other by his kind reception and treatment of them; so that he not only met with a hearty and joyful welcome from the former, but was quickly joined by vast multitudes of the latter, as both had so long groaned under the same tyrannic yoke, that they thought it impossible to exchange it for a worse.

March to Carthage.

Arrival of his fleet before it.

Release of the state prisoners.

CARTHAGE being then the only place of strength, Belisarius moved the day after the battle to that metropolis with his army, and reached it that very evening; he found the gates of d it open to him, and the citizens expressing their joy at his arrival, by bonfires and illuminations; yet he would not enter it on that night, for fear of some ambush from the Vandalic garrison; who, on their part, were under the utmost consternation, and had taken refuge in their temples and other places of safety. On the same day, his fleet came to anchor in sight of the city, at the port called Mandracium; which, instead of opposing their entrance, ordered the large iron chain, which closed it, to be taken down. In that place was a dismal prison, where vast numbers of prisoners of state had been confined by Gilimer, and who expected every hour was to be their last, being wholly ignorant of what had happened abroad. To these the Roman general paid a kind visit, which at first filled them with fear and dread; but, upon his asking them at what price they would be willing to buy their lives and liberties, they readily offered him their all. Upon which he told them, that he would exact but one thing from e them in return; namely, that, when set free, they should give him what assistance they could, in case of need: to which they eagerly agreed. Immediately after which, causing the gates to be flung open, from which they had a full prospect of his navy, and acquainting them with the design and success of his expedition, he joyfully led them out with him.

Enters into Carthage. Seizes on the throne and treasures of Gilimer.

Gilimer sues in vain for aid.

ON the next day, he caused his other forces to disembark; and, having ranged them with the rest in order of battle, for fear of some ambush or unforeseen stratagem, began his march towards the city, after having strictly forbidden his troops to plunder, or offer any kind of outrage to it. Accordingly he entered it in triumph, without the least opposition; and, proceeding to the royal palace, took possession of Gilimer's throne, and soon after of all his immense f wealth and treasure; caused all the churches to be restored to the orthodox, and the Vandals to take the oaths to the Roman emperor. But his principal care was to cause the walls and fortifications of the city, which had been so neglected by the Vandal princes that a great part of them were gone to ruin, to be rebuilt with all possible speed; whose orders were so punctually executed, that, when the unfortunate Gilimer was brought prisoner to him, and beheld them in that strong and beautiful condition, he could not forbear repining at his late folly and stupidity, thinking it impossible, in so short a time, to have put them in such a state of defence against the Romans, and seeking safety out of them m.

ALL this while that unhappy prince had been endeavouring to annoy the Romans, with petty hostilities, and by hiring the Moors to bring him all their stragglers and marauders, at so much g a head. He had likewise tried in vain to get fresh succours from Theudis, king of the Goths in

† PROCOPIUS. ubi sup. & al.

m Idem ibid. l. i. c. 23. Vide & al. supra citat.

- a Spain, the Moorish princes and other states of Africa; to all which he sent splendid embassies, under pretence of joining with them in an alliance against the Romans. But the misfortune was, that Theudis was already too well acquainted with his desperate state, in spite of all the false glosses he put upon it, to venture any of his troops into Africa, to fall a prey to the conquering enemy. And as to the Moorish chiefs, Belisarius had taken such care by that time to gain the greatest part of them over to his side, and to get hostages from them for their strict adherence, that few of them dared to give him the least assistance. His last refuge, therefore, was to recall his brother Tzason from his Sardinian conquests to his assistance; who made all possible dispatch to sail back, and joined his small army on the plains of Bulla, on the confines of Mauritania. Recall his brother from Sardinia.
- b THEIR first meeting, Procopius tells us, afforded such a mournful scene as would have drawn tears even from an enemy, and quickly spread itself through both armies; particularly the newly arrived one, among whom almost every enquiry after their nearest friends and relations was answered with the news of their being either slain or taken prisoners. This dismal account was soon followed by a mutual resolution to make one more desperate attempt to regain their lost kingdom, and to make a bold attack upon that new-fortified metropolis, if but to retrieve their captives out of the Romans hands. For as to Gilimer, he betrayed, upon this occasion, such pusillanimity, as, joined to the horrid murders and cruelties they were told he had committed during their absence, rather inspired them with horror and contempt than ardor to fight for him. However, as Gilimer did not so much depend upon their zeal and courage, as upon his own policy, he did not doubt of succeeding in it, by bribing their auxiliaries to his interest. He accordingly attempted, and prevailed with those whom he knew to be highly discontented, to turn their arms against the Romans, on the next attack he made against them, by assuring them that they would be joined by all his Arian Vandals, and other malecontents. Belisarius was not without some apprehensions from these two quarters; which made him the more watchful over them; and partly by making an example of one of the latter, and partly by the most generous engagements to the former, prevented all further consequences of that conspiracy. This made him, however, conclude it more expedient to lead his forces out against the enemy, than to trust too far to the fortifications of the place, or the fidelity of the citizens; and, having animated them by a suitable speech, marched at their head against the Vandalic army. Belisarius marches against the Vandals.
- d Gilimer and his brother Tzason were not tardy on their part, in using all proper means to inspire their forces with courage and loyalty on this important crisis. Both sides came soon to a decisive blow, in which the Romans, contrary to their usual foresight, were surprised by the Vandals just as they were preparing themselves for dinner, instead of fighting, and had scarce time enough to arm themselves against them. The onset, however, was furious on both sides; the right and left wings of the Vandalic army, consisting chiefly of Moors, were commanded by their own chiefs; the center consisted of Vandals, whom Gilimer had forbidden to use either bow or spear, or any other weapon but their swords; and his brother, with his own troops, closed up the rear. A small nameless river parted the armies; over which Belisarius dispatched one of his brave captains, at the head of a sufficient corps, to begin the onset, who was twice repulsed by the enemy; but returning a third time, with a stronger force, and the pretorian standard with him, a dreadful slaughter soon ensued on both sides; in which the brave Tzason, who fought with desperate bravery, was slain, with about 800 of his choicest men, and the rest were put to flight. The Romans lost only 50 of theirs; when, towards evening, Belisarius moving forward with all speed at the head of his army, fell suddenly on the Vandalic camp; which Gilimer no sooner understood, than he mounted his horse, attended only by a few, and, without staying to give any farther orders to his army, galloped away towards Numidia, in the utmost consternation and dread. His flight was not presently known among his troops; but, when it was, it spread such an universal confusion and panic, that they abandoned their camp to the Romans; who had now nothing left to do but to plunder it of all its wealth and riches; and, not contented with that, massacred every Vandal they found in it, and made the women captives. State of both armies. They engage with great fury. Tzason slain. Gilimer's shameful flight.
- e
- f

THIS last defeat put at once a total end to the Vandalic power in Africa, and left the Romans once more masters of that rich country, and of an immense wealth, and a vast number of prisoners. As for the rest of the Vandalic inhabitants, those were permitted to remain in statu quo, on condition that they, who were still infected with the Arian heresy, should embrace the orthodox faith. It is time now to give our readers a short account of Gilimer's sad catastrophe.

THAT pusillanimous prince was soon informed of the total overthrow of his army, and the irretrievable condition of his affairs, being chiefly owing to his hasty flight, which his presence might have prevented; or, at least, given him a fair opportunity to rally his men, and fall suddenly on the enemy, whilst they were taken up with the plunder of his camp; in which

Pursued by Belisarius.

Flee to a high mountain.

His miserable condition
there.

Exhorted in vain to surrender.

Mournful request.

Surrenders to Pharas.

Brought prisoner to Constantinople.

His death,
534.

case he might, in all probability, have cut the greatest part of them in pieces, and recovered his capital. The dread of which gave Belisarius, who knew not of his flight, so much uneasiness, that it kept him awake all that night; and, as soon as the day appeared, he left his tent, and set about recalling his men to due order. It was then that he was informed of the king's flight; upon which he lost no time to go in pursuit of him as far as the city of Hippo, distant about ten days journey from Carthage. Here he was told, that the fugitive prince had already gained the Pappuan mountain; where he would find it impossible to come at him, it being almost inaccessible by its height and ruggedness, inhabited by Moors in friendship with him, and he shut up in the antient town of Medemus, situate on the top of it. Wherefore, being unwilling to lose his prisoner on one hand, and afraid on the other to be so long absent from his capital, as the siege of that place would require, and winter coming on, he committed the conduct of it to one of his experienced officers, named Pharas, a man of great courage and fidelity, with orders to shut up all the avenues to the town, to prevent any provisions being brought to, or letters or messages from him. Before his departure from this sea-port, he had the good fortune to be put in possession of an immense deal of wealth, which Gilimer had ordered to be transported from thence to Spain, but was driven back by contrary winds, and helped to complete that prince's misfortunes; who being then kept closely besieged, with his sister, his nearest relations and friends, on the top of a barren mountain, and destitute of all supplies from abroad, must soon be reduced from their highest degrees of luxury to the most excessive want of all necessaries of life. For Pharas, having been repulsed by the Moors in every attempt he had made to gain the top of the mountain, with loss, having no other means left of reducing them but by famine, kept all the passes to it so closely guarded, that no kind of relief could possibly be conveyed to them; and, as soon as he was apprised of their distress, wrote a most friendly and pathetic letter to him, earnestly exhorting him to extricate himself and his friends from their present misery, by a submissive surrender of himself to the noble and generous Belisarius. He was, however, highly surprised at the strangeness of the answer he received from him; in which, on the one hand, he utterly declined his friendly advice, and, on the other, concluded with the most submissive request, that he would so far pity his great distress as to send him a LOAF OF BREAD, A SPUNGE, AND A LUTE. Pharas was not a little grieved at his resolution, but was still more puzzled at the oddness of his request, till explained by the messenger in words to this effect; that the king had not tasted any baked bread since his arrival on that mountain, and earnestly longed to eat a morsel of it before he died: the sponge he wanted to allay a tumour that was fallen upon one of his eyes: and the lute, on which he had learned to play, was to assist him in setting some elegiac verses he had composed on the subject of his misfortunes to a suitable tune. The good Herculean, who could not refrain from tears at this mournful report, did not make him wait long, but immediately dispatched the messenger with the things requested.

GILIMER had spent near three winter months on that inhospitable mountain, his misery still hardening him the more against the thoughts of surrendering, when a melancholy scene in his own family presented itself to his view, which at once reconciled him to it. It was a bloody struggle between two boys, the one his sister's son, about a flat bit of dough, laid on the coals; which the one seized on, burning hot as it was, and clapped it into his mouth, and the other, by dint of blows, forced it out, and ate it from him; which might have ended fatally for both, had he not interposed. The sight of this made so deep an impression on him, that he immediately dispatched a messenger to Pharas, acquainting him that he was now ready to surrender himself, his men, and all his effects, on the conditions he had offered him, as soon as he was assured that they were embraced by Belisarius. Pharas lost no time to get them ratified, and sent back to him; and gladly conducted him and his retinue to Belisarius's head-quarters. Where, upon his approaching that general, we are told he broke out in a loud fit of laughter, which was variously interpreted; but was most probably owing to a delirium, occasioned by so long a series of misfortunes. Belisarius, however, gave him a reception suitable to his dignity; and, having settled his Carthaginian affairs, set sail with him for Constantinople, with the first fair wind; and at his arrival presented him to the emperor Justinian, with all the immense riches he had brought away from Africa. The unhappy Gilimer was introduced to him, laden with golden chains, his crown upon his head, his eyes gushing out floods of tears, and his heart breaking out into the deepest groans, which utterly choaked up his words; so that he could only repeat, in broken accents, the words of the wise man, vanitatum, & omnia vanitas *. Having at length recovered himself, he begged of the emperor, in the most submissive terms, that his life might be spared: which was readily granted him, together with a handsome yearly pension for him to live as a private gentleman. But his mind and heart were too unsettled and broken to enjoy long, much less relish, the sweets of a private state. So that growing daily more and more unable to bear the weight of his disgrace, guilt, and shame, he died there of grief, in the fifth year of his unhappy reign, and the a first after his captivity. Thus Africa being freed from the Vandalic yoke, after having groaned under it, according to the best authors, the space of 117 years, was once more reduced to the obedience of the Greek emperors, and governed by their generals or prefects, as we have shewn in our Antient History°. By this change, however, affairs of religion took a more Orthodox respective turn, the banished bishops and clergy were recalled, and gladly returned to their respective charges; the churches were again opened, the ecclesiastical revenues restored in statu quo, and Arianism banished from that country.

* Ecclesi. i. 1.

It was not long, however, before the prosperous state of the orthodox, as well as the tyranny of the Greek prefects, occasioned a new revolt among the idolatrous Moors; which was like New revolt raised by the Moors, 539. to have proved as fatal to Christianity, as the Vandalic tyranny had been; insomuch, that Justinian was again obliged to dispatch thither one of his best generals, named Solomon, an eunuch; who by his valour and conduct, quickly reduced, and kept them quiet for a short time; that is, till newly provoked by the ill treatment of the Greeks, they fell upon him, as the author or encourager of it, and massacred him two years after his arrival. The emperor, on the news of it, sent thither a relation of his, named Ariobindas, in quality of a proconsul; who was scarcely seated in his government, before he was murdered by Gundibundus, one of the late Solomon's captains, who was then at the head of the army; but was soon after defeated and put to death by Artabanes, a Persian, Ariobindas's successor. By this means peace was again restored to that province, and the Moors so quelled and kept under, that we read not of any considerable revolt in it during the short space it remained in their hands, except that the Gauls in Spain seized on several considerable places on the Mediterranean coast; of which we shall give an account in its proper place<sup>p</sup>.

ALL this while, however, the Vandals were not so totally destroyed, nor the Moors so thoroughly reduced, but that vast numbers of the former were dispersed amongst the latter, and ready to join forces against the Greeks, upon the least probability of success; which occasioned great uneasiness in them, and in all probability encouraged the plundering Arabs and Saracens, who had already invaded Syria, Palestine, and Egypt, to penetrate still farther towards these parts, and who accordingly, at that juncture, came pouring in like a torrent; and having defeated the prefect Gregory, not only drove the Greek forces out of it, and made themselves masters of all that fruitful tract, under the Khalif Omar, as we have shewn at large in our Ancient History<sup>q</sup>; but, by degrees, enlarged their conquests on that continent much farther than the Romans had ever done. Arabs invade and plunder 544.

THIS dreadful and irresistible inundation soon wrought, as may be naturally supposed, a considerable change in the African government where-ever it spread itself; especially among the African natives, who had continued strangers to the weight of the Roman and Vandalic yoke, knew no subjection to any but their own natural chiefs, and could ill brook that of the Arabian cheyks. At the same time the Khalif Omar, who was by his vast conquests and successes become exceedingly powerful, sent his general Amru to conquer the western part of Africa; who marched thither at the head of a powerful army; or, as others affirm, detached thither Okba ben Nasr, or, as others write him, Occuba ben Nasir, with 24,000 men on that expedition; who accordingly made himself master of all the country between Barca and Zaweilah, and obliged the people to pay the same tribute which they had done to the Greek emperor's prefects. Some add, that Amru built a temple, or mosk, there at Al Fostad<sup>r</sup>; and some add the city of Kayrwan, or Cairavan, more corruptly Cairvan, and Cairwan, Kayrwan, about thirty miles distant from Tunis, and antiently Cyrene, the capital of Cyrenaica<sup>s</sup>. It was afterwards demolished by order of Khalif Moawiyah, and a new one built near it; which afterwards became the residence of the Fatemite Khalifs, who conquered the whole province, and made it the capital of it. capital of the Fatemite dynasty founded. We have elsewhere given an account of these schismatics, as they were termed by the other westerns, and the cause of that fatal rupture<sup>t</sup>, which gave occasion to the founding of this new dynasty, in opposition to that of the Abbassides; who, on that account, have never called it by any other name than that of Obeidite, from Obeid'allah, its founder, but never by that of Fatemite, whose declared enemy they have always professed themselves, as long as it continued in being, as the reader may remember from the account we have given of their mutual wars in the former volume lately quoted<sup>u</sup>. For which reason we shall avoid repeating any more of it here, than barely and necessarily relates to our present history of this province of Africa Proper.

OBEID'ALLAH took upon himself the surname or title of Al Mohdi, or Al Mabedi, or Obeid'allah director, the better to support his new dignity of Khalif; which he founded on a traditional prophecy of Mohammed, that at the end of 300 years (from the Hejra) the sun should rise out of 1st Khalif, ° Vol. vi. p. 526, & seq. vii. 527. & Mod. Hist. vol. i. p. 239.

<sup>p</sup> PROCOPIUS, & al. supra citat.

<sup>q</sup> Vol. vi. p. 544.

<sup>r</sup> See before, vol. i. p. 58, & seq.

<sup>s</sup> See before, vol. i. p. 239, & seq.

<sup>t</sup> Anc. Hist. vol. vii. p. 169.

<sup>u</sup> Idem ibid.

drives out the west. Accordingly, we are told, that he began to signalize himself in that part of Africa <sup>a</sup>
Aglabites, about the year 296, or 298, and drove the Aglabites, who had feated themselves there and
 910. in Sicily, under the Khalifat of Moktasi, out of the latter, and obliged them to retire into Egypt; whilst he, extending his conquests over that whole province, then called from its western situation Maghereb, did apply that prophecy to himself, and set up the next year for a second prophet or director, and took the name and title of Khalif Al Mobdi*. He made Kayrwan the place of his residence, and capital of his dominions, whilst he was laying the foundation of a more opulent one near it, and on the same coast, which he designed to call by his new surname Mobdi, or Mobedia; but, not living to see it finished, left it to be done by his son and successor; who, upon that account, probably claimed to himself the title of Mobdi, and the honour of founding the Fatemite dynasty, and is accordingly acknowledged as such by <sup>b</sup> several Arabic writers; though the rest ascribe both to his father (X).

His conquests, We have already given an account of his other conquests and exploits both in Africa and and death, Sicily, and more particularly in Egypt, under his successful general Habbasab; his reduction 933. of the two famed cities of Barca and Alexandria, as well as of his last defeat, and being forced to abandon that kingdom by the superior forces of the Khalif Moktader<sup>y</sup>; by which the reader may judge of the excess of power and grandeur to which he had raised his new kingdom. He reigned, according to the best authors, 24 years, and died in the 63d year of his age, and the 322d of the Hejra<sup>z</sup>; which was the first of the khalifat of Al Radi at Baghdad.

Al Kayem, He was succeeded by his eldest son Abu'l Kassef Mohammed, who then took the surname <sup>c</sup>
2d Khalif. of Al Kayem Mobdi. He had signalized himself in war in his father's reign; who had sent him into Egypt with an army of 100,000 men, where he had gained some victories over the
His conquest, *Magrebian*s, and over-run a considerable part of that rich country. He was, however, at and defeat, in length totally defeated, and forced to abandon all his conquests, by the superior forces of the Egypt. Khalif Moktader, in the 308th year of the Hejra. When he came to the khalifat, he thought fit to conceal his father's death for a while, for some reasons of state, which the Arabic writers have not thought fit to transmit; some of them say a whole year; and was at last proclaimed Khalif in his capital, and reigned 12 years; during which time we read of nothing memorable, except the revolt which was raised by one Yezid Ebn Condat, of the tribe of Zenal, a man of Conspired mean extraction, but who was become by this time chancellor, and in very great power under <sup>d</sup> against by him; in which he was supported by such a strong party, that the Khalif was obliged to shut Yezid. himself up and fortify himself in the castle of Mobeia. Yezid was then at the head of a powerful army, by the help of which he soon reduced the capital of Kayrwan, the cities of Al Rak- kada and Tunis, together with several other fortresses. He was no less successful in defeating a considerable number of troops, which Al Kayem had raised and sent against him to stop his progress; over whom he gained a complete victory, accompanied with a dreadful slaughter of them; after which he led his forces directly to the castle where he lay intrenched, and besieged Closely besieged him closely for seven months; by which time he was reduced to such straits, for want of
in his capital. provisions, that he must have been forced to surrender, or be starved, when death put an end
His death, to his anxiety and reign, in the 12th year of his khalifat, in the 334th of the Hejra, and was <sup>e</sup>
 945. succeeded by his martial son Ishmael, whom he had nominated to be his heir; who took upon Succeeded by him the title or surname of Al Mansur, and who quickly after his accession severely revenged the Al Mansur; affront offered to his father by the traitor Yezid<sup>2</sup>.

who raises the AL MANSUR, however, thought proper to conceal his father's death for some months, siege of his ca- whilst he was privately making all proper preparations to fall upon the rebels with a sufficient pital, and de- force to put an end to that revolt. He proved so successful in it, that he obliged Yezid to feats the re- raise the siege of Mobdi, or Mobedia; which he entered in triumph the same year; and, in bels.

* Vol. i. p. 512, & seq.
 FEDA, & AL MAKIN, sub Ishmael.

<sup>y</sup> Idem ibid.

<sup>z</sup> See before, vol. i. p. 530, & note (C).

<sup>a</sup> ABU'L.

(X) We have had frequent occasion, through the whole history of the Khalifs, both of Baghdad, Kayrwan, and Egypt, to mention the difference there is between the Arabic writers, and how difficult it is to reconcile them, even in some of the grandest points relating to them; and, with respect to this Khalif we are now speaking of, we find the like disagreement, not only with relation to his pedigree (1), but about his conquest of this province, and his being the founder of this dynasty; the honour of both which some of them give to his son and successor Abu'l Kassef; who actually arrogated it to himself, as well as the surname of Mobedi, in order to appropriate the traditional prophecy mentioned in the text above.

We shall, therefore, avoid clogging this history with needless repetitions, and vain attempts to reconcile those differences, and shall once for all here remind our curious readers, that we have, in all such disputed cases, endeavoured to follow the most probable side; and that, if any thing occur either by way of confirmation or confutation, it will be taken proper notice of in the supplement, which we have promised elsewhere to subjoin at the end of this work (2).

(1) See before, vol. i. p. 512, & D'Herbelot Biblioth. orient. sub voce Obeid'allah & Mobadi, & auſt. ibi citat.
 (2) See vol. i. p. 698, & ii. p. 109, & seq.

<sup>a</sup> the following, gave him two signal overthrows, and obliged him to shut himself up in the strong fortrefs of Kottama, or Cutama; where he closely besieged him in his turn. Yezid defended the place a considerable time, and with a bravery becoming such a traitor and desperado; but finding his efforts frustrated, and the garrison obliged to capitulate, seeing no other way to avoid the effects of the Khalif's resentment, betook himself to a private flight. Al Mansur, finding his victim escaped, immediately dispatched a number of forces in pursuit of him; who overtook, and brought him back in fetters; but not till after a vigorous defence, in which he received several dangerous wounds, and died a few days after in the dungeon where he was confined to be reserved for a severe and more exemplary punishment. Al Mansur, vexed at the disappointment, caused his body to be flayed, and his skin stuffed and exposed to public view. <sup>Yezid is wounded and dies.</sup> Soon after which he entered into his capital a second time in triumph, and ordered the news of Yezid's death, and of the total suppression of the rebels, to be proclaimed through all his dominions. <sup>952.</sup> We have elsewhere mentioned his other conquests in Sicily<sup>b</sup>; but meet with nothing remarkable concerning his reign in Africa, except that death put an end to it in the 341st year of the Hejra, after a short reign of seven years and sixteen days. He died on the 29th of May, in his own capital of Mobedia, extolled for his magnanimity and eloquence; in the last of which he was become so great a master, that he frequently made long speeches in public with great readiness and presence of mind, and sermons in the mosks without any premeditation. Some Arabic writers compliment him with the titles of Mansur Benasa'allah, and of 3d Fatemite Khalif; and add, that he was the founder of the city of Mansurah, in Egypt; <sup>Al Mansur's death.</sup> where the Franks, with their first monarch at their head, were defeated<sup>c</sup>; whilst Abu'lfeda, who makes no mention of any such thing, gives him no higher title than that of Emir of Libya<sup>d</sup>. He left the khalifat of Kayrwan to his son Abu Zammim Moad, or Mabad, who took the surname of Al Moezz Ledinillab; and, among other conquests, having made himself master of Egypt, removed the seat of the khalifat to Al Kayro, and became the head of the Fatemite dynasty in that country, as we shall see in the sequel. <sup>Is succeeded by Al Moezz.</sup>

<sup>d</sup> AL MOEZZ reigned a long time; some say 20 years, in his old African dominions; and made Kayrwan and Mobedia alternately the seat of his residence. We have formerly given an account of the bloody contest he had with Abdalrahman, the then khalif of Andalusia, and the severe reprisals his powerful fleet made on him<sup>e</sup>; by which our readers may judge to what height of power the khalifat of Kayrwan had been raised by this time both by sea and land. We have likewise related how greatly he enlarged his dominions in Africa<sup>f</sup>, as a proof of the one, and his signal and surprising victories over the Greek fleet, as a pregnant instance of the other. All these not only helped to spread abroad the terror of his arms, but did moreover facilitate and pave the way to his most favourite design, the wrenching of the kingdom of Egypt out of the hands of the Abbaside Khalifs, and making it the place of his residence, and the scene of his new dynasty. <sup>Removes the khalifat to Egypt.</sup>

<sup>e</sup> This conquest, which he had never lost sight of, though his predecessors had all miscarried in it, he did not begin to put in execution till the year of the Hejra 358; when, having made all necessary provisions for it, he committed the management of that expedition to his faithful and experienced general named Giafar, or Jaafar; of whose quick and surprising success we shall give an account in its proper place. In the mean time this enterprize did not divert Al Moezz from the care of his other foreign conquests, especially those in Sicily and Sardinia; to the last of which he failed in the year of the Hejra 361, and continued a whole year in it; leaving the care of his African dominions to an experienced officer of his, named Yusef Ben Zeiri. He failed thence, in the year following, for Tripoly, in Barbary; where he had not staid long before he received the agreeable news that his general had made himself master of the city of Alexandria. He lost no time, but immediately embarked for it; leaving the government of his old African dominions in the hands of his trusty servant Yusef above-mentioned, and arrived safely at that port, where he was received with all the demonstrations of joy. <sup>f</sup> Here he began to lay the foundation of his new Egyptian dynasty; which was to put a final end to the old one of Kayrwan, after it had continued about the space of sixty-five years. Our readers will find a full account of the former in the subsequent history of Egypt, to which it more properly belongs; and we shall close up the latter with observing, that Al Moezz preserved all his new conquests, as well as his old dominions of Kayrwan, or Africa Proper, under his subjection, and under proper governors; but whose ambition, or rather avarice, suffered them to run quickly into a shameful decay; particularly the new and opulent metropolis of Mobedia, on which its magnificent founder had lavished such immense sums, as well as labour and care, to render it not only the richest and stateliest, but the strongest city in the world, as <sup>Great decay of his old dominions.</sup>

<sup>b</sup> See vol. i. p. 553, & seq. & aut. ibi citat.
ad an.

<sup>c</sup> Vol. i. p. 552.

<sup>f</sup> Ibid. p. 554, & seq.

<sup>e</sup> D'HERBELOT, ubi supra, sub voce Mansour.

<sup>d</sup> Chron.

the reader will own it really was, by what we shall have occasion to say further of it in our history of Barbary; so that we may truly say, the wealth and splendor of this once-famed, though short-lived, state, took its final leave of it at the departure of its last possessor; seeing that whole maritime tract from the Egyptian confines to the Streights of Gibraltar, after having long been the melancholy scene of the most bloody and destructive wars with the Spaniards and other European powers, became at length the nest and property of a most odious piratical crew, under whose tyranny it hath groaned ever since. The Arabs who are in the inland parts, as we have shewn already by the account we have given of them, are not much better than they; who, we are told, are the spawn and offspring of those plunderers that first over-ran the greater part of Africa. One part of whom, having laden themselves with the richest spoils of it, returned back to their own native seats, whilst the other, and perhaps by far the greatest, settled themselves in the most pleasant and fertile lands, built castles and fortresses to secure their new habitations; and not only intermixed themselves gradually with the natives, especially the Berbers in these parts of Barbary, but in time came to domineer over them, and by their continual plunders and exactions reduced them to the lowest pitch of misery and servitude; till at length they fell, in their turn, into as great a degree of slavery under the Turks.

Other governments in Arabia.

Natives oppressed by the Arabs.

Shake off their yoke, A. D. 1051.

New kingdom erected.

On the other hand, upon the decline of the Arabic Mobammedans, three of the five tribes of Africans, which came thither with their leader Melek Ifriki (Y), being no less tired and galled with the Arabian yoke, wrenched the reins out of their hands, and governed successively in Biledulgerid, Libya, and Barbary; so that whilst the Fezan family, which founded the city of Fez, reigned over the two Mauritanias, and that of the Abd'al-raman, which had passed over into Spain, reigned in Cordova, one of the branches of the Zeneti, named Mequinez, erected itself into a kingdom. These were succeeded by another branch of the same tribe, named Magaroans, who stripped that of the Abd'al-ramans, settled in Africa, of most of their conquered provinces; and after having defeated them and the Mequinezes, erected a new empire in Barbary, and made themselves masters of a great part of Numidia.

Not long after, a chief of the tribe of the Zinbaghians, named Abu Tefsin, or Abu Texifin, took up arms against the Magaroans; and, with the assistance of the Zinbaghians, Zeneti, and other Numidian tribes, having defeated both them and the Arabs, took upon him the title of Emir Mumenin, or emperor of the faithful. And hence it is that Arabic writers give that conqueror the title of Morabite, or Morabut, the most of the officers of his victorious army being men of that profession, but who had embraced Mobammedism, whom he had brought over, and sent about every-where among the Africans, to exclaim against the tyranny and insolence of the Arabian Cheyks, and to proclaim liberty to as many as should fight for it under his standards and victorious arms. By which means he quickly saw himself at the head of a powerful army, and in a condition to withstand these petty tyrants, not only the Zinbaghian and Zenetian tribes, but an infinite number of other volunteers out of Numidia repairing to his standards, in hopes of regaining their promised freedom. Hence all the Spanish chronologers give his descendants, who signalized themselves in Spain the appellative of Al Moravides, by changing only the b into a v, with the addition of the particle, conformable to the Arabic idiom. However, the new Emir, being now got at the head of a numerous army, led them directly westward, took the city of Agmel, and soon after the province of Morocco, and gained so many victories over the Arabs and Magaroans, who inhabited these parts, as to be

(Y) These, according to our Arabic author, who makes them to be descended from the tribes of the Sabeans, were, 1. the Zinbaghii; 2. Muzamadini; 3. Zeneti, or Zeneti; 4. Gomerii, and 5. Hoarez; from whom, he tells us, 600 capital families of Berberes, and the most considerable ones in Africa, owe their origin. They settled themselves first in Barbary, and from thence gradually dispersed over the greatest part of Africa (3). We know little else of their rise, and other particulars concerning them, they came into this country, nor of their precise settlements and transactions in it, and must be content with this small sketch of their extract out of the African authors above-mentioned; which is as follows.

The Zinbaghians settled themselves, for the most part, along the mountainous parts of Barca, Nefusa, and Gue-neferis, whilst others of them intermixed themselves with the Zeneti. The Muzamadini spread themselves farther westwards along the coast, even beyond the Streights of Gibraltar, or Mauritania Tingitania, along the ridge of the Great Atlas, and plains adjacent, the whole length of the four provinces of Hea, Sus, Gexilla, and Morocco; where they formerly made a great figure, but are since dwindled into a poor contemptible people.

A number of them likewise joined themselves to the Zeneti, and settled in the province of Tremecen, which is the most western one of the kingdom of Tunis, and became very powerful. Others settled in that of Constantina and Tunis, and have been at perpetual wars with the Turks, as we shall see in the history of that kingdom; but the most powerful, free, and numerous branch of them, is that which settled in Numidia and Libya; with whom the Hoares, who are vassals of the Zinbaghians, are likewise intermixed.

The Gomerians, once a very considerable tribe, spread themselves along the Little Mount Atlas on the Mediterranean coasts, between the frontiers of Ceuta and those of Mauritania Tingitania.

(3) Ibni. Alrak. Genealog. Afric. vide & Leo Africanus, lib. i. c. 9, & seq. Marmol, lib. i. c. 24.

- a able to lay the foundation of that new empire<sup>s</sup>; where we shall resume his history, and that of his kingdom in a subsequent volume.

AMONG the other five tribes, which we have given an account of in the last note, the Zeneti, <sup>Various</sup> Muzamadini, and Zinbaghians, have at different times reigned in Barbary, Numidia, and <sup>changes of go-</sup> Libya, after the decline of the Arabic tyranny; for before that time they were all under the <sup>vernment,</sup> subjection of their Cheyks. But during the reign of the Fezian family, that of the Mequinezes, another branch of the Zeneti, usurped the empire; and after that another branch of the same <sup>by various</sup> tribe, called the Magoroan, then settled in Numidia, stripped that of the Abd'al-ramans of <sup>branches of</sup> sundry provinces they held in subjection in Africa, subdued the Mequinezes, and reigned over <sup>th: Zene.i.</sup> the greater part of Barbary and Numidia; though they were driven out of this last by the Zinbaghian Septums, since nick-named Al Moravites, or Marabuts, from the great hand these monks had in that conquest, as we lately hinted<sup>n</sup>.

Thus far it appears plain, that the Zenetian tribe hath held by far the most considerable share in the government of this part of Africa, in one or other of their families. The Mequinezians, however, were deprived of it by the new sect of Al Mohdians, or, as they are commonly called, Al Mohades, one of whose chiefs, a Marabut preacher, took upon him the title of Al Mohdi, or Mobedi, signifying a director of the law, and became the ringleader of the sect, called from him by that name, as implying the orthodox or unitarians. This man's disciples were by this time become so numerous and zealous, as to enable him to raise a revolt against the Al Moravides; and, assisted by the Muzamadans, waged a long and bloody war against them, and conquered the greatest part of the country; but were at length reduced by another branch of the Zeneti, called the Benemerini; who were, in their turn, subdued by the Benistares, another branch and dynasty of the same tribe; which was at length driven out of Tingitania by the Sharifs of Morocco, as we shall shew in a subsequent volume.

Thus much we thought necessary to premise in this general-account of Africa, in order to give our readers a distinct view of the several nations and governments to which this large <sup>How and by</sup> tract of it hath been subjected, during this epoch, and by what means and steps it hath gra- <sup>what steps</sup> dually settled itself in that variety of states and kingdoms in which we now see it. From whence <sup>settled into</sup> it appears, that whatever names each successive branch hath thought fit to assume, in order to obtain or secure their government, as Al Moravides and Al Mohedes, they all sprung from <sup>their present</sup> some of the five Zenetian tribes mentioned in the last note, especially from the three first; and as for the two last, viz. the Gomerite and Hoarezan, though they have not erected themselves into eminent monarchies, yet they have enjoyed their own respective governments, under their own chiefs, in several considerable provinces, since the declension of the Arabic power; and are equally of the same Arabic extract as those Cheyks which had preceded them during the <sup>various forms.</sup> khalifat. It will also appear, that the three first of these tribes have not only spread their conquests from one end to the other of the Barbary coast, but have likewise enlarged them in the inland much farther than ever the Romans did: all which will be more amply shewn in our general history of Barbary, in a subsequent volume.

HAVING now gone through every material point, which relates to the general history of this <sup>The order and</sup> vast continent, we shall proceed to the particular one of each empire and state contained in it, in <sup>course of the</sup> the most distinct and regular order that it is possible for us to observe in so spacious a field; <sup>su' sequent</sup> beginning first with that of Egypt, as nearest to that of Asiatic Turkey, from whence we set out. <sup>African his-</sup> It was our intention to proceed through those of Nubia and Libya, and enter into that ancient and extensive tract of the Abissinian empire, and smaller kingdoms tributary or adjacent to it: thence, continuing our course eastward to the Cape of Gardafuy, the utmost Afri- can verge on that side, to take in all those states which are along the coast of the Red Sea, and Streights of Babelmandel. Then turning our course south-ward along the coasts of Ajan, Zanguebar, down to the Cape of Good Hope, we proposed to take in every king- dom, not only on that coast, but those in the inland, especially the most considerable and best known to us (the rest being hardly so, but by their names and uncertain situations); afterwards double the cape, and begin a new course northwards along the western side, on which lie, among others of inferior note, the kingdoms of Angola, Kongo, and Loango, and some of the most considerable settlements and conquests of the Portuguese, extending themselves to the Rio de les Macarons, or Crab River; besides some remarkable inland kingdoms contiguous to them, of which we shall likewise take notice in their course. From the mouth of the said Crab River extends the coast of Guiney, or the Golden Coast, through which runs the famed and most advantageous river of Senega; and on the north side of it the country called

<sup>s</sup> Vide & MARMOL, GRAMMAY, LEO AFRICANUS, lib. i. c. 9 & 10.
& al. sup. citat.

<sup>n</sup> LEO, GRAMMAY, MARMOL,

Nigritia; or Negroland, and the vast desert of Sarah, where begins the empire of Morocco and Fez, on the most western verge of the Barbary coast. Whence, steering directly eastward along the Mediterranean coast, by the states of Algiers, Tunis, Tripoli, and in the inland, the Biledulgerid, our last stage will be through the desert of Barca, which extends itself to the confines of the Egyptian kingdom, whence we at first marked out the route we designed to take thro' this history, and where of course our next chapter is now to begin. Such was our purposed route, from which we have been obliged to deviate a little, by the difficulty of finding some materials for certain articles, which, however, we shall insert in another part of the work.

End of the FIFTH VOLUME.